Every now and then she looked behind her, expecting to see the police officers make their appearance on the top of the hill.

Dick Turpin appeared to be reflecting deeply, but suddenly he aroused himself from his reverie, and spoke.

"Maud," he said, "there is only one course which I can adopt!"

"What is it?"

"A very dangerous one, for its failure or its success will be complete! If the latter, all will be well; but I am obliged to confess that the former is more likely!"

'And should it fail?"

"Why, then Mr. Wriggles and his officers would triumph!"

"Then I will not ask you what that plan is,—think of it no more."

"I must either adopt it or remain here," replied Dick "if the latter, the officers are sure to have us, while in the other case there is just a remote possibility that we may escape."

Maud wept.

"Dry your tears!" said Dick—"my scheme is a bold one, and I hope its boldness will ensure its success! Come, come—lean upon my arm again, and walk with me! You will see then what I intend to do!"

Maud obeyed—she felt broken-hearted.

Already in anticipation she saw Dick Turpin heavily loaded with chains, and carried off by the police officers.

As for Dick himself, although his position was so desperate, he was not without the hope that he should be able to elude his foes.

Maud still sobbed and wept most bitterly, but he tried to soothe and calm her in every way he could think of.

Very little success attended his endeavours, and for about a moment Dick looked vexed. He had formed a bold and daring scheme, but this agitation of Maud's threatened to spoil it.

Suddenly, however, a fresh thought appeared to strike him.

He placed his left arm round her so as to support her steps.

He led the way towards the large iron gates which formed the entrance of the grounds surrounding the mansion we have mentioned.

With his right hand he led Black Bess by the bridle.

Maud gave way so entirely to her grief that at first she did not notice in what direction Dick was leading her.

It was not until they actually reached the large gates that she suspected where he was going.

She looked up into his face in terror, but Dick smiled reassuringly.

"Be of good heart," he said; "I feel every confidence in the plan I am about to try,—I might almost say that I am certain to succeed. I shall be glad if it does, as you stand badly in need of rest. What has lately happened has proved too much for you."

"And for you," said Maud, sobbing still.

"And for me," replied Dick, "now that I suffer so much from that wound in the head Mr. Wriggles was kind enough to give me. I shall soon get the better of that, however. Now, our wisest plan will be to confine ourselves to the present,—it is not worth while to look forward to to-morrow."

Maud did not weep quite so violently as before, still the tears rolled down her cheeks, and every now and then she would sob heavily.

"Doubtless these tears relieve your heart," he said. "If they do, let them flow, for they will actually be of assistance to me in carrying out my plan."

"What is the plan?"

"Never mind that now dear one; there is no time to talk about it,—leave all to me. Look, here are the gates; one half is already open, so that we can pass through readily enough."

Such was the case; the large iron gates were not closed, and so Dick Turpin entered the grounds without any difficulty whatever.

But he took the liberty of closing the gates after him.

They now stood in a broad serpentine avenue, which doubtless led to the main entrance of the mansion, but a group of trees hid the mansion itself from their view.

Every object around showed that great pains had been taken to bring the grounds to a high state of cultivation.

Maud trembled excessively, and had it not been for the support of Dick's arm she would doubtless have fallen to the ground.

As it was she walked with great difficulty.

As for Turpin, however, now that he had once decided upon his course of action, he was bold and calm.

He walked along the smooth well-kept avenue with as much ease and confidence as he could have done had the estate owned him for master.

Every now and then he would look back to the gates through which they had entered, but still he saw nothing of the officers.

When at length a turning in the avenue took them out of sight of the gates and brought them in view of the mansion, he felt quite content, so assured was he of the excellence of the plan he had thought of.

Maud's distress and agitation increased at every step.

Had she possessed the power, she would have again asked Dick what he intended to do, but her tongue clung to the roof of her mouth, and she could not utter a syllable.

As he walked along towards the mansion, Dick Turpin continued his efforts to console her.

Presently a faint scream came from Maud's lips.

Dick frowned when he heard it, but looking up he perceived what it was that had caused it.

Coming towards them at a very rapid step was some one in the costume of a gentleman.

He was considerably past the prime of life, yet, for all that, he walked quickly and erectly.

He was very thin, and his cheeks were hollow and sunken.

The dress he had on was no doubt fashionable at the time when he was a young man.

On his head he had a wig, of the kind worn in the preceding reign, and the white frill of his shirt stuck out ostentatiously from his waistcoat.

Maud fixed her eyes upon him with the greatest apprehension.

Something seemed to tell her that he was the owner of the mansion and grounds.

Dick Turpin thought so too, but he still retained his calm, easy confidence.

The old gentleman looked flushed and angry.

He paused when within a few yards of the intruders, and striking his stick violently upon the ground, he said, in a querulous voice:

"How dare you?—who are you?—where do you come from?—what do you want?—who are you I say?" The old gentleman gasped for breath after each question.

Dick Turpin made no attempt to speak, but taking off his hat, bowed profoundly at the close of every sentence.

He bowed again when the old gentleman had done speaking, and with so much courtesy and grace, that the old gentleman could scarcely resist pulling his own hat off and bowing too.

"I am very sorry to intrude upon you," said Dick—very sorry indeed, I can assure you; but I have been compelled to do so on behalf of this lady, who has met with an accident; and all I desire is, that you will grant her that hospitality and assistance which is ever the delight of true Englishmen to afford!"

So saying, Dick bowed again and then put his hat on.

Maud listened in wonder, and so anxious was she to hear what Turpin would say next that she almost forgot her previous fears.

It is certain that she ceased to weep and looked up into Dick's countenance with great curiosity.

The old gentleman coughed.

"Accident, eh?—oh, indeed! Well, I don't know who you are—never saw you before; but if the lady has met with an accident, why, of course, I shall be glad to render her what assistance I can!"

"A thousand thanks," said Dick Turpin; "I felt assured that such would be your reply the moment I caught sight of your benevolent countenance."

The old gentleman smiled, and looked quite pleased. In plain truth, he had a most hideous physiognomy, which caused him to appreciate Dick's compliment all the more highly.

"You are too good sir," he mumbled—"too good!"

"Pray excuse me," said Dick; "I ought to have mentioned it before, but I am in the habit of being address I as 'my lord.'"

Maud clung closer to Dick—she was afraid he was carrying the joke too far.

As for the old gentleman, however, an expression of the almost astonishment first appeared upon his countenance but it quickly vanished, and then he made such a profusion of bows that he must have had quite a pain in his back for a long time afterwards.

"Ten thousand pardons my lord," he said—"ten thousand pardons! But if you will believe me, really I had no idea ——"

"Enough—enough!" said Turpin, waving his hand graciously. "Say no more, I beg. Of course you could not tell. However, if you will lead the way to your house, I will, while we are on the way, relate to you the nature of the accident which has happened."

"I shall be most happy, I am sure," said the old gentleman. "This is the way—straight along this avenue; it leads up to the front door."

"And now to explain," said Dick. "The fact is, that myself and my sister were on our way to join a large hunting party at Southgate. We were rather late in starting, and so we took the nearest way across the country."

Turpin paused, and the old gentleman, being under the impression that he ought to say something, cried quickly:

"Pray proceed, my lord—pray proceed!"

"That, then, was the primary cause of the accident. When within a little distance from here, we found our progress barred by a rather stiff hedge. My sister—who is all spirit—would insist upon leaping it, and I consented. We did so, and my mare cleared the hedge first rate."

Dick patted Black Bess on the neck as he spoke.

"My sister, however," he continued, "was not so fortunate—her horse jumped short and fell, before I could spring from my own horse and run to her assistance; but by scrambling to his feet, and then thoroughly terrified, he set off at a wild gallop for the meadows, leaving my sister lying insensible upon the ground."

"How dreadful!" said the old gentleman, anxiously—"I do hope the lady is not much hurt?"

"Not so much hurt as one would imagine; she is, however, greatly terrified and unnerved. I restored her to consciousness, and then looked around. Her horse was already out of sight, so I gave up the idea of capturing him. My next thought was to find some place of shelter for my sister, where she could rest a little while and recover herself. For this purpose, I stood upon a bank and looked round me, and discovered that yours was not only the nearest habitation, but in fact the only one in sight."

"It is, my lord," said the old gentleman, with a low bow—"it is."

"I looked at it," continued Turpin, "and felt sure that the owner of such an elegant structure would be sure to afford the shelter we needed. Such, then, is the simple account of our intrusion upon you."

"I hope you will pardon me, my lord!" said the old gentleman—"I do hope you will, indeed! But when I saw you approach——"

"Don't recur to that, I beg!" said Dick Turpin.

"Your lordship is too good—much too good!" said the old gentleman, with a pleasant smile. "Here, however, is my poor abode. You may not find it so comfortable as your own abode, but, such as it is, you are fully welcome to it."

"I thank you!" said Turpin; "not only on my own account, but on behalf of my sister's, who is much too agitated and alarmed to speak for herself."

The old gentleman ascended the steps that led to the front door of the mansion as he spoke.

Upon seeing their master approaching, several servants made their appearance, one of whom took charge of Black Bess.

Dick Turpin looked anxiously after his steed, and felt strongly inclined to accompany the servant and see where she was bestowed.

But if he did, their suspicion might be aroused, and so he contented himself with the thought that he would take the earliest opportunity of paying a visit to her in the stable.

The old gentleman offered his services to assist Maud to ascend the steps, and, in a few moments afterwards, the two fugitives found themselves beneath the roof of the mansion, and, as it seemed, in a place of absolute safety

[THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN ARE ALARMED WHILE COUNTING THE MISER'S GOLD.]

CHAPTER DXLII.

DICK TURPIN IS STARTLED BY THE SUDDEN APPEARANCE OF MR. WRIGGLES AND HIS OFFICERS.

"WELCOME," said the old gentleman, ushering Dick Turpin and Maud into a room, and bowing profoundly at every step—"welcome to my poor abode."

"A thousand thanks!" returned Turpin. "I trust it will not be long before I have the opportunity of returning this cordial hospitality."

"Your lordship is too good," said the old gentleman—"much too good. Allow me, my lord, to introduce you to my wife."

Upon entering the room, Dick Turpin had noticed that, seated near the fire, was a very stout and elderly lady, who, upon their entrance, threw down the book she appeared to be reading, and came towards them.

"Allow me, your lordship, to introduce you to my wife, Mrs. Tuttle."

Then, turning to his wife, he added:

"Sophia, allow me to introduce to you Lord ——."

He paused and stammered, then looked inquiringly towards Dick for a name by which he could announce him.

The highwayman did not allow this to embarrass him in the least, but spoke with great readiness the first name which came to the tip of his tongue.

"Alton," he said.

"Thank you, my lord! Sophia, this is Lord Alton and his sister."

The introduction was gone through with a vast deal of politeness and deference upon the part of the owners of the mansion.

Refreshments were brought, and then, for the gratification of Mrs. Tuttle, Dick had to relate over again the cause of his intrusion.

So freely and unhesitatingly did Dick speak, and so much coherence and circumstantiality did his narrative possess, that not a doubt was raised in their minds as to the truth of the whole story.

They well knew it was no uncommon thing for hunting parties to assemble at the place Dick had mentioned.

and such an accident as he had described was one very likely to happen.

Although his enemies were so close at hand, Dick Turpin preserved his calmness in a most admirable manner, and partook of the delicacies before him with as much ease as though he was Lord Alton in reality.

Poor Maud, however, could not control her terror.

The agitation and alarm which she exhibited were not attributed to the real cause, but to the accident which Turpin described as having befallen her.

And so all things turned out for the best.

As for Dick, he felt quite certain that he should be able to maintain the deception which he had commenced.

It was easy enough to see that Mr. and Mrs. Tuttle were completely overwhelmed by the unexpected honour which had fallen upon them.

Never before in their lives had their mansion been graced by the presence of any member of the aristocracy.

Dick Turpin was calm, because, having succeeded in effecting his object so far, he had no doubt about the success of the remainder.

He made sure that Mr. Wriggles would never dream of looking for him there.

In all this he was mistaken, and he was disagreeably reminded of the fact that it is never safe to trust to appearances.

While he imagined himself so secure, danger was in reality rapidly thickening about him.

Mr. Wriggles was making, what might be termed, without any exaggeration whatever, almost superhuman efforts to achieve his capture.

The success he met with will shortly be made apparent, but, for the present, it is our duty to occupy ourselves with the proceedings of the highwayman himself.

While seated in the comfortable room of the country mansion, Dick noticed, with some surprise, that the old gentleman managed to monopolise the whole of the conversation; and, above all things, appeared desirous of preventing his wife from speaking, for when he observed her about to make any remark, he would immediately say something himself, and in such a high, querulous tone of voice that it made what she said inaudible.

Mrs. Tuttle looked very red and indignant at being thus treated.

Unfortunately her voice was thick and soft, and would not reach for any great distance, while her husband's, being a shrill treble, seemed to pierce to the very brain.

At last she resolved to be kept in check no longer, and, observing an opportunity, she raised her voice as loud as she could, and said:

"Timothy, I am ashamed of you—and not no mistake! You engrosses the whole of the conversation, and don't give me not no chance of speaking to his ludship!"

When his wife thus spoke, Mr. Tuttle opened and shut both his hands and his mouth at the same instant, in a convulsive gasping sort of way, and no doubt he gave an inward groan.

Dick raised a glass of wine to his lips to conceal the smile this little episode produced.

He understood clearly enough now the reason why Mr. Tuttle had been so desirous of drowning his wife's voice, and preventing her from speaking.

A complete silence followed her words, for her husband was too overcome either to move or to utter a word, and so the good lady took advantage of this favourable opportunity to display her oratory.

"Your ludship must be quite disgusted with Timothy, I am sure! It is just like him—he ain't got no more manners nor a pig! But sir—your ludship—you're welcome to this 'ere house, and all that's in it, the same as if it was your own!"

Dick bowed and muttered his thanks.

"We are plain people, your ludship," she continued, "as I dare say you've found out! I ain't no lady, and Timothy ain't no gentleman—though he tries hard to pass himself off as such—but I don't. Show your true colours, and stick to 'em s allus my motter!"

"The sentiment does you infinite credit, Mrs. Tuttle," said Dick, and felt himself constrained to say something.

"Your ludship is too obleeging!" said the old lady, in a muster "But, as I said afore, show what you are! I ain't ashamed of my bringings up, if Timothy is! Many's the row I have had with him, your ludship, over this 'ere very subject; but I never would act the fine lady to please him! The fact is, it isn't in me!"

With his countenance expressive of the utmost dismay, Mr. Tuttle sat still in his chair without speaking a word, but every now and then he would dart furious glances upon his better half.

She, however, took not the least notice.

She was talking to a lord—a thing she had never done before in her life; and, what was more, the lord was listening to her with evident pleasure.

"Power out some wine, your ludship," continued Mrs. Tuttle—"don't spare it; and power some out for your sister. If you'll make yourselves at home, why then all's right. I hope your ludship won't be offended with Timothy for trying to make out he was somebody grand,—it's a failing of his, and so I often tells him. 'Lor, sir,—your ludship, I mean—'tain't so many years ago since we kept a chandler's shop in Bermondsey. Them was the times, your ludship, and I often thinks of them with a sithe. Timothy hadn't got so many fine notions in his head then as he has now, though he was allus a little given that way."

Dick bowed and sipped his wine, for it was not very easy to participate in Mrs. Tuttle's conversation.

"Our history, your ludship," continued Mrs. Tuttle, delighted with the idea that a lord was listening to her—"our history is exceedingly simple,—Timothy's uncle dropt off defunct one day, and left this 'ere crib and all the belongings to we."

At this disclosure Mr. Tuttle groaned aloud.

In spite of his dangerous position, Dick enjoyed this scene mightily.

It was by no means the first instance which had come under his notice of people trying to make themselves out to be much better than they really were.

"Not but what, your ludship," continued Mrs. Tuttle, "Timothy is a decentish man, allus exceptin' the fault which I have just been mentiouing; but, as I often say to him, 'Timothy,' say I, 'what's the good of your trying to make out you're a gentleman born when you know very well that you ain't, 'cos you know your father kept a knacker's yard at Dock Head;' but of course, that's neither here nor there—I don't wisb to expose you."

Mr. Tuttle's countenance assumed a greenish tinge.

Evidently he didn't know what to do with himself, and was much disgusted with his wife's conduct, for if ever he had desired to induce the belief that he was a gentleman, he had that morning, but, as usual, his wife, by her plain speaking, had disappointed him.

Gradually Maud forgot her fears, and listened to the disclosures of Mrs. Tuttle with a half-smile upon her countenance.

After this last speech of Mrs. Tuttle's came a long and strange pause.

When there are four persons only partially acquainted with each other, or in conversation, such pauses are common.

Already Turpin had found that Mrs. Tuttle's remarks were not provocative of comment or inquiry, and quite incapable of reply.

As for Mr. Tuttle himself, he was too far gone, and too overcome by his wife's revelations, to be able to open his lips.

Maud was silent, for she had not yet sufficiently overcome her agitation to take an active part in what was going forward.

Mrs. Tuttle's volubility seemed, in some mysterious way or other, to have received a sudden check, for she became quite silent.

Every second made this pause grow more and more unbearable—the only sound which reached their ears was the rustling of the trees in the garden.

Suddenly Dick Turpin started upright in his chair, and assumed a listening attitude.

His quick ear had detected a sound, which had escaped the attention of the others present.

It was that of heavy footsteps walking upon the gravel.

Before he had time to think anything about it, or even to listen long enough to the sound in order to make sure that his senses had not deceived him, the remarkable silence was broken in upon by a heavy knock.

Some one at the front door of the mansion had rapped the ponderous knocker, and brought it down with a dab.

The sharp sound echoed and re-echoed through the mansion, and those who heard it started violently, as they would have done had a pistol been discharged suddenly and unexpectedly.

"Oh, crikey!" exclaimed Mrs. Tuttle. "What in the name of gracious, is that?"

Bang came the knock at the front door again.

Maud screamed slightly.

Mr. Tuttle started to his feet, and said:

"It's—it's some one at the front door!"

Bang came the knock for the third time, as if those who were without had determined upon entering.

"I'll—I'll go and see what it is!" gasped Mr. Tuttle.

And before Dick could interpose and prevent him from leaving the room, the ex-chandler opened the door and rushed into the passage.

He seemed glad to escape.

No sooner had he gone, however, than Dick closed the door behind him and locked it.

"Oh my, your ludship!" said Mrs. Tuttle. "What are you going to do?"

"Hush—hush!" said Turpin, coming towards her. "You have now an opportunity, if you desire to embrace it, of seeing my brains blown out and scattered upon the floor!"

"Your ludship's brains!" exclaimed Mrs. Tuttle. "What a awful idea!"

"You don't desire it, then?"

"Certainly not, your ludship!"

"Hush—hush! I am no lord! I have come here under false colours! I now feel heartily ashamed of myself for having done so!"

"Not a lud?"

"No, I am not a lord! But I am so pleased with your candid, open, and kindly disposition, that I don't hesitate to tell you who I am! Listen, then, and prepare yourself for a surprise! I am Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

Mrs. Tuttle screamed.

"Oh lawks!" she screamed, and then she sank back in her chair with such violence that it threatened to demolish it.

"Yes, I am Dick Turpin, the highwayman, and my life is entirely in your hands, for those knocks at the front door were given by the police officers in search of me For my own part, I would not ask your protection, but would take my own part; you see, however, that I have some one with me—not my sister, but my wife—it is her I want to spare from the police officers."

"But they are here," said Mrs. Tuttle; "how can I save you?"

"That I cannot tell," returned Dick; "if you can't do so in any way, I must do the best I can for myself."

"Oh dear me!" sighed Mrs. Tuttle. "Criky me if this ain't romantic! But as for the wosifers, your ludship, I hates 'em quite as much as you do, the sneakin' vagabones! I shall never forget a trick they once served me, which, however's, neither here nor there, and I would gladly do anything to spite the vagabones!"

"Then you have the opportunity of doing so," said Turpin, "and much more effectually than you could ever have hoped for. All you have got to do is to be quick and hide us in some place where they can't find us."

"Ah, wheels within wheels I allus do say; that reminds me of them folks' ancestors what lived in this 'ere crib afore. Mr. Tuttle's uncle once hid King Charles the First in this werry hidentical room."

"And was he found?" asked Dick, pointedly.

"No, he warn't; the sogers searched all about and gave it up in despair, and though they was very nearly-certain he was hidin' in the house somewhere."

"Show us this place," exclaimed Dick—"conceal us in it, and deny all knowledge of us to the officers, and you will not only render me and my wife a service for which we shall for ever be grateful, but you will also spite the officers to your heart's content!"

"I will do it," said Mrs. Tuttle, with an air of tragic resolution—"I'll do it—criky me if I don't—but I must be quick."

"You must," said Dick—"quick—quick, or it will be too late, and the chance will be lost!"

CHAPTER DXLIII.

MRS. TUTTLE SECRETES DICK TURPIN AND MAUD IN THE RECESS.

"Come this way—come this way!" cried Mrs. Tuttle, and she waddled across the room towards the fireplace, closely followed by Dick Turpin and Maud.

She paused at one side of the huge chimney-piece, and, pressing a concealed spring, caused a narrow door to open.

A dark-looking recess was disclosed beyond it.

"That is the place," she said. "Enter—be quick; it is not large, but will hold you both, and take my word for it, you won't be found!"

Mrs. Tuttle almost pushed the fugitives into the dark little recess, and as soon as they were fairly inside it she closed the door.

The snap which the spring gave when it flew into its place caused Dick to feel an uneasy sensation about his heart, for he could not conceal from himself the fact that his position was ticklish, that he was a prisoner, and that he relied for his safety entirely upon the excellence of his place of concealment.

And yet not exactly that, for Mrs. Tuttle would have to call into exercise all her tact.

Just as that lady closed the secret door, the thought suddenly crossed her mind that her husband had gone out of the room, and, as he had not been cautioned to the contrary, would disclose all to the officers.

She shook her fist at the door, and her face became clouded with vexation.

"There is no help for it," she muttered; "we must take things as they come, but how I am to manage with Timothy is more than I can tell."

She hastened towards the door, and unlocked it silently.

The footsteps which Dick had heard and which had just apprised him of his danger were indeed those of Mr. Wriggles and his officers, who had followed him so far and then lost the track.

From the top of the hill he had made an accurate inspection of the whole of the country, and found that those he sought were not in sight.

Yet he could not divest himself of the notion that they were somewhere close at hand.

The only habitation in sight was the residence of Mr. Tuttle, and the appearance of this mansion was such as to make it very unlikely Dick Turpin was hiding anywhere in its vicinity.

Mr. Wriggles, however, had discovered that Dick Turpin was one who would do without the least hesitation what anyone else would shrink from.

He thought as a kind of last hope, no harm would result if he made his way to the mansion and inquired of its inmates whether anyone answering to the description of the highwayman had been seen by them.

Accordingly this was the course of action he decided upon, and so we see him and his officers standing at the front door of the mansion knocking for admission.

Mr. Tuttle had ran out into the passage with the intention of opening the door himself, but after going a few steps he paused.

"Confound that beastly woman," he said, "she has thrown me entirely off my guard! The idea of my doing such a ridiculous thing as to run to open the front door—that just shows how she has flurried me. Oh, Sophia, Sophia, you are the plague of my life!"

The officers, impatient at the delay and angry that no notice was taken of their summons, knocked again.

Mr. Tuttle lived in as great style as he could, and so he had a hall porter, who sat in a huge leather easy chair, with nothing else to do but attend to the door.

Upon the present occasion the easy chair was vacant, and it would seem that the porter was in some place where the knock at the front door was inaudible.

Mr. Tuttle was very angry.

His servants gave him an immense deal of trouble, for they quickly found out who he was, or rather, who he had been, and despised him accordingly, and set him quite at defiance.

"I suppose I must open the door myself," said Mr. Tuttle. "I will discharge that villain this very day! He ain't fit to live in a gentleman's house. I'll discharge him!"

It was during this time that Turpin was having the extraordinary conversation with Mrs. Tuttle which we have recorded in the preceding chapter.

Feeling very angry with himself, with his wife, with his visitors, with his servants, and with those who were knocking so persistently, Mr. Tuttle walked along the hall, and finally opened the door.

There stood Mr. Wriggles, with his countenance more purple and irascible than ever, and his men in a throng behind him on the steps.

Mr. Wriggles's suspicions had been excited and he roused by the inattention which was given to his summons for admission; therefore, as soon as the door was opened, he stepped in.

This proceeding and the appearance of the officers took Mr. Tuttle completely by surprise, and he glared at them in a manner that was ludicrous to behold.

"Why is all this delay?" roared Mr. Wriggles—"why was the door not opened before? I'll complain to your master, you blackguard!"

"My master?" gasped Tuttle.

"Yes, you ill-looking son of a gun! You are a good deal too old for service! You ought to be hung up on a hook, and pass the remainder of your days in peace!"

"Mind what you are about!" said Mr. Tuttle, shaking his fists indignantly. "I tell you an Englishman's house is his castle, and beware how you invade it! You have insulted me; but beware—beware, I say, or you will rouse the British lion within me!"

"Don't excite yourself, old cock, but just run and tell your master that his majesty's police are at the door. Make haste, or you will find yourself in the wrong box!"

"My master?" said Mr. Tuttle again. "What do you mean—are you mad?"

"No; but it strikes me you are—you must be an escaped lunatic!"

Mr. Tuttle shook with passion, and felt as though he would have liked to fell Mr. Wriggles to the earth, but he thought of their number and the probable result of an encounter, and his discretion got the better of his valour.

At this moment Mrs. Tuttle opened the door of the room in which she had been sitting.

"What is the meaning of all this?" she said. "Why is all this uproar?"

"Beg your pardon, mum," said Mr. Wriggles, taking off his hat and making a bow, "and meaning no offence to you, mum, but we can't get any satisfaction from this old bloke, who we take to be a lunatic?"

This gave the worthy lady an idea.

"Yes, yes. Alas!" she cried, "he is just a little bit touched."

Mr. Wriggles tapped his forehead.

"Don't pay any attention to him; fix you eye on him; he is quite harmless. What did you please to want?"

"Mum," said Mr. Wriggles, "I am very sorry to interrupt you, but we are in search of a great criminal. We have tracked him to near this spot, and I called to inquire if you had seen him, thinking it possible you might have done so?"

"Was he a man?" asked Mr. Tuttle.

"In course he was," said his wife. "Didn't the gentleman say so? Ho'd your row, Tim, and don't interfere!"

Poor Mr. Tuttle looked around him with a perfectly indescribable expression on his countenance. He was quite sure some one was mad, but he could not decide whether it was himself, or his wife, or his strange visitors.

Mr. Wriggles went on:

"He is dressed in a kind of officer's uniform: scarlet coat, trimmed with gold lace, and horseman's boots."

"Had he got his sister with him?" asked Mr. Tuttle.

"Why, old fellow," said Mr. Wriggles, "you don't mean to say you have seen him?"

"No—no!" exclaimed Mrs. Tuttle, quickly. "Don't pay any attention to him—he is mad!"

"Mad?" repeated her husband, looking more bewildered and enraged than ever—"mad? Yes, somebody is mad! It—it isn't me! Oh, Sophia—Sophia! What do you mean?"

"Beg your pardon, mum," said Mr. Wriggles, "I see you're right, his case is quite hopeless, I should say; only it strikes me as being strange, asking that question, as the very chap we are in search of happens to have a woman with him."

"Young and pretty?" said Mr. Tuttle again.

"Come, come, old chap, don't you interfere, but let me talk with the lady! I must fix my eye upon you."

"D—n your eye," said Mr. Tuttle. "I am no more mad than you are!"

"Cracked people always say that," remarked the police officer.

"Well, mum," he added, "that's the description, and if you happen to have seen any person answering to it, you will do me a very great favour by saying so. They are desperate characters, I can tell you!"

"Are they thieves?" said Mr. Tuttle.

"Well, one is Dick Turpin, the highwayman."

"D—D—Dick Turpin? And all my plate on the sideboard!"

"He—what?" said Mr. Wriggles quickly. "Say that again!"

"Don't heed him," said Mrs. Tuttle. "I tell you he is mad, and don't know what he says!"

"Oh, you false woman, you know I am not mad! You wicked old wretch—you know they are both in the dining-room, and one of them is Dick Turpin, and all my plate's on the sideboard!"

As he spoke these words, the owner of the mansion turned round and made a rush, as though he would have entered the room and seen after the safety of his property.

But his wife adroitly stepped before him, and caught him in her arms.

She stroked and patted him on the head, saying:

"Come, come, Tim—Tim, be quiet—be quiet, there's a good lad, don't excite yourself!"

"Let me go, you female hyena!" said Mr. Tuttle, struggling to release himself. "Come on, officers—come on, I see how the land lies! Run into that room—there he is! I dare say he has pocketed all my plate by this time."

Mr. Wriggles was beginning to get very much bewildered.

However, he understood that he was to run into that room which Mr. Tuttle indicated, and calling aloud for his men to follow him, he did so.

He entered, and of course found the room empty.

Mrs. Tuttle followed, dragging he husband after her.

"Why, there is nobody here," roared Mr. Wriggles—"nobody at all!"

Mr. Tuttle looked round and saw that Dick Turpin had disappeared.

His eyes wandered to the sideboard, upon which a profusion of plate was rather ostentatiously displayed, and found that it presented its usual appearance—nothing had been removed.

He clenched his fists and struck himself some very severe blows on the head, in order to make out whether he was awake, or whether he was the victim of some ridiculous dream.

"I told you it was no good to pay any attention to what he said," cried Mrs. Tuttle. "He is mad, and when the change of the moon comes, there is no doing any good with him, though at most other times he is quiet. "Now Tim—Tim," she said, "do be quiet, and don't make fools of these officers any more, or else you will get yourself into trouble!"

"Am I mad?" asked Mr. Tuttle, wildly—"am I mad?' Just tell me that? Am I mad, I say?"

"If we're to judge by appearances," said Mr. Wriggles, "you are about as clean off it as anybody well could be. If you were in your proper senses, do you think you would have said Dick Turpin was here, when you must have known very well all the while that the room was quite empty?"

"Empty?" said Mr. Tuttle, endeavouring to collect his scattered thoughts — "empty? It was not empty. Where's his lordship? — where's his lordship's sister? Oh, Sophia, Sophia! you are at the bottom of all this, but what it means I can't think. Tell me, I say again, where's his lordship?—where's his lordship's sister?"

"Yours is a hopeless case, old file, I should say," remarked Mr. Wriggles. "Why, anybody could tell you're as mad as a March hare, and you're not fit to be allowed your liberty!"

CHAPTER DXLIV.

MR. TUTTLE DOUBTS WHETHER HE IS IN HIS RIGHT SENSES OR NOT.

MR. WRIGGLES and his officers considered the very inquiries made by Mr. Tuttle as direct evidence of his insanity.

No words, however well chosen, could give the least idea of the state of his feelings, he was enraged beyond measure, and moreover mystified in no small degree.

"Will you all sit down," said Mrs. Tuttle, "and have a drop of something short? I am sorry Tim, poor fellow, should have given you so much trouble."

"Don't 'poor fellow' me," howled her husband.

"It's a great affliction," said Mrs. Tuttle, "and a great grief to me. It worrits all the flesh of my bones, that it does! 'Taint often he is so violent as what he has been this morning. Generally he is all right if you can but fix your eye upon him. Now, Tim," she added, "just look at me."

Mr. Tuttle howled again.

"Oh, you viper," he cried—"oh you viper, to treat your husband in this way! And you," he added, turning to Mr. Wriggles and his party—"you, who are you? You can't be officers; you must be idiots, or else you wouldn't let this woman make fools of you like she does!"

"Come, come, Tim," said Mr. Wriggles, endeavouring to fix his eye upon him, "don't be violent—pray don't, for your poor wife's sake—you must be a great grief and trouble to her, poor thing!"

Poor Tuttle gnashed his teeth, and, seizing hold of his wig, dashed it violently upon the ground, and stamped upon it.

All these actions, which resulted merely from the state of passion he had worked himself up to, were set down as positive proof that he was out of his senses.

Mrs. Tuttle went to the sideboard, and poured out glasses of brandy for the officers.

"There," she said, "drink that—it is a drop of good."

"Many thanks, mum," said Mr. Wriggles; "and 'eres hopin' you'll be as well and kind hearted as you are at this minute for the rest of your life, and that poor Tim will give you less trouble either by getting better, or else by kicking the bucket, which, though I am sorry for him, I can't help thinking is the best thing he can do."

"You wretch—you infamous villain! Would you come into a gentleman's house and insult him in the manner you have insulted me? I will let you know that such things are not to be done with impunity! You shall be reported! I will have this matter thoroughly sifted!"

"Now, Tim—Tim—calm yourself—do be calm!" said his wife. "You ought to know very well that you don't know what you are talking about!"

"But I do, you perfidious villain, and you know it, but you shall suffer for this, take my word for it—you shall remember this day, and remember it to your sorrow!"

"I say, mum," cried Mr. Wiggles, "'eres axin' your pardon, but we must be going, as we have got our duty to attend to; but don't you think that your life's in danger—don't you think you ought to keep him under some kind of restraint? He ought to have a strait jacket put on you know, and chained down on a bed in the regular style, and fed on cold water and hard blows, till he gets better! Lor' bless you, mum, you'd be surprised if you knew how quick the patients recover under that treatment! I can't abear mad people myself, making so bold, mum, and if I was in your place I shouldn't rest till he was locked up!"

"And I won't rest till you are locked up!" screamed Mr. Tuttle. "Do you hear that, you purple-faced villain? You shall suffer dearly for your conduct!"

The least allusion to the remarkable colour of his countenance put Mr. Wriggles in a towering passion, and it was with difficulty that he resisted the impulse of rushing forward and strangling Tim on the spot.

But he thought he was only a poor lunatic, and determined to spare him.

"Good morning, mum," said Mr. Wriggles, preparing to take his departure. "Then you have not seen the individual we are in search of?"

"No I have not," replied Mrs. Tuttle stoutly.

"False woman, you have," cried her husband—"you know you have—you know he sat here in this very identical chair—that is where his lordship sat, who anybody could see with half an eye was Dick Turpin, for hadn't he got a red coat on, and hadn't he got a sword by his side and pistols in his belt, and boots on that came up over his knees? You know he had, you hyena, and his sister was with him—that is his lordship's sister, or Dick Turpin's sister, or whoever else's sister she might be—and where are they gone? I know they were here!"

Mr Wriggles was staggered by the first part of the speech, and hardly knew what to make of it, but as unfortunate Tuttle proceeded, and became more and more excited and incoherent, he set down what he said as being nothing more than the ravings of a disordered brain.

Once more bidding Mrs. Tuttle good-bye, and having received from that lady the assurance that no one of the sort had been in the room, Mr. Wriggles took his departure, descended the steps in the front of the mansion, and walked slowly along the avenue leading to the gates.

As he proceeded, he quickly grew meditative.

"I'd have given a guinea," he muttered, "if Jim Lickfold had been with me. With all his faults, I will say he was a rare good one to see through a thing! I ain't satisfied over this 'ere job now. I can't help thinking there's something behind it. I must think—I must turn it all over in my mind from first to last. The question is, is he mad? He must be; for if he is in his senses, I'm out of mine. And yet what a many odd things he said! It could not have been madness that made him ask whether he'd got his sister with him. And how was he able to describe him so well? It puzzles my brain. I am half inclined to think he wasn't mad, after all. I must think it out—I must sit down quietly somewhere, and think it out!"

Leaving Mr. Wriggles to carry out his resolution, we will return to Dick Turpin and Maud.

Being placed in full possession of all the facts, can the reader form an idea of the state of mind they were in during the time they were shut up in the little recess at the side of the fireplace?

In this place of concealment they could hear perfectly all that was said in the room.

At first Dick was at a loss to understand what was meant, but by degrees he comprehended the case.

Once or twice, however, he gave himself up for lost, and when Mr. Tuttle described him so graphically at the last, Dick shut his teeth close together, and prepared for the worst.

As soon as the officers had departed, poor Mr. Tuttle sank down in a chair.

There can be little doubt that he was at this time really and truly mad, for his mind was in a state of utter confusion.

The look of his face alarmed his wife, and she came towards him with the intention, if possible, of soothing him.

But as soon as he saw her approaching, he started wildly to his feet, and shricked:

"Off—off, you perfidious woman! Don't come near me—don't touch me! Go away from me, I say! I am not mad, and you know it!"

"I don't know what is the matter with you, Tim," said Mrs. Tuttle; "but the manner in which you treat me is enough to draw tears out of pavia'-stones! It is cruel and unmanly of you to treat me in this way!"

Mrs. Tuttle sat down in a chair, and burst into tears.

Her poor husband's mystification increased.

"So confused was his mind, that he could not determine whether he was the injured party or whether his wife was.

There she sat, however, sobbing and crying bitterly.

"Oh, Sophia, Sophia!" he cried, with ludicrous pathos. "Do explain all this dreadful affair—pray do! I am going mad! I feel it. My head's going round and round like a coffee-mill. It is, Sophia. Do explain things to me!"

"I will not, Tim! I don't know what is the matter with you, but I hope you ain't going mad. Will you take my advice?"

"What is it?"

"Go upstairs and lie down on the bed, and go to sleep. That is the very best thing you can do, Tim; and when you wake up you will feel all right, and if you want anything explained, why, then, I can explain it. I can't help thinking that you've been somewhere unbeknown to me, and got something to drink which don't agree with you."

Poor Tuttle didn't know, but he felt it would be a great relief to lie down on a bed in a quiet room, and go to sleep; he wanted to rest his brain, and free himself from the state of mystification he was in.

"I will go, Sophia," he said—"I will go: and I hope I shall be able to go to sleep."

"Ah, Tim, try; and, take my word for it, when you wake up you will find yourself all right."

"I am going—I am going."

With these words, Mr. Tuttle shuffled out of the room.

His wife sank down on the chair again, and cried in good earnest.

Dick Turpin was anxious to be released from his place of confinement, but he did not know how to open the secret door himself, and he thought his best plan would be to let Mrs. Tuttle shed her tears and grow calm.

After a while he ventured to tap gently with his knuckles upon the door.

The summons was at first taken no notice of, but presently she heard it, and, rising to her feet, pressed the spring and caused the little secret door to fly open.

Maud and Turpin both sprang forward and grasped her by the hand.

"How can I thank you?" said the latter. "It is to you and you alone that I owe my life and liberty on this occasion! Who knows, perhaps some day or other the time will come when I shall be able to do you a favour in return for the one you have done me to-day?"

"I shall never forget you," sobbed Maud, "never—never!"

As might be expected, Mrs. Tuttle was one of those persons who feel uncomfortable while being praised or thanked, and so she went on hastily:

"Don't say anything about it. It's all right! I have had my revenge upon the ossifers, and that's chiefly all I wanted! I have served them out—they are gone—and you are free to depart!"

"And we will leave you," said Turpin, "but it will be with much regret! I am afraid to ask any further favour at your hands, and yet——"

"Speak out—tell me what I can do!"

"Well, then, it is quite possible that the police officers are just a little suspicious, and are watching in the neighbourhood, and if such is the case, why, I should be discovered before I had gone many yards. What I was going to ask was that you would allow us to remain here until night?"

"You shall—you are quite welcome! You can remain here in this room. I will leave the secret door open, and if anything of an alarming character happens, all you will have to do will be to slip into the recess and close the door after you."

"Ten thousand thanks, dear madam!" said Dick Turpin—"ten thousand thanks! I wish I could repay you for this estimable service!"

Mrs. Tuttle withdrew, leaving both to themselves.

"Oh, Dick," said Maud, "this is truly dreadful! I wish that we were far away from this spot; I am terrified to death!"

"Calm yourself," said Turpin—"there is no immediate danger now. I would gladly leave this place behind myself, but at present it would be unwise to make the attempt to do so. We ought to be exceedingly glad that we have obtained permission to remain—I can assure you that it is much more than I expected. I hope and believe that we shall remain in safety until nightfall, and then, when the darkness comes, we shall stand a chance of getting away, even supposing that Mr. Wriggles's suspicions are excited, and that he is lurking somewhere in the neighbourhood."

"I wish night would come now," said Maud.

CHAPTER DXLV.

DICK TURPIN FINDS HIMSELF SURROUNDED BY MR. WRIGGLES AND HIS OFFICERS.

Most heartily did Dick Turpin reiterate his fair companion's wish.

It was now only about mid-day, and though it was that season of the year when the days are shortest, many hours would have to pass away before it would be dark enough for them to steal away from the mansion unperceived.

Dick occupied himself with the difficult task of lessening Maud's apprehensions, and when a short time had elapsed, without the occurrence of any incident, and without their privacy being disturbed, she grew calmer, and began to think that after all, things would turn out well.

What gave Turpin the most uneasiness was that Black Bess was placed somewhere, he could not tell where, so that, should he be compelled to beat a precipitate retreat, he would not know in what direction to run in order to find his gallant mare.

To have attempted to leave the house in order to obtain this important information would be running a very great risk—more risk, indeed, than he felt justified in running.

It was quite likely that some of the officers were lurking about, and if so he would be seen, and all the advantage which he had hitherto gained would be lost.

Nor was it possible to send Maud out upon this errand, for she would be recognised by the officers as quickly as himself.

Under these circumstances, then, he had no other resource than to remain perfectly still, and content himself in the best way he could.

Although they were busily occupied in conversing together upon the subject, yet the time hung very heavily upon their hands.

In the afternoon Mrs. Tuttle entered, and Dick was sorry to perceive that her countenance bore unmistakeable symptoms of distress and grief.

Hastily rising from his seat, he went towards her, and took hold of her hand.

"What has distressed you?" he asked, kindly. "Has anything amiss happened?"

"No, no—it's nothing now."

"Have you seen the officers?"

"No. I think the vagabons is gone, for which let us be joyful! I am glad I served them out; but poor Tim, he has been in a dreadful state!"

Dick, with difficulty, repressed a smile.

"It was too bad to serve him so," he said—"a great deal too bad! Where is he now? Did he take your advice—has he gone to bed?"

"Yes, and, I am happy to say, has at length dropped off to sleep; but he is so flustered and puzzled in his mind, that I was afraid he would go mad in earnest!"

"He will be all right when he wakes. Sleep is just the thing to put him right, and when he wakes I should advise you to try and persuade him that what he remembers of these events is nothing more than a dream."

"I am afraid I couldn't make him believe that."

"I think you could; or, if you like, after I am gone, you could explain matters to him from first to last. It will always be a source of regret to me, however, if what you have been kind enough to do for myself and my wife is a cause of any unhappiness between yourself and your husband."

"Many thanks, sir; but I don't think you need fear about that. I know how to manage Tim."

"No doubt you do; but I can't help repeating the hope that what has happened will not interfere in any way with your peace and happiness; if it does not, then I shall be glad that chance led me to this place. I can assure you it was my last resource. If I had not taken shelter here, I should by this time have been in the hands of my foes."

"And is it possible," said Mrs. Tuttle, "that you are the Dick Turpin I have heard so much about? I'll declare my poor brain is almost as much upset as Mr. Tuttle's!"

"I am Dick Turpin; but whether I am the Dick Turpin you have heard about is more than I can tell."

"Well, I have the Flying Post, and I have read some queer things in that about you—awful things, too, which, if you had done, I think I should feel sorry I had given you shelter."

"But surely," said Dick, "you don't believe what they put in the newspapers? You are quite wrong if you do. But tell me what it is you have read about Dick Turpin?"

"Why, I read once a horrid thing, which, however, I don't believe you ever done, and I judge that from the look of your face."

"I am much obliged to you. But now tell me. You have raised my curiosity to the utmost."

"Why, it said in the Flying Post that Dick Turpin and three or four other men dressed themselves like country labourers, and blackened their faces."

"Did it say that Dick Turpin blacked his nose?"

"Oh yes!"

"Then we'll say, if the rest of the tale is true, that that at least is a lie. But go on, I am full of curiosity to know what the newspapers say of me."

"I wish I could find you the paper; but it's a good while ago, and I don't suppose I could. However, I recollect it, and I dare say that will do quite as well."

"Well, then, Dick Turpin and these men that were with him, all with their faces blackened, broke open the door of a little cottage somewhere in Essex."

"Where?"

"I don't know where; but I think it said near Epping Forest."

"Well, what did Dick Turpin and these men do?"

"Why, in this cottage there lived a poor old woman, who was scarcely able to do anything. She was all alone, her husband was dead, and she kept no servants in the house with her."

Dick nodded, but did not speak, and by the expression of his face it could be seen that he was far from being pleased with the tale that was being told him.

"It said in the Flying Post," continued Mrs. Tuttle, "that Dick Turpin and the gang of villains that were with him knew very well that this poor old woman had got about three hundred pounds concealed in her cottage, which was all the money she had got to keep her up to the end of her life, for she was quite past work."

"But surely it didn't say in the paper that Dick Turpin or anybody else robbed an old woman in such circumstances?"

"Oh yes, it did though! They all rushed into the little cottage, and the poor old woman was much frightened when she saw their black faces. Dick Turpin put a pistol to her ear and said he would shoot her if she made the least noise, while the others set to work to search the cottage, but they failed to find what they sought."

"And what then?"

"Dick Turpin asked the old woman to confess where the money was hidden, and although he threatened dreadful things, she refused. At last, he said he would put her on the fire in the cottage, and keep her there either until she was burnt to death or until she confessed where the money was hidden."

Dick started angrily to his feet, and his eyes flashed.

"Did it say that?"

"It did," replied Mrs. Tuttle, "and more, for the old woman still refusing to say where the money was to be found, he caught hold of her by the arms and forced her on the fire. The poor creature bore the pain as long as she could, until at last she was forced to confess where the money was. Then, and not till then, was she taken off the fire, and the villains, having taken every penny of the money, left her in the hut by herself to do the best she could."

"It's a monstrous lie, though doubtless, as it is in print, it will be believed! To you, madam," he continued, "I give you my word that I never perpetrated any such atrocity as you have recounted to me. I could scarcely believe that anyone would be guilty of such an act, or that anyone could imagine it."

"I saw it in print," said Mrs. Tuttle; "but when I looked in your face I felt sure it was false, for you don't look as though you could do such a thing."

"I could not—I could not, but I will have some revenge for all this. Did you say it was the Flying Post that contained the account?"

"Yes."

"Then let the Flying Post and those who belong to it look out; I shall not forget, rest assured! I should be base indeed, had I been guilty of such a hellish piece of work!"

Dick was much exasperated to think that such an act should have been attributed to him.

"It is a lie," he said—"a base lie from beginning to end! Many a time I have rode up to a traveller on the highway and demanded from him that which he could well afford to spare, but never in all my life have I disgraced myself so far as to rob the poor, still less to take from an aged woman what little wealth she had to keep her from starvation."

At this moment the door was opened, and a head projected into the room.

Hearing the sound, Dick turned and saw that it was Mr. Tuttle who stood upon the threshold.

A look of blank amazement came over the poor fellow's face.

He clapped both hands to his head, and said:

"Oh, your lordship, there you are, and there's your lordship's sister! Are you there, or are you not? I'm mad—I'm mad—I'm quite sure I'm mad! I came downstairs thinking to myself that if I found the room empty, and Sophia all right, I should consider I was in my senses, but now I know I'm the victim of a delusion! I'm mad! I'm mad!"

Uttering these words, Mr. Tuttle abruptly withdrew from the room.

His wife looked alarmed.

"I am sadly afraid," said Dick, "that it will prove too much for his intellect. Luckily, it has grown darker rather earlier than usual this afternoon, and now the obscurity is great enough to make it safe for us to leave without much fear of being seen by Mr. Wriggles and the other police officers."

"I hope you will escape," said Mrs. Tuttle.

"I have one more favour to ask of you," said Dick, "which is that you will show us the way to the stable where my horse has been placed, and show me, too, the way where I am least likely to be seen."

"I will do that willingly," said Mrs. Tuttle. "I don't believe what I have read about you. I feel sorry for you! I should like to spite those interfering fellows. And it's quite certain you've done me no harm, and taken nothing from me, so follow me—I'll show you the stable."

Dick Turpin linked Maud's arm within his own, and followed Mrs. Tuttle into the hall and out to the back portion of the premises.

Although not dark, yet it was dusk enough to make objects but a short distance off appear confused and indistinct, and Dick felt almost sure that he should be able to escape unseen by his foes, even if they were lurking about, and of this he was doubtful,—it was quite as likely as not that they were some distance away.

The stable was reached and entered without the occurrence of any incident, or without their experiencing the least interruption.

Dick's heart beat with joy when he once more placed his hand on the neck of his gallant steed.

Her trappings were close at hand, and she was saddled and bridled with a speed that would have done credit to an experienced ostler.

Dick Turpin led Black Bess to the stable door.

"What shall you do with your companion?" asked Mrs. Tuttle—"how shall you take her?"

"I shall have to take her on the saddle before me," said Dick, "It won't be the first time she has had to do such a thing."

Dick Turpin mounted as he spoke, and then bending down, took hold of Maud's arm, and swung her up into the saddle before him.

He clasped her tightly round the waist with one hand and in the other held the reins.

"Farewell!" he cried, addressing Mrs. Tuttle—"a thousand thanks for the kindness you have displayed towards me, and the service you have rendered! I shall be rejoiced if I ever have the opportunity of repaying you."

"Is it his lordship? Is it his lordship's sister? Where is Dick Turpin? Which is Dick Turpin? Does he wear tall boots?" said a voice, which all three immediately recognised.

It was that of Mr. Tuttle, and immediately afterwards that individual, looking more excited and more insane than ever, made his appearance.

At the very same time another voice cried:

"Now we have him, my lads! Be quick! I told you how it would be! Take care this time that he doesn't make his escape!"

Those words were spoken by a familiar voice—at least, familiar to Dick Turpin and his companion.

Maud screamed, and a cold chill crept over Dick's heart.

The words were spoken by Mr. Wriggles, and were addressed to his followers, who now completely surrounded Black Bess and her double burden.

CHAPTER DXLVI

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN ARRIVE AT THE ROSE AND CROWN, AND ARE ALARMED WHILE COUNTING THE MISER'S GOLD.

Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack wended their way through the New Forest without meeting with any further interruption, and without the recurrence of any incident important enough to be placed on record.

While journeying on, however, they occupied themselves with talking over their late proceedings, for from the time they left the Golden Lion adventures had crowded so thickly upon them that they had had scarcely any opportunity for conversation or the exchange of thought.

Above all, they were surprised to find their old acquaintance, the Governor of Newgate, under such strange circumstances.

Mr. Tapner had made himself from the first a foe to Tom King, and without having any particular reason for doing so.

The highwayman's feelings towards him were not at all of a friendly nature, and yet, after what had occurred, Tom King could not help feeling sorry at seeing his old enemy in so sad a plight.

Whether they should ever encounter him again they knew not, nor was it probable they would ever learn by whom he had been attacked. Their suspicion pointed to the two turnkeys, Biggs and Wilson, but they had no proofs and scarcely any grounds for believing them guilty.

One subject, however, afforded them the greatest consolation.

They had run some risk and had much trouble, but they had succeeded in their attempt quite as well, or even better, than they had anticipated.

They had not the whole of the miser's treasure, but yet almost as much as they could carry about with them with any comfort to themselves.

By the time morning had dawned, the forest was left behind, and the highwaymen found themselves in a narrow cross-country road.

It was agreed that their future course should be left to Tom King, and so he spoke as follows:

"This adventure," he said, "has turned out in a manner quite contrary to my expectations. Of course I am glad that it has done so. The money we now carry between us, added to that we have already obtained, and which Dick Turpin has in keeping at the deserted mansion, will make more than sufficient for the carrying out of our purpose, therefore, I think we cannot do better than make our way back to the deserted mansion with all speed, taking the most unfrequented paths we can find, and using every means to elude observation."

"Agreed—agreed!" cried Claude and Jack at once, and then the latter added:

"It would be foolish of us to run any risk by molesting travellers. We have no necessity for stopping anyone."

"None whatever. We are now in a thinly-populated part of the country, and there is little fear that we shall be seen by anyone. About mid-day, however, I should advise a halt. It will be well for us to rest both ourselves and our horses."

"It will be much the best."

Having come to this determination, they trotted onwards at a rapid rate, whiling away the time by chatting gaily with each other, for now that their enterprise had been crowned with so much success, they were in most excellent spirits.

Noon came, and when it arrived, their horses showed signs of great distress.

They were fatigued, and the highwaymen looked eagerly before them, in the hope of being able to perceive some place where they could obtain shelter.

No habitation, however, was in sight—nothing but fields and trees were stretched out before them.

"Push on gently," said Tom King. "I can't take upon myself to say precisely where we are; but yet I am sure we can't go much further without coming to an inn. We will stop at the first one we come to."

To their vexation and annoyance, our friends had to travel very many miles before they reached an inn, and, when at length they saw one in the distance, darkness was deepening rapidly, for the brief winter's day was fast drawing to a close.

Just about dark, they reined-in their horses in front of an old-fashioned rambling building, which they would never have taken for an inn had it not been for a large swinging sign that was fixed on the top of a post at a little distance from the door.

"Here we are at last," said Tom King. "I don't much care about the appearance of the place, but I suppose we must put up with it, for the probability is, that we should have to travel much further before we come to another inn."

"It looks dirty and untidy enough," said Claude Duval, glancing at the exterior of the house; "but I think we can put up with it—at any rate, it is better than none."

"You are right."

Hearing or seeing the travellers stop before the door, an old man, with a dirty, repulsive-looking countenance, and bleary eyes, came forward and touched his hat in a surly way.

"Can we stay here for an hour or two?" said Tom King, addressing him.

"Dunno," was the growling response; "but here comes master, and you can ask him."

A short, thick-set looking man, whose personal appearance was no more prepossessing than that of the ostler, emerged from the front door of the inn.

Tom King repeated his request, and the landlord, after scrutinising them attentively for at least a minute said:

"Yes, gentlemen, yes—you are quite welcome to the Rose and Crown."

Upon this, the highwaymen alighted, and resigned their steeds to the care of the sinister-looking man, Sixteen-String Jack, as usual, keeping behind, in order to see them placed in the stable.

Tom King and Claud followed the landlord into the inn.

Upon entering, the two highwaymen felt less satisfied than ever with the place in which they were about to take up their quarters.

The atmosphere within seemed thick and sickly, and there was a disagreeable odour caused by they knew not what.

Within, all was silent as the grave.

They were evidently the only customers in the house at that moment.

Despite the disagreeable feeling which crept over them, our friends tried to content themselves with the reflection that if the inn was not so comfortable a place as it might be, yet in all probability they would be safe while they remained beneath its roof.

"Can we have a private room?" asked Tom King—"our horses are tired, and we wish to sit down somewhere while they rest themselves!"

"All right, gentlemen, you can have my own private parlour if you like it. As it is the best room in the house, of course I should have to charge extra for the accomodation."

"Don't trouble yourself about that: we will settle liberally with you—never fear."

The landlord bowed when he heard this gracious and welcome speech, and ushered the two highwaymen into a dirty, scantily-furnished room, which made the latter wonder what the common or worst rooms were like, if that was the best.

A roughly-made table of some dark-coloured wood stood in the centre of the room, and a few massive, old-fashioned chairs were ranged round the walls.

"This is my best room," said the landlord; "it is a poor place, I know, when compared with many others, but in this part of the country you must not expect to find superior accommodation."

"It will do very well for us," replied Tom King, "provided you can bring us something good to eat and drink."

"I can manage that, gentlemen," replied the landlord—"I can promise you every satisfaction!"

"That is all right. Our friend will be here directly—no doubt he is gone to look to the horses."

DICK TURPIN BIDS MAUD FAREWELL.

"I have a couple of the finest capons that ever were trussed," said the landlord, "and some excellent home-fed, home-cured ham!"

"That will suit us," said Tom King, who was by no means displeased at the prospect of partaking of such a savoury meal.

"If you happen," said Claude, "to have some home-brewed October ale in your house we shall be all right."

"I can serve you with that, gentlemen, and, if you will allow me to retire now, you shall be served in as short a space of time as possible."

Our friends gave the landlord permission to retire, and directly afterwards Sixteen-String Jack entered.

He closed the door carefully, and seated himself near his friends.

"Are the horses all right, Jack?" they asked.

"Yes, quite right; but I can assure you I don't half like the look or the feel of this place—I wish we were out of it."

"We are much in the same mind as yourself," said Tom King; "only we don't see how we can better ourselves, and so have determined to stay. Perhaps, after all, it is only our fancy, and the landlord has promised us that we shall have a tempting meal in a very short space of time."

"I hope this will not turn out a similar place to that hut which we visited on the heath."

"Pho—pho! Jack, there is no fear of anything of that kind—there are three of us, recollect, and we should be well able to defend ourselves if an attack was made."

"So we should—and yet somehow I feel uneasy; perhaps the blood which I have lost in consequence of my wound has made me feel weak and nervous."

"Very likely."

"There can come no harm from using caution," said Claude Duval. "We will be on our guard, for this is a lonesome, uncivilised part of the country; and, although there are three of us, yet, if there is any danger, it will be of a kind against which valour and strength will be of no service,—we should be attacked at a time, and in such a way, as to make us incapable of defence!"

"Let us quit the subject!" said Tom King—"there can be no good in dwelling upon it! It is true, we are in a lonely part of the country, and that this inn seems a very cut-throat-looking place, but I don't think we need have any apprehension on that account."

"Above all," said Claude,—"and this is no more than a matter of just precaution—don't let any of the inmates of this dwelling be aware that we jointly possess so large a sum of money as we do—that would be imprudent in the extreme."

"You need not be afraid that we should do that. I propose, as soon as our meal is finished, and our horses rested, that we leave this place and set out afresh upon our journey."

"Agreed! I am sure that will be the best!"

In such conversation as this the time was passed away, until the meal which the landlord was preparing was ready.

When the repast was spread upon the table it looked very tempting, and our friends ate heartily, while they found the old October ale to be the most delicious they had ever tasted, and a welcome adjunct to the feast.

After the meal was over, and the things removed, the highwaymen ordered wine to be placed upon the table, and sat down with the intention of passing away the time as pleasantly as they could.

The refreshments they had taken appeared to have a beneficial effect upon all their spirits, and those gloomy forebodings which they had all to a certain extent experienced passed away and were forgotten.

The prospect before them was a cheering one; they had money enough to carry on the excellent plan which Dick Turpin had conceived and proposed, and for the future the highwaymen believed that they should be in what was, comparatively speaking, absolute safety.

"We don't know yet," said Tom King, "how much money we have got, and it might be as well to count it and ascertain. We should then be better able to speculate upon the future."

"That is a good thought, Tom. We will count up the spoil at once."

"But be careful. While we are counting it, we must not make a sound. You know very well when money is handled a peculiar chink is produced, which would be heard plainly in a place as silent as this, and which could not be mistaken for any other sound."

"We can count the money silently, never fear! I, for one, should be very sorry to make the landlord or anyone else who inhabits this gloomy building aware that we had so much money in our possession."

"So should I; for, even if he already has no evil intentions, no doubt that would suggest them. I will count my money first."

With these words, Tom King took carefully from his pocket that portion of the miser's treasure which he carried, and began to count it.

He was very particular not to make the least sound.

The operation took some time, and, when he had finished counting, he found that the total amount he possessed was four hundred and ten pounds and a few shillings.

It was now Claude's turn, and when he placed his upon the table, it was evident at a glance that he possessed much more than Tom King, which was accounted for by the fact of his having at the last moment deprived Richard Nares of his share.

While Claude was counting, Tom King fancied he heard a faint sound outside the door of the room.

He started to his feet in a moment, and held up his finger in an impressive manner for his companions to be silent.

Claude had laid a pistol upon the table, and he instantly took hold of it so as to be prepared to use it in a moment should it be necessary.

Tom listened for a minute good, but was unable to detect any repetition of the sound which had disturbed him.

Making a rapid sign to his companions, he strode on tiptoe towards the door, and flung it open suddenly.

On the outside all was dark, and he was unable to distinguish any object.

Just then he was startled by a loud peal of thunder, which seemed to shake both heaven and earth.

Then came a dazzling flash of lightning and another peal of thunder.

For an infinitesimal portion of time all objects were revealed by the glare of the lightning, and then the darkness seemed ten times greater than before.

The brilliant evanescent light had, however, failed to show Tom King anything of a suspicious character.

He closed the door and hastened towards his companions, who had started to their feet when they heard the storm break forth with so much suddenness and violence.

CHAPTER DXLVII.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN FALL INTO THE TRAP LAID FOR THEM BY THE LANDLORD OF THE ROSE AND CROWN.

THE three highwaymen were wholly engrossed by their occupation of counting up the miser's gold, and had failed to notice the change which had taken place in the weather.

The cloude had piled themselves up rapidly in the sky, and had they been abroad, they would have perceived all these elemental changes which proclaim the advent of a thunder storm.

But while seated at the table counting up the gold they noticed nothing, and so the first intimation they received was a startling one indeed.

All three advanced to the window, and looked out.

The darkness was most intense.

The rain was falling in torrents, and the peals of thunder were quickly alternated by flashes of vivid lightning.

"What a frightful storm!" said Tom King; "and how suddenly it has burst upon us! I am glad to think we are so lucky as to be under shelter. I should be sorry to be abroad."

"And I, too."

"And how dark it is! I fancy the storm will last for several hours at least, and, as you say, we have been lucky to find shelter."

"There is no need," said Tom King, "why we should not continue our occupation. We will summon the landlord, and call for a light and another bottle of wine."

"Do so by all means."

The table was cleared of the gold that was upon it, and the landlord summoned.

"It is a terrific storm, gentlemen," he said, "and, if I know anything about the weather, it will last a good way into the night. Of course you can't think of resuming your journey while it lasts?"

"No; we shall not start until it abates."

"A wise determination, gentlemen, though I say it; and if you choose to stop here for the night, you can command the best accommodation this poor inn can afford; which I can assure you, is not often visited by gentlemen like yourselves."

"We will see how long the storm continues," said Tom King, "before we decide upon staying here all night. In the meantime, bring us a light and another bottle of your wine."

"You shall be served in a moment, gentlemen."

"I don't quite like our host," said Claude Duval; "he is not a man who improves upon acquaintance."

"Decidedly not," said Tom King. "I consider he is about the most sinister-looking man I ever beheld!"

"Excepting the ostler," said Sixteen-String Jack. "I was enabled to have a good look at that individual when I went to the stable. I tried to make friends with him in the usual way, but didn't succeed very well."

"I don't like the place," said Tom King, "and I am vexed the storm should have broken out. I don't like the idea of staying here all night."

"Nor will we if we can help it. Besides, it is important that we should continue our journey without loss of time. We have already, in one way and another, been detained much longer than we expected."

At this moment, the landlord entered, carrying in one hand a miserable tallow candle, and in the other a bottle of wine.

He placed the candle on the table, and then officiously picked up a corkscrew, and drew the cork out of it.

"I don't like to praise my own goods, gentlemen, but I am sure you will find that such port wine as you have never tasted. I have been in this house a matter of eighteen years or more, and when I took it this wine was in the cellar, and had been for many a year. It isn't often that we have customers who order wine, and so, of course, I have got many bottles left in the cellar."

"All right, landlord; the bottle looks as if it had been nursed up in some old cellar for half a century. I hope it will turn out good."

The landlord lingered and fidgeted about as though he would have been glad of an invitation to remain in the room with his guests, but as no such invitation was given him, he at length withdrew.

The highwaymen did not speak until several moments after his departure.

"You didn't tell us, Tom," said Claude Duval, "what it was that alarmed you. What sound did you hear?"

"A kind of rustle, as though someone was outside, listening at the keyhole."

"But you could not see anyone when you opened the door?"

"No; all seemed perfectly still and right. Perhaps it was only my fancy."

"Very likely; but we will be careful to keep our ears open in future. And now to go on with counting."

Claude Duval once more placed upon the table his portion of the booty.

"It is a good weight, I can assure you," he said, "and I am not sorry to get it out of my pocket for a little while."

The gold was counted silently, and while thus occupied all three drank somewhat freely of the wine.

It was found that Claude's share amounted to no less than five hundred and three pounds.

The storm still continued to rage with great violence, and showed no more signs of abatement than it did before.

"I feel very tired," said Jack, with a yawn, as he produced the gold from his pocket. "I should think it was this dark room and the silence that makes me feel so sleepy."

"I feel sleepy too," said Tom King.

"And I," added Claude; "but I don't wonder at it, for our rest lately has been none of the best. I cannot quite understand how it is that we do with such a little sleep."

"Let us count my share," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and then, when we have done that, if the storm shows no signs of giving over, I think we can't do better than call for a bed, and get a few hours' sound sleep."

"Well, we shall see," said Tom King, languidly. "I don't much like the idea of staying here."

Sixteen-String Jack's money was produced, and they commenced to count it.

Strangely enough, he and his two comrades felt their eyes closing in spite of their efforts to keep them open, and every now and then their heads would drop forward, and they would wake up with a sudden start.

Counting the money, too, confused them, and they made several ridiculous mistakes.

At last, when about half the money was counted, Jack said:

"Let us stop; I feel very strange; I can't imagine what's the matter with me! I'll get up and go to the window; I seem stifled for the want of a little fresh air!"

"So do I—so do I!" exclaimed his two comrades together, though they spoke feebly, and without energy.

All three attempted to rise.

To their astonishment and horror, however, they found their limbs refuse obedience to their will.

They could not rise, but seemed changed to stone.

They glared at each other with the utmost dismay upon their countenances.

Tom King tried hard to speak, but his tongue seemed to cling to the roof of his mouth; but after one or two efforts he found his voice to gasp out:

"The wine—the wine which we have drank has been drugged or poisoned; we are quite helpless!"

His two comrades heard his words, but scarcely understood them.

Tom's voice sounded as if it was far—far away, and they themselves seemed to be sinking down—down into depthless space.

After that they relapsed into utter unconsciousness.

Sixteen-String Jack slipped from his chair under the table.

The chair in which Claude Duval sat was an old and massive one, furnished with arms.

He leaned to one side, but the arm of the chair prevented him from falling to the floor, and so he remained in this strange attitude with his head and one arm hanging down.

Tom King fell forward upon the heap of gold, with his arms outstretched before him.

Tom King's last supposition was evidently correct, but whether they were dead or merely rendered insensible for a time was hard to say.

The only sign of life that remained was their loud and stentorious breathing, which always precedes dissolution when some narcotic poison has been taken.

There was no movement and no other sound in the room.

At the expiration of about a quarter of an hour, however, the door was slowly and stealthily opened.

The candle on the table, having remained so long without attention, had got a prodigious wick, and the light which it gave forth was very feeble and ghastly indeed.

Still it fell upon the countenance of the man who just projected his head into the room.

It was the landlord.

He glanced around him quickly, and then muttered:

"Oh, it's all right; I thought that would do the business for them! They never knew, I'll be bound. The wine would have no taste. That receipt is worth its weight in gold!"

He approached the table and snuffed the candle with his fingers.

It burned up with great brightness, and its beams were reflected by the glittering heap of gold close by.

The landlord chuckled when he saw so many gold pieces.

"I knew they had money—I thought I heard it chink. I shall be able to take it now, and without much trouble."

The landlord deliberately picked up the money from the table, and put it into his pocket, counting it while he did so.

"Three hundred and forty-seven pounds!" he said. "What a mine of wealth! I am a made man now. But who knows, perhaps they have even more about them!"

He determined to ascertain this point, and by chance stooped down over Sixteen-String Jack and searched his pockets first.

He found nothing valuable save his watch, for, as we know, Jack had emptied all the gold out of his pockets on to the table.

This was not much encouragement to go on with the search, but rising up, the landlord noticed that one of Claude Duval's pockets was gaping open, and he could see what looked like the top of a leather bag, such as would be used to hold money.

He took hold of it and found he was right.

"Here is as much money again," he said. "How rich they must be, and how fortunate it was for me, at least, that they should take it into their heads to stop here!"

The landlord consigned this bag to his pocket, and searched the rest of Claude's apparel.

He took every article that he could find that was of the least value.

Then he went to Tom King.

Our friend's pockets were quickly emptied, but Tom moved slightly, showing that either the drug had not taken so much effect upon him as his comrades, or else that he had not drank quite so freely of the wine.

The landlord was greatly terrified when Tom moved, and he instantly plunged his hand into his breast, where he seemed to clutch a concealed weapon, doubtless a knife.

But Tom made no further demonstration of life, but remained perfectly still.

The landlord was now the possessor of upwards of twelve hundred pounds, and the very fact that he possessed this large amount of money unnerved him, and made him feel quite alarmed.

He trembled in every limb.

The storm was now almost over.

At distant intervals the thunder could be heard in the sky, and every time the reverberating sound reached his ears, the guilty landlord would start violently.

At last he staggered from the room, closing the door carefully behind him.

"I am a rich man now," he muttered to himself, as though the reflection would calm his agitated soul—"I am rich—very rich! This will keep me for many a day!

I will get away from this part of the country, however; I can't do better. Let me see; would it not be better if I could conceal all traces of the deed I have committed? Yes—yes; surely that will be best; it will be easy too! And what care I? The place is not my own; it is built of wood and will burn bonnily! Yes, I'll set fire to the old inn before I leave it, and the ashes can tell what tale they like!"

The villainous landlord of the Rose and Crown now set about taking those steps which he imagined would make him perfectly secure.

Procuring an armful of dry sticks, he placed them against the wood partition, near the centre of the building, and set fire to them.

The sticks blazed and cracked, and the long flames quickly caught the thin, dry partition, and the fire spread with amazing rapidity.

In a few minutes the building would be completely wrapt in flames.

The landlord rubbed his hands with satisfaction when he perceived the progress of his work.

"There is no fear of the fire going out now," he murmured, and as he spoke the words he passed out of the back door of the inn, and ran as fast as his trembling limbs would allow him towards a plantation or wood that was no great distance off.

He reached it in the space of a few minutes; but before he plunged among the trees he paused, and looked back.

He could see the inn plainly enough, and from several windows and from the roof the smoke was escaping in prodigious quantities.

CHAPTER DXLVIII.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN HAVE A NARROW ESCAPE OF THEIR LIVES AT THE ROADSIDE INN.

NEVER before in the whole course of their adventurous career had the three highwaymen been in a position of so much peril as they were at this moment.

Even if the wine were not poisoned, but merely drugged, there seemed no possibility of escaping, for before they could recover themselves they would perish in the flames.

Knowing the vague fears which they had all expressed, and knowing, too, that their suspicions were aroused, it may seem strange to the reader that our friends should have fallen so easily into the trap laid for them by the landlord.

The fact was, that though they expected danger, they imagined it would assume a different aspect, and that if any attempt was made upon their lives and property, it would be during the night, provided they passed it in the inn.

The idea that the landlord had drugged or poisoned the wine never once entered their minds. Had either of them drawn the cork out of the bottle they would, in all probability, have noticed that it had been drawn before; but as we have already seen, the landlord took care to prevent them making this discovery.

Whatever the drug might be, it produced no perceptible alterations in the flavour or colour of the wine. Had there been the least peculiarity of taste, the highwaymen would have been on their guard immediately, but they had no such warning.

The narcotic was powerful and speedy in its effects, for Claude and Jack had only drank two glasses each of this second bottle of wine, and Tom King only one glass.

All three remained perfectly still, showing no signs of life whatever, while the flames every moment grew more and more powerful.

The smoke curled into the room in fantastic wreaths through invisible fissures, while the air grew hotter and hotter.

Still the highwaymen did not move.

Then, with a roaring sound, the flames burst through the door, and, spreading themselves in various directions, quickly ignited everything of a combustible character in the room.

Tom King at last moved slightly, for having taken a less quantity of wine, the drug had not produced so great an effect as it had upon his two companions.

Suddenly a long tongue of flame shot across the room; it passed over his hands as they lay spread out upon the table, and the pain which this occasioned restored him to life.

He raised his head languidly, and wondered what had happened, and where he was.

The drug had not yet lost all its subtle power over him; it was with difficulty that he kept his eyes open and his body upright.

His head throbbed and ached in a manner so painful as to be almost beyond his powers of endurance.

In a vague way he was conscious that something strange and perilous was going on, and he tried to rise to his feet.

But his lower limbs seemed paralysed.

Hotter and hotter grew the flames.

The room was one mass of fire, and the air within it was as hot as that of a furnace.

With every second that elapsed Tom King grew better.

By degrees the effects of the drug evaporated, and he became more and more master of his actions.

He made the greatest efforts to understand properly his exact position, and at last he realized the terrible fact that the inn was on fire, and that himself and his two comrades were under the influence of some narcotic drug.

When once he made this discovery he regained possession of his physical powers.

He struggled to his feet.

The fire blinded and scorched him.

In that dreadful moment, however, he recollected his two comrades, and instead of making a frantic rush for his own escape, he called loudly upon them.

But they were wholly insensible, and paid no attention to his cries.

Claude Duval had slipped from his chair on to the floor, and it is to the fact of their being in this position that the preservation of their lives were chiefly due.

Luckily they were on the ground floor of the inn.

The room in which they sat was paved with some kind of red tiles laid upon the earth, so that the resting-place they had was a cool one.

The roaring of the flames, and the floating mass of smoke prevented Tom King from immediately ascertaining whereabouts his companions were.

He advanced a step, and then his foot struck against something soft.

A disagreeable conviction of what this was came over him, and he stooped down.

It was the body of Sixteen-String Jack that he had come into contact with.

Tom's brain was dizzy and confused, and he felt weak and helpless.

He was sensible, and upon his efforts depended the lives of his friends, and of course he resolved to save them.

He turned round and gave one glance towards the window.

It was only a few feet distant, and the flames were rushing through it with the utmost fury.

Summoning all his strength to his aid, he seized hold of Sixteen-String Jack by the arms near the shoulders, and dragged him along the floor.

Then, upon reaching the window, he picked him up, and by a sudden exertion of strength flung him out into the open air.

No portion of the glass or lead work remained, and so Sixteen-String Jack had a clear passage.

He fell with considerable force into the road in front of the inn, but it so happened that where he fell he was out of danger.

At this moment Tom King felt as though he must sink down upon the floor and give up.

The remembrance of his insensible comrade's terrible position, endowed him with fresh strength, and he resolved to make one desperate effort to save him or else perish with him.

Sinking down on his hands and knees, he groped his way towards him.

Claude had a stronger constitution than Sixteen-String Jack, and the drug had not produced quite so much effect upon him, and when Tom King reached him he found he showed signs of life.

Tom seized him by the arms and dragged him along the floor to the window.

This rough treatment recovered Claude more and more, and by the time the window was reached, he was able to understand that he was in imminent danger of being burnt to death.

"Rouse yourself, Claude!" cried Tom King in his ear, "rouse yourself if you wish to preserve your life—the inn is on fire! Here is the window; it is close to the ground. Try if you can scramble through it—I will assist you."

As yet, Claude had but little strength, yet the intelligence he received was enough to make him use his utmost efforts.

With Tom's assistance he rose to his feet. He was dismayed when he saw the window, for it was covered with a huge sheet of flame, and through this he would have to pass.

"Quick, Claude—quick," cried his comrade. "If you are quick you will be scarcely hurt, if you linger we shall both perish!"

Claude made a dash and disappeared; Tom King followed.

As soon as they reached the earth they felt they were right, and although much bruised and shaken rolled over and over so as to get as far from the blazing building as possible.

Directly afterwards they encountered the body of Sixteen-String Jack, and both seizing it, they dragged it to a distance where they were all safe from the scorching heat which came from the fire.

With a sullen crash, the roof of the inn fell, and for a moment the fierceness of the fire abated.

It was only for a moment, however, and then the flames shot up into the sky with redoubled fury.

The three highwaymen had escaped being burnt to death, but they were faint and sick, while Sixteen-String Jack exhibited no signs of life.

"Water—water," said Claude—"I must have water!"

"And so must I," added Tom King. "We must drag Jack with us, and endeavour to recover him—he seems quite lifeless."

It taxed their strength severely, but they dragged Sixteen-String Jack to the back part of the inn.

Here they were comparatively free from smoke and heat, for the wind blew the flames in the direction of the road.

The brilliant light enabled them to see all round with great distinctness, and with a cry of the utmost joy Tom King exclaimed:

"Look, Claude, there is a pump; we shall be all right now!"

They dragged Sixteen-String Jack along, and placed him underneath it.

Although their mouths were parched and their throats burning, they set to work to recover their comrade before they tasted a drop of water themselves.

The pump was over a well of great depth, and the water was intensely cold.

Two strokes with the handle sufficed to recover Sixteen-String Jack.

The cold water fell with great force upon his countenance and restored him.

Tom King and Claude then drank heartily, after which they felt scarcely any effects of the drug they had so unluckily taken.

Sixteen-String Jack looked about him with a puzzled and bewildered air—he could not imagine where he was or what had happened.

His companions explained matters to him in a very few words, and he shuddered violently when he learned how narrow an escape he had had from a painful and frightful death.

The fire still raged with considerable fury, though it was evident in a few minutes more at most the entire building would be consumed.

"I think we cannot do better than get away from this place as soon as we can," said Tom King; "the flames will be seen for many a mile, and people will hasten towards them. If we linger, we shall have some questions put to us which we shall not care about answering."

"The horses," said Claude—"where are they?"

Tom started, and all the blood in his body seemed to rush suddenly to his heart, for he feared that their steeds had perished in the flames.

"The horses are all right," said Sixteen-String Jack; "at least they are not burnt, for yonder is the stable in which I saw them placed."

Tom King gave a sigh of relief. Then almost immediately the reflection occurred to him that their horses might have been stolen as well.

The stable to which Sixteen-String Jack alluded was a rough wooden shed situated in the rear of the inn, and at a considerable distance from it.

As the wind blew the flames in the opposite direction it had escaped.

The highwaymen hurried towards this building fearing the worst.

To their joy, however, they found upon entering, that their horses were all right, though apparently much frightened at something.

With what speed they could, the highwaymen saddled their horses, for they were unanimously of opinion that the sooner they got away the better.

Some delay, however, took place in consequence of of their not being able to find the trappings, but at last their steeds were got ready for the road.

They led them out of the stable into the yard, and prepared to mount.

While they were in the act of doing this, they were startled by hearing a loud shout.

They turned like lightning and looked in the direction from which the sound came.

They saw a body of mounted men.

At first they were puzzled to imagine how it was that they had reached the inn without the sound of their horses' hoofs being heard.

The roaring of the flames were so loud as to make it inaudible.

Immediately after the shout, they heard a voice cry, in tones that were startlingly distinct:

"There they are—there they are! That's them! I am sure of it! I told you so, and you see I am right! Will you make one more rush and capture them?"

All three highwaymen recognised the voice instantly.

It was that of Richard Nares.

Those who were with him were doubtless the police officers from Southampton.

Without pausing, our friends sprang into their saddles, and, turning their horses' heads, galloped off.

A rattling discharge of firearms followed.

The volley was a straggling one, and produced no effect.

It was replied to by one shot only.

This was fired by Claude Duval.

Turning round in his saddle, he hastily aimed a pistol at the form of Richard Nares, and fired.

He could not wait to see whether it was effective, but galloped off after his companions, who were already a little in advance.

CHAPTER DXLIX.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN STOP THE HORSE-COPER ON THE LONDON ROAD.

Richard Nares had managed to induce the police officers to keep up the chase after the three highwaymen, and had kept very closely indeed upon the track.

They were seriously meditating giving up altogether, when they caught sight of the fire in the distance, and Richard Nares suggested that the highwaymen were in some way or other connected with it.

Not that he had any such belief in his own mind—all he desired was to induce the officers to follow him.

Singularly enough, as we have seen, his supposition was correct.

Our friends urged their horses forward at their utmost speed, and after having gone a considerable distance, looked back.

They were greatly surprised to find that the police officers had not commenced the pursuit, so they moderated their speed, and once more turned their horses' heads towards their destination.

The hasty gallop which they had taken had, however, one good effect.

It served to dissipate the effects of the drug they had taken, and recovered them more effectually than perhaps anything else could have done.

Sixteen-String Jack suffered most, and he was least able to understand what had happened.

As the pace they were going at rendered conversation possible, he made several inquiries of his comrades.

"The matter is clear enough," replied Tom King,

"and we have been unfortunate in the extreme. By some means or other, the landlord must have become aware that we had a large sum of money with us. That tempted him to drug the wine. When we were insensible, he entered the room, took the money, and then, in order to conceal his villany, s t fire to the inn, hoping that we should perish among the ruins, and so leave no trace behind of what he had done."

"And is it possible," said Sixteen-String Jack, searching in his pockets, "that we have been deprived of that money which we ran so many risks to obtain?"

"We have; not a penny remains. Not that I am much surprised, for from the first I never believed that the miser's gold would do us any good; and if Dick Turpin had taken my advice, he would never have troubled himself so far as to bury it."

"It is most vexatious!" said Claude Duval. "Only think, we had upwards of twelve hundred pounds between us, which, added to the money at the deserted mansion, would have been more than sufficient for the carrying out of our plans."

"I don't think you ought to grieve so much about the loss of the money," said Tom King, "as you ought to rejoice at having so narrowly escaped a frightful death. In all probability, if I had taken two glasses of wine, as you did, we should by this time have been reduced to ashes."

"We have indeed had a narrow escape," said Sixteen-String Jack, with a shudder; "but it will be a caution to us in future."

"It will. We are all to blame for having been so much off our guard. But what is done can't be helped. We know the extent of our misfortune; it might have been much greater. Let us think no more about it, but turn our attention to what we are to do in the future."

"This unfortunate occurrence," said Claude Duval, "has deranged all our plans. We imagined that we had nothing to do but to ride back with all speed to the deserted mansion."

"And if we do that now," said Tom King, "we shall get there empty-handed."

"Which I, for one, will never do," said Sixteen-String Jack. "We have failed in this, but then other courses are open to us."

"You are right. I feel no more inclined to return empty-handed than you do yourself. We have many miles to travel, and doubtless shall encounter many people, and have many adventures."

"There may be some delay," said Claude Duval, "but even yet we may recover our loss."

"I hope we shall be able to do so."

"I wish we could find that rascally landlord," said Claude. "If we could, we would soon ease him of the money, and punish him into the bargain."

"Let us think no more about that," said Tom King. "The money has been no good to us yet, and I don't believe it ever will be. For my part, I am willing to resign myself to the loss. I should very much prefer making up for the deficiency by crying 'Stand and deliver!' to everyone I met."

To this his companions agreed, but chiefly because they believed that the landlord was out of their reach, and that they stood no chance of recovering possession of the miser's treasure."

All three still felt the effects of the drug very severely, but they had no doubt in a little time the uncomfortable sensations which they experienced would wear off.

The cool night air blew gratefully upon their fevered brows, and they inhaled it with the greatest satisfaction.

A silence followed the last words which Tom King had spoken.

Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval now regretted exceedingly the loss of the money. They believed that their troubles were for a time over, but now they suddenly discovered that they were no better off than when they left the deserted mansion on this hazardous excursion.

"With your consent," said Tom King, at length breaking the silence, "we will make our way into some public road. At first we intended to take the most unfrequented route we could find; but the necessity for doing that no longer exists. We must now seek some place where we are likely to encounter travellers who will be worth the trouble of stopping."

"With all my heart!" said Claude Duval. "Though at the present moment I don't feel at all up to the mark for an adventure. My limbs seem as heavy as lead, and my brain throbs painfully."

"And mine; but I believe the best and surest means of recovering will be to take another rapid gallop. I am sure its effects were beneficial before."

"Lead the way, then, Tom. We will follow wherever you choose to lead."

"Come on, then," cried Tom King. "Once more we will cry 'Hurrah for the road!' And somehow I feel a conviction that before we rejoin Dick Turpin we shall have many a strange and stirring adventure."

His two comrades responded by a faint hurrah, and then, urging their horses forward, they set off at a rapid gallop.

From the knowledge of the locality he possessed, it was an easy matter for Tom King to lead the way to the high-road.

A gallop of about twenty minutes brought them to it, and then they reined-in their steeds.

"There is one precaution," said Tom King, "which I think it will be well for us to take."

"What is that?"

"To stop no travellers except such as are coming from London."

"I see; that will be a wise proceeding. We don't want the intelligence to travel on and reach London before us."

"Certainly not; and now it is agreed that the next travellers we meet, be they whom they may, we stop, and not allow to pass until they have paid toll."

"The night is almost too far advanced for many travellers to be abroad," said Claude, as he looked carefully to the primings of his pistols. "Still, we may be lucky enough to meet some one."

"Hark—hark!" said Sixteen-String Jack. 'I fancy I can hear something already."

Claude and Tom immediately became silent, and listened attentively.

They found Jack was right.

Some two-wheeled vehicle was approaching them at a rapid rate.

"It can't be a carriage," said Tom King. "It rattles too much for that, and it is only drawn by one horse."

"It sounds to me," said Jack, "more like a light cart, such as people use to drive to market."

"Then that doesn't promise anything worth our while."

"We will see. Let us make a rule not to allow a single traveller to pass us until we have ascertained for certain whether he carries with him anything worth our taking."

The approaching vehicle made a prodigious rattle, and came rapidly from the direction of London.

The three highwaymen formed themselves into a line across the road, and patiently waited its coming.

They had not long to wait.

In less than two minutes they were able to discern some dark, shadowy mass approaching them, and directly afterwards Tom King cried out "Halt!" in a loud and imperious tone of voice.

Sixteen-String Jack seized the horse by the bridle and forced him to come to a stand.

Tom King and Claude rode up, one on each side of the cart.

It contained only one man, and when he found himself stopped in this fashion, he took up a stout whip and lashed the horse severely, in the hope that he might escape.

But Sixteen-String Jack had got too firm a grasp upon the reins for the terrified animal to obey the impulse to gallop forward.

Claude Duval roughly thrust a pistol in the man's ear and cried:

"Hold!—be still at once, or you are a dead man! This is a loaded pistol which I am holding to your head!"

The man in the cart uttered a cry of fright and dropped his whip.

"Spare my money, gentlemen!" he exclaimed—"spare my money, and take my life! No—no—I don't mean that! I mean, spare my life and take my money!"

"Your request is granted," said Tom King; "we don't want your life, and if you will hand us your money you may ride on in safety."

The traveller appeared to be in a desperate fright, for he trembled from head to foot.

He was tall and stout, and from his burly appearance one would have thought his courage would have been greater, and that he would have resisted any attack that was made upon him.

"We are in a hurry," said Claude, "so hand over your money quickly! Give it to us, and we will be content; if not, we shall take it from you, and then it is possible we may be a little violent."

The traveller groaned, and, putting his hand in his pocket, drew out a small leather purse, which at the most contained only a few sovereigns.

Tom King took it, and weighing it in his hand, said:

"This won't do—we must have more."

"More, gentlemen? You must be joking! I can spare no more. I am only a poor horse-coper on my way to Southampton Fair."

"A horse-coper?" repeated Tom King. "Then I find I shall have a much better booty than I expected."

"Why—why—what do you mean?"

"I never knew a horse-coper yet, and never heard of one, who was not an infernal rascal, and a rogue into the bargain! All rascals and rogues manage to get hold of plenty of money, especially when they are horse-copers. I feel no hesitation in robbing you, and taking every penny you have got, for you do nothing from one week's end to another, and rob people yourself; only I do it straightforwardly, while you pretend to be honest."

"Good!" said Claude—"I quite agree with you there. Now, Mr. Horse-coper, you are off to Southampton Fair to buy horses. Such people as you never get credit, so you must have plenty of money about you."

"I have not, gentlemen, indeed! I don't know what you mean—I am a poor man."

Claude made a signal to Tom King, and then, seizing hold of the traveller by the neckcloth, and pressing the muzzle of the pistol with still greater violence against his head, cried:

"If you resist—if you move—if you cry out—I shall pull the trigger instantly, and you will be a dead man. In the meantime, my friend will take the liberty of searching your pockets. If, as you say, you have got no more money about you, the operation need not give any trouble."

The traveller groaned, but made no resistance.

From the calm, stern manner in which Claude had uttered his threats, he fully believed that he would carry them out.

Tom King was rather dexterous in the matter of searching pockets, and in less than a moment he produced a good-sized leather bag, which he could tell, both by the feel and the weight, was filled with money.

"Here you are," he said. "I thought it would be a strange thing if a horse-coper told the truth about anything. Let go now, Claude."

Tom King put the bag of money in his pocket, and Claude let go his hold, while Sixteen-String Jack released the bridle.

The traveller seemed furious with rage.

"Curse you," he said, "you have robbed me of all, but you shall suffer dearly for this! I will offer a reward as soon as ever I reach Southampton!"

"You can do what you will," said Tom King, "only I should think it the most prudent if you uttered no threats. Be off! Think yourself lucky that we have not taken your life as well as your money."

The traveller did not seem to take the very good advice that was offered him, for he made no efforts to set his horse in motion.

Perceiving this, Sixteen-String Jack gave him a smart cut with his riding-whip, which caused the creature to start off at a gallop, for it seemed much alarmed by the whole transaction.

Apparently the traveller made no attempt to stop him, and, after the lapse of a few minutes was out of hearing.

CHAPTER DI.

THE HIGHWAYMEN PREVENT THE CONTINUATION OF THE BEADLE'S CRUELTY, AND WITNESS A CURIOUS CIRCUMSTANCE.

"I THINK we may congratulate ourselves so far," said Tom King. "If I may judge by the weight of this leather bag, I should say that it contains a good round sum."

"Yes," said Claude, "a few such adventures as that and we should be all right. I wonder what will fall in our way next."

"Where abouts are we?" asked Sixteen-String Jack.

"Very nearly half way between Southampton and London," replied Tom King. "There is a stage coach which runs between London and Southampton, and passes along this road."

"At what hour?"

"That I can't tell you. There is, however, just the bare possibility that we may meet it, and if we do——"

"Why, we will stop it," said Claude Duval. "There are three of us, and we could manage such a job easily."

"Then we will consider that as agreed upon."

Our friends walked their horses slowly along the road.

They did not wish to make haste back now, and they were vexed because night was so nearly over, and morning so close at hand.

In an hour more, at the most, the dawn would come.

At such a time as this, there was but little chance of meeting with anyone.

Presently they heard a rumbling sound, and Tom King cried:

"That is the stage coach, or I am much mistaken."

"But it is not coming from London," said Claude Duval, "it is coming from Southampton. Look, you can see the lights in the distance."

Claude was right—the stage coach was approaching, but it was coming from the direction of Southampton, and they had previously agreed that all travellers and vehicles on their way to London, should not be molested.

For a moment or two they were all silent, and looked earnestly in the direction of the stage coach.

It was coming on at a rapid rate.

"Shall we make this an exception?" said Sixteen-String Jack. "Probably this is the only chance we shall have to-night of getting any more booty."

"I think it will be unwise," said Tom King. "The most prudent course will be to let it pass by."

"Why not run the risk of stopping it?"

"I think the risk would be too great; the coach would soon reach London, and you know very well the consequence of that would be a troop of police officers or dragoons would be soon out, and our proceedings would be put a stop to."

"Then we will draw on one side, and let it pass."

The highwaymen backed their horses into the shadow of the hedgerow.

The stage coach came on at a dashing gallop, and in a few minutes swept by them with a flash and a rattle.

Little did the passengers who were seated in it imagine what a narrow escape they had had—that they were so near being stopped by the highwaymen.

The stage coach was soon out of sight, and then the highwaymen quitted their place of concealment.

"I am afraid these are the only travellers we shall see to-night," said Sixteen-String Jack; "and then what are we to do during daylight?"

"It will be madness to continue our journey. We must keep ourselves snug somewhere. Doubtless by sunrise we shall find some place that will suit our purpose."

While they were speaking, they were startled by hearing a succession of shrill cries, and from their tone it was evident the cries came from the lips of a child.

"What's that?" said Claude, suddenly. "I can't hear anyone coming."

"Nor I; but somebody is in trouble, that is quite certain. I suppose, however, that it's no business of ours."

"I don't know that. Suppose we find out?"

"Listen then!"

The sound of voices could now be distinctly heard, and they found that some persons were walking along the road on foot.

It was very dark, and so the highwaymen drew to one side, where the shadow was deepest, and waited for the coming of these persons.

The silence around them was very great, and they were soon able to hear what was said.

Two persons were approaching.

The gruff, surly voice of one was sufficient to show that it was a man.

"Come on, will you, you young hound?" the highwaymen heard this voice saying. "Come on, will you? Oh, you won't? Take that, then!"

Then followed the sound of blows, accompanied by the shrill cries which had first attracted the attention of our friends.

"Please, Mr. Wantlin, I can't—indeed I can't! I have walked so many miles, and I am so tired that I can scarcely stand!"

"And whose fault's that, I should like to know?" said the gruff voice. "Was it anyone else's besides your own? Get up, I say, or you shall have another taste of the strap!"

"No, no, have mercy upon me—pray have mercy upon me! I can't go a step further!"

"We will see—we will see! Take that! Will you get up now?"

There was again the sound of blows and screams.

"I can't stand this any longer!" said Tom King, in a whisper. "We will put a stop to this brutality!"

He slipped quickly off his horse as he spoke, and Claude followed his example.

After going a few steps up the road, they saw a man. In his hand he held a strap, and with this he was inflicting heavy blows upon the body of a boy not more than twelve years of age, who lay huddled up on the ground.

"Hold!" said Tom King, in a loud voice. "What are you doing?"

The man stopped in an instant, and turned round in great surprise.

"What's that to you?" he said, insolently and defiantly. "Mind your own business, and don't interfere!"

"This is my business!" said Tom King. "I demand to know the reason why you are illtreating this lad?"

"Help, gentlemen—help!" said the boy, who was writhing on the ground, as though suffering great agony. "Save me from that man! I am one mass of weals and bruises from head to foot! He is flogging me along the road!"

"Where to?"

The boy hesitated for a moment, and then, in a choking voice, he answered:

"To the workhouse!"

"Yes," said Mr. Wantlin, "the work'us—that's where I am taking the young scamp!"

"And what has he been doing, that you should treat him in this barbarous manner?"

Mr. Wantlin seemed inclined to return some defiant answer, but upon taking a second look at our two friends, he altered his mind.

"I will tell you all, gentlemen," he said, in a cringing voice. "This 'ere boy is the most horfullest scamp there is in the world!"

"What has he done?"

"Done? You mean what hasn't he done—he has done everything that is bad, and to-night he finished up by makin' his escape from the work'us."

"I don't wonder at that," said Claude Duval, "it seems to me only natural."

"He is a pauper, sir—a miserable pauper! His father and mother died paupers, and he has been nothing but an expense and a trouble since he was born."

"Then I should think you would be glad of his escape, and rejoice at being rid of him?"

"You know nothing about it, gentlemen. A nice example that would be to set! Must a pauper do just what he likes? Certainly not!"

"But what are you?"

"Me, sir?" returned Mr. Wantlin. "I am the beadle."

"And when this boy made his escape, did you run after him?"

"That's just it, sir. In course I did, and such a dance as he led me no one knows. At last I cotched him."

"But," said Tom King, indignantly, "do you mean to tell me that because he made his escape you beat him in this manner?"

"In course! He lay down in the road and pretended he could not walk any farther. Do you think the majesty of the law is to be set at defiance in this manner? I whacked him till he got up—and what if I did?—what does it matter?—isn't he a pauper?"

"It does matter, as I think you will find, my lad," continued Tom King, addressing the boy. "Does this man speak the truth?—have you escaped from the workhouse?"

"You won't take me back, shall you, sir?"

"No, don't be afraid of that!"

"Yes, sir, I escaped because Mr. Wantlin did nothing but beat and illuse me from morning to night. I am half starved too, and that's how it was I could not run fast enough to make my escape. I fell down on the ground and couldn't get up again, and then of course he caught me."

Mr. Wantlin did not like the manner in which our friends looked at him, and he fancied that he had made a mistake and been rather too humble, so he resolved to make the attempt to carry things off with a high hand.

"Now, gentlemen, you know all," he said. "I have satisfied your curiosity, so just go and mind your own business leaving me to mind mine!"

"And what is your business?"

"To take him back to the work'us, in course."

"No—no, gentlemen," screamed the boy—"save me, gentlemen! Don't let him take me back; I don't want to be a pauper."

"Of course you don't. Cheer up, we will not allow him to take you back."

"Oh, won't you," said Mr. Wantlin. "Perhaps you will allow me to say a word on that subject? I am an officer of the law, and beware how you interfere with me!"

"I don't care what you are! You are an infamous brute, and a disgrace to the name of man!"

Tom King darted forward and seized the beadle as he spoke.

"Off with his neckcloth, Claude!" he cried, "and tie his arms together with it."

"All right!"

Before he could resist in the least, Mr. Wantlin found his arms tied tightly behind his back

"Now, my lad," said Tom King, speaking in a kind voice, "we are going to help you to take your own part. Get up—don't be frightened."

The boy struggled painfully to his feet.

"Now pick up that strap," continued Tom. "I will hold the beadle tightly, and do you give him as good a thrashing as your strength will permit."

The boy hesitated.

"Don't be afraid," said Tom again. "Perhaps if he knows what the strap tastes like he won't feel so much inclined to beat other children with it, and I'll take care that he doesn't get you into his power again."

This encouraged the boy, and in spite of the horrible threats to which Mr. Wantlin gave utterance, he took hold of the strap as Tom King had directed, and laid about him with it in a manner that was surprising, considering his emaciated condition.

The beadle uttered frantic howls.

When the boy showed signs of flagging, our friends urged him to continue.

The strap was a thick, heavy one, and the blows it gave were very severe.

At last the boy could wield it no longer.

"I think that will do," said Tom King. "You have given him a lesson which he deserves! Now, Claude, take the strap, and we will fasten him to this young tree."

There was a tree growing close by the roadside, and to this they secured the beadle by passing it through his arms where they were pinioned, and buckling it round the trunk of the tree.

"Now, my boy," said Tom King, "I will do for you all that lies in my power. Here is some money. Take care of it; the beadle won't be able to run after you for a long while. You make use of the time to get as far off as possible."

"You shall suffer for all this!" howled Mr Wantlin—"you shall all suffer for it!"

"Be silent!" said Tom King "If you utter another word I will take up the strap myself, and I shan't put it down again in a hurry!"

After this speech the beadle held his tongue.

The boy was greatly terrified and exhausted, yet he was overjoyed at the prospect he had of deliverance from his foe.

With tears streaming down his cheeks, he thanked Tom King for his gift, and hastened off.

"That is an adventure which has not done us much good," said Tom King, "but yet we have done a good turn to one who could not help himself."

[TOM KING IS JUST IN TIME.]

"We should have been cowards," said Claude Duval, "if we had stood by and allowed the continuation of such barbarity."

"We should."

Our friends trotted forward, but upon looking up they saw that day was breaking, and they gave up all hope of another adventure.

They turned their attention to looking out some place of concealment or shelter, where they could pass away the time until night again arrived.

The morning came on with great rapidity.

In a little while our friends could distinguish everything around them.

"We are not far from a town," said Tom King, "and I think our best plan will be to pass through it now, for at this early hour it is scarcely likely that anyone should be abroad."

"Forward, then! In all such matters we are quite willing to be guided by you."

The highwaymen set forward at a gallop, but ere they had gone far they perceived in the distance the form of a young man.

He was hurrying on at a rapid pace, and there was about him a general appearance of wildness and distraction.

In the clear morning air the highwaymen could see him with great distinctness, and somehow or other they felt strangely curious about him.

Leaping rapidly over a hedge, the young man ran on at the same rapid speed towards a clump of trees that was at no great distance.

Our friends pressed onward, wondering what he was about to do.

To their astonishment they saw him pause at the foot of one of the trees.

Then he made some furious and desperate gesticulations, after which he began rapidly to climb one of them.

"Is that a mad man?" asked Tom King.

"I don't know," replied Claude Duval; "his behaviour is very extraordinary; let us find it out. People don't ascend trees in that manner for nothing."

CHAPTER DLI.

DICK TURPIN HAS ONE MORE NARROW ESCAPE OF HIS LIFE, AND IS INDEBTED TO BLACK BESS FOR HIS SAFETY.

THE more Mr. Wriggles pondered over the events which had taken place at Mr. Tuttle's mansion, the more mystified he felt.

The great point to be decided was the insanity of Mr. Tuttle. If he was mad, of course it would be folly to take notice of what he said; but if he was not, how then? Mr. Wriggles rubbed his head perplexedly.

In vain, however, did he try to come to any conclusion upon the subject.

At last he made up his mind what he would do.

"I will remain somewhere about here until nightfall," he said. "If Dick Turpin is in the mansion (and it is quite possible), he will not think of stirring out till after dark; and if he is there, so sure as night comes he will try to slip away. I can see nothing of him, I have no track whatever, and this is my only resource. I will stay here and rest, and see what turns up."

Mr. Wriggles concealed himself and men in various positions, and left with them instructions to the effect that if they caught sight of Dick Turpin they were at once to apprise him of the fact—if not, they were to remain until he came to them.

The day slowly passed away, and as soon as ever it began to grow dusk, the police officers redoubled their vigilance.

Eventually one of them had the supreme satisfaction of seeing Dick Turpin and Maud enter the stable.

No sooner had they crossed the threshold, than this officer hastened to where Mr. Wriggles lay concealed, and informed him of what he had seen.

The impurpled countenance of the chief police officer expanded into a smile of intense delight.

His watching and waiting had met with a full reward.

With anxious speed he collected his men around him and hastened to the stable door.

He was just in time to see Dick Turpin swing Maud into the saddle.

It was at this moment that he addressed his men in the manner recorded at the end of a previous chapter.

Rushing forward in obedience to his words, the officers surrounded the highwayman and his steed.

Turpin had half expected some demonstration of this sort, and therefore was not so much taken by surprise as he might have been.

He drew a pistol from his belt and touched Black Bess upon the flank in order to cause her to bound forward.

But Mr. Wriggles had determined to make a last and desperate attempt to capture the redoubtable highwayman.

Springing forward, he seized Black Bess by the bridle just in time to prevent her setting off at full gallop.

Mr. Wriggles pointed his pistol full at Dick Turpin and Maud, while he cried:

"Yield—yield this moment, or I fire!"

"Take that!" said Mrs. Tuttle, suddenly.

The worthy lady was much astonished with the suddenness of the last events, but understanding what was Mr. Wriggles' intention, she suddenly seized the stable broom, which lay convenient to her hand

Just as Mr. Wriggles called upon Dick Turpin to surrender, she made a sudden charge with this novel weapon, holding it much in the position that a soldier does when he has a bayonet fixed on the end of his musket.

It struck Mr. Wriggles full in the face, and his mouth was open. The hard bristles entered it, and effectually put a stop to what he was about to say.

So astonished was he at the unexpectedness of this assault, and so disconcerted by the peculiar nature of it, that he released his hold upon the bridle of Black Bess and staggered back several paces.

"Take that!" cried Mrs. Tuttle, who was much elated with the victory she had gained—"take that! It is my turn now! I owes you all a grudge!"

With these words she followed up her attack with the stable broom, only she used the weapon in a different manner.

Whirling it in the air like an Indian club, she brought it down with full force upon the head of the chief police officer.

Dick Turpin did not see this last portion of the encounter.

Black Bess was impatient to be free, and as soon as Mr. Wriggles released his hold upon the rein, she gave one tremendous bound forward and galloped off at a furious rate.

It was madness to follow her.

Under the impulse of the moment, several shots were fired, but not with sufficient accuracy of aim to do any damage.

Turpin directed the course of his steed straight across the grounds, quite heedless of the amount of damage he might do to the shrubs and flowers.

He passed by the gable end of the hall, and just as he did so a window was dashed violently open.

Poor Mr. Tuttle appeared at it.

It was evident he caught sight of the flying highwayman, for he uttered a cry of distress and clapped both his hands to his head.

That was all Dick saw, for, with a rush, the house was left behind.

"One more escape, dear Maud!" said Turpin, as he pressed his fair companion closer to him—"one more escape, for we are both unhurt."

Maud was weeping.

"Don't weep, dear one, the danger is over now."

"But this is dreadful," sobbed Maud. "Are we to have no rest?—will not the officers allow us even a little peace?"

"I fear not. They are too intent upon my capture, and the many defeats they have had so far from disheartening them seem, on the contrary, to make them more persevering."

There was a pause, which lasted several moments.

Dick was the first to break it.

"The officers are in pursuit of us," he said; "I can hear the sound of their horses on the road behind us. Don't be alarmed—they are at a great distance. I have no doubt, now that Black Bess has had rest and food, that we shall be able to distance them easily."

Maud endeavoured to look back.

"I can see nothing of them," she said at length.

"I hope you can't. I should be vexed indeed if they were within sight. They are at a great distance, and every moment the sound of their horses' feet grows more and more indistinct."

"I can hear nothing."

"Nor I now. But Maud, it will not do for this sort of thing to continue—it will wear you out entirely; you must have some rest and peace, even if I don't."

"No—no, with you—let me be with you!"

"We will talk this matter over, Maud. I have been thinking a great deal about it, and I will tell you what I have to propose."

"It must not involve a separation."

"Listen, we will push forward at the best speed we can make for the remainder of the night. When morning comes I will look out for some retired little cottage, and when I have found one I shall halt there."

"For what?"

"For rest for you, for myself, and for Black Bess. We shall all need it. I shall try if I cannot make some arrangement with the inmates of the cottage to allow you to stay with them."

"Not by myself?"

"Yes, dear one, but only for a few days. I will give you my reasons for wishing this course to be adopted. In the first place, you will be in peace and security, and will be able to recover yourself from the effects of what has lately happened."

"And you, what shall you do?"

"There are many things which I am compelled to do. You have not forgotten the plan which I proposed, and which was agreed to?"

"You mean with regard to taking an inn?"

"Yes, that is what I mean. Tom, Claude, and Jack, as you are already aware, have gone down to the New Forest in furtherance of that object. It was appointed that we should meet at the deserted mansion, and by to-morrow at the furthest I should say they will return."

Maud clung closer to Dick. She guessed what was coming, and yet did not know what to say in opposition to it.

"It may be the cause of a great deal of mischief if they arrive and find no one there, they might even fall into some trap laid for them by the officers. Surely you would not wish such a calamity as that to happen?"

"No, no."

"I am sure you would not."

"You intend to leave me at this cottage while you repair to the deserted mansion and meet your companions?"

"Exactly. You will be in peace and security, and so I shall be relieved of one very great responsibility; and do not be offended, I shall be much safer alone and with no one to look after but myself, than I should be if I had to be answerable for your safety as well as my own."

"But will it not be very dangerous to return to the deserted mansion?"

"There will be danger, I admit, yet not so much as my three friends would run were they to go there in ignorance of the fact that we had been hunted out by the police officers."

"But could you not manage to meet them at some other place, and so avoid the necessity of going to the deserted mansion at all?"

"I fear not. I shall approach with great caution, for I shall know just what danger I may have to encounter, and there is another reason why I should return, and the sooner I do so the better. Do you not remember that we have a large sum of money concealed in the upper room? When we were surprised on the staircase by the entrance of the police officers, we had neither time nor opportunity to fetch this money and take it with us in our flight. It would, I think, be very foolish to allow that money to remain without making an effort to obtain possession of it again. A large amount of money must be obtained before we can carry out the plan that will ensure our safety, and you will admit that not only would it take a longer time, but the risk would be very much greater if we collected the money again on the highway."

"But the officers may have already taken it."

"I scarcely feel afraid of that. Mr. Wriggles and those of his men who were unwounded pursued us; the wounded only remained; these have, doubtless, taken their departure, and ten to one if the thought of searching the deserted mansion ever entered their heads; but I am sure the danger will be great, and I shall be in a state of perpetual dread while you are absent on this excursion."

"Nay, Maud, be brave! Surely you would not wish me to hold back, and be the means, probably, of causing the capture of my three comrades?"

"No, no—not that!"

"Well, then, reconcile yourself to my absence as well as you can. Will it not be better for you to remain at the cottage, as I proposed?"

"I should feel safer, and suffer less anxiety if I was with you."

"But you would not wish to increase my danger, which you infallibly would do if you accompany me."

"I will stay, then, though I feel most reluctant to do so."

"Cheer up, Maud—better days will soon arrive! If our three friends have succeeded in obtaining possession of the miser's chest of gold—and I don't see anything to prevent them—why, then, all will be well. I shall meet them, and then we shall have more than sufficient money to carry out our scheme, and bring it to the utmost perfection."

"Don't be offended at what I am about to say," exclaimed Maud. "I wish to ask you a question."

"Ask it freely."

"Then, are you not tired of this life of desperate danger and adventure? It cannot last for ever. Some day or other it must end—meet with a sudden if not ignominious termination. Why not quit this mode of life?"

Turpin was silent.

"It would be better for you—better for all of us," continued Maud, urgingly. "Think of what I have said, and answer me."

"I am a highwayman, Maud, and all the world knows it; and a highwayman I must remain. They would not suffer me to be anything else. No, no, I must not think of that—you must not think of it. It is out of the question. How, think you, could I obtain a livelihood? Who would employ me?"

"You forget," said Maud, "what a large sum of money you possess—surely sufficient to keep us from want for a long time."

"But it doesn't belong to me, Maud; only a fourth portion of it is mine. If I possessed the whole, then there would be some possibility of carrying out your plan. I might indeed feel induced to retire from this adventurous life. We should have sufficient to maintain us in a foreign land; but as things are, it is idle to think about it."

"Don't say that!"

"Why not? It is the truth. As I said before, one-fourth of the money would be of little use; and besides, I should have to gain the permission of my three comrades."

Maud sobbed and wept.

"Don't feel disappointed and sad. I will promise you this, when we all meet we will ascertain exactly what amount of money we have. The proposition you have made to-night shall then be considered, and we will decide whether that shall be acted upon, or whether the scheme originally proposed shall be adopted."

Maud made no reply; she felt it would be useless to speak.

Her only hope was, that events would take such a turn as to make Dick Turpin's comrades agree to her suggestion.

Dick Turpin was silent, and one glance into his countenance would have been sufficient to make anyone aware that he was thinking deeply over what had just been said to him.

A long time elapsed before any more words were exchanged.

From the starting, Dick Turpin had pursued one uniform direction, and he still followed it.

His attentive ear failed to catch any sound that indicated the officers were on his track.

All around was as silent as it was dark.

He slightly increased the speed Black Bess was going, for he was anxious to get still further off, and he wished to come to a halt soon after sunrise.

"Look, Maud," he said at length. "Do you see that faint line of light in the horizon yonder?—that shows the dawn to be close at hand. In a little time it will be quite light. Then the sun will rise, and after that I trust we shall find some place that will be suitable for our purpose."

CHAPTER DLII.

DICK TURPIN BIDS MAUD FAREWELL, AND DEPARTS ON HIS PERILOUS JOURNEY.

When at last the morning fairly broke, Maud raised her head from Turpin's shoulder, and looked around her.

She found they were in what appeared to be a very lonely part of the country, and a part, too, with which she was not at all familiar.

Nothing but trees and fields were around them; there was not a sign of a single habitation.

"I have been in this part of the country before," said Turpin, "and, if I recollect right, we shall, after mounting yonder hill, come in sight of a farm-house. It is there where I propose you shall stop."

As he spoke, Dick Turpin pointed to a long, steep hill, a considerable distance off, and beyond which, nothing could be seen save the clear morning sky.

Dick allowed Black Bess to ascend this hill at a walk. Carrying a double burden for so long had much fatigued the gallant creature.

During the time occupied by the ascent, Dick Turpin was revolving in his mind some scheme—some tale which he could tell to the inhabitants of the farm-house, in order to account in the first place for his coming there in so strange a fashion, and secondly, for leaving Maud behind him.

He was well aware that without he gave some palpable and sufficient reason, the people would not rest satisfied, but their curiosity would be roused, and this might lead to the worst possible results.

Dick had an inventive brain, and in a general way he was never at a loss to think of something which would have the effect of completely deceiving those he addressed. As an instance, we may remind the reader of the clever manner in which he told his tale to Mr. Tuttle.

The present case, however, was somewhat more difficult.

By the time the top of the hill was reached, he had formed the bare outline of a plan, which he imagined, when matured, would be just the thing.

He allowed Black Bess to pause on the top of this hill, and recover herself a little from her exertions.

He took the opportunity of surveying the country around him.

His first thought was concerning the officers, and he looked in the direction he had come, in order to ascertain whether any of them were in sight.

He had an excellent opportunity for making his observations. The morning was a remarkably clear one. His face was turned towards the west, and the sun behind him shone with great power and beauty upon everything that lay in this direction.

The most searching gaze, however, failed to discern the least signs of the police officers, and he came to the conclusion that at last he had been lucky enough to shake them off entirely.

He turned round, with his countenance expressive of calmness and content.

Raising his riding-whip, he pointed with it to a large, old-fashioned farm-house, situate about half-way down the hill.

It was almost surrounded by trees, but the thatched roof and the red chimney-pots could be clearly seen.

"There, Maud," he said, "is a place where I hope to find shelter and refuge. What an air of calmness the whole place has! Is it not delightful? Surely here—if anywhere—you will be safe from all harm!"

Maud gazed upon the fair scene spread out before her with feelings of the greatest delight, and she looked forward with pleasure to the prospect of remaining for a time in this peaceful, secluded spot.

Her heart throbbed painfully as she thought how happy she should be if she could but pass the remainder of her life in as much quietude.

Dick Turpin gazed with unmingled pleasure at the fair scene before him; no one could help doing so, and the longer he gazed, the more did the desire for rest and peace come over him.

"Come," he said—"we will make our way at once towards this peaceful habitation; I have great hopes of being able to obtain shelter there. I think I shall be able to entirely remove even the shadow of a suspicion."

Rather more than half-way down the hill there was a small white gate, and before this Dick Turpin paused.

It was only latched, and he opened it easily by means of his riding-whip; it closed of itself.

A winding road led from the gate to the farm-house, and along this he took his way, to the intense astonishment of one or two farm labourers, who at that early hour were at work in the fields.

In a little more than five minutes, he reached the homestead, and paused before the rustic porch.

He slipped quickly from the saddle, and assisted Maud to dismount.

By the time this was done the door of the farm-house was opened, the inmates apparently having either seen or heard the arrival.

Quite a cluster of heads appeared in the doorway, but Dick fixed his attention upon the person of a little ruddy man with small, twinkling eyes, and a face of fiery redness.

From his manner, and jolly, contented look, Turpin came to the conclusion that this must be the owner of the farm-house.

Taking off his hat, he made a low bow.

"I have called here," he said, "to request your hospitality for myself and this lady. We are much fatigued, having travelled very many miles. Yours is the only house we have seen for several hours, and, not knowing how far we might have to go before we saw another, I thought I would come up to you and ask you if you would allow us to remain here for a little while?"

"You did quite right, sir!" said the farmer, in a hearty voice. "Come in—come in! You are heartily welcome to the best the house can afford! It was lucky you stopped, for, if you were going towards London, you would have to travel at least ten miles before you came to the next house, and that's only a farm-house, as this is."

While speaking these words, the farmer, with the greatest hospitality, ushered Dick Turpin and Maud into his humble dwelling.

A lad about ten years of age sprang forward and said:

"I will take the gentleman's horse round to the stable, father."

"Do so, my lad. And now, wife, lay the cloth."

This was a better reception than Dick had dared to hope for. He was glad, for, judging by what had already taken place, he fancied he should be able to carry out the remainder of his plan.

A substantial meal was placed upon the table, of which they partook with a heartiness that delighted the old farmer exceedingly.

During the meal they chatted upon indifferent subjects, and when it was over Dick rose, and, addressing the farmer, said:

"If you have no objection, I should like to take a walk with you round to the stable, and have a look at my horse."

"Certainly, sir—certainly! I am most willing! Here, dame, give me my hat and stick!"

Thus equipped, Turpin and the farmer sallied out into the open air.

"I am a straightforward man," said Turpin, "and one of few words. I want to say something to you—and so I shall say it at once, without any beating about the bush."

The farmer looked up into Dick's face with a puzzled expression on his countenance as he replied:

"I do like anybody that's upright and down straight. I try so to be as straightforward as I can myself."

"I know you do," said Dick—"I can see that at a glance."

"Can you now?" ejaculated the farmer.

"I can assure you I could; and, what's more, I could perceive that you were a man of discretion, and that has caused me to make up my mind to take you into my confidence."

"You are as plain-spoken a gentleman as ever I met with," replied the farmer, "and I shall be very glad to render you a service."

"Thanks—thanks! Well, then, you must know that I am an officer in the army, with nothing but my pay to depend upon."

"Which isn't much."

"It is very little," said Turpin, "but that didn't prevent me from falling in love with a very pretty girl, who also fell in love with me; but her parents were very, very rich, and had got great expectations. Of course they would not listen to me, a poor soldier of fortune, and when they discovered how matters stood they tried everything they could think of to break the match."

The farmer was deeply interested.

"A man of your experience," continued Turpin, "cannot have lived all these years without knowing very well what a soldier is like."

"Well, rather; and I should say I know 'em, and candidly speaking, I don't much like 'em, and I'll tell you why: There came a soger courtin' my wife, that is when she was a girl, and before she was my wife, and I very nearly lost her through him, for the women are devilish fond of a red coat. I gained the day though," added the farmer, with a chuckle, as though the recollection afforded him intense delight.

Doubtless he would have favoured the highwayman with a long tale, but Dick did not happen to be in the humour to listen to it, so he went on:

"I determined to have her in spite of all of them, and she was quite willing. They carried her off, but I discovered her place of retreat, communicated with her, and at last obtained a meeting. I didn't expect to succeed, but nevertheless, I pressed her to elope, and she consented. I had made no preparations for such an event, and had only one horse with me. I know if you want a girl you must take her while she is in the humour, so I proposed that she should ride on the saddle before me."

"Good—good!" said the farmer, rubbing his hands. "You soldiers have a strange way of wooing."

"Ha—ha! I believe you. I carried her off as you see. We have been travelling all night in the fashion I described, but she became so fatigued I was obliged to stop, and that is just what has brought us here."

Dick looked piercingly into the farmer's countenance, and was rejoiced to find that so far the explanation he had given was considered perfectly satisfactory.

"Well, now," said Dick, "I have come to the most important part of the affair. As a matter of course, the girl will be missed, and close search will be made after her. I shall be suspected, and they know where my regiment is quartered. They will be sure to make a call there."

"I see."

"I have got leave of absence, but my time expires at six o'clock to-morrow morning, and I am bound to report myself at that time. If I don't, I shall get into serious trouble. I told you I had made no preparations for this event, because I did not expect it. And now to tell you what I want: You will confer a very great favour upon me if you will allow the young lady to stay at your house while I ride back to London, and report myself at the proper time and place, get a house ready, and a special licence. When I have done that I shall come back, and of course, all the rest will be all plain sailing; for, after we are married, her friends will have to grin, and bear and abide by it, and make the best of a bad job."

"Very true!" said the farmer.

"Well, now, would you mind taking care of the lady, under these circumstances? I shall only be absent for two or three days, and you will do us both a very great service, for she loves me to distraction, and she would break her heart if we were parted!"

"Here's my hand on it," replied the farmer. "You may consider it as settled and agreed."

"I am delighted to hear you say so, and I hope I shall live to see the day when I shall be able to make you some return for this kindness."

"Pho—pho! Don't speak about that! I am quite willing to assist you. Lead the way. Your talk makes me feel quite young again. But here's the stable. Come in, you will find your horse all right."

Dick followed the farmer into the stable, where he had the satisfaction of finding Black Bess very comfortable.

He repeated his thanks to the farmer again and again.

He congratulated himself upon the success he had met with, and so far as he could tell, there was every prospect that Maud would remain in safety and peace at the farm-house for a few days, while he rejoined his companions and gained possession of the money they had left in the deserted mansion.

He spent some time in strolling about the grounds, conversing with the farmer, and then returned to the house.

He had no opportunity of speaking to Maud during the remainder of the day.

At dusk, however, he announced his intention of departing, and requested that his horse should be got ready.

He had whispered to Maud and told her that he had made matters right with the farmer, but had not explained.

He bid the farmer and his family good-bye, and left the farm-house.

Maud followed him with a tearful countenance and a sinking heart.

The inmates of the homestead understood perfectly well that the lovers were about to part, and so they left them alone.

Upon reaching the outside of the farm-house, Maud clung to Dick and placed her head against his breast.

He reassured her, as well as he was able, and told how successful he had been with the farmer, and acquainted her with the details of the story he had told him to account for their presence there in such a fashion.

Maud could scarcely suppress a smile.

"And now," said Turpin, "remain here. Be calm—be content! I may be absent two or three days, but do not let that alarm you; I will take every possible care to keep out of danger, and will run no unnecessary risk. As soon as ever I can obtain the money and rejoin my comrades, I will return and take you from this place! I have much to do, but while I am engaged upon it I shall have the satisfaction of knowing that you are in perfect safety, for in this farm-house, surrounded by these kind people, what harm can happen to you?"

"None—none to me," sobbed Maud; "it is you who are running into danger."

"It is true; but don't let that alarm you. I have come safely out of more dangerous enterprises than this one! Do not betray me by any incautious word or act, and then all will be well."

"But when may I expect you?"

"On the third night from now, but not before; it will be towards morning, so until then make yourself as contented as you can, and after that expect me."

There was a pause, and then Dick Turpin, pressing her close to his heart, said:

"We must part. Farewell! Remember, I only leave you for a short time and shall soon return, and if you will consider all that I am going to do, you will come to the conclusion that it is not so very dangerous after all. I have only one caution, do not suffer your alarm to be so great as to be the means of arousing suspicion in the minds of these people. And now, farewell!"

Maud felt heart-broken, but she felt she could not ask him to stay or to take her with him.

The parting was necessary, and she endeavoured to reconcile herself to it.

Dick gently disengaged himself from her embrace.

Tears filled her eyes and she could see nothing.

When she dashed them aside, however, she perceived Dick Turpin riding slowly towards the gate opening into the high-road.

She waved her hand to him as the last farewell, and he returned the signal.

Then, in another moment, he was gone.

CHAPTER DLIII.

TOM KING IS JUST IN TIME TO PREVENT THE SUICIDE OF THE MYSTERIOUS STRANGER.

THE curiosity of Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack was excited to the utmost degree by what they had just seen.

It may seem strange that they should be so deeply interested by the occurrence of the simple incident of a man climbing up a tree.

There was, however, something so peculiar and so striking, not only in the personal appearance of this young man, but in the distracted manner in which he ran towards the tree, that they could not but gaze with the greatest intentness.

As soon as his person was concealed amongst the branches our friends turned to each other.

"What do you think of that?" asked Tom King.

"Think!" replied Claude. "Why, I feel quite sure he has ascended the tree for some important purpose."

"But what?"

"That is just what I should like to know, and precisely what I intend to find out—that is, if you are both in the same mind as myself."

"I am quite willing!" said Sixteen-String Jack.

"And I!" added Tom King. "In all probability this occurrence does not concern us in any way whatever, and I don't think there is much chance of reaping any benefit from it in a pecuniary point of view. However, I consider that, situated as we are, it is our duty to take notice of everything we see which is at all out of the way, and which we cannot exactly understand."

"I fully agree with you," said Claude. "By adopting that plan, we should very likely avoid danger, and also become acquainted with many singular incidents of which we should otherwise remain in ignorance."

Our friends had trotted on towards the trees while they spoke thus, and, just as Claude had concluded, Sixteen-String Jack cried:

"Look—look! What do you think of that? What is he doing?"

The highwaymen fixed their eyes upon the tree the young man had ascended.

First the leaves were violently agitated, and then they perceived the form of the stranger.

He came out on to one of the largest and straightest branches, creeping along it with great care; nor did he pause until he had nearly reached its extremity.

At last he stopped, and the highwaymen could see the bough upon which he sat bend considerably beneath his weight.

The stranger was apparently deeply and wholly absorbed by what he was about, for he never looked around him once, and consequently failed to observe the advance of our friends, who continued to watch his motions with rapidly-increasing interest.

Having seated himself on the extremity of the bough in the manner we have recorded, the stranger commenced feeling in his pockets, and finally produced a piece of stout rope about three or four feet in length.

One end of this he carefully and firmly tied to the branch of the tree.

He pulled it several times, in order to test its firmness, and then, being to all appearances quite satisfied with the result, formed the other end into a noose.

This he slipped over his head, and in the twinkling of an eye dropped from his seat.

There he hung at full length suspended by the rope round his neck.

He kicked and plunged violently for a few seconds, and then grew perfectly still.

The highwaymen—and Tom King especially—divined instantly that the rash young man intended to commit the crime of suicide.

Guessing at his purpose, Tom King spurred his horse into a gallop, and he was some distance off before his comrades could recover themselves sufficiently to follow him.

So suddenly did the young stranger drop from the branch after placing the noose round his neck, that Tom was not in time to frustrate his rash intention; and, though the horse galloped towards the tree at the top of his speed, yet he did not reach it until the young man had ceased to struggle.

As swift as lightning, however, Tom King drew his sword, and with one slash divided the rope.

The body fell to the ground with a dull, heavy crash, and lay on the grass a huddled-up heap.

By the time this had happened, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack arrived upon the scene of action.

Tom King alighted from his horse without the loss of a moment, and, stooping down, loosened the rope from round the stranger's neck.

When that was done no signs of life were given, and they began to think that they were too late.

Claude and Jack also dismounted, and the latter perceiving at a distance a pool of water, ran towards it, and brought back as much as his hat would hold.

He dashed all the lot at once into the stranger's face, who shuddered visibly, gasped for breath, and finally opened his eyes.

The highwaymen now left him to recover of himself, for they could tell by his general appearance that it would not be long before vitality was restored to him.

They stood by watching.

After the lapse of a few seconds, the stranger uttered a cry and started to his feet as though galvanized.

But his strength was not sufficient to sustain him in an upright position, and he sank down again.

Tom King spoke.

"Rash man," he said, "be thankful that you have been prevented from committing the crime you contemplated!"

The stranger looked up at him, and then, for the first time, Tom and his comrades had a good opportunity of noticing the appearance of the individual they had saved from death.

His age could not have been more than four-and-twenty, and was most likely much less.

His face was an extremely handsome one, but now it was clouded by the bitterest sadness, and he had altogether an air of the deepest melancholy.

He looked as though he was tired of life, and would willingly free himself from it.

He was dressed with richness and elegance, and he had about him that indescribable something which proclaims a member of the upper ranks of society.

He regarded the three highwaymen successively with fixed attention, and then at last, in a sad and hollow voice, he spoke:

"Gentlemen," he said, "it is clear that to one and all of you I owe my life! In some way or other you have saved me, but I cannot tell how!"

"It was I," replied Tom King, "who happened to be in time to snatch you from the jaws of death!"

"I wish I could thank you," said the stranger, "or that I could look upon what you have done in the light of a service rendered! But I cannot—it is impossible! On the contrary, in bringing me back to life, you have done me an incalculable injury, and will cause a double pang!"

"How so?"

"Because I am so thoroughly weary of my life that I am resolved to rid myself of it! I candidly tell you that I shall seize the next opportunity that presents itself to make the attempt, and I trust that I shall meet with better luck than I have this morning!"

As may be supposed, our friends listened to what the stranger said with great astonishment.

His determination surprised them beyond measure.

Up to that moment they had always believed that none had committed suicide who did not at the last moment, and when too late, regret that they had been so rash.

They judged by those who had been saved from self-murder, and they, without exception, manifested the greatest joy at their deliverance.

The stranger at their feet was, however, a being of quite a different character, for he was regretting what they had done.

These thoughts passed through their minds while he spoke. Tom King replied at once:

"I do not desire your thanks. When I saw what you were about, I considered it was my duty to try my best to save you, and I have succeeded. I desire nothing more."

"You are surprised, no doubt," said the stranger, in a melancholy voice, "to find one so young as I am so anxious to quit life! Your wonder would cease, however, if you knew my history. You would then think with me that my life was worthless and unbearable!"

"It does indeed seem strange that you should manifest so much determination as you do, and although I have not the least notion who you are, still I can affirm that you are wrong in coming to the conclusion that you ought to throw your life away."

"You speak in ignorance!" said the stranger, in the same impassioned tones he had from the first employed. "But I am not disposed to quarrel or dispute with anyone! I can't thank you for saving my life, and as soon as I am strong enough I shall rise to my feet! If you choose to wait till then I shall depart, and whichever way you are going, mine will be in the opposite direction!"

"You are not only thankless, but churlish!"

"Pray pardon me if I am! But if you will believe me, I am not in a state to study the difference between rudeness and politeness!"

"Your behaviour surprises me more and more each second—so much so that I cannot help coming to the conclusion that the force of circumstances which have produced this frame of mind are of a most singular nature."

"You are right, sir, they are! I might say, with perfect truth and safety, that they have no parallel!"

"You excite my curiosity more and more!"

"Alas, sir! had you seen me two days ago, you would now fail to recognise me—you would refuse to believe that I was the same person!"

"Are you so greatly changed?"

"I am—changed until in every way I am the opposite of what I was!"

"You will excuse me, sir, but your words inflame my curiosity more even than your actions!"

"Very likely!"

"And although you may not feel disposed to thank me for having saved your life, yet my intentions were good."

"No doubt."

"I say, then, as my intentions were good, perhaps you would not consider it too much if I was to ask you to do me a favour in return for the service I have rendered you, and which, unfortunately, is so entirely unappreciated."

"I don't see that it is in my power to do anything for anyone. You have indeed done me an injury. Think what additional pain you have caused me, and think what I shall have to go through again!"

"I trust that you will yet alter your determination, and rejoice that you were saved."

"Never, never! Do not have any such thought as that. If it had not been for your interference, I should by this time have been beyond all pain—my troubles would have been over. Now I shall have to go through all those disagreeable preparations again!"

"I say, I hope you will change your mind."

"No—I must die—to live is impossible! Talking of granting favours, it is in your power to grant me one."

"I should rejoice."

The stranger smiled in a peculiar fashion.

"I am not so sure of that. The only service you could render me would be to rid me of the life you were at so much pains to save."

"Impossible!"

"So you refuse?"

"Decidedly! You must have been mad if you thought for one moment that I should consent."

"Then there is no help for it?"

"No help for what?"

"I must embrace the next opportunity I can find! I am resolved to quit this life and all its cares in some way or other long before yon climbing sun reaches the meridian."

"Your conversation is very extraordinary."

"No doubt it appears so to you, but then you must remember that you are ignorant of my history."

"I certainly am."

"You may think me insane?"

"No, I don't. You speak strange, but it is too rational and coherent for that. No—you are not insane, or if you are, your madness is of a different kind to any that I have seen or heard of."

"No, I am not insane! I wish I was, and then I would not be harassed with these terrible reflections, which will not allow me a moment's peace. No, no—I suffer too much to be mad!"

"I said I had a favour to ask you."

"Yes, what is it?"

"Not such an outrageous one as your own. All you have said, and the manner in which you have acted, have served to inflame my curiosity to a greater degree than I have ever before experienced! No doubt my companions feel much the same as I do."

"We do—we do!" exclaimed Claude and Jack together.

"Then, sir, would you mind recounting to us those circumstances which have brought you to your present state of mind, and caused you to be so determined to quit this world? The record cannot fail to be full of the deepest interest, and perhaps convey some useful and necessary lesson from your own experience."

"You may."

"Then, is it asking too much, if I make the request that you will recount the curious circumstances I have alluded to?"

"And that is your favour? The one you meant to ask?"

"Yes. Will you grant it?"

"I will."

"Many thanks."

"Do not fall into the error of supposing, however, that I do this out of any feeling of gratitude. It is quite the reverse. I look upon you almost as an enemy. However, we will let that pass. It will give me pain to relate my history, but I will do it in the hope that by being fully known, it may serve as a lesson to others who will take warning by my fate, and not act in the manner I have done, and which has been the means of bringing about the frame of mind I am now in, and which you so much deplore."

CHAPTER DLIV.

TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK ARE AUDITORS OF A MOST SINGULAR NARRATIVE.

EVERY word the mysterious stranger spoke seemed of additional interest, and our friends were much delighted to think that they were about to be made acquainted with those facts about which they felt so anxious, and which at first they had scarcely hoped to learn.

Now, however, the stranger had signified his willingness to relate to them the story of his life, and they prepared to listen to every word he said with the greatest possible amount of attention.

The stranger seated himself upon the grass in a more comfortable manner than he had done, and buried his head in his hands.

The highwaymen understood from this action that he was collecting his thoughts in order that he might begin his narration and tell it through to the end in a succinct and straightforward manner.

Being under this belief, they availed themselves of the opportunity to secure their horses.

They did it in a manner, which, while it effectually prevented them from straying away, yet allowed them to crop the short, sweet grass that grew near the trees.

They also took a careful observation of the surrounding scene.

Having done so, they felt there was little likelihood of being disturbed.

Not a single human being—not a single dwelling-place was in sight.

Directly afterwards the thought occurred to them that the place was a very lonely, unfrequented one, and had been chosen by the young man for the perpetration of his heinous crime upon that very account.

And now, unable to control their impatience any longer, they seated themselves together on the grass in front of the stranger, and at a little distance from him.

Having thus taken up their positions, they waited for the stranger to commence.

At last he raised his head, and, having looked at them with the greatest attention, said:

"Although I am ignorant of your names, for you are all three perfect strangers to me, yet, as a kind of guarantee as to the truth of what I am going to relate, I will tell you my own name, and the real names of the parties who have been joint actors with me in this affair."

"We do not wish to hear your name," said Tom King, "and you can substitute fictitious ones for the other persons, if you think proper."

"No—I will tell you the real names."

"As you please! Either way we shall be content."

Then the stranger paused, cleared his throat, and began.

"My name is Frederick Marchmont. My father is a clergyman in Scotland, and I am his only son.

"In order that my education should be thoroughly completed, I was sent to London to pursue a course of studies.

"For a long time I devoted myself ardently to my pursuits. I knew no one in London, and, being naturally of a solitary—even unsociable—disposition, I took no trouble to find acquaintances.

"This state of things, however, was not destined to continue, though I little thought that the forming of an acquaintanceship in London would lead to such deplorable results.

"It is not necessary I should tell you how it was that I became acquainted with a lady named Swayne, who lived in the outskirts of the city.

"Mrs. Swayne was a widow with three children. One was a young man about my own age, who, however, at the time I became acquainted with the family, was absent in Spain, whither he had been sent to transact some important business."

The stranger's voice failed him several times during this last sentence, and now he broke down altogether.

Our friends were silent.

In a little while he recovered himself from his emotion, and continued:

"The other two children were daughters—one Ellen, whose age was about eighteen, was——"

The stranger stopped suddenly.

His voice failed him entirely, and he burst into sobs and tears.

As before, however, he recovered himself with great rapidity.

"Mrs. Swayne had two daughters—one named Ellen, who was about eighteen, and the other named Florence, who was a mere child.

"Being alone in the great city, as I was with no other friends save those, it was no more than natural that an affection should spring up between Ellen and myself.

"Such was the case—the intimacy was approved of by our parents, and we were betrothed."

Again the stranger paused, and he buried his face in his hands, in order to conceal his emotion.

"When you hear further," he said, "you will understand the reason why the recapitulation of these simple incidents affects me so strongly.

"I was perfectly happy.

"All went well, and in a few months we were to be married.

"Time rolled round, and everything went smoothly until the third day before the one on which the wedding was appointed to take place arrived.

"I was walking through the streets, when, by chance, I perceived some kind of scuffle going on, and, prompted by a curiosity, the result of which has been unfortunate to a degree, I hastened forward to learn what it was.

"I found it was a young man, well dressed, but in a deplorable state of intoxication, who was struggling with a police officer, who was endeavouring to arrest him, and take him to the roundhouse for creating a disturbance in the streets.

"It would seem that a friend of the intoxicated man happened to be passing by, and seeing what the officer was about, stepped forward and endeavoured to prevent him from executing his duty.

"The intoxicated man was very violent, and he was rather more than a match for the police officer in height and strength; and when this new comer sided with his friend and attacked the constable, he stood but a poor chance indeed.

"Still the officer endeavoured to effect his purpose.

"The crowd of people stood idly by, and no one seemed inclined to take the part of the constable, who was fast becoming exhausted.

"Such being the aspect of affairs, I considered it my duty to interfere, and I did so, siding with the police officer.

"Amid the jeers and taunts of the crowd, I endeavoured to bring all three to reason; but I failed. Blows were exchanged, and I quickly found myself compelled to join in the fight, or else suffer myself to be beaten most unmercifully.

"I was angry at the non-success which I had met with, and took the part of the constable to the best of my ability.

"Then more police officers came up, the intoxicated man was secured, and his friend and myself were left confronting each other.

"We spoke fiercely and angrily, and the crowd applauded.

"'You have insulted me!' he cried. 'You had no business to interfere! Apologise instantly!'

"Several persons stepped forward, some placing themselves by my side, and some by the side of my antagonist.

"'This dispute must be settled in a proper manner!' they cried. 'There is only one way in which gentlemen settle their differences!'

"I knew what was meant; but I had always had the greatest horror of duelling, which I considered an atrocious crime, and so I resolved not to allow myself to be forced into one by my would-be supporters.

"Those who had ranked themselves with my antagonist succeeded better, for they persuaded the misguided young man to draw his sword.

"He came fiercely towards me, and tapped me on the breast.

"'You have insulted me,' he said, 'and the insult must be avenged! You have struck me! Draw and defend yourself!—we will settle this matter on the spot!'

"Anything in the shape of a contest was especially delightful to the disorderly crew who had assembled, and so they applauded vociferously when the young man spoke.

"I folded my arms, and assumed as much calmness as I could.

"'You are a stranger to me,' I said; 'I know not who you are. But of this I am quite certain—you are so much heated with wine, or passion, or perhaps with both, that you are not responsible for your actions, and so I decline to fight with you. Besides, I abhor duelling!'

"These words seemed to increase the resentment of my adversary, those around me crying out: 'Coward!—coward! He dare not fight! He carries a sword by his side, but dare not use it!' and other speeches of the like nature.

"I was very much exasperated at finding myself thus drawn into a brawl; but feeling that my passion was rising rapidly, I made every effort to subdue it.

"'Draw,' said the young man—'draw and defend yourself, or I will slay you where you stand!'

"I endeavoured to expostulate.

"'This is a foolish matter,' I said, 'to stake our lives upon!'

"I should have proceeded further, but the crowd interrupted me with hisses and yells, and then some one with a stentorian voice roared out:

"'Beat the coward with your scabbard!—drive him forth!'

"These words raised me to the utmost fury, and I drew my sword.

"It rang against that of my opponent with a clashing sound.

"While we stood thus with crossed blades, I cried:

"'Look out now! You have forced me into this, and you must reap the consequences!'

"'You are too full of words,' said the young man,—'let us see some of your deeds!'

"The crowd applauded to the utmost.

"In another second the combat commenced.

"I was greatly enraged, and felt that I had only two alternatives, and that I must choose one of them—either to slay or be slain.

"The contest was a brief one.

"From some cause or other, my antagonist's foot slipped and he stumbled forward.

"Just at that moment I was about to make a thrust, and was holding myself in readiness to do so.

"In stumbling forward he fell against the keen point of my sword, and, before I could properly understand what had happened, I felt the hilt of my sword strike with a dull thud against his breast.

"Horror-struck at this incident, I let go my hold upon the hilt of my sword, and, before any of the self-constituted seconds could step forward to save him, the young man, with a gasping, agonising cry, fell backwards into the street.

"Every person in the crowd suddenly became silent—all were appalled, and I stood as though turned to stone.

"The next sounds I heard were voices urging me to fly, and so escape the consequences of the deed.

"It was some time before I could comprehend them; but at last, overcome with horror, and dreading the consequences of what I had done, I turned round and hastened away.

"I gave one glance at my foe as he lay on his back in the roadway.

"In his fall he had partly driven out the sword, while the point had entered the earth, so that anyone seeing him in this position, and not knowing the facts of the case, would come to the conclusion that he had been ruthlessly pinned to the ground.

"His face was ghastly white, and contracted into an expression of the greatest anguish.

"It was impossible that he could survive such a wound, and, with the feelings of a murderer, I fled I scarcely knew where.

"During the whole of that night I roamed restlessly through the streets of London like a ghost, not knowing what to do and where to go, fearing to return to my lodgings lest I should be recognised.

"My mind was indeed in a state of the utmost confusion.

"Day broke before I was able to collect my senses sufficiently to decide upon what I should do.

"At last I resolved to call upon Mrs. Swayne to tell her what had taken place, to bid her and Ellen adieu, and leave England for ever.

"I knew not how my affianced would receive me,—I feared the worst, for many a time had I heard her express in the warmest terms her abhorrence of duelling.

"Mrs. Swayne, too, expressed her detestation of it, but they had good reason for doing so, for the father of one and the husband of the other had been slain in a duel in the streets.

"Yet, knowing all the circumstances, I resolved to make a full confession of my guilt.

"They would loathe and hate me.

"I prepared myself for that, but in some other land I fancied I might forget the occurrences of that dreadful night.

[DICK TURPIN SUDDENLY ENCOUNTERS THE DRAGOONS.]

"Weary, haggard, and staggering like a drunken man, I made my way to the residence of Mrs. Swayne.

"As I turned into the streets a strange, cold chill suddenly swept over me; it was a horrible sensation, and such an one as I had never felt before.

"I walked on, however, and ascended the steps leading to the front door.

"I raised the knocker, and while I was in the act of bringing it down I experienced the same cold, shuddering sensation, though much more intensely than before.

"I imagined it proceeded from the dread which I felt of the ordeal through which I was about to pass.

"My blood seemed to turn icy cold, and crept through my veins slowly and sluggishly, so much so that I was compelled to lean against the door post for support.

"The door was opened. A film was over my eyes, but yet I was able to see that it was Ellen who had opened the door.

"The strangeness of this circumstance seemed to rouse me from my stupor—my eyes brightened, and I saw clearly.

"Then again that horrible shudder crept over me. I had not expected any of the inmates of the house up and dressed at that early hour; but there stood Ellen. She had evidently never been to bed at all that night; her eyes were red with weeping—her whole appearance betokened the extremest care; she sobbed and could scarcely speak.

"She noticed my wild and haggard expression, and seized me by the arm.

"Her lips were white and trembling, and in an almost inarticulate murmur, she said:

"'Then you have come at last—you have heard the news!'

"'What news?' I said.

"She did not appear to hear me, but closing the front door, led me across the passage into the drawing-room.

"The shutters were closed, the blinds were drawn down, and a couple of wax candles standing in the centre of the apartment seemed to increase rather than dissipate the obscurity.

"Sobs and moans of anguish, however, reached my ears.

"Ellen did not release her hold upon my arm.

"Going up to the table, she took hold of one of the candles, and then led me towards a couch at the other extreme of the apartment.

"A figure covered with a white sheet lay upon it.

"Beside the couch knelt Mrs. Swayne, so absorbed in her grief as to appear unconscious of my entrance

"At that moment a feeling more horrible than any I had yet experienced took firm hold of my heart.

"I trembled, my breath failed me, and all objects appeared to be swimming round in mad confusion.

But as though she was a long way off, I could hear Ellen speaking.

"Faint and low as the voice appeared to be, yet it went direct to my understanding—I had no difficulty in comprehending one word.

"'My brother,' she said, 'has been brought home thus! He has been set upon in the streets and murdered! Look!'

"At the same instant she removed a portion of the sheet, and disclosed the features of the being who lay there so still.

"A wild and awful shriek, such, I should think, as never came from the lips of a human being, burst from me. At the very first glance, I recognised that white, anguished countenance.

"I knew all. Before me, on that couch, lay the young man I had slain only a few hours before.

CHAPTER DLV.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN HAVE ANOTHER PERILOUS ADVENTURE.

"By what words, think you, shall I be able to convey to you a clear idea of what my feelings were at that moment?

"No language can describe them—all must be left to your imagination, which I am convinced, will fall far short of the reality.

"The young man I had casually encountered in the street was no other than Ellen's only brother, who had returned from abroad unexpectedly, and an unpropitious chance brought about that fatal meeting between us.

"The unfortunate young man was quite dead. That could be seen at a glance; besides, he was already cold.

"Mrs. Swayne was frantic and called down the bitterest maledictions upon the head of the murderer of her son. It was too much to lose both husband and child in a street brawl.

"I stood rooted to the spot—I strove to speak, but could not give utterance to a sound.

"Ellen perceived my horror and agitation, but never dreamt for one moment of the cause.

"'That is my brother's corpse,' she said, as she placed the sheet again over his cold features. 'We did not know he was coming back; he has been set upon and murdered in the street, and the first we knew of it was, when his body was brought here about two hours ago.'

"Still I could not speak, nor could I make up my mind as to how I should act.

"Should I confess all?—would it be better for me to tell the whole of my frightful tale?—or should I hold my peace?

"For a moment I felt inclined to adopt the latter course, but then I changed my mind.

"Detection, I thought, would, sooner or later ensue, and then I thought I should be more execrated than ever, if such a thing was possible.

"I do not know how I carried my resolve into execution—I cannot remember what words I uttered, nor could I fully or properly describe the effect which they produced upon my hearers.

"When I had finished my horrible account I rushed from the room; and the last thing I remember is, seeing Ellen lying insensible on the floor, and hearing Mrs Swayne invoking the bitterest curses upon my head.

"I rushed out into the street, and bounded onwards as if pursued by fiends.

"Beyond the fact that I found some relief in going at this rapid speed, I can remember nothing of what occurred

"I ran on all that day with but little intermission, and at last dropped down insensible on the highway.

"When I awoke and recovered my senses, I found that day was just beginning to break.

"The thought of suicide then rushed into my mind, and I determined to rid myself of that life which otherwise would be but an insufferable burden to me.

"I started up with the intention of effecting my purpose upon the spot.

"Instinctively I placed my hand to my side, and then I discovered that my sword was gone. I remembered what had become of it.

"I had no other weapon about me; but still I resolved to put my purpose into execution.

"Looking around, I saw in the next meadow a horse tethered by a rope.

"I pushed through the hedge, set the horse at liberty, and hurried off with the rope.

"In the distance I could perceive a clump of trees.

"To the branches of one of them I knew I should be able to secure the rope, and then my miserable life would be at an end.

"What followed you know.

"The bitterness of death was past when you rode up and by cutting the rope restored me to life.

"After having told you this, can you wonder that I should seek for death?—can you wonder that I should regret that you had saved me?

"No; had I been left alone, my miseries would have been over; now they begin afresh."

The stranger ceased, and for several moments there was an intense silence.

At last Tom King spoke.

"You are not so much to blame that I can see. The circumstances are distressing ones; but if yours is a correct version of the affair, you did no more than defend yourself against a man who would have slain you."

"Would he had done so—would he had done so!"

"I can understand that wish, because you were so soon about to make his sister your wife. Had he been a stranger, your feelings would have been very different to what they are now."

"True—true!"

"Then I think in a little while you will alter your mind and feel glad that I saved you from the commission of a cowardly crime. I repeat that you are not to blame. The death of your antagonist resulted chiefly from an accident, and you were in ignorance of who he was."

"Well, gentlemen, I have told you my tale, and now we will depart. As to what I shall do in the future, that is, I imagine, a matter for me to settle. We will part here, and if my sad experience furnishes you with a lesson, I shall rejoice that we have met."

With these words the stranger rose to his feet, and bowing distantly to our three friends, took his departure with a slow and stately step.

They made no attempt to hinder his departure, but watched his course across the meadow until he disappeared from their view.

It was Claude Duval then who said:

"This has been a night of strange adventures: but this one is, I think, the most extraordinary I have ever met with!"

"His tale is a very sad one," said Tom King.

"Very. I fancy from his manner and from the scared look about his eyes, that he was not in full possession of his senses; but in this it is possible I am mistaken."

"I don't know. Less things than that have driven a man into temporary madness."

"What will become of him?"

"That would indeed be hard to say. I don't think, however, that he will make another attempt upon his life. Few try when they have failed once."

"I suppose not; but now let us decide what we are to do and how we are to spend the day."

"I should be glad to rest."

"So should we all, I fancy, for I feel the effects of the drug which the landlord administered to us; it must have been a powerful one."

"It was, but that reminds me of something; let us see how much money is contained in the bag that we took from the horse-coper."

The leather bag was produced, and the contents poured out upon the ground.

A considerable portion of it was silver, which had deceived them when they first made an estimate of the amount the bag contained.

Upon counting all over, they found there were sixty-seven pounds.

"Not very bad," said Tom King, "though I fancied there was more; but even at this rate, we shall be a long while making up the amount that we had taken from us."

"I think our best plan will be not to revert to that again," said Sixteen-String Jack. "What is done cannot be helped, and I fancy there is no chance whatever of our recovering any of the money again."

"None—none!"

"And now," said Tom King, "let us decide what we are to do during the day. Where are we to go? It will not be right to continue on our journey by broad daylight; nor will it be wise to remain here, because we are very likely to be seen."

"What do you propose?" asked Claude Duval.

"I scarcely know what to say," returned Tom King. "It seems to me, the only thing we can do is to put up at some roadside inn; and after late experience, I don't feel inclined to do that."

"Nor do we," said Claude Duval and Jack together.

"But what else can be done—where else can we go? We shall not recover from the effect of the drug we have taken until we have had a sound, refreshing sleep; and if we do not obtain that at an inn, where else are we likely to gain it?"

Tom's two comrades found this an unanswerable question.

"I am afraid we shall be driven into this proceeding, much as we may dislike it, for as it is our intention to try our luck upon the road again to-night, it will be necessary that our horses be well fed and attended to, for it is upon their speed that we shall have to depend, probably, for our lives."

"You are quite right there!"

"Well, where can our horses be fed except at an inn?"

"Nowhere, I am afraid. All this reminds me very forcibly of the advantages which we shall have when Turpin's excellent scheme is fully carried out. We shall then be freed from all danger and difficulties on this account."

"Unquestionably we shall!" said Tom King, "and the prospect of this amount of safety ought to induce us to use every effort to obtain the requisite amount."

"It is all through that villain Richard Nares," said Claude Duval, "that we haven't got the amount at the present moment. I don't know whether my last shot at the rascal was an effectual one, but I sincerely hope it was."

"Let us think no more about that, Claude. Let us decide at once upon our plan of proceeding. It is yet very early in the morning, and there is little probability of finding many persons abroad; if we stay, however, we shall run a very serious risk in travelling to the next inn."

"So we shall," said Claude; "and, moreover, there is a village yonder through which we shall be obliged to pass."

"So there is," said Tom King, "I had forgotten there was a village so near; I think we had better make our way through it without delay; if we stay any longer, we shall lose the chance of doing so in safety."

"Let us mount, and as we journey we can talk the matter over and decide."

This was assented to, and the highwaymen once more mounted their steeds and emerged on to the high-road.

They looked before and behind them carefully, and, being unable to perceive anyone about, set forward at a sharp trot.

Five minutes brought them to the outskirts of the little village, the roofs and chimneys of which they had perceived from the distance.

The sun was only a little way above the horizon, yet the highwaymen noticed that the inmates of many of the houses were astir, though few persons were visible in the long, straggling street which formed the village.

These few looked up in dull and sleepy surprise when the travellers clattered past them, and wondered who they were and where they were going to at that hour.

The village was soon left behind, and, having gone a little distance, Tom King reined in his steed to a walk.

His comrades followed his example.

"That danger is over," he said. "I do not believe we have been seen by anyone who would recognise us, or would attach any importance to the fact of our trotting by."

"I don't think we have," said Sixteen-String Jack. "And now to decide upon our next halting-place. If some other place than an inn can be thought of, I shall be delighted, for I like the idea of stopping at one less and less each moment."

"I am afraid there is no help for it," said Tom King, "without you can think of some other place?"

"I can't."

"Nor I."

"And now, with regard to the probable amount of danger. If you think back, I fancy you will admit that we were very much to blame for falling so blindly into the snare laid for us by the landlord."

"We were, certainly; but who would suspect such a thing?"

"Well, we didn't; but now we have had a caution, and let it serve as such. I shall not be caught in the same way again, I promise you."

"No," said Claude Duval; "I have made up my mind that whenever we stop at an inn again, that I will not taste a drop of anything until I have seen the landlord taste it too."

"A good plan, Claude," said Tom King, "and one that can be easily carried out. By an affectation of good fellowship, we could easily induce him to join us in a glass; if he drank the bumper off without hesitation, why then we should be all right; if he hesitated, or seemed in the least confused, we should suspect him."

"Very good! Then we will agree that that shall be the plan adopted."

"It shall; and, if we only make use of the amount of caution that we really ought to do, I don't think there is much danger to be apprehended."

"Whether there is or not," said Sixteen-String Jack, "it seems we shall be obliged to run the risk."

"We shall," replied Tom King. "As I happen to know, we are in perhaps a more lonely part of the country than any we have yet visited; I mean, not so lonely as regards travellers and vehicles on the highway, but lonely as regards habitations;—these are very few and far between, and it is at least twenty miles to the next town."

"Then in such an out-of-the-way place surely we shall be safe?"

"One would think so. At any rate, we don't carry a large amount of money to tempt the cupidity of the landlord, as was the case on the last occasion."

"As we are to put up at an inn," said Jack, "do not let it be one on the high-road; try if you can't find one in some lane."

"Very good! We shall have to be quick, for as the day advances this road will become more and more filled with people. I should like, too, to get a little further from the village through which we have just passed. Let us try a gallop onwards for a few miles, and then we will look about us."

This was acceded to, and the highwaymen sped along the road at a hard gallop.

Coming at length to a rather steep hill, they were compelled to slacken speed.

Upon gaining the top, they paused and looked at the lovely scene spread out before them.

The early rays of the sun lighted up every object in the landscape with wonderful clearness.

"Look!" said Tom King, pointing with his riding-whip to a habitation at some distance from the high-road, —"there seems to be a place exactly suited to our purpose! How calm, and peaceful, and lovely it looks! Surely no danger lurks there! At that inn—if it is one—we shall be able to take up our quarters with the utmost confidence and security."

"One would think so," said Claude Duval.

"Let us hasten towards it and ascertain," said Tom King. "I am greatly deceived if that is not just the kind of place we require, and we shall have a better day's rest than ever we could have hoped for. Forward! When we have reached the bottom of this hill, a few minutes will take us to the dwelling."

CHAPTER DLVI.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN ARE DELIGHTED WITH THEIR NEW QUARTERS.

HAVING descended the hill, the highwaymen journeyed along the high-road until they came to the lane branching off at right angles from it, and which promised to lead in the direction of the inn they wished to reach.

They turned down it without hesitation, and, after going about half a mile, found their surmise was quite correct.

Before them was a primitive yet very picturesque-looking structure.

It was an inn, for a tall post with a swinging sign on the top of it, and a horse-trough at the base, were plainly visible.

A wisp of straw was also suspended from the sign-post by a rope, which indicated that there was good accommodation both for man and beast.

As was frequently the case in that part of the kingdom, the inn bore the appearance of having been at some time or other a farm-house, and indeed, from the spacious grounds which surrounded it, there was a probability that it was a farm-house now; only, by being thrown open to the public, it gained the name of inn.

In such an out-of-the-way place, it was only by the combination of two trades that they could hope to obtain a livelihood.

The most striking characteristic about this place was the air of peacefulness and content which it seemed to wear.

All three highwaymen were delighted with the appearance which the inn presented, and, after a very brief discussion, they agreed to stop there.

When they drew up before the door it was about six o'clock in the morning, yet the inn was open; and no sooner had the trampling of the horses ceased, than an old, benevolent-looking man, who was taken by the highwaymen for the landlord, made his appearance.

Shading his eyes from the sun with one hand, he came towards our friends, with a smile upon his face.

"Good morning, gentlemen!" he said. "Do you wish to stay here? If you do, you will find the best accommodation at the Wheatsheaf."

"We have travelled many miles," said Tom King, "and should be glad of a rest, not so much upon our own account as of our cattle."

"You ride three splendid nags, gentlemen!" said the landlord, admiringly—"I hope you will excuse me for speaking?"

"Oh, certainly!" said Tom King. "Then you have no objection to making us comfortable for a few hours?"

"None in the world, gentlemen—none in the world! You may depend I shall do the very best I can!"

Tom King slipped off his horse, and his two comrades followed his example.

While this brief conversation had taken place, a man came forward to take charge of the horses.

According to rule, Tom King and Claude Duval engaged the landlord in conversation and entered the inn while Sixteen-String Jack accompanied the ostler to the stables.

Our old friend saw the cattle carefully attended to, and insisted that the trappings belonging to each should be hung upon the end of the stall.

It was always an advantage for one of the highwaymen to see the horses fed, because then the ostler was more liberal with his master's corn than he would have been if left to himself.

"Have you ever been in the army?" said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Lawks—no, sir!" replied the ostler, a loutish-looking lad—"whatever made you ax I that? Does I look like a soger?"

"Not much. Do I?"

"Well, reether; though, I must say, you looks to me rather more like a hossifer!"

The ostler meant "officer," only he invariably persisted in his pronunciation of the word, from an opinion he held that they were so called because they rode on horseback, while the others walked on foot.

"Well, I have been in the army," said Jack, "and so have those gentlemen that you saw with me; and, as a matter of course, we've got many military ways, and we like them better than any other."

The ostler looked up with curiosity, and wondered what on earth was coming.

"Now, in the army," said Sixteen-String Jack, "we always have our horses saddled very quickly, and at the word of command. For instance—I have known officers, when they have been in want of their horses, come walking towards the stables, as I might from the house yonder, but before they reached it, they would whistle thus—do you hear?"

"Yes, sir," replied the other, "and a curious whistle it is!"

"It is a military whistle," said Jack. "Now, I was going to say that I have known an officer whistle like that when he has been a dozen yards from the stable, and by the time he reached the door, there would be his horse already saddled, and in readiness for him to mount."

"Lawks, sir! Now, that does surprise me! If it had not been a gentleman like you as had told me—a hossifer in the army—I should have said straight up and down—that's a lie!"

"But it is the truth," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Now, I can see that you are rather clever in the way of saddling and bridling horses, and I am much inclined to think that you could manage it if you tried. Now, look here—take that!"

Jack pressed a crown-piece in the ostler's hand as he spoke.

"My two friends are quite as fond of military ways as I am, so that when we come out of the house I will give a whistle—so——and if you can have the horses ready by the time we reach the stable door in true military style, why, I'll stand a guinea!"

The ostler's face expanded into a smile, and his eyes twinkled, as he said:

"I will practise it. I don't think as any o' them army chaps can get the better o' I in the matter of saddling a horse."

"Well, we shall see," said Sixteen-String Jack. "If the horses are ready by the time we reach the stable-door, there's a guinea for you."

"All right, sir! Shall you be staying long? I ax because of feeding the hosses."

"Oh! give them plenty to eat and drink. We shall probably stay here until evening."

"All right, sir!"

Sixteen-String Jack left the stable and went towards the inn.

As soon as his back was turned, the ostler rubbed his hands together, and his countenance assumed an expression of very great satisfaction.

"I shall earn the guinea to-day!" he said, with a chuckle. "Blest if I shan't do him! I wasn't born yesterday, and I do believe I am up to a thing or two! Why, it's as easy as can be! As soon as ever it begins to get dusk like, I shall saddle and bridle the horses already, and as soon as I hears him whistle, why, out I comes, and the guinea's mine!"

The ostler at the Wheatsheaf always had an idea that he was a very clever fellow, but he never was so assured of his cleverness and never so well satisfied with himself as he was upon that occasion.

He chuckled over it incessantly, and never dreamt that Sixteen-String Jack just meant him to get the horses saddled and bridled in readiness, and nothing more, though, if the highwayman had simply said so, the suspicions of the ostler might have been aroused.

When Sixteen-String Jack entered the house, he found his two comrades were seated in a very comfortable room, in which a young girl was laying the cloth for breakfast.

Some cold beef and ham were brought in, and a huge tankard of foaming ale.

This last was brought in by the landlord himself, and, in pursuance with the plan they had agreed upon, Tom King said:

"That looks splendid ale, landlord—brewed in October, I should think."

"You're right, sir! That was the very month it was brewed in, and though I say it myself, it is as good ale as ever was drawn out of a barrel."

"I have no doubt of it," said Tom King. "Pour some into the cups, and fill one for yourself."

"Well, gentlemen, since you are so kind, I really don't mind if I do take a cup. It's the only drink I am fond of. Here's good health to you all, gentlemen!"

"And here's prosperity to the Wheatsheaf!" said the three highwaymen, as they put the cups to their lips. But they did not begin to drink until they saw the landlord swallow the whole of his at one draught.

This gave them confidence, and they commenced their breakfast.

They were quite sure there was nothing of an injurious nature in that ale, so they drank freely and with pleasure, for the abominable drug they had taken had left a parching thirst behind.

When breakfast was over, the landlord was summoned, and Tom King said:

"We have travelled without taking scarcely any rest since sunrise yesterday morning, so you may easily suppose we are very tired; and now we have partaken of your good cheer, we never felt more inclined to rest in our lives. We are going on as far as London, and we shall be obliged to take a rest somewhere before we reach it."

"That's quite true," said the landlord, "and though I say it myself, you won't find many places where you can rest so well as at the Wheatsheaf."

"I have no doubt of that; so that, if you can accommodate us with a bed each we shall be much obliged."

"Well, gentlemen, it so happens that my wife is ill, and she is in the best room."

"We would not disturb her for the world!"

"Well, gentlemen, there is but one other room that is well enough furnished for such as you, but that room is a large one, and has two beds in it, so if you would not mind ——"

"Not at all—not at all—it will suit us very well—in fact, we should prefer a double-bedded room."

"Very good, gentlemen, and would you like to lie down and go to sleep at once?"

"Yes."

"Then I will go and have the room got ready. I shall only be a few moments."

The landlord left the room as he spoke, and then Tom King, turning to his two comrades, said:

"What do you think of the landlord, and our present quarters?"

"We think we have been very lucky."

"So do I," replied Tom King. "Anybody could see at a glance that this landlord is a well-meaning man; there is no treachery about him—none in the least—and we are as safe here as we possibly could be anywhere."

"I am inclined to think so myself," said Sixteen-String Jack, "though, as a matter of precaution, I have made an arrangement with the ostler by which I can have the horses ready saddled at the stable door the moment I give a whistle."

He then told his comrades the manner in which he had made this arrangement with the ostler, at which they laughed most heartily.

"It is a delightfully quiet place," said Claude Duval. "Surely peace and content will be found here if anywhere. Who could imagine officers making their appearance here?"

"I would much rather not imagine it," said Tom King; "but hush, here comes the landlord!"

He entered as Tom spoke.

"The room is all ready, gentlemen, if you would be kind enough to follow me. If it is not so luxurious as you are accustomed to find rooms, you must not blame me.

"Certainly not! It will suit us, never fear. There is no need for you to make any apologies."

The landlord seemed well pleased with the manner in which his guests spoke, and yet every now and then he glanced furtively at them, and whenever he had a chance of doing so, without exciting suspicion, he looked them full in the face.

The highwaymen noticed this, but thought nothing of it, for it seemed only right that a person, having such an open countenance as the landlord had, should look those he addressed straight in the face.

He led the way up a flight of stairs to the room that was on the first floor, and at the back of the house.

It was a large apartment with two windows in it, one of which looked into the yard at the back of the house, and the other, being placed in the gable end of the building, commanded a very extensive view of the country beyond

"Is there anything more that you require, gentlemen?" asked the landlord, as he stood on the threshold, holding the knob of the door in his hand.

"Nothing more," said Tom King.

"Then I hope you will rest well, gentlemen. Would you like to be called at any particular hour?"

"No, we will sleep on until we are refreshed. When we awake we will have something to eat and continue our journey to London."

"Very good—all preparations shall be made."

The landlord closed the door of the room after him and descended the stairs.

Our three friends only partially undressed themselves and then lay down on the outside of the bed.

After a brief conversation, they all fell off into a sound sleep, which the silence of the room, the effects of the drug, and the strong ale they had lately drank conspired to make as profound as possible.

CHAPTER DLVII.

THE LANDLORD OF THE WHEATSHEAF RECOGNISES THE HIGHWAYMEN, AND DISPATCHES THE OSTLER TO THE NEXT TOWN TO FETCH THE POLICE OFFICERS.

Tom King and his two comrades would not have slumbered so peacefully as they did, had they been able to understand the exact state of affairs in the old Wheatsheaf Inn.

The landlord had quite won their hearts by his affable, open-hearted way, but they would have changed their opinion had they been able to see him as he descended the stairs.

His face assumed a very frightful expression, and he kept continually muttering something between his teeth.

The highwaymen's uneasiness would have been still further increased had they perceived him enter the bar of the inn and go to an old-fashioned bureau, which was placed in a recess near the fire-place, and opening it, take therefrom a packet of miscellaneous papers. The landlord of the Wheatsheaf was able to read, an accomplishment which in those days was very much rarer than it is now.

In consequence of this, he carefully treasured up every printed piece of paper that came in his way, and the bundle he held in his hand formed a collection that he had been many years in making, for, in that remote region, printed documents of any kind were uncommon.

Anyone would have laughed had they been able to look over the landlord's shoulder at the incongruous mass of papers. Many of them were devoid of the slightest possible amount of value or of interest.

Deliberately setting his spectacles on his nose, the landlord turned over these precious papers until at length he came to one, which he selected from the heap and perused with great attention.

At every few words he would pause and consider it; with a satisfied nod he would then proceed.

In this manner he continued to read until he had read every word which was printed on the paper.

He then sat down upon a chair, gasping for breath.

At last he managed to utter his thoughts aloud.

"Ah!" he said, "they told me no good would come of hoarding up these papers; but time, that proves all things, proves that I am right and they are wrong. I am right! —I am sure of it! I am certain there is no mistake. However, to settle the matter, I will read the paper again."

The landlord did so.

As the reader may perhaps have surmised, the document which he held in his hand was one of those bills which had been so extensively circulated a short time back offering a reward, amounting to two thousand five hundred pounds, for the apprehension of the four highwaymen. It contained a minute and accurate description of their personal appearance, and the landlord read every word of this portion of the bill with great attention.

When he had done so, he was brought more irresistibly to the conclusion that the three travellers who were upstairs asleep were no other than the three notorious highwaymen, for whose capture no less than fifteen hundred pounds was offered.

He had looked at our friends carefully at various times, and found that their appearance exactly corresponded with the descriptions set down.

"Now," he said to himself, "what shall I do? Would it be right for me to let fifteen hundred pounds go by when I might have it with very little trouble? Certainly not. Why, with such a sum as that I shall be able to make my fortune—I am sure of it. Fifteen hundred pounds is a large amount, and worth a little risk. The chance of earning such a sum does not occur every day!"

The landlord ruminated for some time, and puzzled his brains to think what was the best way to proceed.

At last he determined to call the ostler, and take him into his confidence.

He would then be able to dispatch him to the nearest town for a body of police officers, and if good speed was made they would be able to reach the inn before the highwaymen had left it, though, as Tom King had correctly stated, the nearest town was nearly twenty miles off.

"I will go to the stable," said the landlord. "Tom is sure to be there, and he shall start off at once."

Accordingly the landlord left the bar, and directed his steps towards the stable.

Upon crossing the threshold, what was his astonishment to perceive the ostler capering about as though completely overjoyed, and occasionally pausing to sing some fragment of a song.

The landlord was surprised to see the ostler behaving in this manner, and for a moment or two stood stock still with astonishment, gazing upon him.

"Tom," he roared, at length, "what on earth are you after now? Have you taken leave of your senses?"

Upon hearing his master's voice, the ostler suddenly ceased.

"Beg your pardon, master," he said. "I didn't see you were at the door. I was having a little bit of fun to myself like, that was all."

"You seem in wonderful spirits. But I can't stop to talk to you now. There is something very important for you to do, and if you do it properly, why, you will earn a good round sum."

The ostler broke out into another exultant dance.

"I am in luck's way to-day, master, and no mistake! What do you want me to do?"

"I want you to ride over to the town, and——"

"Can't, master!" said the ostler, interrupting. "Can't leave the stable on no account to-day! I have got something important to do, master!"

"Can't leave the stable! Why not? You must!"

The ostler shook his head.

"I say you must! You must saddle a horse, and gallop for your life to the police station, and bring back all the officers you can find as quickly as you can."

"Lawks, master! what for?"

"Why, there are highwaymen in the house! Fifteen hundred pounds—that's the reward, Tom! I have got 'em all safe! So jump on a horse, and make haste, and you will come in for a share of the reward!"

Tom staggered back until he came to the corn bin, upon which he sat down with too much suddenness to be at all pleasant.

"Highwaymen!" he said. "Those three gentlemen what belong to those horses?"

"Yes."

The ostler burst out into a loud laugh.

"Lawks, master! what's you at now? You're making a mistake!"

"What do you mean by laughing at me in that fashion? I am making no mistake!"

"Oh, yes you are, if you are thinking those three gentlemen are highwaymen! I know they ain't!"

"How do you?"

"Because I know what they are."

"What are they?"

"Hossifers," he said—"real millingtary hossifers!"

The positive, deliberate way in which Tom, the ostler, spoke rather staggered the landlord, and he began to wonder whether he had not been deceived by some accidental resemblance.

"Officers!" he said—"officers!"

"No, not officers!" said the ostler, dogmatically. "I said hossifers—that's what they are—sogers that ride on hosses! That's why they call 'em hossifers—millingtary hossifers, because ain't they always milling when they go to battle?"

"Hold your stupid tongue, and pay attention to what I say! How do you know that they are military officers?"

"I does know it."

"But how?"

"Because the gentleman told me so."

"You idiot!"

"Ha! mind what you are saying on, master. I'm no more idiot nor you!"

"Yes you are; they'd tell a fool like you anything, because you'd believe it! I tell you they are not officers, they are highwaymen, and there are fifteen hundred pounds offered for their capture!"

"Well, how do you know that, master?"

"I do know it."

"I said that to you, but you were not satisfied. I've told you how I know them to be millingtary hossifers. Now, tell me how you know them to be highwaymen?"

"I tell you I am sure of it."

"Now, look here, master. Did you get it out o' some o' them papers? Did some o' them papers tell you?"

"Yes."

"I thought so—blest if I didn't!" said the ostler, with a grin of contempt. "You must be a fool to take notice o' them papers! I always said so, and I'll stick to it!"

"You are the fool, Tom—papers are above your comprehension!"

"And a precious good thing too, master, I think; I wouldn't be led away by a lot o' black and white marks like you are."

"I tell you they are highwaymen, and you may either obey my orders and go and fetch the police officers or take notice and leave this day month!"

"But master, I can't leave."

"Why not?"

"Why, I am going to do things in the millingtery style and earn a guinea!"

"You're drunk, Tom—you've been having something to drink! Why don't you talk sense?"

"I am talking sense. Don't you think I know what the hossifer said to me?"

"What did he say?"

"Well, master, since you think I'm a fool, I'll tell you all about it, and when I've done that, you'll say I'm not such a fool as you think I am."

"Go on, then."

"Well, master, the gentleman told me he had been in the army, and liked to have things done in the millingtary style, and how all the hosses was saddled by the word of command. He said if the man in the stable heard his hossifer whistle when he was a dozen yards off, he would have the hoss saddled and bridled by the time he got to the stable door. So said he, 'If you'll do the same, as we're very fond of the millingtary style, you shall have a guinea."

"Why, you ——"

"Stop a bit, master! I know'd you'd say it's impossible for me to saddle three horses while anyone walked a dozen yards. It would be impossible for anyone not so clever as I am. Don't you see, master, I shall saddle the horses all ready, and when he whistles, why, out I shall go like a shot."

"You d—d fool, what a thick head you must have to be sure!"

"Ha, master! What do you mean?"

"Why, I mean if you did that you would be just putting a rope round your neck—you'd be assisting those highwaymen to escape, and that would be felony, and you'd get your neck stretched, and serve you well right!"

The ostler was silent for a moment, and by his manner one could tell that his intellects were confused.

At last he said:

"Master, I am surprised at you: I always have said that those papers would turn you mad, and I'm blest if they haven't done it!"

"Take notice," cried the landlord, in a furious passion—"take notice—you shall leave this day month! I would not have such a pig-headed fellow about my place!"

"All right, master, I can go; but I shall just appeal to you in this way, and ask you one question. Look here now! Which would you sooner do, believe a gentleman when he told you he was a millingtary hossifer, or would you sooner believe what it said on one o' them papers?"

"Why, I would sooner believe what was on the papers, of course! What can't speak can't lie!"

"Don't know about that, master—I believe the gentleman, and I am going to earn my guinea!"

"Now, Tom," said the landlord, "I should like to bring you to reason if I could. You took particular notice of that gentleman that told you he was a military officer, didn't you?"

"I did, master."

"Well, then, he is no other than Sixteen-String Jack the highwayman, and I can prove it."

The ostler was staggered at this; but resolved not to give way, he said:

"Go on, master. I will sit down the while; for that will take a good deal of proving, I rather think."

"Now, I will read what it says on this paper," said the landlord, producing the bill from his pocket.

The ostler uttered a groan of derision and contempt.

"This is the description of Sixteen-String Jack:—'Rather short, fair complexion, long light-coloured hair, a steeple-crowned hat, scarlet coat trimmed with gold lace, blue vest, white breeches, and top boots; to the top of the boots are tied sixteen ribbons.' Now, Tom, that's what it says on the paper, and does it agree with the appearance of the man you call a military officer?"

"Millingtary hossifer, I said," replied the ostler, scratching his head. "It do correspond—I do admit that."

"Oh, you do?"

"Yes. I wish I could read papers myself. I don't like to give in; but I am afraid you're right, after all."

"I am right. No one could help recognising him after such a description as that. Well, for that very man there is a reward of five hundred pounds offered, and five hundred pounds for each of the others."

"Now, Tom, I'll tell you what I'll do if you will gallop over to the next town, and come back here with the police officers before dark,—I'll give you a ten-pound note, and that whether they are the right persons or not. Will you agree to that?"

"I will, master! That's a clear profit of nine pounds, so of course I could not refuse, and I had sooner take the word of one that I know, than the word of one that I don't."

"Very well, then, Tom. If you will go and fetch the officers and be back before dark, you shall have the ten-pound note."

"Let's shake hands, master! I am agreed, and I'm off! But drat it all, I should like to know whether they intended to make a fool of I!"

"Of course they did, and when they had got their horses you might have whistled for your guinea, for you'd never have got it."

"Well, I'll go, master, for I can't be wrong, anyway. You're sure you'll give me ten pounds?"

"Certain."

Upon receiving this assurance, the ostler saddled and bridled a horse with a speed that would have elicited the admiration of the highwaymen,

He scrambled into his seat, gave the horse a cut with a short stick that he carried, and away he went at full gallop.

"If he kept up the speed he was going at, he would reach the next town in something considerably less than two hours.

CHAPTER DLVIII.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN INCUR MUCH DANGER AT THE WHEATSHEAF INN.

In the meanwhile, the three highwaymen slumbered on peacefully and calmly, dreaming many strange and fantastic dreams, but never suspecting that they were in such imminent danger

It was growing dusk, when Tom King suddenly awoke, and sat straight up in the bed.

He had heard something, and now listened intently

The murmuring of voices came plainly upon his ear, and without saying a word, he slipped off the bed and went to the window.

He looked out, but was not able to see anything, though the murmuring of voices still continued.

Of course the first thought that entered his mind was that he was threatened with some danger.

Rapidly but noiselessly, he turned the little button which secured the window, and opened it a little way.

By projecting his head a little, he was able to see below him a group of dark figures.

By straining his sense of hearing to the utmost, he heard some one say:

"Keep a sharp look-out on all the windows and doors, and as soon as you see them appear, rush forward and seize them. In the meanwhile, I will go upstairs with half a dozen more, and try to get into their room!"

Tom King did not wait to hear any more, but instantly awoke his two comrades, and in as few words as he could he explained the nature of the danger to them.

"Our landlord, then, is not quite such an amiable individual as we took him to be," said Claude Duval.

"What had we better do?"

"I don't know. You may depend the inn is thoroughly surrounded and well guarded, so that how we are to escape is more than I can tell."

"We must be quick," said Sixteen-String Jack. "I don't know whether my agreement with the ostler will hold good, or whether he has had a hand in summoning these police officers. That, however, we shall see."

"Come to the window," said Tom King, "and look out. Be careful that they do not see you."

Claude and Jack obeyed.

Peeping cautiously down into the yard, they managed to perceive the dusky forms of two men, who were stationed almost immediately underneath.

The others had disappeared.

To have attempted to escape by passing through the window would have been little short of madness, for it was quite certain they could not do so without being seen by the two men on the watch.

In the meantime Tom King had gone to the other window which looked on the back of the premises, and opened that as well.

He was rejoiced to find that there was outside this window a kind of rude balcony, or veranda, which extended right and left along the back of the inn.

He lost no time in communicating this discovery to his friends, and said:

"There are two men underneath this window, as well, I have no doubt, but yet I think we might manage to crawl out into the balcony without being seen or heard. If we do this quickly, the officers, when they open the door, will find this room empty."

"Try it, Tom. You creep out first, we will follow."

In order to avoid being seen, Tom King crouched down as low as he could, and crept on to the balcony.

Claude and Jack soon followed him, and then they closed the window.

It would have required a very keen eye to have detected them lying still on the floor of the balcony.

They looked right and left, in order to decide which would be the best way to take, and finally decided upon keeping to the left.

They crept along, and, after going a few yards, reached its extremity, and were unable to go any further.

Just then they heard a prodigious uproar in the room they had left, and then both windows were flung violently open by the police officers.

"Have you seen them?" they cried,—"they are not in the room. Have you seen them escape?"

As a matter of course, the attention of all the men below was at once concentrated upon these two windows.

Tom saw his opportunity, and, touching Claude upon the arm, he said:

"Now!"

He climbed over the railing of the balcony as he spoke with marvellous rapidity, and, hanging at the full length of his arms, dropped to the ground.

Claude and Jack speedily followed, but, unfortunately, they were seen by those officers who stood at the back window, and who had to some extent recovered from their first panic.

They all had pistols in their hands, and, without staying for instructions, rapidly brought them to the level, and fired

But they produced no effect, as the highwaymen changed their positions so quickly, and, before the smoke proceeding from the discharge had cleared away, they were all three standing upon the ground beneath.

The police officers all rushed on to the balcony, and hastened to that corner of it from which the highwaymen had descended.

These occurrences were quite sufficient to put those below on the alert.

"To the stable!" cried Tom King,—"be quick! If we can only get our horses, all will be well!"

Just at that moment a terrific crash came upon their ears, and, looking round, they saw that the balcony had given way and precipitated the whole of the officers into the yard

The woodwork of which the balcony was constructed was old and rotten, and quite inadequate to support the weight of so many persons, and so all at once it gave way before the officers were aware of it.

In the twinkling of an eye they were all lying in a confused heap upon the ground, struggling and fighting to regain their feet.

This proceeding diverted the attention of the other officers, and the three highwaymen took all the advantage they could of the opportunity.

The stable door was only a few yards distant, and they ran rapidly towards it.

Just as they reached the threshold, they were confronted by several police officers, who made their appearance from within, and who rushed forward, intent upon making a capture.

Our friends did not wait for an attack to be made upon them, but at once turned round and fled.

They had seen already that the officers were too numerous for them to stand the least chance of obtaining the victory in a contest, so they wisely resolved to retreat. It was a dark night, and they hoped that, under cover of the obscurity, they should be able to escape.

If they had had their horses with them, the matter would have been simple enough. It was necessary that they should obtain possession of them, but how they were to do this was more than they could tell.

At the present moment, all they had to think about was distancing those who were pursuing them.

By this time most of the others had recovered themselves and had joined in the pursuit.

Several who had been seriously injured by the fall of the balcony still lay upon the ground.

"We must run out of the yard gates!" said Sixteen-String Jack,—"there is no other outlet."

Accordingly, they ran in this direction; but, to their extreme annoyance, just as they were about to rush into the high-road, an officer closed the gates and planted his back against them.

Claude Duval made a rush forward and seized the officer by the throat.

With an effort of strength he drew him away from his position, and Tom King and Jack instantly opened the gates.

No sooner were they opened than Claude dragged the man out into the road, and Tom King slammed the gate shut just as the other officers reached it.

Could they but have secured it in some way they would have gained a considerable advantage, but on the outer side there were no fastenings whatever.

The officer Claude Duval had seized clung to him with desperate tightness, and it was evident that he was determined not to release his hold until assistance arrived.

But he was no match for Claude, who, doubling up his fist, struck him a heavy blow upon the head, which at once deprived him of his senses.

By the time this was done, however, the officers had opened the gates, and the position of the highwaymen seemed no better than before.

All three felt anxious in the extreme, but they resolved to run for their lives.

With great fleetness they speed onwards, but stopped before they had gone many yards.

Close to the front door of the inn was one police officer who had been left there in charge of the horses.

"Now we have a chance," said Tom King, breathlessly. "Let us take a horse each! We must not stop to mount, or the officers will be upon us; you must seize hold of the pummel of the saddle and let the horses gallop on, and then swing yourselves into the saddle while they are in motion."

This looked a most desperate feat to attempt, but it was the only chance of safety they possessed.

But it is wonderful what men can do when their lives

About fourteen horses were standing all together in perfect readiness for the road.

The highwaymen chose three at random, and seizing hold of the saddle with one hand, struck them several sharp blows upon the flank with the other hand, which caused the horses to set off at a swift gallop.

Clinging to the saddles, the highwaymen ran along by the side of them, until at last they were able, by a sudden spring, to seat themselves in the saddles.

This feat is by no means so difficult as it seems to be, as it is continually performed in all circuses.

The officers were not a little surprised when they saw the highwaymen escape in this manner.

They had almost made sure of capturing them, but now their chances of doing so had materially diminished.

Still, after having had so much trouble, they did not feel at all inclined to give up the chase. On the contrary, they felt stimulated to make even greater exertions.

Having run through the gate, they hastened to the horses, and some half dozen of them scrambled into the saddle and commenced an immediate pursuit.

They were not much behind the highwaymen, who had not been successful in obtaining much of a start.

They spurred their horses in a perfectly barbarous manner, and so managed to gain slightly upon our friends, who discovered that their horses were by no means of the best quality, and therefore deemed it unwise to exhaust them at once.

So long as their pursuers did not gain too much upon them, they were satisfied.

As usual, Tom King took the lead, for he was much better acquainted with that part of the country than either of his comrades.

In a very little while the wisdom of the course which they had adopted became apparent.

The officers' horses, thoroughly worn out, refused to pay the least obedience to the spur, and, although their riders gored them most cruelly, they could not accelerate their speed.

The highwaymen were much rejoiced to perceive this, for their own horses flagged considerably.

This is not to be wondered at when it is considered that the officers galloped them twenty miles at the top of their speed, and they had not stood long enough at the inn to recover their lost wind.

Our friends still pushed on in the open country, nor did they venture to come to a halt until they were quite certain that they stood in very little danger of being overtaken by their foes.

After congratulating themselves upon their escape from their perilous situation, a discussion was held as to what was to be done.

They were very loath to part with their own horses, which were valuable and excellent animals, while those belonging to the officers which they now bestrode would be quite useless to carry them out of danger.

It seemed, however, that they would have to resign themselves to their loss, for what possibility was there of their being able to regain them?

To return to the inn would be a hazardous thing to attempt, and then very likely the officers, upon being deprived of their cattle, would retaliate by taking possession of those which the highwaymen had left behind them.

CHAPTER DLIX.

DICK TURPIN FINDS DANGER ON THE WAY TO THE DESERTED MANSION.

As Tom King and his two comrades are, for the time being, tolerably safe, we feel that we can leave them while we turn to the proceedings of Dick Turpin.

After bidding Maud farewell, and passing through the gate which led into the high-road, Dick Turpin slackened the reins upon Black Bess's neck, and the gallant creature at once set off at a rapid gallop, which, however, she performed with the greatest ease.

She was in most excellent condition, and Dick felt that he could rely upon her powers to the utmost.

She had rested for an entire day, and had been supplied with as much good food as she could eat.

Her rider felt that, should any emergency arise, he should be able to rely upon her powers with the greatest confidence.

At an easy gallop, then, which did not distress his bonny mare in the least, and yet took him over the ground at a wonderful rate, Dick Turpin made his way in as direct a line as he could to the deserted mansion.

The enterprise he was about to go upon was one of very great danger, and he knew it; still he would have incurred the peril, great as it was, merely for the sake of obtaining possession of the money that had been left behind; but in addition to this he had to meet his three comrades, who, for aught he knew, had already arrived, and might have fallen unknowingly into some great danger, or at any rate were uneasy at his absence.

By calculating the time which it would take them to go to the New Forest and back, Dick fancied he should be there before them, and so be able to warn them of their danger.

As the reader knows full well, he had no reason to be apprehensive about the result of their return, for owing to the singular circumstances that had taken place, and the series of misfortunes they had met with, Tom King and his two companions had been very much longer on their journey than could have been calculated upon.

Dick was sad and somewhat anxious when he started, but he soon experienced great invigoration from his gallop along the country high-road, and in a little while his heart grew as light as ever it had been.

When mounted upon the back of Black Bess he seemed to forget everything else, and to give himself up entirely to the enjoyment which he felt.

Every now and then he would pat her caressingly upon the neck, and address her almost as he would have done a human being.

We will not go so far as to say that the gallant mare understood his words, but she comprehended the tone, and each time she would show her satisfaction by giving a faint neigh.

He journeyed on for a long distance without meeting with one single traveller. Notwithstanding the errand he was upon, he had made up his mind not to allow any travellers to pass him without first paying toll.

He had not come in sight of a habitation since he had left the farm-house; but suddenly, upon taking a bend in the lane, he saw before him the clean thatched roof of a cottage.

"There is a house," he murmured,—"I suppose now I shall not be long before I find some people. Hallo! What on earth is that?"

He uttered these last words with great abruptness, and brought Black Bess to a sudden stop.

The sound which had struck upon his ears was a loud and piercing shriek, evidently from female lips.

It lasted scarcely more than a second, but so shrill was it that it seemed to pierce through the highwayman's brain.

The silence that followed was something remarkable.

Dick looked around him in uncertainty and bewilderment, for he could not take upon himself precisely to say from what direction the sound had come.

"It must be from that cottage," he cried. "Some one is in distress—that is certain. It is no business of mine, and yet by interfering I may be able to help those who are unable to help themselves."

As he made this reflection, there came another shriek, but it seemed to be stifled, by some means or other, almost as soon as it was uttered.

This time Dick felt certain the scream came from the interior of the cottage.

It was close by, and half a dozen bounds forward that Black Bess gave when he loosened the rein brought him to the door.

The sound of some kind of struggle going on within came plainly to his ears, and, without a moment's hesitation he slipped from the saddle, and knowing that Black Bess would not stray away, did not secure her, but burst open the door.

The scene which he beheld was so surprising a one, that, for a moment at least, he remained rooted to the spot with surprise.

The interior of the cottage was brilliantly lighted up by a large fire that was burning on the hearthstone, and by the aid of this light, Dick Turpin was able to see with great distinctness.

Seated in a chair, to which she was evidently bound, was a young, simple-looking girl, apparently a servant.

Standing before her, with his hand pressed roughly and tightly over her mouth, and holding a pistol near her head, was a man, whose costume closely resembled that which Dick Turpin himself wore.

His back was turned towards the door, so Turpin could not see his face.

"Now, girl," said the man, in a rough voice, "I have told you who I am, and beware! I am Dick Turpin, and you know when I say a thing I always keep my word. Tell me this instant where it is that your master and mistress keep their money. If you do not, I will blow your brains out as surely as this is a pistol I hold in my hand!"

It would be difficult, we imagine, for the reader to form any idea of the astonishment which Dick Turpin experienced when he heard these words.

He almost doubted whether he was in his proper senses, and whether he had heard aright.

It was clear his intrusion had not been noticed by either of the persons before him, and, after the man who had styled himself "Dick Turpin" had spoken, the girl closed her eyes, and seemed about to swoon.

Perceiving this, the man removed his hand from her mouth in order to allow her to breathe more freely; but the moment he did so, the girl took advantage of the opportunity to utter another piercing shriek.

With a horrible oath, the ruffian thrust his hand violently into her face again, and would probably have renewed his threat, had not Dick Turpin at this moment bounded forward and seized him by the neck.

No sooner did the rascal feel this sudden grasp upon his neck than he dropped the pistol and uttered a yell of fear.

He would even have sunk down upon the ground, had not Dick by main force held him up.

"Mercy, mercy!" cried the false Dick Turpin. "Oh! dear, kind sir, have mercy upon me! It was only a little joke, I assure you—nothing but a joke! Spare me, good, kind sir,—have mercy upon me!"

"Silence!" said Dick, in a voice that made the villain's craven heart almost leap into his mouth. "Silence, I say! If you disobey my commands, you will be a dead man the next moment!"

He uttered a groan, and all the strength seemed suddenly to depart from his limbs; his whole body grew limp, and Dick Turpin having released his hold, he fell in a muddled-up heap upon the ground.

Dick coolly picked up the pistol the man had dropped, and put it into his pocket; at the same time he produced another from his belt.

"I don't know whether your pistol was loaded," he said, "but this one is. If you stir hand or foot, or utter a sound except when I bid you, I will fire!"

"No, no—good sir!—spare my life—have mercy! I'll be silent—I will be still—I will do anything if you will but spare my life!"

Dick Turpin made up his mind to investigate this matter thoroughly, and, glancing around him, he perceived, stretching from one beam of the cottage to another, a strong piece of rope.

He took possession of it in a moment, and, cutting it to a convenient length, bound the man's hands and feet securely with it.

The rascal groaned incessantly while this was going on, in spite of Dick's commands for silence.

There was another piece of rope close by, suspended from beam to beam in the same manner, and, wishing to make his captive quite secure, Dick seized this also.

By the side of the fireplace was an old-fashioned staircase.

There was no door at the foot of it, as is generally seen, but it ascended from the floor of the room.

It was defended by some old-fashioned bannisters, and to a stout one, at the foot, Dick resolved to tie his prisoner.

He did so, binding him in such a manner that he could not possibly have got free without pulling down the whole staircase and carrying it at his heels.

Feeling that his prisoner was safe, Dick turned his attention to the girl in the chair.

A few strokes with his knife soon set her free from the chair to which she had been bound, and no sooner had he done so, than he had the satisfaction of perceiving that she was recovering from the swoon into which she had fallen.

"You are safe," he said. "All is well—you have nothing to fear now, so be still and silent. Look, there is the rascal tied safe to the staircase. He cannot harm you."

While Dick Turpin uttered these assuring words, the young girl glanced in the direction of the stairs, and there, sure enough, she saw the man bound hand and foot.

"Now, my good girl," continued Dick, "just tell me what you can about this affair."

"Yes, sir—oh yes, sir, I will indeed! I am so glad you happened to come in! I was almost frightened to death, and I do believe that in another moment he would have murdered me."

The girl trembled and spoke hastily.

Dick tried to soothe her.

"Go on," he said, "you are in no danger now While I stand by, you need not be afraid that anyone will harm you in the least."

"Oh, thanks, sir—thanks! You have saved my life, for I would have allowed him to murder me rather than have told him what he wanted to know! I was all alone in this house by myself. My master and mistress have gone to the next town, which is a long way off. They left me to mind the house. I was expecting them to return every moment, when that man suddenly broke in, and tied me to the chair before I could resist, for he almost frightened me to death, and then he said he would shoot me if I did not tell him where my master kept his money. I shrieked for aid, but I little thought that help would so soon come."

"It was fortunate you did cry out," said Dick, "otherwise I should have passed by without knowing anything about it."

"I am glad, too, sir, for master placed me here in trust, to take care of the house for him. He has gone to market, and ought to have been back before this."

"Don't be alarmed; some trifling thing has probably detained him. Calm yourself—I want to have a few words with this individual here."

"Be careful, sir—oh, be careful! He is Dick Turpin—he told me so—and there is no knowing what he may do."

Dick gave a peculiar smile as he said:

"I will be careful, depend upon it."

He turned round to his prisoner as he spoke.

The man uttered a groan.

"Now," said Dick, "tell me who you are at once. Hold up your head and look at me. Who are you, I say? Answer my question, or I fire! Who are you?"

"D—D—Dick Turpin—s—sir!"

"Liar! That is not your name, and you know it! You are a base, cowardly hound! Dick Turpin would never take advantage of a girl in the way that you have done."

The man was silent.

"Upon one condition," said Dick, fiercely, "and on one condition only, will I spare your life. Tell me truly, whether you did or did not some time back commit a robbery in a cottage on the borders of Epping Forest? Speak the truth, or you die!"

"Y—yes, sir, I did!"

"And on that occasion, did you and the rascals who were with you ruthlessly and barbarously put an old woman on the fire, and hold her there until she disclosed the place where her money was concealed?"

The man hesitated.

"Be careful how you reply—upon your answer depends your life! As soon as you speak, I shall know whether what you say is true. If it is false, you die instantly!"

"I did, sir!" was the reply.

Dick Turpin ground his teeth, and took one step forward in so menacing a manner that the villain uttered a yell of fright.

"I said I would spare your life," said Dick, suddenly checking himself, "and I will not go from my word; but such a monster—such a fiend in human shape as you are, should not be allowed to encumber the face of the earth. Whoever trampled the life out of your base carcass would be doing humanity a service."

Dick turned away in disgust.

The admission which the man had made was some slight satisfaction to him, but not much.

He saw clearly enough, however, that many deeds would be imputed to him of which he was perfectly innocent.

Rascals like the one who stood trembling before him, knowing the fear which was produced by the bare pronunciation of his name, would take advantage of that circumstance to commit robberies which otherwise they would not have the courage to attempt.

It was a matter in which he was quite powerless; he could not prevent people from doing this.

Now that he had given his word, he never thought of slaying this man for an instant, and yet he was reluctant in the extreme to allow him to escape without receiving due punishment.

"He shall not play the part of Dick Turpin with impunity," he muttered to himself; "he shall learn that there are pains and penalties connected with the assumption of the character. I can see now how to make him suffer. To fetch the officers myself would be impossible, but this girl will go."

He turned round as he made this reflection, and addressing the servant, he said:

"My good girl, I am on urgent business, and cannot afford to lose a single moment; the time I have already lost may be of serious consequence to me. If I could, I would hasten off, and not return until I brought the officers of justice with me, who should carry off this wretch, and bestow upon him the fate he so richly merits; but you see he is quite safe here—he cannot escape—he cannot do anyone an injury; therefore run out—obtain police officers yourself, if you can—if not, ask the first person you meet to go upon the errand for you."

By this time the girl had quite recovered from her fright, and having found that the man was perfectly helpless, she took courage and said:

"A thousand thanks, kind sir, for saving my life, and saving my master's property, and telling me what to do! I will go, sir, at once,—you have had trouble enough already."

"It is no trouble," said Dick. "Farewell! You may perhaps meet your master and mistress returning from market; if you do, tell them all, but rest not until that villain is in safe custody."

CHAPTER DLX.

DICK TURPIN SUDDENLY ENCOUNTERS A TROOP OF DRAGOONS ON THE HIGHWAY.

The servant girl repeated her assurances, and then hastily left the cottage in order to seek assistance.

Dick Turpin went up to his prisoner, and carefully examined his bonds.

He found them quite secure, and was certain that by his own exertions the rascal would not be able to get free.

It would have been a great consolation to Dick if he could have seen him in the custody of the police officers, but this was not to be thought of—it would be running rather too much risk; besides, he was anxious to reach the deserted mansion with as little delay as possible.

Accordingly he turned round and left the cottage, closing the door after him.

Black Bess had strayed off down the lane, cropping the sweet green grass that grew beneath the hedgerows.

A faint whistle, however, brought her in a moment to his side, and vaulting into the saddle, Dick Turpin pursued his interrupted journey

The lane was narrow and winding, so that it was impossible for him to see more than a few yards in advance.

Where it led to, he could not precisely take upon himself to say, though he knew he was going in a right direction for his destination.

Black Bess galloped on some little distance further, and then swept round what appeared to be another bend in the lane.

But such was not the case, it was where the lane formed a junction with the high-road.

Had Turpin been aware of this, he would have gone round the corner with greater caution. As it was, he most unexpectedly found himself in the highway.

Then he heard a trampling of horses' feet, and some one cried out in a loud voice:

"Halt!"

The command was not addressed to him, and yet Dick Turpin stopped; if he had not done so, he must have come into violent collision with a troop of dragoons that formed a compact body in the road before him.

The suddenness with which this meeting had taken place filled the highwayman with astonishment.

There he was, face to face with those who had for such a long time been vainly patrolling the roads in the hope of meeting with him.

What was to be done?

To attack so many well-mounted and well-armed men would be the extreme of folly, and to turn and fly would be equally futile, for before he could go many yards he would be riddled by a volley of bullets from their carbines.

It did not take Dick Turpin the thousandth part of a second to make this reflection.

He comprehended the full peril of his position instantly.

"Hallo!" said the voice which had previously given the command to halt. "Who are you? Stand forward at once!"

Dick felt that his only chance of escape was to hoodwink these dragoons in some way, but how it was to be accomplished he had not the remotest idea.

Still, he did not lose his presence of mind, and in order to have time for a moment's thought, he took off his hat and made a low bow to the person who had addressed him, and who beyond doubt was the officer in command of the troop.

"You are not very civil," said Dick, assuming as haughty a tone of voice as he could. "By what right do you stop me on this public road and demand to know who I am?"

The calm manner in which Turpin spoke, and the coolness with which he had brought his horse to a standstill, did more to throw the officer off his guard than anything else.

As they made it a rule to question every mounted man they met while patrolling the roads, they had of course to speak with civility to those passengers they addressed.

Therefore this officer of dragoons, returning Dick Turpin's salute, said:

"We are here under special orders, and my instructions are to patrol this road and question anyone I may meet or think proper to challenge. We are in search of four highwaymen."

"But you did not take me for one, surely!" said Dick, with great show of indignation. "Do I look like one?"

"I beg your pardon, sir, but I am instructed to take every precaution possible. However, I don't wish to detain you; still, it will be necessary that you go through the form of telling me who you are and where you reside."

"I have no objection to doing that, of course," said Dick, "though it is not very pleasant to be stopped on the road in this manner."

"It is not pleasant, I admit," replied the officer, "but, then, what is to be done? Of course you, like everyone else, desire that these highwaymen should be captured?"

"Oh, yes—yes, certainly—yes!" said Dick, who just at that moment was struck with a new and brilliant idea.

"Well, then," said the officer, "if you will just give me your name, you may pass on, and we will trouble you no further."

"I will tell you, and ask you a question at the same time. My name is Sir Dominic Gordon, and I reside at Ludlow, in Herefordshire. And now for the question—Is one of the highwaymen you are in search of called Dick Turpin?"

"Yes—yes!" cried the officer, quickly. "He is the one we are most anxious to capture. Have you seen anything of him?"

"I have," replied Dick. "I can give you some very important information concerning him."

"Indeed, sir!" said the officer, greatly interested, and not suspecting for a moment the identity of the person who was addressing him, for the darkness of the night effectually prevented a recognition. "I shall be most happy to receive any information you can give concerning this notorious offender."

"Well, then," said Dick, with admirable coolness, "I captured him about a quarter of an hour ago."

"Did what?" roared the officer at the top of his voice, as soon as ever he recovered his breath—"did what?"

"Captured him about a quarter of an hour ago; and if you will follow me, I will take you to where he is bound hand and foot, and unable to make a single movement."

"Sir," said the officer, "I hope you are not thinking of playing off any practical joke upon me. If you are, let me dissuade you from it."

"Practical joke?" said Dick. "You will find it a practical reality, if you will take the trouble to follow me!"

"You will excuse my doubts," said the officer, who was completely disconcerted by this startling intelligence, "but it does sound so extraordinary, and is so unexpected."

"Say no more," said Dick; "that is quite sufficient. Would you be kind enough, as we trot along, to inform me what is the exact amount of the reward offered for Dick Turpin?"

"Eh?"

"I asked what is the reward for capturing Dick Turpin, because I intend to lay claim to the whole of it, as I have captured him single-handed and unaided."

"Well," said the officer, "several rewards are offered by various parties; the total amount is fifteen hundred pounds."

"Exactly; I thought so."

"But if we convey the prisoner to Newgate—and the reward cannot be claimed until then,—we shall expect some share."

"All right!" said Dick. "Never fear, I will make that all right with you."

"That contents me a little more," said the officer. "I am heartily glad he is captured at last. I can assure you it is very disagreeable to the feelings of soldiers to find themselves turned into police officers; and the only thing which has ever reconciled me to this has been the prospect of earning the reward."

"I had not thought of that," said Turpin, "but it must be disagreeable to you to hunt about after highwaymen in this way."

"Excessively so. Well, then, as we have come to such a good understanding already, perhaps, as we go along, you would not mind telling me in what manner you managed to effect the capture of this daring individual. You have done that which no one has been able to do yet, though many have tried."

"I found the affair rather easy," said Dick. "I was riding along this lane, and, coming presently to a cottage, I heard a shrill scream from within, and knowing some one must be in distress, I alighted and opened the door, when I saw this redoubtable highwayman, Dick Turpin, holding a pistol to a girl's head, and threatening her with instant death if she did not tell him where her master kept his money."

"Oh! that was it?"

"Yes, just as I say. Seeing how matters stood, I sprang in, seized him by the neck, and bound him hand and foot, before he well knew where he was or what I was about."

"You quite surprise me!" said the officer. "I can't make out how it is you have so easily succeeded. Dick Turpin has kept a dozen men at bay before now, and resisted all their attempts to capture him. I am afraid there is some dreadful mistake. How do you know it was Dick Turpin?"

"I have only his own word for it," said Dick Turpin. "Just when I got to the door, I overheard him saying to the girl, 'My name is Dick Turpin, and when I make a threat I always execute it,' or something to that effect."

"Oh! you heard him say that?"

"Yes, I did—most distinctly."

"And when you had bound him hand and foot, what did you do?"

"Left him in the cottage so that he could not escape, and told the girl to run off for assistance, and not to rest until she had found some police officers. I do not wish to mix myself up any further in the affair. For one thing, the business I am upon is urgent, and delay would be of serious consequence to me; moreover, I felt it would be a disagreeable matter to be mixed up in."

"Well, it might for some persons," said the officer; "but if you will believe me, I should rather like being mixed up in it."

"Then you have your desire. Look, yonder is the cottage; a hundred steps will take us to it."

They passed round one of the bends in the lane as Dick spoke, and he pointed out the thatched roof of the cottage, which was plainly visible.

"And Dick Turpin is in there, is he?" said the officer.

"Yes, beyond all doubt; for, after I had secured him, I merely rode away from the cottage to the top of the lane where I happened to encounter you, so I have not left him very long."

"No—you have not!" said the officer, in quite a gleeful tone of voice, for he looked forward with absolute certainty to taking Dick Turpin to Newgate.

"Hark!" said Dick, "he is there safe enough! Can you hear him bellowing out? No doubt he is endeavouring to summon some of his companions to his assistance in order to escape."

"Let us make haste, then!" the officer said.

He pushed onward, and Dick smiled with satisfaction to think how completely he had succeeded in deceiving these dragoons.

Not only had he been able to get himself out of a very dangerous predicament, but, at the same time, he had managed to have his revenge upon the villain who had had the audacity to personate him.

Some most awful yells, proceeding from the interior of the cottage, now came upon their ears, and the motion of the whole troop was accelerated.

Just as they reached the cottage, however, three other persons arrived upon its threshold.

These were the owner of the cottage, his wife, and the servant girl.

The latter had met the former on their way home from market.

The girl recognised Turpin instantly, and she said, addressing her master and mistress:

"This is the gentleman who saved my life. He has come back, although he said he had particular business to attend to, and could not spare the time."

If any doubts had been lingering about the heart of the officer of dragoons, these few simple words from the servant girl would have completely dispelled them.

Hastily dismounting, and bidding his troop follow him, he entered the cottage.

Dick Turpin kept close behind him, then came the cottager, his wife, and the servant, while the troop of dragoons brought up the rear.

The fire was not burning quite so brightly as it had been a little while before, and so they were not able to see about them distinctly; but Dick Turpin, advancing to the hearth, kicked the embers together with his foot, and soon a bright blaze sprang up, which revealed everything.

"There he is," said Dick, pointing to the man he had tied to the staircase,—"there he is—behold your prisoner!"

The man uttered another yell of fright, and seemed ready to faint with terror.

"Hurrah!" shouted the dragoons, who were perfectly satisfied when they caught sight of the figure.

The man had evidently been at some pains to make himself resemble the famous highwayman,—he was about the same height, was attired in a similar manner, and wore his hair in the same fashion.

It was a daring thing for Dick to stand in the full glare of the firelight as he did, but he felt confident he was safe; under such circumstances as the present, who would think of taking him for the highwayman?

"So, Dick Turpin, my fine fellow," said the officer of dragoons, addressing the captive, "we've caught you at last, have we? There'll soon be an end to your little games."

"Turpin?" cried the man—"I am not Dick Turpin! I give you my word—I assure you I am not Dick Turpin,—it is all a mistake!"

"Ho, ho!" said the officer, laughing loudly, "that's just exactly what I expected; I never thought you would own who you were. Would not you like to make us believe that you are not Dick Turpin, but somebody else, and set you at liberty? But we are not so green,—oh dear, no—not by any means! But—ha, ha!—it's a good joke!"

The other dragoons burst out into a loud guffaw, in which Dick Turpin heartily joined.

In fact, he laughed until the tears rolled down his cheeks; and as for the officer of dragoons, he was fairly compelled to hold his sides.

"It's very funny," he said, "but shoot me if it isn't exactly what I thought he would say! Said I to myself, 'he will swear himself black in the face that he is not Dick Turpin, but somebody else,' and so he did as soon as ever he opened his mouth. It is a good joke, that it is!"

For the last moment or two, the prisoner had kept his eyes fixed upon Dick's countenance.

Then all of a sudden he screamed out:

"Gentlemen all, I am not Dick Turpin—I swear it! but, if you want him, he stands before you! There he is—that's Dick Turpin! I have seen him before, and I will take my oath that it is him any moment! I mean that man there—that one standing by the fire—the one that brought you here. I'll take any oath you think proper to propose that he is Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

CHAPTER DLXI.

DICK TURPIN SUCCEEDS IN COMPLETELY DELUDING THE OFFICER IN COMMAND OF THE TROOP OF DRAGOONS.

ANY other person than Dick Turpin would have been disconcerted by the words to which the man had just given utterance; but, retaining his calmness in the most admirable manner, he slapped the officer of dragoons familiarly on the shoulder, as he said:

"Ha, ha! That's a better joke than the other! The idea of his impudence,—me Dick Turpin, indeed! Why, in a minute or two I should not wonder if he doesn't try to make out you are the redoutable highwayman, and not him!"

"Oh, it's too rich!" said the officer—"it's too good, that it is! I always did believe that this Dick Turpin was an extraordinary fellow—I have heard people say so; but after to-night I shall always be able to speak from my own knowledge."

"You will," said Dick, with a peculiar smile. "You rascal!" he added, turning to the prisoner. "How dare you insult me in such a manner? I suppose you wanted to have revenge upon me, if you could, for capturing you!"

"Yes, that's it," said the officer—"of course that's it! Never mind, sir, don't pay any attention to him. He must think us green if he imagined we should take notice of such a tale as that!"

"You are all fools and idiots!" roared the prisoner. "You are letting a reward of fifteen hundred pounds slip through your fingers! I pretended to be Dick Turpin—I don't deny that for a moment; but I am not the real Dick Turpin! I have pretended to be him so that I could rob all the more easily, and I have been found out; but I tell you that man standing beside you is Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

"Better and better!" said the officer of dragoons, who appeared to enjoy the scene mightily. "You are a clever fellow, Dick Turpin, and when anybody says you are not, I shall make bold to contradict them; but although you are clever, I know somebody else that is just a little bit cleverer. Your tale might do with some, but it won't do with me."

"As you say," replied Dick, "it is a most excellent joke. No doubt the rascal would feel exceedingly gratified if he could only have me taken a prisoner to London along with himself—that would be his revenge."

"Of course it would; but he needn't think that I shall do anything of the kind—it isn't very likely. I have read the printed description of Dick Turpin, and from that I have no hesitation in saying that is the man."

"He told me his name was Dick Turpin," said the servant girl, chiming in, "when he was threatening to shoot me because I would not say where the money was. He told me he was Dick Turpin."

"But I was only pretending—I tell you I was only pretending!"

"All right!" said the officer. "I'll take you to Newgate, and if they like to believe you and let you out, why, it will be no affair of mine. But you need not think you will impose upon me, if you are ever so clever."

"He must be a fool to make the attempt," said Dick Turpin. "If he had got the least common sense at all, he would be able to see at a glance that you are not the kind of man to be taken in by anybody."

"I believe you there," said the officer. "They would have to rise very early in the morning to get over me."

"That's precisely my opinion," said Dick, with great emphasis.

"Oh," said the man, "to think you should be such fools—to think you should allow yourselves to be so easily imposed upon! But look here—listen to me! I don't want you to let me go!"

"That's all right, then," said the officer. "I was under the impression you did."

"No—take me to Newgate, and welcome! I shan't resist or say a word against it, provided you take that gentleman with you, and when he gets there, if he can prove that he is not Dick Turpin, why then you can do anything with me you like."

"All right, my friend!" said the officer. "We'll take you to Newgate, never fear! But you make a great mistake if you think I shall aid you in your scheme of revenge upon this gentleman."

The man held down his head, and resolved to say no more.

"Now, my lads," said the officer, just untie him from that post, and get him across one of the horses. Be very careful—don't you hurt the poor fellow for the world. We'll soon have him safe inside Newgate."

From the tone in which the officer spoke, the men could tell that he was quite willing to let them play any little prank upon the prisoner if they felt disposed.

While this was going on, Dick Turpin drew the officer aside, and said to him, in a low voice:

"Those who are acquainted with me would tell you that I am the last man to be guilty of flattery in the slightest degree, therefore I hope you will excuse me, and believe me when I say that it is a very long time since anything gave me so much pleasure and satisfaction as I have experienced in making your acquaintance."

"My dear fellow," said the officer, "you do me too much honour! Permit me to do the same thing. Let me shake hands!"

Thereupon the officer and Dick Turpin shook hands in such a brotherly, amiable way, that it was quite delightful to look upon.

"Now," said Dick, "I've told you who I am, and I am also on rather particular business. You may easily believe that a matter of a thousand pounds, more or less, is a mere trifle to me; I would not trouble myself about double the amount!"

"Ah!" said the officer, with a sigh, "I wish I was in the same position; but a thousand pounds would make a world of difference to me."

"Would it indeed? Then I'll tell you how you can have it without any trouble, and how you can render me a service at the same time."

"Command me," said the officer, shaking Dick's hand with greater heartiness than before,—"command me in any way you think proper!"

"Well, then, the fact is, I don't want to be brought into notoriety by having captured that highwayman rascal yonder. Why, if my friends heard about it, I should not have any more peace—I should be called a police officer, or a thief-taker, or something of that sort, to the end of my days."

"Ha, ha!" said the officer. "Good! You may depend upon it you would! If it was me, I should be one of the first."

"So should I," said Dick, "if it was anyone else; so you see I don't want to be bothered with this business any further. Besides, I have got urgent private affairs of my own to attend to, and I have already lost more time than I could afford to spare; and you are such a jolly good fellow that I feel inclined to make the following proposition to you."

"It concerns my getting a thousand pounds?"

"It does."

"Fire away, then—I am all attention!"

"I am glad to hear it. Well, then, I want to back out of this matter entirely; as I said before, it would not only be very disagreeable, but very inconvenient, for me to proceed to London. Now, you can easily make this matter all right. You will be able to give just what account may suit you best of capturing the highwayman. Make out that you did it yourself, then you can claim a thousand pounds of the reward, and divide the five hundred among your men. I don't want a penny of it."

"My dear sir!" said the officer, almost with tears in his eyes, "let me shake hands with you once more! I hope I shall always have the pleasure of enjoying your acquaintance. In this, my dear sir, as in everything else from this time forth, I am your most humble servant!"

"Then we'll say the matter is agreed upon?"

"Yes, sir, it is agreed on on my part. But you are really too generous—indeed you are—you are decidedly too generous! You quite overpower me!"

"Don't mention it," replied Turpin,—"I look upon you as conferring a favour on me, and if you will only say that the matter is settled, why, I'll be off! I shall have some difficulty in making up for the time I have lost, and any further delay may be productive of very serious consequences."

"Go, my dear sir!" said the officer,—"do not let me detain you on any account, though I hope I shall have the pleasure of meeting you again!"

"So do I," said Dick. "And now, perhaps, you would not take it amiss if I give you a word of advice?"

"To be sure not!"

"Well, then, I would recommend you to lose no time in getting that rascal highwayman safely inside Newgate; he is cunning as a fox, and you don't know what tricks he might play you. He may be deceiving you even at the present moment."

"Ha! what?" said the officer, in some alarm, turning round.

"I think it's all right!" said Dick, with a smile,—"they appear to have him safe, and you know when you have at last handed him over to the Governor of the prison, you need take no further trouble—the more will then be yours."

"A thousand pounds will be the saving of me—it will indeed! I find it hard work to make my pay supply my wants—I can't do it, in fact,—and I am in debt: but a thousand pounds will put me all right."

"Then I am rejoiced at being the means of putting the amount in your way. So, now, farewell!"

"Are you riding towards London?"

"No," replied Dick,—"I wish I was, because then I could have the pleasure of your company on the way."

During this brief conversation they had had together, the dragoons had unbound the pretended Dick Turpin from the staircase, and, according to the instructions of their chief, placed him across one of the horses, very much in the manner of a sack of grain.

He was quite silent—not even so much as a groan escaping him. He had found out that it was perfectly useless to speak, and experienced a savage sort of satisfaction in thinking how disappointed the dragoons would be when they got to Newgate and discovered their mistake.

All were in readiness to start; and, after one more shake of the hands, Dick Turpin and the officer of dragoons parted.

"Keep close round the prisoner," he said, as they were riding away, "and mind he don't escape. You cannot be too careful."

"All right!" said the officer,—"don't you fear that I shall let such a good chance go by me! Farewell!"

"Farewell!" replied Turpin.

He once more whistled, and again Black Bess came to his side.

He sprang into the saddle, and then waited until the troop of dragoons had gone round the bend in the lane.

As soon as they were out of sight, he walked Black Bess onwards for a few yards, until he came to a gap in the hedgerow.

Through this he leaped into the meadow beyond, and then set off at full gallop in a straight line across the country.

Dick was on excellent terms with himself, and every now and then he would shout again with glee as he thought of the manner in which he had tricked his foes, and had his revenge on the rascal who had done him such an injury.

"It would be worth something," he thought to himself, "if I could only have a peep at their proceedings when they arrive at Newgate. They will find out their mistake, no doubt. I would not mind running a little risk to notice the change that will come over that officer's countenance when he discovers he has taken all his trouble for nothing, and is no nearer obtaining the reward than he was before."

Dick had not felt so joyful and delighted for many a long day.

The rapidity, too, at which he was travelling had the effect of raising his spirits, until at last they reached to rather an extravagant height.

"It's glorious!" he cried. "Was there ever anyone so taken in before? I can scarcely believe it. I trembled for my own safety once or twice, when that rascal spoke with so much certainty as to my identity; but the officer was quite blinded. How I should like to be in the vestibule of Newgate when they arrive! Let me see! They will get there about three o'clock in the morning—they will call the Governor up, and there will be rare fun!"

Dick's thoughts ran very much upon the scene that would take place in the vestibule of the prison, and at last, after some time spent in reflection, he said

"I have succeeded so far, and I have a good mind to tempt my luck a little further. There is London!" he continued, pointing to a little black, cloud-like mass before him. "I'll do it—I'll follow the dragoons at a safe distance, and see how they get on."

This was a very hazardous trick, and the probability is that if Dick had been a little less excited than he was, he would never have thought of attempting it; but it so happened that he was just in the humour for an exciting adventure.

It was a dark, misty night, and he knew he should be able to get pretty close to the dragoons without being seen.

He stopped Black Bess, and, looking around him as well as he could, tried to make out where he was.

"There is the high-road," he said, at length. "Yes, that is the main road to London. I have come much faster than the dragoons, so they must be some distance behind. Good! I will cross yonder meadow, and conceal myself behind that hedge, and wait there till they pass by.

Dick had no sooner resolved upon this course of action than he proceeded to carry it into effect.

Changing his course, he struck at right angles across the field in which he then was, and leaped over a low hedge which divided it from the meadow situated on the side of the high-road.

CHAPTER DLXII.

DICK TURPIN FOLLOWS THE DRAGOONS TO NEWGATE, AND TAKES A PEEP INTO THE VESTIBULE.

As we have previously stated, the hedgerow was all that divided this meadow from the high-road; but it was closely planted and of considerable height, so that it would be an easy enough matter for Dick Turpin to place himself behind it without fear of being seen by anyone who might pass by.

Upon a closer inspection, he found that he could not possibly have chosen a better place, for there was a kind of dry ditch about two feet in depth, which ran along the side of the meadow.

On the other side was a bank of earth, on which the hedge was planted.

He slipped from the saddle, but kept hold of the reins, so that Black Bess could not move away, for the hedge only afforded her concealment when she was standing close to it.

Dick laid down on the grass, and waited patiently for those sounds which would indicate the approach of the troop of dragoons.

His patience was put to a rather severe trial, but at length he started up with the exclamation:

"They are coming—I can hear them!"

The faint sound caused by the clatter of the horses' hoofs on the high-road soon grew louder and louder.

With intense excitement, Dick peered through the hedge.

Closely as it was planted, yet near the top of the bank there were plenty of interstices through which he could peep and command a tolerable view of the road just in front of him.

In a few minutes more the troop of dragoons arrived opposite to him.

They were going at a sharp trot, which would be anything but pleasant to the individual who was laid across the pommel of one of the saddles.

The soldiers formed a close guard round their prisoner, and Dick Turpin was unable to obtain the least glimpse of him.

The officer brought up the rear, and, dark as it was, Dick fancied he could see a smile of congratulation upon his lips.

Then they all swept by, and he could see them no longer.

But the view he had had, so far from satisfying him, only inflamed his curiosity.

"I must see it out to the end," he said. "I am determined to do so. It will be rare sport, and I should be a fool to miss it."

Remounting his bonny mare, he trotted along under the shadow of the hedgerow at about the same rate of speed that the dragoons had adopted.

In a little while, however, he could tell that he was gaining upon them, and therefore slackened his speed.

It would be fatal to his whole purpose if he was seen, for, however blind the officer might be, his suspicions could not fail to be aroused by seeing Dick, after he had so expressly stated that he was not going in the direction of London, and was in a hurry to resume his journey.

Without the occurrence of any incident, Dick Turpin managed to follow the troop into London.

The difficulty in keeping near them was now very much greater, but he had determined at all risks to have a peep, if he could, at what took place inside Newgate.

"I will gallop on before them," he said. "I can take a circuitous route and be there first easily. That will be by far the best plan."

He put this resolve into execution at once.

Galloping off apparently in an opposite direction to that which the dragoons were taking, he made a detour, and presently emerged into Fleet Market.

As he reached this place, he heard St. Paul's strike the hour of three.

At that hour there was little fear of his meeting with anyone. The whole city had a deserted appearance, and the silence was most profound.

Dick Turpin turned up a narrow thoroughfare called Fleet Lane, which is to this day in existence, and forms a connection between Farringdon Street and the Old Bailey.

Along this he slowly paced until he reached the top, and here he paused.

From this point a full view of the gloomy, dismal old prison could be obtained, as well as of the street in which it is built.

The black and frowning walls had no terrors for Dick Turpin. He glanced over them rapidly, and yet with a strange kind of interest. Then he gave all his attention to listening for the arrival of the dragoons.

The prison before him was perfectly dark, with the exception that over the top of the door through which prisoners are taken, and where a man sits on guard night and day, came a faint beam of light from the iron oil-lamp which at that time depended from the centre of the ceiling of the vestibule.

Through one of the upper windows of the Governor's house, too, there came a feeble glimmering, for the Governor was liable to be called up at any hour of the night.

Presently, with a tremendous clattering sound, the troop of dragoons came round the corner of Newgate Street into the Old Bailey.

They pulled up with a dash in front of the vestibule; and, fearful of being seen, Dick Turpin backed Black Bess a little way down Fleet Lane.

The officer in command sprang from his horse, and, running up the little flight of stone steps, knocked vigorously at the wicket.

There was not much delay in responding to his summons, for the noise made by the horses' feet was quite enough to rouse the man on the lock from the comfortable nap he was taking.

"Hallo!" he cried, in a gruff voice. "What the devil's the matter?"

"Open the door this instant!" cried the officer, in commanding tones, "and call up the Governor! I have brought a prisoner of great importance!"

"Hi! Joe!" cried the man on the lock, addressing a turnkey who was seated on a wooden bench, "just call up the Governor, will you?"

"Yes," added the officer, "and tell him I have brought Dick Turpin a prisoner."

"Oh, my eye!" cried the man on the lock, and as he uttered the ejaculation, he flung open the door

In the meantime, the dragoons had dismounted, and all of them managed, in some way or other, to take hold of the prisoner, who was thus carried into the vestibule.

He was perfectly helpless, and escape was quite out of the question.

The door was quickly closed behind them, and then Dick Turpin muttered:

"Now is the time! There is no one about, and, let the risk be what it will, I'll cross the road, and peep over the top of the door. The chances are, however, that I shall not be seen."

He slipped from the saddle as he spoke, and then for the first time wondered what he should do with Black Bess in the meanwhile.

"Hallo, there! Who are you?" said a voice, and at the same time a flash of light fell upon the forms of the highwayman and his steed.

Turning round, Dick found himself confronted by the watchman, who carried in one hand a lantern, and in the other a rattle which he was ready to spring at any moment.

"Ah!" said Dick—"I was just looking for you. This is your beat, I suppose?"

"It is, your honour," replied the watchman. "What might your worship want?"

"Why, I want you to hold my horse for a minute or two. I shall be back directly, and, if you'll take care of my horse till I come, you will have no room to find fault with my liberality."

"All right, your honour! I will mind your horse, with the greatest pleasure."

"Don't walk her about," said Dick, "but just stay where you are, and then I shall know where to find you."

"All right, your honour!"

"Fortune favours me," muttered Dick. "I have got out of that difficulty nicely, and if I can manage all the rest as well, I shall be quite satisfied."

He walked to the top of Fleet Lane as he spoke, but did not cross straight over the road.

He turned to the left and went on for some distance, then he crossed, and walked along under the shadow of the prison wall.

In less than a moment he reached the door through which the prisoner had been taken.

He paused at the bottom of the steps and listened.

The murmuring of many voices came upon his ear, and he said, mentally:

"They will be all too busily engaged to notice me; and if I am careful to make no sound, I shall not be discovered."

So saying, he stole silently and swiftly up the steps.

Upon reaching the top, he paused.

Before him was the strong iron-studded door.

In the centre of this door was an iron grating, which could be uncovered at pleasure by those within, by means of a concealed shutter.

It was through this grating that questions were asked by the man on the look before he opened the door.

Now the wicket was closed, and so Dick could not see through it.

But the upper portion of the door was formed of strong iron spikes placed close together, and the tops of which formed a kind of semicircle.

By standing on his toes on the top step, Dick Turpin was just able to see into the vestibule, or lobby, as it was indiscriminately called.

Of course, only the upper portion of his head was visible, and consequently there was still less danger of his being seen by anyone within.

It may not be out of place here to give a few words descriptive of this vestibule.

It was octagonal in shape, and had a pointed roof.

From it several doors opened—one leading into the room where the turnkeys were allowed to sit when not on duty, another to that portion of the prison in the occupation of the Governor, and two more conducting to the cells.

It was about ten or twelve feet in diameter.

Such, then, was the general appearance of the place into which Dick Turpin was peeping.

CHAPTER DLXIII.

DICK TURPIN WITNESSES AN AMUSING SCENE WHICH TAKES PLACE IN THE VESTIBULE OF NEWGATE.

Who would have believed that Dick Turpin would have had the audacity and daring to coolly ascend the steps of Newgate as he did, and peep into the interior?

It would seem utterly incredible, and yet there he was, standing as calmly and collectedly as anyone possibly could, and enjoying the scene to the utmost.

All were very busy inside in removing the bonds from the prisoner's hands and feet, while those officials connected with Newgate who happened to be about were all clustering forward eagerly to catch a sight of the celebrated highwayman.

By the time this unbinding process was over, the door we have mentioned as leading to the private part of the prison was opened, and Mr. Cawthorn, the Governor, followed by a turnkey, made his appearance.

He had evidently hurried on his clothes in a very reckless manner, for when the startling intelligence was brought to him, he was so impatient to catch sight of the prisoner that he was almost ready to run downstairs in his shirt.

However, he did control himself enough to slip on a few of his garments, and then he made his appearance upon the scene.

As soon as the door opened, the officer in command of the dragoons went up to him and said:

"You are the Governor, I presume?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Cawthorn.

"Then I have the pleasure of informing you that I have succeeded in capturing the notorious highwayman Dick Turpin. Here he is in safe custody, so please give me a receipt in due form, in order that I may obtain the reward!"

"All right, sir," said Mr. Cawthorn—"you shall have what you desire. I am really delighted to think that at last you have been successful. I congratulate you, sir—I congratulate you!"

"Thanks!"

"Bring the prisoner this way," said Mr. Cawthorn, "and trim the lamp, so that I can have a good look at him!"

The iron lamp was burning somewhat dimly; but one of the turnkeys poked the wicks about with the blade of a knife, and then there was a sudden increase in the illumination.

The glare of light fell full upon the person of the prisoner.

No sooner did Mr. Cawthorn behold him than he staggered back several paces, and trod on the toes of a turnkey who stood behind him, and who uttered a furious howl in consequence.

Thus brought to a stop, Mr. Cawthorn rubbed his eyes, then advanced.

The commanding officer beheld these movements with surprise, and somehow or other a conviction began to creep over him that all was not quite so right as he had fondly imagined it to be.

"Damnation!" roared Mr. Cawthorn. "You have made a mistake!"

"A what?" screamed the officer and all the dragoons in a chorus.

"A mistake! That is no more Dick Turpin than I am!"

The officer and his men were completely taken back.

"What is the meaning of this?" cried Mr. Cawthorn, in a rage. "Is this some nice little trick you thought of playing upon me, in order to get me into trouble, or make a laughing stock of me? If it is, you shall suffer for it!"

"You take my breath," gasped the officer, leaning for support against the wall. "Do you mean to tell me that that is not Dick Turpin? You must be mistaken—you must indeed!"

"There is no mistake," said Mr. Cawthorn, "except on your side. Do you think I am a fool?—do you think I have no eyes? I tell you that is not Dick Turpin!"

"I told them the same," said the prisoner, speaking for the first time. "I offered to take my oath of it, but they would not believe what I said. Dick Turpin himself was standing by humbugging them all the while!"

"You rascal!" cried the officer, shaking with passion. "If you dare to repeat that, I'll fell you to the ground! How dare you insult that gentleman who was with us!"

"Ha, ha!" laughed the prisoner. "'Gentleman!' Good that! I rather like the idea! But he was Dick Turpin as sure as I am not!"

"Then, Mr. Governor," said the officer, "am I to understand that you still cling to the notion that this is not Dick Turpin?"

"Of course! Do you think I should not know him? Wasn't he a prisoner some months ago for a long while, and didn't I see him every day? Of course I did! And after that, do you think I should be likely to fall into any mistake? Do you think I should not know him from a man who is no more like Dick Turpin than I am myself?"

The officer of dragoons uttered a frantic howl of rage.

Pushing forward, he seized hold of the prisoner by the neck, and shook him backwards and forwards with so much violence that it was a wonder it did not shake the life out of him.

"Villain!" he shrieked,—"tell me all—confess to the truth—explain, I say, or you shall suffer dearly!"

The prisoner struggled to speak, but could not, for the officer pressed his windpipe with so much tightness that speech was impossible.

Mr. Cawthorn saw this, so he in turn seized hold of the officer, and tried to drag him away.

"Let go!" he cried—"let go! I am master here, and will be obeyed! I should advise you to be careful, Mr Officer! I do not intend to be called up in the dead of the night and be made a fool of by such as you!"

The officer let go, and the prisoner gasped for breath in a dreadful manner.

In a broken voice, he said:

"I tell you I am not Dick Turpin. I pretended to be so that I could rob with greater safety and ease. I could frighten the people into anything by simply telling them that I was Dick Turpin. That was why I assumed the character, and a damned fool I was for doing it!"

[DICK TURPIN ESCAPING FROM THE DESERTED MANSION.]

"Then that is how the mistake arose, is it?" cried Mr. Cawthorn.—"you passed yourself off for Dick Turpin, and the officer believed you?"

"That's partly it," said the prisoner. "I was threatening a girl when Dick Turpin himself came into the room at unawares, stole behind me, and hit me a crack on the head. I became insensible, and when I recovered I was tied hand and foot to the bannisters of the staircase."

"That's a lie!" said a voice.

Everybody started and looked around them in surprise, while the Governor of Newgate said:

"Who was that that had the audacity to speak?—who was it, I say?"

There was no answer, and each man in the vestibule looked with a curious, inquiring expression into the countenances of those who were nearest.

"Who was it that spoke?" cried the Governor again. "It was somebody, and whoever it was I give him warning, he had better not attempt to make a fool of me!"

"If you please, sir," said one of the turnkeys, "I think it must be somebody on the steps, who shouted over the door!"

"Go and look, then."

The turnkey pushed back the little wicket in the centre of the door and peeped through the grating.

"There is nobody here," he said; "they must have holloaed out and run away."

No further importance was attached to this incident, and Mr. Cawthorn continued his examination of the prisoner.

As the reader surmises, it was Dick Turpin who had spoken.

He uttered the words upon the impulse of the moment, and without reflecting upon what was likely to be the consequences.

As soon as ever the words had passed his lips he shrunk back into the shadow of the doorway, where he was just out of sight of the turnkey who peeped through the grating.

As soon as the conversation was resumed he took up his former position, though he was more cautious now than ever, as he thought it not unlikely some person might have his eyes fixed upon the door.

But he was mistaken, the attention of everybody was fixed upon the prisoner.

"Now," said Mr. Cawthorn, "go on with your tale."

"I called out for help," said the prisoner, "but it was no good, and after a time the door was opened and in came that officer, these dragoons, and along with them Dick Turpin, though I did not recognise him at first."

"Oh! this is monstrous," cried the officer—"monstrous to a degree! Is it at all probable that a highwayman would have acted in such a manner? and is it not quite impossible that I could have been so grossly imposed upon?"

"I will swear to it any minute!" said the prisoner. "I said so to them, and wanted the officer to bring that gentleman with him, as he calls him, to Newgate, so that the doubt might be cleared up; but he refused to do so, so I shall leave you to judge to what extent he is an accomplice of Dick Turpin's. If all the other dragoons have behaved in the same manner as these, I don't wonder at his never having been captured. My belief is there is an understanding existing between them."

"You wretch!" cried the officer of dragoons—"you villain!"

He rushed forward as he spoke, with the intention of annihilating the prisoner there and then, and no doubt it would have gone hard with the individual in question, had not Mr. Cawthorn commanded the turnkeys to seize the officer.

"Hold him!" he said. "I intend to have this matter cleared up, and it strikes me very forcibly that I shall have to detain him a prisoner.

"Speak on, my man," he continued, addressing the prisoner; "tell us the rest, and do not be afraid of the consequences. I will see that no harm comes to you."

The prisoner was delighted at this opportunity, and determined to have his revenge upon the dragoons as well as he was able.

"I want to make a clean breast of it," he said, "and I have done so up to now; the rest is very simple. I wanted him to bring Dick Turpin to Newgate, but he refused, and they both went off into a corner, and began to whisper together, and in the end they let Dick Turpin ride off free as air, although I had told them over and over again who he was."

"That will do," said Mr. Cawthorn.

Then, turning to the officer, he added:

"Perhaps you will be kind enough to explain this little circumstance; it seems, from what I can hear, that you did not capture this prisoner at all?"

"No, I did not," said the officer, hesitatingly.

"Then who did?"

"A gentleman who happened to be passing by, and who heard a girl screaming for help."

"And how did you come to know anything about it?"

"After he had taken him prisoner, the gentleman happened to meet with me, and he told me all about it. I went back to the cottage with him, and there we found the prisoner, who was sworn to be Dick Turpin, not only by the gentleman I am speaking of, but by the girl herself."

"And where is this gentleman?" asked Mr. Cawthorn.

"Far enough off by this time, I'll be bound!" replied the prisoner.

"Why did you not bring him to Newgate with you?"

"Do you think it was likely I should insult him?"

"It would have been no insult; it was necessary for him to come if he made the capture, because he is entitled to the reward, and no one else."

"I tell you it is all fudge!" replied the officer. "That is Dick Turpin; I swear to it, and I maintain it, and if you liberate him, or refuse to believe my statement, it will be at your peril!"

"Fiddle-de-dee!" replied the Governor, snapping his fingers. "It is as plain as the nose on your face, you have been taken in and done for by Dick Turpin; you have been sold as brown as a hammer—you'll never hear the last of this business! I'll take care it gets pretty well known. How green you must be, to be sure!"

"I shall represent your conduct to the proper authorities," said the officer, "and you shall take the consequences. Give me a receipt and let me go. There's your prisoner. I tell you he is Dick Turpin! Take him, I say, and give me a receipt!"

"I shall do nothing of the sort!" said the Governor. "I shall lock him up, and keep him safe till morning; and I consider I have heard quite enough to warrant me in coming to the conclusion that you, so far from attempting to capture the highwayman, have been his accomplice, and aided and abetted his escape."

"Mind what you are saying!" said the officer, foaming with passion.

"All right!" said Mr. Cawthorn. "I tell you that is my belief; and such being the case, I shall take upon myself the responsibility of keeping you all here till morning, when you will have the opportunity of clearing yourself from the charge which this man makes against you."

"I tell you," cried the officer, who began to be afraid he had got himself into a very awkward scrape—"I tell you I am no accomplice of Dick Turpin's, and that man lies in the throat when he says so! I'll admit I may have done wrong in not bringing the gentleman with me, but then I did not think it would matter; but it seems I have got myself into a nice fix!"

"You have," said Mr. Cawthorn, grinning and rubbing his hands together. "It strikes me that you'll find it rather difficult to clear yourself of the charge!"

"I wish I had brought the gentleman with me," said the officer, "and then all would have been cleared up."

"You would have found it rather a difficult matter to have brought him, I fancy," said the prisoner, with a laugh. "I fancy I see it! You wouldn't have brought him so easily as you have brought me!"

"Very true," said a voice, "and so I have come by myself! Here I am, Mr. Cawthorn! How do you find yourself this morning? Pay no attention to what that prisoner says. He is a liar, for he tried hard to make me believe that he was myself. I am Dick Turpin, and I thought I would just look in, and make the remark that the officer of dragoons is no accomplice of mine. Good-bye, all! I am delighted to take my leave of you!"

CHAPTER DLXIV.

DICK TURPIN AT LENGTH SUCCEEDS IN REACHING THE DESERTED MANSION.

Feeling convinced that it is out of our power to describe the effects which were produced by this speech upon the persons who were assembled in the vestibule, we shall not make the attempt.

All we can say is, that if they had been by some mysterious process transformed into statues, they could not have stood more motionless than they did.

They were literally rooted to the ground with astonishment, and had their lives depended upon it they could not have moved hand or foot while Dick Turpin was making his extraordinary address.

The highwayman had seized hold of the spikes and drawn himself up so that his face was clearly visible above the top of the door.

When he had finished speaking he took off his hat and waved it in a defiant manner, then disappeared.

At that instant everyone seemed to start suddenly into life.

"Ten thousand devils!" cried Mr. Cawthorn. "Am I to be made a fool of after all? After him, I say! Open the door, Winch! Where are you?—where is the key? Why the devil don't you open the door? He will be off before we can get outside!"

A furious rush was made towards the door, each one striving to get nearest to it, so as to run out into the street first, so the consequence was, that they very much impeded each other, and caused at least a minute's delay.

At last the door was unlocked and dashed open.

Then, in a tumultuous throng, they rushed headlong down the steps, nor could they stop themselves until they reached the middle of the Old Bailey.

Then they panted and looked about them.

The faint clatter of a horse's hoofs on the stones alone reached their ears.

"Mount—mount!" cried Mr. Cawthorn. "Pursue him instantly! Quick, or he will be quite out of hearing!"

"Mount!" said the officer in charge of the dragoons—"mount at once!"

They obeyed promptly, and then a voice cried:

"Yah—ha! There, stop him—stop him! There he goes—after him—be quick or you will be too late."

These vociferations came from one of the turnkeys.

This was caused by Dick Turpin's personator having also made his escape.

He took advantage of the sudden rush to the door, and had descended the steps along with the rest unnoticed.

As a matter of course, as soon as ever he reached the street he took to his heels, and ran as he never had before.

"Stop whom?" roared Mr. Cawthorn—"who has escaped?"

"The prisoner!" roared the turnkey.

The Governor gave vent to some horrible oaths.

"After him!" he cried—"after him!—catch him! I would not have him escape on any account!"

"Which are we to go after?" inquired the officer.

"Why, both of them, you idiot! Run after both, or you will lose them!"

The dragoons attempted to carry out this order, but as individually they could not make up their minds which way to take, they ran their horses against each other in confusion.

Mr. Cawthorn was frantic with rage, and danced in the street like some infuriated red Indian, while every now and then he would seize hold of his hair, pluck a handful out by the roots, and dash it violently down upon the ground.

"You will lose them!" he screamed. "Half of you go that way and half this way! D—n you all for a parcel of idiots and cowards! You will be too late!"

Leaving the dragoons to pursue the fugitives, we will return to Dick Turpin.

Before he spoke in the extraordinary manner we have recorded, he had come to the conclusion that those within would be too much astonished to move for a moment or two, and then he should easily be able to make his escape.

The result fully proved that he was right.

It was a daring act to thus proclaim himself while standing on the very threshold of Newgate, and while so many were in readiness to pursue him in a moment.

It was done, however, and then, running down the steps, he crossed the road and turned down Fleet Lane.

Here he found the watchman holding his horse, and in happy ignorance of all that had been going on.

"Here's a crown-piece for you," said Dick, "but I should advise you to hold your tongue about it. If you say you have held my horse you will get into trouble, for this is Black Bess and I am Dick Turpin!"

The watchman opened his mouth to such a prodigious extent that the top of his head seemed in imminent danger of falling off. No sound, however, came from his throat, but he made a desperate attempt to raise an alarm by whirling his lantern round and round, labouring under the delusion that it was his rattle.

A word was enough to cause Black Bess to set forward at the top of her speed, and she flew through the streets with a rapidity that would have terrified any ordinary rider.

Dick turned her head in the direction of the Oxford Road, and in a little while afterwards reached it.

He paused and listened.

At first all was silent, but soon a faint, almost inaudible sound arose.

"They are after me," he said. "Well, no matter, let them come; I am not afraid that they will overtake me!"

He once more set his mare in motion, and in a little while the open country was gained.

Dick was now on familiar ground.

There was not a cross-country road or lane and scarcely a tree for miles round that he did not know. So he forsook the highway, and turned down a narrow lane, upon both sides of which trees grew so thickly that it seemed more like the entrance to a cavern than aught else.

"I have had enough of adventures for one night," Dick said, as he trotted swiftly along this lane. "I fancy there will be a little bit of a consternation to-morrow, when the facts become known. Ha, ha! It's a good joke, and I could never have believed that so daring a feat could have been carried out so easily!"

Dick was evidently very well satisfied with his achievement, and for some time he amused himself by laughing aloud.

At last, happening to look up, he saw in the east a faint grey light, which told of the rapid approach of morning.

"I must make good speed," he said, "or I shall scarcely reach the deserted mansion before daylight. It is quite clear I shall not do so if I meet with any interruption. No more adventures to-night! It's against my nature; but if one comes in my way I will avoid it."

As Dick Turpin took the most lonely road to his destination he could think of, it was scarcely likely that he would meet with anyone, for at that hour few people were stirring.

Black Bess seemed to know that she was returning to her old quarters, for Dick found it almost impossible to make her moderate her speed.

Trees, hedges, and meadows flitted quickly past them, but every moment the faint light in the east increased in brightness, and it was evident that day would fairly dawn before the highwayman reached the end of his journey.

At length he emerged into the Finchley Road, near the spot where the lane branched off that led to the deserted mansion.

As the misty light of morning was creeping all over the landscape and dimly revealing surrounding objects, it was necessary that he should be cautious in his movements, for the consequences of being seen near this spot would be serious, if not fatal.

Accordingly, Dick reined-in his steed, and took a long look about him.

But his piercing gaze failed to detect the presence of any human being.

The only living objects besides himself and his mare seemed to be the little birds that were already chirping in every tree.

Finding the coast was clear, Dick galloped along the road for about two hundred yards as rapidly as possible.

Then, coming to the narrow lane, he turned down it, and felt that, for the time being, he was safe.

Nevertheless, he approached the dilapidated gates with great caution, as it was just possible that some of Mr. Wriggles's men might be lingering and spying about the place.

Dick hardly thought this, but yet judged it best to omit no precaution, and to keep himself fully on his guard.

All was as silent around as when he had first approached that spot, and, encouraged by the stillness, he passed through the gates into the grass-grown avenue.

Here, however, he dismounted, and, leading Black Bess by the bridle, plunged at once among the trees, his intention being to get as near to the mansion as he could without being seen.

It was both difficult and troublesome to force a passage through the trees, for having been left uncultivated for so long, branches shot in all directions, many of them being near the ground.

Describing in his course a kind of semicircle, Dick Turpin at length arrived upon the margin of the lawn.

Again he looked closely and scrutinisingly around, and in doing this he was much assisted by the faint daylight.

So far as he could tell, the mansion looked just the same as it had ever done, presenting no signs whatever of habitation.

It was before the front that Dick paused, and having examined this, and feeling satisfied with the result, he made his way round to the side, still taking care to keep under the shadow of the trees.

When he paused again it was opposite the little window through which they had been wont to pass when entering or leaving the building.

Here also silence reigned, though on the ground there still remained traces of the furious struggle that had so lately taken place upon that spot.

The bodies of the officers, however, that had lain there had disappeared. In all probability, they had been carried away by their companions.

The more he looked about him the more certain did Dick feel that he had all the place to himself.

Yet he was not satisfied, nor would he venture to enter the building until his examination had been complete.

Accordingly, he passed completely round it, observing all with the greatest closeness.

And then, and not until then, did he feel thoroughly satisfied.

The next thing to be decided was what should be done with Black Bess.

After what had happened, he did not like the idea of placing her inside the stable—he wanted to have her in some place where he could rejoin her instantly.

There appeared to be only one thing that he could do, and that was to take her into the deserted mansion with him; but there were difficulties in the way of this; a previous examination made him aware that all the doors were so securely fastened that it would be a matter of time to get one open.

Then the little window was some height from the ground, and he doubted whether he should be able to get her through it.

If he could, why so much the better; and under this conviction he once more came round to that side of the mansion.

Looking at the window, he fancied she might be able to jump through it, provided he could only make her understand what he meant.

He determined to try.

He patted her fondly and caressingly upon the neck, speaking to her all the while.

The gallant creature fully understood him, and rubbed her head against his breast, and neighed with evident pleasure.

Then, releasing his hold upon the bridle, Dick climbed through the window.

Standing within, he uttered that chirping sound which he always made use of when he wished to call her to him.

She trotted up to the window in an instant and put her head in.

"Come, Bess," he said, patting her again—"come lass—this way!"

He stepped back as he spoke, and then it was evident his mare understood him.

Turning round, she walked some distance from the window—in fact, as far as she was able, for she did not stop until she came to the trees.

Then she turned round and faced her master.

Again Dick uttered the signal, and with a rush she galloped on and leaped through the casement.

She alighted in perfect safety.

"Bravo!" said Dick. "All's well now—I fear nothing. The money I shall get easily enough, and now my only wish is that my three comrades will not be long in returning."

CHAPTER DLXV.

DICK TURPIN ENDEAVOURS TO ELUCIDATE THE MYSTERY CONNECTED WITH THE HORRIBLE SOUNDS.

Having succeeded in getting Black Bess inside the mansion, Dick Turpin felt quite at his ease.

He was sure, from the care he had taken in reconnoitring, that no officers were about, and no one had noticed his arrival, so that his future proceedings seemed plain and simple enough.

His visit respecting his three comrades was not very likely to be fulfilled, for at that very moment they were many miles away, and many obstacles were in the way of their return.

Still Turpin was quite contented with what he had already done, and having patted and soothed Black Bess, he passed through the door we have so often mentioned which led into the passage.

The first thing that he had to do, was to find some chamber in the mansion where he could place Black Bess, so that should occasion require it, he should be able to rejoin her instantly.

This threatened to be difficult, for there were several doors near at hand, yet they were all well secured.

One in particular, that was situated at the extremity of the passage, attracted his attention, and he advanced towards it.

It was locked and bolted.

The latter securements were easily removed.

He then set to work upon the lock, and, after about half an hour's labour, he managed to get the door open.

The chamber beyond had a damp, earthy kind of smell, and was plunged into a state of partial obscurity.

The only light which made its way into the place was that which struggled through some small diamond-shaped holes that were cut in the window shutters.

In less than a moment, however, Dick Turpin was able to see about him with tolerable ease and distinctness, and, by degrees, every object which the room contained was revealed to him.

He then came to the conclusion that in former times this place had served as a kitchen, for all the fittings belonging to it and most of the utensils still remained.

He considered this would serve his purpose excellently, and determined that for a little while it should be a stable for his mare.

He loosened the girths of the saddle, but did not take it off.

He also removed the bit from her month, though he did not remove the bridle.

The next thing to be done was to obtain some provender.

There was nothing else to be had except the grass upon which she had formerly fed, and some of this he resolved to obtain at once, for, as he rightly enough imagined, there was less probability of his being seen at that early morning hour than if he was to remain till late in the day.

There were two windows in the kitchen, and, going to one, he opened it, and unbarred and unbolted the shutters.

He did not abate his caution, but opened them a little way and peeped out.

Failing to see or hear anything encouraged him to proceed.

Opening them still further, he sprang out into the garden.

Grass was growing in abundance all around him, and in a few moments, he had gathered a very large quantity—enough to last his mare a couple of days at least.

He did this in order to avoid as much as possible the risk which he ran while gathering it.

Having completed his task, he sprang through the window again and carefully closed the shutters after him.

"Now, Bess," he said, "you will do for a time—at least, you are all right; and now to look for the money!"

He was about to leave the kitchen, when his eye suddenly alighted upon an object which caused him to utter a cry of satisfaction.

This was an old-fashioned lamp standing upon a shelf.

He took hold of it instantly, and found that it was thickly covered with dust.

Whether it would burn, after having been disused so long as it evidently had been, was doubtful, and though feeling this, his satisfaction was scarcely, if at all, decreased.

Having secured this unexpected prize, he left the kitchen and closed the door carefully after him, and endeavoured to conceal, as well as he could, all traces of its having been broken open.

There was no necessity to light the lamp at present, for day had fairly begun, and the ample staircase and entrance hall were fully illuminated by the circular skylight in the roof.

Dick Turpin ascended the stairs quickly.

He was impatient to reach that little apartment at the top of the house in which he and his companions had spent so much of their time.

He was doubtful whether he should find the money where he had left it—there was a strong probability that the police officers had made off with the whole.

As he mounted, he looked keenly about him from right to left, but he failed to perceive any signs of the presence of the police officers.

At length he gained the top of the staircase, and entered the apartment with a beating heart.

He saw at a glance that nothing had been disturbed—the place presented exactly the same appearance as when he had last left it.

The money had all been placed in a drawer in the old-fashioned table.

He went up to it, opened the drawer, and then, to his joy, found that the money, which he and his comrades had run to so much risk to obtain, was still there.

His first impulse was to transfer it to his pockets; but as the weight would have been considerable and prove an impediment to motion, he determined, upon second thoughts, to leave it where it was.

"And now," said Dick, as he seated himself in the large arm-chair, "I have got nothing to do but wait for the approach of night, and when it comes I hope that my comrades will come also, for a lengthened stay here would in all probability be dangerous to a degree."

Dick was very weary, and unconsciously sank off into a deep sleep, which continued several hours, and had the effect of refreshing him in no small degree.

His slumbers were not disturbed or broken in upon in any way, and when he awoke he looked around him in some surprise, but he soon remembered where he was.

He felt quite a new man and in readiness to sustain any amount of fatigue.

He went to the window, and looking out, found by an inspection of the sky that it was long past noon.

The exact time he had no means of knowing.

"I have slept a long while," he murmured; "but no matter, I have been in safety, and it has done me good. I will go down now and see whether Black Bess is all right."

Just then his eyes fell upon the lamp on the table, and remembering its condition and the doubts he had had whether it would light, he resolved first of all to remove the dust with which it was covered, and then try the experiment of lighting it.

He trimmed the wick, and unscrewing the upper portion found that the reservoir beneath contained a considerable quantity of oil, which was, however, fast losing its fluid state and becoming solid.

Screwing the top on again, he next took out of his pocket a bottle of phosphorous and some matches.

Dick was too fully impressed with the importance of having the means of obtaining a light to his hand even to be without the little apparatus we have mentioned.

The task of lighting the lamp was a troublesome and tedious one, but eventually he was gratified by finding his efforts crowned with complete success.

Having thus satisfactorily proved that it was possible to light the lamp, he extinguished it, and then proceeded to carry out his original intention of visiting Black Bess.

He took the lamp with him, for he could not tell in what way it might be useful.

Upon reaching the kitchen, he found that Black Bess had made herself quite at home in her new quarters.

He patted and stroked her, and then went to the window.

He did not open it, but listened

The same silence continued, and so he came to the conclusion that the police officers had quite abandoned it.

While listening thus, Dick suddenly remembered the mysterious and awful sounds he had so often heard in the mansion, and the origin of which he had never been able to make out.

He recollected, too, that when the officers made their former attack upon the place, he was just then about to make an exploration of the building, in order to elucidate the mystery.

As the reader is aware, subsequent circumstances prevented him from carrying out his purpose.

"I will have one more trial," he said half aloud as he turned away from the window. "I should have preferred having some one with me when upon such an expedition, in order that I might have a witness to what I say, and so that I might make sure my fancy did not deceive me However, I have now nothing at all to do, and this exploring expedition will serve to pass away the time, that otherwise would hang very heavily upon my hands."

He left the kitchen as he spoke, and hastily ascended the staircase, nor did he pause until he reached the shattered door of the mysterious chamber.

That this was the source from which the horrible sounds had emanated he was quite certain—he had stood on the outside and heard them, therefore it was here where he should look to find the solution of the mystery.

All previous attempts had failed utterly, but he hoped on this occasion by the exercise of great patience and close scrutiny to be able to clear the matter up

He crossed the ante-room without bestowing much examination upon it, and hastened to enter the armoury

Although it was broad day, only a very dim light crept into this place, and though his eyes were accustomed to the obscurity, Dick made up his mind to light the lamp, and so have increased illumination to aid him in his search

He determined to conduct his search in a systematic manner, and so commenced with the wall on his right hand.

He walked on slowly, closely scrutinising it.

But he was unable to detect anything of a singular character more than the strange weapons with which the walls were covered.

Upon many of these, Dick could not help gazing with a great amount of interest.

The collection of arms had evidently been made at great expense and trouble, and specimens had been obtained from every quarter of the globe, and included not only those in use at the time of which we are writing, but those which had been in existence from the earliest periods.

But deeply interested as he was, Dick would not allow himself to be led away from his original purpose.

It took him nearly three hours to go completely round the room, and at the expiration of that time we have mentioned, he reached the door again.

Not a single square inch of the wall, from the floor up to as high as he could see, had escaped his careful observation, and yet he had not been able to discover anything at all calculated to explain the mysterious sounds.

Nor, indeed, did he make any discovery whatever, for the secret door forming an outlet from the armoury he was already aware of the existence of.

Whether that was connected with the mysterious sounds was more than he could tell.

Then he remembered the two figures they had found lying so strangely on the floor.

Thinking it possible that this might afford some clue, he walked towards the spot; but his astonishment may be imagined when he found scarcely a fragment remained.

This puzzled him beyond measure, for he was, of course, ignorant of the fact that Mr. Wriggles and his officers had stumbled and fell over them, thus reducing the two bodies to an almost impalpable powder.

He taxed his brain to the utmost, without being able to satisfy himself precisely as to the cause.

He had no difficulty, however, in coming to the conclusion that there was nothing to be learned in that quarter.

Then, as to the floor of the armoury, that had been examined with the greatest care by himself and his three friends, so it was hardly likely that he would discover anything in that quarter.

Only the secret door remained.

Through this he had already passed, though hastily, and he had made no discovery that would account in any way for the mysterious sounds.

Besides, when they had stood upon the staircase, the cries appeared to come from the ante-room, and this secret door opened from the furthest extremity of the armoury.

As there was nothing left to investigate, Dick was, in a manner of speaking, compelled to pursue his inquiries in this quarter.

Accordingly, he crossed the threshold of the secret door, and paused at the top of the flight of spiral steps.

He looked to see whether there were any steps leading upwards, but found there were none.

"I do not see that much good is to be obtained by descending these steps," he said; "the cries I heard cannot have come from these depths; yet there is something below that I would fain look upon once more, ghastly and horrible as it is."

Dick alluded to the skeleton which he had found chained to the wall of the dungeon.

He went down the steps with the greatest deliberation, looking keenly at the walls as he descended.

Nothing but the rough masonry, however, met his gaze, and once more he found himself in the subterraneous dungeon.

The skeleton was still there, presenting the same appearance as before; but nowhere around him could he find anything to explain who the unfortunate being was or by whose orders he had been chained there, to meet so horrible a death.

Dissatisfied and disappointed at the want of success he had experienced, Dick Turpin set to work to explore the various passages.

But he learned nothing, except that where they branched off, in the manner we have elsewhere described, they proceeded for a short distance and then united.

The bodies of the police officers had all been removed.

In the distance Turpin perceived that faint speck of light which indicated the outlet of the passage; but he did not deem it worth while to go nearer towards it, for fear any police officers should be concealed in the vicinity.

Accordingly, he retraced his steps, and reached the armoury without having made any discovery.

"Is this to remain for ever an unrevealed mystery?" he asked, as he looked around him, at the curious objects on the wall. "Am I fated never to learn what caused those horrible sounds? It seems so; but yet I will make another attempt—not now, however; I will wait until my three companions return, and then, when we are all together, it will be strange indeed if we do not penetrate this mystery, insolvable as it now appears to be."

CHAPTER DLXVI.

DICK TURPIN IS ATTACKED BY POLICE OFFICERS ON THE STAIRCASE OF THE DESERTED MANSION.

ALTHOUGH Dick Turpin spoke these words with great energy and determination, yet there did not seem to be any reasonable prospect of his succeeding in making the discovery he so much wished.

It would be scarcely possible to imagine a closer and more rigid search than that which he had made by himself; nothing had escaped his observation.

The cause which had produced those sounds promised to remain involved in mystery.

The search had occupied several hours, and upon gaining the landing on the staircase, Turpin discovered that night had already set in.

The services of the lamp which he had so fortunately discovered were now absolutely called for, and he looked at its tiny flame with great solicitude, for fear it should not continue to burn long enough to answer his purpose.

On that night Dick felt almost sure his absent friends would return, and when he reached the landing, as we have described, he suddenly changed his mind.

His intention had been to wait in the mansion until they arrived; but considering that he should incur danger by so doing, made him resolve to take up his position somewhere outside.

He could not tell how many officers might be lurking about, and some of them might notice the arrival of the three highwaymen, who would once more find themselves in a perilous situation.

"I am sure that will be my best plan," said Dick. "I will go upstairs and take possession of the money, and then ascend again and hide myself somewhere near the entrance gates, for——"

He ceased suddenly and assumed a listening attitude.

Some trivial sound had broken in upon the intense silence which prevailed in that deserted habitation, and though its cause might be unimportant, yet placed as he was, Dick felt it necessary to take notice of everything.

Holding the lamp so that its light was not so likely to be seen, he bent over the massive balustrade of the staircase and stretched his sense of hearing to the utmost.

The sounds of footsteps and the murmuring of voices came upon his ear.

His first thought was, that they were his enemies endeavouring to steal stealthily upon him and take him by surprise; but the next moment he fancied it was probably his comrades who had returned.

He was the more inclined to think this from the manner in which the persons below were ascending the staircase.

They were neither endeavouring to be silent nor noisy, but were coming up in the most easy, matter-of-fact manner imaginable, and this made Turpin believe that they were not police officers.

Nevertheless, a doubt remained in his mind, and it was very important that this doubt should be completely set at rest.

How to do it appeared no easy matter, but after a moment's thought Turpin stepped noiselessly to one portion of the staircase, from which he could command a tolerable view of the stairs below, for, as we have previously stated, it was a well staircase.

He instantly perceived a faint glimmering light, which rapidly increased in brilliancy.

Still, it was not sufficient to disperse the darkness, and from the position Turpin occupied it looked more like a twinkling star than aught else.

Some of its beams, however, fell upon the apparel of the person who was carrying it, and after a scrutinising glance Dick came to the conclusion that it shone upon the uniform of a police officer.

If he had not been certain of this, his suspicions would quickly have been confirmed, for he heard a voice say:

"Make haste, will you, or it will be sunrise before we reach the top of this d—d staircase!"

As soon as Turpin heard these words he was quite convinced that they were not uttered by either of his three comrades.

They were police officers who were ascending, and he suddenly found himself in a position of great danger.

He could not conceal from himself that the probability was, they had tracked him, by some means or other, to where he now was, and very likely they had entered the kitchen and taken possession of Black Bess.

If this was so, his peril was extreme, for, single handed and deprived of his gallant mare, he could not cope with his foes, who doubtless had assembled in large numbers.

But even if they had not taken possession of Black Bess, how was he to rejoin her? It seemed absolutely impossible.

For a moment he stood there buried in thought.

He was aroused by the rapid ascent of the police officers, who by this time were very close indeed to where he stood.

Then suddenly he thought of the money in the drawer upstairs.

His first impulse was to fly and disregard it, but then, upon second thoughts, he considered it was his duty not to lose the opportunity of carrying off so much booty.

By ascending to the top of the mansion, however, he could not but increase his danger, for, in order to escape, it was necessary to go down.

But being unwilling to lose this large amount or to allow it to fall into the hands of his foes, he turned round, extinguished the lamp, and sped swiftly but noiselessly up the stairs.

In an incredibly short space of time he reached the topmost landing, and glided into the room.

He opened the drawer quickly, and commenced transferring its contents to his pockets.

Nimble as he was, it took him at least two minutes to empty the drawer.

He had his pistols all ready for immediate service, and, without loss of time, stepped out on to the landing again.

What he was to do now seemed a mystery.

To have attempted to descend the stairs, and cut a way through the officers, would have been little short of madness; and ever ready as he was to adopt, in the moment of danger, any desperate expedient, Dick shrunk from attempting this.

The officers, however, were very near the top of the stairs.

They had stopped, for some purpose or other, on one of the lower landings, but now they were ascending again.

Dick looked about him with increasing apprehensiveness, but he was unable to see any means by which he might escape.

On the landing was a huge oak chest.

For what purpose it had been used he knew not, but he had often noticed it, and now resolved to remove it to the top of the staircase, so as to form a barricade.

The chest was a great weight, but it was furnished with a handle at each end.

These Turpin seized alternately, and soon had the chest close to the top of the staircase.

The lumbering sound produced by the removal of this heavy object sounded strangely and alarming in that silent place, and when they first heard it, the officers paused and stood huddled up together.

Quickly recovering from their surprise, however, they hastily rushed up the stairs, but, before they could reach the top, Dick Turpin succeeded in wedging the oak chest in between the banisters in such a manner as to make it a most formidable obstacle to surmount.

"Hold!" he cried, in a voice that made every officer pause—"hold, I say! If you ascend a step higher I will fire both these pistols among you!"

"Dick Turpin," said a voice—"surrender—we have got you this time and no mistake, so you had a damned sight better give in than make a fuss about it—we have you now as safe as a nut!"

"Beware!" said Dick. "I tell you I would rather die a thousand deaths than surrender once! If you attempt to capture me, it will be at your own peril!"

"Come on," said the police officer who had before spoken—"come on—never mind what he says! You will find it will be different when you get up!"

Dick Turpin again glanced about him, but he could see no means by which he could make his escape, and his face assumed a more anxious expression than it usually wore.

It was impossible that he could hold out against so many officers as were on the staircase.

He might prolong the contest, but they must succeed in the end, without assistance came to him, in the shape of his three absent comrades, and this hope was too frail a one to be depended upon for a moment.

"Dick Turpin," said the officer, "our orders are to take you dead or alive, so if you resist, your death will be upon your own head!"

Almost as soon as the words were uttered, a pistol was levelled at the highwayman.

Dick just saw the movement of the officer's hand, and then heard the report.

He stood perfectly still.

He was aware that, as he had heard the report, he was at the most, only wounded.

The treacherous manner in which the shot had been fired exasperated him greatly, and, acting upon the impulse of the moment, he pulled the triggers of the two pistols he held in his hands.

A loud report ensued, followed by cries of pain from below, and then the officers fired two more shots.

Turpin found that his position at the head of the staircase was untenable, and so taking advantage of the blue smoke that was curling about in every direction, he retreated, as he thought, in the direction of the room from which he had just emerged.

But in the excitement of the moment he made a mistake and found himself near one of the other doors opening from the landing, the threshold of which he had not yet crossed.

He turned the handle, but the door remained firm in its setting.

By dashing himself suddenly against it, however, he caused it to fly open.

This door opened upon a staircase, and it was a thousand wonders Dick did not lose his balance.

He saved himself by clutching the handle, and then he closed the door behind him.

At first he was at a loss to understand where he was.

Stairs were below him evidently, but to what part of the house they led, he was at a loss to imagine.

He commenced descending them, however, without pausing to consider where they might take him; he only knew he was getting further from his foes.

The fact was, as Dick soon found, that the staircase he was descending, was the one that had been used by the domestics at the time when the house was inhabited.

In all such mansions, it is usual to have two staircases, one the grand staircase, for the use of visitors and the occupiers of the building, and the other, a back staircase, by which the servants could ascend to the upper rooms.

The officers, observing Dick Turpin retreating, scrambled over the oak chest in the best way they were able, but they found it a rather awkward obstacle to surmount.

By chance they pushed open the door at the top of the staire, and, as they carried a light, they saw at once what kind of place it was.

They could hear Dick Turpin hastily descending, and fired a volley of bullets after him.

Fortunately our hero had turned an angle in the stairs, and the bullets were buried in the woodwork or flattened against the walls.

This report caused Dick to descend with still greater speed.

Directly they had fired, the officers rushed pell-mell down the staircase.

Dick, however, had a good start, and coming presently to a door, he closed it, and bolted it on the inner side.

This would prove some hindrance to the progress of his pursuers, and furnish him with at least one chance more of making his escape.

The time occupied in doing this was really insignificant, and Dick again flew down the staircase at his utmost speed.

He now began to grow very anxious to know where this staircase led, but scarcely dared to hope that it would bring him near the kitchen in which he had placed Black Bess.

All around him was profoundly dark, and the manner in which he descended the stairs was reckless to a degree.

Suddenly, however, he was brought to an abrupt stop.

He had reached the bottom of the staircase unexpectedly, and did not see the door that was placed at the foot of it.

The first intimation he received of its presence was by coming with full force against it.

He was bruised, and for the space of several seconds half stunned.

Recovering himself, and exactly comprehending his position, he dashed himself against the door.

It flew open instantly, for the fastenings had been, to some extent, deranged by the violence with which he had before come in contact with it.

He stood perfectly still, and strained his eyes, endeavouring to pierce the darkness with which he was surrounded.

The attempt was a vain one, however, and then suddenly he heard a sharp ringing sound, which he immediately recognised.

Then his ears were saluted by a low, but well-known neigh, and at that moment he felt something soft touch him upon the breast.

"Black Bess!" he exclaimed, in a tone of incredulous joy—"Black Bess! I have found her; she is safe—surely now I shall escape!"

He patted her on the neck, and then with nervous haste tightened the saddle-girths and placed the bit in her mouth.

While he was so occupied a tremendous crash came upon his ears, and was instantly followed by the sound of footsteps rapidly descending the staircase.

CHAPTER DLXVII.

DICK TURPIN'S POSITION IN THE DESERTED MANSION INCREASES IN PERIL AND INTEREST.

THE presence of the police officers at the deserted mansion at this juncture, and the peculiar manner in which they had entered the premises, may seem not a little strange to the reader.

A very few words, however, will serve to explain their presence on this occasion, and place the reader in possession of some facts necessary to be known.

It will be remembered that after Mr. Wriggles's attack upon Dick Turpin in the garden, he had galloped off in pursuit with several of his men, leaving Jim Lickfold lying on the ground in a desperate condition.

In common with the rest who were wounded and dead, he was carried away from the scene of conflict, and placed at a public-house on Finchley Road, where his hurts were properly attended to.

Most of the officers, himself included, had not been wounded very seriously, so, after their hurts were properly dressed, they very quickly recovered.

It was towards the close of that day, and about the time when Dick Turpin was engaged in exploring the armoury, that Jim Lickfold and several of his companions, feeling very much better—almost well, in fact—were seated in a room set aside for their use in the public-house we have just mentioned.

"Well!" said Jim Lickfold, addressing his companions, "I'm damned if we have not brought our pigs to a fine market, though we might have been worse off than we are. Curse that Dick Turpin say I, and all his crew! and no one will rejoice more than I shall when the day comes for him to be scragged!"

The other officers murmured an assent, for the pain they had experienced from their wounds had produced in their breasts a very strong feeling against the highwayman.

"Well, mates!" said Jim Lickfold, "if you feel pretty well, I have got something to propose to you that I think you will like. I made a bungling mistake, and got a good many of you into trouble, and I am anxious to atone for it if I possibly can; so if you feel well enough to go out upon a little expedition this very night, I will tell you at once what I have to propose, and which you will find will turn very much to your advantage."

"Hear, hear!" cried the other police officers. "Go on, Jim! We are all attention!"

"But are you well enough for a little expedition, do you think?"

"Oh, yes—yes!"

"Well, I am myself, and so I thought you were. To begin, then. While I have been laid up, I have been thinking matters over a great deal, and I have come to the conclusion that the highwaymen had taken up their quarters in that blessed old mansion for some time before we happened to disturb them."

"But we only found Dick Turpin," said one. "Where do you think the others are?"

"That's more than I can tell. Of course they are off on an excursion somewhere. However, that's nothing to do with what I was going to say."

"Proceed, then."

"Now, I think you'll admit that we rather took Dick Turpin by surprise that night when we broke in and attacked him."

"Well, I should rather say we did, judging by what took place."

"Very well, then, if they have taken up their quarters there for any length of time—and I feel sure they have—you may depend upon it that somewhere or other in the old place they have a great deal of booty concealed. Now, as we took Dick Turpin by surprise, it's pretty certain that he did not carry it away with him, so I should say the probability is, that the booty is there still. I dare say you understand what I am going to propose—it's that we should wait till night comes, and then slip off to the deserted mansion, get in, and have a good hunt for this booty. If we find it, why we will divide it equally among ourselves, and nobody need be any the wiser."

By the manner of the police officers, it was easy to see that they highly relished the proposition which Jim Lickfold had made, and they, one and all, signified the utmost willingness to assist him to carry it out.

They were absolutely frantic to start, when Jim said:

"I should not feel a bit surprised if we were to find a thousand pounds there. Very likely we should find a great deal more, but suppose we find that amount—well, there are five of us—so that would be just a couple of hundred pounds a-piece, and all I can say is, that such a sum would be very acceptable to me."

All Jim's companions were of the same way of thinking, and they were delighted beyond measure at the prospect of obtaining so large a sum at one stroke.

Jim was determined to clench the matter, so he added:

"You see, mates, the best of it is that there is no danger and very little trouble. All we shall have to do, as I said before, will be to make our way to the deserted mansion, creep in through the window, and then we can spend the night in searching the place over."

"But," said one of the officers, whose valour had cooled considerably since the wound he had last received, "suppose we should find some of the highwaymen there—how then?"

"That is not in the least degree probable," said Jim Lickfold. "The other three, you may depend, have taken the alarm long before this, and would never think of coming near the place, for fear there should be some officers guarding it. Then, as for Dick Turpin, we all know very well that old Wriggles is on his track, and he will have quite enough to do to look after his own safety. No—no, mates, there will be no danger of that sort. We shall have the place all to ourselves."

"Then," said one of the others, "I consider that it is no more than right, as Jim has put us up to this, which we should never have thought of ourselves, that he should have the largest share when the money is divided."

"No—no!" said Jim. "Share and share alike is my motto! I might be inclined to accept something extra under any other circumstances than the present, but I want to make some atonement for my stupid blunder, which caused so many of you to be wounded."

Several of the officers had looked rather frowningly upon him since he made the mistake referred to, but now they quite changed their demeanour, and one of them said:

"We do not blame you, Jim—not a bit. It was more old Wriggles's fault than yours. I only wish that we were ordered out under your command instead of his; we should get on a damned sight better than we do!"

"We should," said Jim, sinking his voice to a whisper, "for between ourselves, my private opinion is that old Wriggles is a fool!"

"So he is—so he is!"

"Well, now, as this matter is agreed upon, just take my advice a little further—have something good to drink, and fortify yourselves against the cold, and I'll warrant to say that before the sun rises to-morrow, we shall be all a couple of hundred pounds richer than we are at this moment."

The enthusiasm of the officers now rose to its highest pitch, and they looked upon Jim Lickfold as being the very best fellow in existence.

More drink was brought in, and the time between then and nightfall was occupied in consuming it, and arranging their plan of proceeding.

"Now mates," said Jim, "of course we don't know no more than a stump whereabouts this booty is; but it is in the house somewhere, I feel convinced. Now, I have got one way of searching a house, and I shall always stick to it, without some one else can show me a better."

"What is it, Jim?"

"Why, when I get into the house, I go right away upstairs to the top of it, and then I begin my search, going carefully over the top floor first, then descending to the next floor, and so on, till I come to the cellars, or find what I am looking for. It may seem the longest way about, but if it is slow it is sure."

"So it is, Jim!" cried the rest. "There couldn't be a better plan! You shall have the direction of the affair from first to last!"

"All right, mates, and though I say it myself, as shouldn't, still it's my opinion you've acted very wisely. If anybody can carry out the affair successfully, I can!"

By the time night fairly came, the officers had all imbibed just enough to make them right for the undertaking they were about to set out upon.

They loaded and primed their pistols, and made every preparation.

With Jim Lickfold at their head they set out for the deserted mansion.

Their astute leader, who was familiar with every inch of the ground in the neighbourhood, took them straight across the fields to their destination, so that they reached it in a very short space of time indeed.

Jim remembered quite well where the little window was situated at which he had seen Maud make her appearance, so he did not pause until he stood before it.

"Now, then," he said, "this is the way! Scramble through after me! There is no particular hurry, you know; but still, we need not lose time; and take my word for it, we have got the place all to ourselves!"

This the officers all believed, and so they scrambled through the window into the little apartment, where Jim Lickfold lighted a wax taper.

They then passed out into the passage; and had their leader made up his mind to commence his search at the bottom of the house instead of the top, why then he would have discovered Black Bess in the kitchen.

But things were ordained otherwise.

He knew the way to the staircase, so, calling out to his men to follow him, he led the way towards it, and commenced to ascend.

The dreary, supernatural kind of silence which always filled the mansion, produced an effect upon the officers, who instinctively and unconsciously lowered their voices and walked with noiseless footfall.

[MR. WRUGGLES MAKES MAUD A PRISONER.]

It was while they were ascending in this manner that Dick Turpin first caught sight of them.

With what happened afterwards the reader has already been made acquainted.

Dick Turpin ascended the stairs, went into the room, pocketed the gold, and came out on the landing again without the officers having the remotest suspicion that there was any oneelse beneath the roof save themselves.

The lumbering of the chest as Dick dragged it from its place came upon their ears with startling suddenness, and several of the most timid felt inclined to beat an immediate retreat, for they imagined the sound had some supernatural origin.

There was very little superstition, however, about Jim Lickfold.

He generally saw through a thing at once, and his reflection was that Dick Turpin had come back for the money, and had managed to get there first.

This enraged him greatly.

It was Jim, then, who had spoken to Dick Turpin about taking him dead or alive, and then immediately fired a pistol point-blank at him.

Jim was in hopes that by this course he should put an end to the affair.

As previously related, they scrambled over the oak chest as soon as Dick Turpin beat a retreat, and followed him to the top of the stairs.

Down these they descended, until they were brought to a stop by the door which Dick Turpin had managed to close.

Now, my boys!" said Jim, "you promised to leave the direction of this affair in my hands, so don't hesitate to obey my commands, and we shall not only get the money I have spoken of, but the reward for Dick Turpin as well!"

"We will obey!"

"Good, then—as there are five of us, two shall remain here, and batter down this door; I will go with the other two down the great staircase and out into the garden. You drive him to one of the windows—we will be on the look-out with our pistols in our hands and as soon as he makes his appearance we will fire at him, and pop-down he will go!"

Hastily calling two men to follow him, Jim Lickfold hastened down the grand staircase, while the others set to work to demolish the door.

Jim and his two companions jumped out of the window into the garden, and then, panting and excited, with their pistols clutched nervously in their hands, they watched for Dick Turpin to make his appearance.

The others in the meanwhile broke down the door, and descended the steps leading to the kitchen.

Before they could reach it, however, Dick Turpin had got Black Bess all ready.

The kitchen window was already open, and all he had to do was to withdraw the bolts of the shutters and push them back upon their hinges.

Then, at the word of command, he felt sure Black Bess would leap with him into the garden.

Holding her thus in readiness to mount, and not dreaming that the officers were watching outside, Dick with drew the bolt and flung open the shutters.

Jim Lickfold heard the slight sound which this produced, and saw the shutters fly open.

He guessed what was coming, and rushed towards the kitchen window.

Dick's movements were very rapid, and before the police officers on the staircase could reach the kitchen, he had sprang into the saddle, and, pressing his heels close against the flanks of his bonny mare, he bent low down upon her neck, and urged her forward by his usual cry

Black Bess responded willingly to the signal.

With a rush she flew onward, and leaped through the window with a bound.

Jim Lickfold and his companions had not expected quite such a sudden movement, nevertheless they quickly recovered from their surprise, and fired.

But their aim was hasty and unsteady, and failed to do the smallest amount of damage.

Then the other officers appeared at the window of the kitchen, and they, too, fired a volley at the flying forms of the highwayman and his steed

CHAPTER DLXVIII.

DICK TURPIN WAITS IN VAIN FOR THE APPEARANCE OF HIS ABSENT COMRADES.

THE police officers were all unprovided with horses, so that, to commence a pursuit after Dick Turpin, was quite out of the question.

Jim Lickfold was furious when he saw Dick Turpin disappear among the trees, apparently none the worse for the many shots that were fired after him.

Those officers who were in the kitchen, however, quickly scrambled through the window, and were rushing off in pursuit, when Jim called them back.

"Where are you going to, you damned fools?" he asked. "What good can you do, I wonder? He has again slipped through our hands! I made sure of the reward this time!"

The officers looked rather crestfallen at each other, and then one, assuming a philosophic air, said:

"Well, I suppose we must make the best we can of a bad job! You know, when we started, we never thought of finding Dick Turpin. We came to fetch the money. Let us go and get it, and return."

"Fool—idiot!" roared Jim Lickfold. "What chance do you think we have got of obtaining the money now he has been beforehand with us? We ought to have been here last night!"

"Then, do you think he has actually been and carried away the money with him?"

"I don't think anything at all about it," was the reply "I am quite sure. What else do you imagine would induce him to run the risk of returning to this place? Of course he's fetched the money, and we have lost that as well as the reward!"

"Then, what are we to do?"

"Don't ask me! for I'm damned if I know or care. I suppose we had better sneak back to the public-house, like so many dogs with burnt tails!"

"We might as well have a search through the mansion," said another police officer. "We may have disturbed him too soon—he may not have had time to get the money, although he intended to do so."

Jim shook his head.

"Don't fill yourself up with that idea," he replied. "However, we will have a hunt through the old place, and if we do not find the booty, we may light upon something that will pay us for our trouble better than nothing."

This was assented to, and the whole party once more passed into the mansion.

In the meanwhile, Dick Turpin had not gone far.

It would have been the easiest matter in the world for him to have placed a very considerable distance between himself and his enemies; but on the present occasion he could not do so.

He was compelled to remain hovering around that spot.

He reined-in Black Bess just under the shadow of the tall hedgerow which skirted the narrow lane leading from the high-road to the dilapidated gates.

It was necessary that he should warn his companions, and he most ardently wished that they would quickly make their return, for the longer he remained lingering around that spot, the more dangerous it would be to him and to them too.

Dick listened; but he could hear no sounds indicating the approach of mounted travellers, so, with something like a sigh, he turned his eyes in the direction of the deserted mansion.

From where he was he could see the upper portions of it distinctly.

He was rather surprised that he should hear nothing further of the police officers.

He made sure they would have commenced a pursuit, and did not know that the reason why they did not was because they were unprovided with horses.

During the darkness, he would not have much difficulty.

But how was he to watch for the return of his comrades during the daytime?

More than once he felt inclined to set out towards the New Forest himself, to endeavour to meet them; but a little reflection soon showed him that this would be perfectly useless.

He was unable to form any idea whether they were near or far away from London, and it was equally impossible for him to say by which road they might return.

In all probability it would be a devious, circuitous one, and if so, the chances of his meeting with them were slight indeed.

He was therefore compelled to abandon this intention.

The prospect of remaining behind the hedge on the watch during the remainder of the night was anything but a pleasant one, but that seemed the only thing that he could do

He did not remain all the time in one place, but allowed Black Bess to walk up and down the meadow, taking care to keep all the while close under the hedge, in order to guard as much as possible against fear of discovery.

He heard nothing of the officers for a long while.

At length the sound of footsteps came to his ears, and, pausing in his lonely walk up and down, he peered through the hedge, and saw them slowly walking along the road.

They appeared to be very much aggravated about something, and in an ill temper with everything in general, for they snapped and snarled at each other like so many wild animals.

The fact was, they had had a long and fatiguing search through the mansion, and had failed to find anything of value that was in any way portable.

Jim Lickfold was generally right in coming to his conclusions, but not always.

His belief was at this moment that Dick Turpin was many miles away, and he would have laughed outright in the person's face who told him the bold highwayman was lurking so close at hand.

Dick Turpin watched them pass by, and listened to their retreating footsteps with feelings of very great satisfaction.

The coast was now clear, and his friends would not run quite so much danger when they made their return.

Dick waited about this spot until sunrise without seeing or hearing a fellow-creature, and, at last, when the sun rose higher and higher in the heavens, he was compelled to quit the position he had taken up, and look around him for some place where he could remain in secret during the day.

There was little probability that his three comrades would return during daylight, if they were ever so close at hand.

They would betake themselves to some shelter until night closed in.

Dick hesitated a great deal before he could decide upon a hiding-place.

The idea of returning to the deserted mansion was by no means pleasant, though, after what had happened it was less likely than ever that the police officers would return to it.

Still there was no coming to any certain conclusion, whether they would or not.

Of the two, he preferred not to take up his quarters under its roof.

Between the dilapidated gates and the mansion itself, the trees grew very thickly together, and between the trunks of the trees was a dense mass of underwood, which would serve to conceal very many persons

This was the best place he could think of, and towards it he accordingly made his way.

He plunged right in among the trees, and halted on a spot where they grew more closely together than elsewhere.

He had been compelled to dismount and lead Black Bess by the bridle; and having now decided upon his resting-place, he slipped the reins over her head and held them in his hand, by this means allowing her to graze, and, at the same time, prevent her from straying off.

Dick laid himself down at full length, stretching his sense of hearing to the utmost, so as to be aware at the earliest moment of the approach of his friends or foes.

The very intentness with which he listened had the effect of drawing him off into a sleep.

In less than half an hour he was insensible to all around him, and would have been an easy prey to the police officers, had they but been acquainted with his whereabouts.

The day passed away however, without anyone coming near to disturb him; and when he at length opened his eyes he was astonished to find that it was rapidly growing dusk.

He had had some disagreeable dreams, and was glad enough to shake off the slumber which had so unconsciously stole upon him.

But even when he was wide awake he could not altogether divest himself of the unpleasant sensation which his dreams occasioned.

His mind seemed to be filled with some vague kind of alarm, but of what character he could not tell

He was conscious that danger was impending, but whether it was over himself, or over his comrades, he failed to decide.

He rose to his feet and listened for some time, but, reassured by the profound silence, he ventured to draw still nearer to the dilapidated gates.

"This will be as good a place as any to remain on guard during the night," he said. "If I could but find the fallen trunk of a tree, or something of that sort, the time would pass more pleasantly."

Searching about, it was not many minutes before he found a fallen tree, and on this he seated himself.

On this occasion he was ten times more anxious and impatient for the arrival of his comrades than before, but there seemed no more signs of their coming.

His quarters this night were more gloomy than before; still, as it was a matter of duty, he stuck to his post bravely.

At last, just as the moon was beginning to show herself above the horizon, the welcome sound of horses' hoofs upon the roadway reached his ear.

He started up and listened with great delight, but soon the expression of his countenance changed.

It assumed an anxious look, for he could tell long before he caught sight of the approaching horsemen that they were not his friends.

There must have been six or eight horses coming.

He changed his position a little, and was then able to command a view of the gates.

He fixed his eyes upon them, and presently a troop of police officers trotted through them into the avenue leading up to the deserted mansion.

Little dreaming that Dick Turpin was so close at hand, they trotted past his place of concealment, and with great rapidity making their way direct towards the building.

As soon as they had all passed him by and got to a reasonable distance, Dick Turpin thought his most prudent course would be to change his quarters, and accordingly he did so.

Forcing a passage through the trees, he once more emerged into the meadow where he had stationed himself on the preceding night.

What the police intended to do, and why they had gone to the deserted mansion was more than he could conjecture, though he tried hard to come to a conclusion upon the subject.

It was, however, perfectly certain that the necessity of his remaining somewhere close by, in order to warn his companions of their danger, was more than ever necessary.

Without he communicated the intelligence to them they would never dream for a moment that the police had taken up their quarters in the deserted mansion, and so they would run blindly into their power.

To Dick's infinite annoyance and anxiety, hour after hour passed away without his three comrades making their appearance.

He was on the watch the whole of the time, and he kept making the reflection every moment, that in a little while longer they would surely come.

But he was destined to perpetual disappointment, and finally morning again dawned and the sun rose without either of them making their appearance.

Dick now became fearfully anxious.

The time required for the expedition was over, he made every calculation as to the probable interruptions they would meet with on their journey, and yet they ought to have been back at least three days before.

The disagreeable conviction stole on him that they must have fallen into the hands of their foes; and if so, where were they?—what had happened?—how was he to learn any intelligence concerning them?

Every moment made his alarm increase.

Once more he was compelled to seek a hiding-place among the trees, but this time the forgetfulness of sleep was denied him.

The officers had certainly not left the deserted mansion—at least, if they were not beneath its roof they were somewhere close at hand.

It may be said with perfect safety that this day seemed the longest that Dick had ever passed.

As time passed by his perplexity increased.

It will be remembered that he had promised to rejoin Maud before dawn on the morning which would follow the coming night; but if his companions failed to arrive, how was he to keep his word.

At one time he determined as soon as night came to leave the vicinity of the deserted mansion and make some inquiries respecting his three friends.

But supposing they should return during his absence—which was very probable—how then?

Some means must be adopted by which they could be made aware of the danger of going farther; but how was this to be done?

The question was a puzzling one, and Dick taxed his brain for many hours in the endeavour to find the answer to it.

Many things suggested themselves to his mind, but not one pleased him.

Of whatever the warning might consist, it would be necessary that it should be conspicuous, or his friends would pass it by; but then, on the other hand, if it was conspicuous it would be seen by the police officers, and they would doubtless take care to remove it.

When night came he was no nearer the solution of the difficulty than he was at first, and he determined to wait until midnight, and so give them one more chance of returning.

Slowly the hours passed away, until midnight came, still there were no signs of Dick's missing comrades.

"I can wait here no longer," he said, starting to his feet; "besides, I am sick and faint with anxiety and hunger. I must leave some notice or other to warn them, and then I will set out with the hope that I may succeed in meeting them."

Dick led Black Bess towards the dilapidated gates, and then, as he gazed upon them, he murmured:

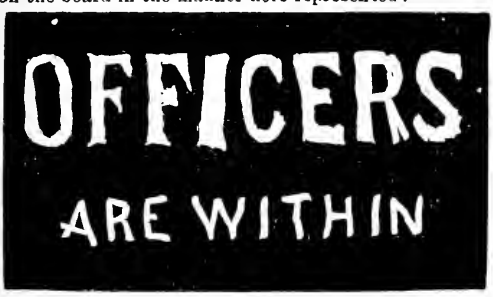
"If I could but fix some notice on them—something that would attract their attention as they were passing by and warn them of the peril of going further, I should be content. I remember now, there is a board upon which many years ago some notice or other was painted. All three of my comrades are well aware of its existence; it is large, and they cannot fail to see it. I will cut something upon it with my knife. If the police officers see it they will understand the warning intended to be conveyed, and will probably remove it; if they do, surely my comrades will notice its removal, and perchance that might put them on their guard."

Dick was aware that this was but an inefficient warning, yet he could not think of a better one, and he felt that to remain there any longer was simply impossible.

CHAPTER DLXIX.

DICK TURPIN HEARS UNEXPECTED AND TERRIBLE INTELLIGENCE AT THE FARM-HOUSE.

After making sure that no one was about, Dick Turpin crept towards the gates and paused before the board to which he had alluded.



He continued to hold Black Bess by the bridle, so that if an interruption of any sort should ensue, it would be the easiest matter imaginable for him to spring into the saddle and gallop off, and so make his escape.

"I wish I could think of some better plan," he murmured as he took out his knife from his pocket. "I am afraid this warning will be insufficient, and yet as the board is black the letters I shall cut on it will appear white and will show out with great distinctness. I fancy, after all, they will see the notice, especially as they always draw rein before they pass through the gates."

Dick Turpin opened his knife and stood for a moment or so reflectively wondering what word he should cut upon the board that would convey his intended meaning.

He did not want his warning to be of too vague a character, lest it should be disregarded or improperly understood. What he wished was, if possible, to make his companions aware of the precise nature of the danger with which they were threatened.

After a little hesitation, he cut the following words on the board in the manner here represented:—

The word "officers" occupied nearly the whole of the board, and, as Dick had anticipated, the white letters showed out very conspicuously upon the black ground, so that they would meet the eye even on a dark night.

"If they catch sight of that word," he said, "they will stop, and by looking more closely they will easily see the others, and after such an intimation they will surely not venture to enter."

Having completed his work, Dick mounted, and going away for a few yards, returned to the gate, and was really surprised to notice how conspicuous the white letters looked.

"I can do no more," he said, "and I hope that the services of that board will not be required. I am in hopes that I shall meet them before daylight, and then we can all four push on to the farm-house where I have left Maud."

Although Dick believed that Maud was in absolute safety, yet, if the truth must be told, he felt quite as anxious to see her as his companions, for whenever he thought about her there was an uneasy feeling at his heart, for which he could not account.

A few minutes took him clear of the lane, and then he pushed onwards along the road which he imagined would most probably be selected by his friends.

He had to use the greatest caution in his progress, for he particularly wished to avoid being seen by anyone, and more than once he had to conceal himself behind the hedgerows, in order to avoid being discovered by one of the troops of dragoons who still continued their dreary task of patrolling the roads.

Dick went for some distance without halting, but at length he was compelled to pause, in consequence of the deathlike faintness that occasionally came over him, consequent upon his having gone so many hours without food.

He did not like the idea of stopping at one of the roadside inns, but no other place seemed likely to offer itself.

At last, however, he came in sight of a small cottage, from one of the windows of which, much to his surprise—for the hour was a late one—there came a feeble beam of light.

He made his way towards it, and after reconnoitring a little, went boldly up to the door and knocked.

Some moments elapsed before any notice was taken of his summons, and just when he was upon the point of repeating it, the door was opened.

A young woman, with a pale, sad-looking face, appeared upon the threshold.

She looked upon Dick with an inquiring, half-frightened expression.

Noticing this, he endeavoured to reassure her.

"My good woman," he said, "I have travelled many miles upon urgent business, and am now almost faint with hunger. Give me something to eat, and allow me to remain for a few moments, and I will reward you liberally for your trouble."

"Come in, sir," said the young woman—"you are quite welcome! The best I have in the cottage shall be placed before you, and I will charge you only its exact value. I would not do that, but I am very poor, and cannot afford to be as hospitable as I could wish."

Dick was well pleased with the answer he received, and dismounted from Black Bess, leaving her, according to his custom, to wander about wherever she thought proper.

There was a perceptible degree of sadness in the manner in which this young woman spoke and invited Dick to seat himself.

In a few moments a plain but wholesome repast was placed before him, of which he partook hastily and eagerly.

"You will excuse me, sir," said the young woman, "if I leave you here while I go upstairs? No doubt you are surprised to find me up at this late hour of the night; but my husband is very ill, and is in the room above. I am afraid he is dying; the doctor told me to-day that there was no hope."

The poor creature buried her face in her apron, and left the room weeping bitterly.

"Dick did not feel very comfortable in his present quarters. A weight seemed to hang upon his spirits, and the gloomy feeling which had entered his heart some hours ago rapidly increased.

Therefore, he dispatched his meal as rapidly as he could.

Dick glanced around the cottage walls with a heavy heart.

He could see that almost every article that could be spared had been removed, and he had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the furniture and other articles had been made away with, either to pay the surgeon, or else to obtain such luxuries for the sick man as might have been ordered.

Dick Turpin was ever ready to relieve distress, and especially such distress as he now beheld.

He had plenty of money, and so, plunging his hands into both his pockets, he took as many guineas as he could grasp, and placed them upon the table.

He pushed all the glittering coins close together, and then covered them over with his plate.

Just as he had finished doing so, the young woman entered the room again.

She was still weeping, though evidently she strove hard to restrain her sobs and tears.

"Is your husband better?" asked Dick, in a kind voice.

"I cannot tell, sir," was the reply. "I am afraid to think he is, lest my disappointment should be greater. He appears no worse, and slumbering quietly."

"Then there is room for hope," said Dick. "Do not be so downcast. Many thanks for your kind hospitality. Good night! Look under the plate, and you will see that I have shown my appreciation of your kindness in the best way I could think of. Good night!"

He left the cottage abruptly as he spoke, and, scrambling his mare, he once more sprang upon her back and rode away.

Surely that was one good deed done, and one that would redound to his credit.

On that occasion, Dick was more ready than ever to sympathise with the woman, for he fancied that her heart, heavy as it was, was scarce heavier than his own.

Already he had travelled many miles, for Black Bess had come quickly, and yet he had failed to discover any signs of those he had longed to see, and his suspicion that they had fallen into danger and been captured by their enemies strengthened, until it almost became a conviction.

In one hour more, or perhaps even less, the dawn would come, and he felt anxious beyond measure to keep his appointment with Maud; if he failed, not only would she suffer much from disappointment, and the thousand natural fears that would fill her heart, but he was unable to tell what mischief might result.

Finding he did not return, she might conclude that he had been captured, and leave her present place of security to go in search of him; then who could estimate the danger that would follow, and the many difficulties that would be in the way of their meeting again?

"I must trust to the efficiency of the warning I have set up," said Dick. "It is very possible that I have passed them, and that ere this they may have arrived at the deserted mansion. I may be altogether on the wrong track, and therefore it is foolish for me to continue. No, I must gallop across the country to the farm-house."

Anxious as he was to see Maud, yet he felt strangely reluctant to leave the high-road on which he had been travelling; and, after he had done so, he fancied, if he had kept on only a little longer, he should have met his friends and then all would have been well.

These were but fancies, however, and he was surprised to find how much he was affected by them.

He allowed the reins to fall loosely upon the neck of Black Bess, and she galloped along the lanes and across the country roads at such a speed as she very rarely put forth, and yet at every bound she took, Dick felt his uneasiness increase and his heart grow heavier and heavier.

It was in vain he made up his mind to shake off these feelings, and it was equally in vain that he attempted to carry his resolution into effect.

Gradually, a faint light appeared in the east; but yet, at the rate he was now travelling, he would almost be able to keep his promise; at any rate, if no accident occurred, he felt certain he should be able to reach the farm-house before sunrise.

Nor was he deceived.

Upon gaining the top of the hill, he looked down and saw it beneath him; and when he observed how peaceful all appeared, and what an air of repose was on the whole scene, he felt angry with himself for having given way as he had to what he now considered foolish fears.

He only paused on the top of the hill long enough to enable Black Bess to recover her wind, then he began the descent.

He paused at the little gate and looked around him.

As he had exceeded his time, he thought it very likely that Maud might be waiting somewhere near to join him, but, although he turned his eyes in every direction, he could not catch sight of her.

This gave him but slight uneasiness.

The gate was fastened, and, as it would have taken some time to open it in the ordinary manner, he resolved to take the nearest way, so, backing Black Bess a few yards, he made her leap over it.

The farm-house was as yet some distance off, and from some cause or other Dick approached slowly—he fancied it was because he expected to see Maud somewhere in the grounds.

Suddenly in the distance he caught sight of a female figure running hastily towards him.

In the uncertain morning light, and at that distance, it was not possible for him to see with certainty whether it was Maud who was approaching, but he jumped to the conclusion that it was no one else.

He reined-in his steed and alighted, for he wished that their first meeting and interchange of words should take place at a distance from the farm-house, and in a spot where there was no fear of being overheard.

But as the female figure came closer, Dick noted, with a surprise that quickly changed into apprehension, that it was not Maud who was approaching, but some one else.

At first he could scarcely believe himself, but, looking again, he found that he had made no mistake.

It was a young girl who was coming, and certainly in a straight line to him, as though she had something to communicate.

As she drew nearer, Dick recognised her as being the daughter of the farmer.

All those forebodings of coming ill which he had experienced throughout the night now came thronging back with redoubled violence, and he clutched Black Bess tightly by her flowing mane in order to support himself.

After the lapse of another moment the girl arrived.

Her whole appearance betokened the greatest fright and agitation.

Her face was white and rigid, and her hands clasped.

"Fly—fly!" she said, in a hysterical voice,—"fly while you have time—while there is yet a chance! Fly—fly at once!"

All objects seemed suddenly to swim before Turpin's eyes.

"What has happened?" he asked. "Speak out, I pray you—let me know at once the extent of my danger? Why should I fly?"

"There are officers in the farm-house!" cried the girl,—"I expect them to make their appearance every moment! If they see you, you are lost! Fly, then—fly, or they will kill you!"

"I cannot go," said Dick, "without my companion goes with me."

The girl burst out into tears.

"Alas—alas!" she said,—"that is impossible—she is gone!"

"Gone?" cried Dick, in a voice of the greatest dismay and consternation,—"impossible! Where can she have gone?"

A wild scream thrilled from the lips of the young girl, by way of reply, and then she said:

"I feared this—I feared this! It is too late—look! they are here!"

Dick Turpin looked in the direction in which the young girl pointed, and then he caught sight of a troop of mounted police officers, whose arms and accoutrements glittered brightly as the rays of the rising sun shone full upon them.

He gazed in a species of stupefaction, making no effort to mount his steed—making no effort to escape, and only murmuring to himself continually:

"Gone—gone!"

CHAPTER DLXX.

MR. WRIGGLES PLANS AN ELABORATE SCHEME FOR THE CAPTURE OF DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES.

In order that what follows may be properly understood, it is necessary that we should revert to the proceedings of Mr. Wriggles and his band.

It will be remembered that Dick Turpin distanced his pursuers soon after leaving Mr. Tuttle's residence; but although he had lost sight of the flying highwayman, Mr. Wriggles did not abandon the chase.

In spite of the apparent uselessness of doing so, he kept on at the best speed his horses could make.

It soon became evident that he had completely lost the track, but still at a venture he kept straight on, hoping ere long to discover something that could put him on the scent again.

Curiously enough, he followed almost in the footsteps of Dick Turpin.

It was on the morning following the night when Dick Turpin had taken his departure from the farm-house, that Mr. Wriggles and his officers halted at the top of the hill that was close by.

From this elevated spot he surveyed the scene around him, but though he looked closely at every object, he failed to perceive any signs of those he sought.

The farm-house was the only habitation in sight, and Mr. Wriggles thought it was just possible that Turpin had halted there.

At any rate, he resolved to make inquiries, so descended the hill.

Upon reaching the little wooden gate we have so often had occasion to mention, he saw coming towards it from the direction of the homestead, a man who was mounted on a strong, rough-looking cob.

This was no other than the farmer himself, who had been so cleverly imposed upon by Dick Turpin.

When he saw the body of mounted police officers clustering round the gate, he felt rather alarmed and wondered what was the matter.

He was somewhat reassured when he saw Mr. Wriggles take off his hat and make a bow.

But he stopped when within about a yard of the gate.

Mr. Wriggles took from his pocket a short ebony staff with a gilt crown at the top of it, which in those days was carried by police officers as an emblem of their authority.

"Good morning, Mr. Farmer," said Wriggles. "I want to ask you a few questions."

"What is it, Mr. Officer?"

"You see this staff," said Mr. Wriggles, waving it in the air. "We are here in special pursuit of Dick Turpin the highwayman."

"Lor! now you don't say so? He isn't in these parts, surely?"

"I fancy he is! Have you seen him?"

"Not I, and I don't want."

"Have you seen any strangers about within the last day or so?"

"Well, no particular strangers that I know of, except a soldier that rode to the door of my house just when I was sitting down to breakfast yesterday morning."

"A soldier!" cried Mr. Wriggles, quickly. "What sort of a one—describe him? Had he a woman with him?"

"Yes, he had."

"Then it's him!"

"Who?"

"Dick Turpin!"

"No—no, Mr. Officer, you're wrong there; he was a soldier, 'cause he told me all about it."

"What did he tell you?"

The farmer thereupon related the story which Dick had told him, adding, as he proceeded, a few little embellishments of his own, in order to increase the interest.

"It's him, I tell you!" said Mr. Wriggles—"it's him! Where is he?—which way did he go?"

"I didn't watch him; but he started last night and said he was going to London."

"And didn't he take the girl with him?"

"No; she is in the farm-house this very moment. I left her there; but, Mr. Officer, you don't mean for to say that that sweet-spoken young lady, that talks for all the world like a book, has anything to do with Dick Turpin?"

"I do though."

"Well, you ought to know best; but I can hardly believe it myself."

"And did he say he was coming back?"

"Yes; he said he should be back in three days: the time will be up to-morrow night."

"And the girl is in your house you say?"

"Yes, she is."

Mr. Wriggles stroked his chin with a meditative air, and then he said:

"Well, Mr. Farmer, you have given us some very important information, and if you will only hold your tongue for a little while you will be a hundred pounds more in pocket than you are now."

"That's a goodish lump of money," replied the farmer, "and would be very acceptable just now, for my last year's crops were so bad that I was well-nigh ruined."

"Well, then, this will give you a start for the next season. All you have to do is, to say not a word to anyone."

"Well, I shan't have the chance," said the farmer, "for I am going out on a journey, and I don't expect I shall return for a couple of days at least."

"All right then, pass on."

"You know," said the farmer, as he came through the gate, "that if so be as this soldier chap is really Dick Turpin, why, catch him I say, for he well deserves it, and I hope when you have got him you'll keep him!"

"We'll try!" said Wriggles, with a grin.

"But as for that young lady, I do hope you don't mean any harm against her. Somehow, I can't believe it's true; however, it's no business of mine."

"We have nothing to say against the girl, of course," said Mr. Wriggles, "nor shall we harm her. All we want is Dick Turpin, and we're bound to have him."

"Serve him right, too!" said the farmer.

And as he spoke, he struck his cob sharply with a stick he carried, and trotted off down the lane—glad, rather than otherwise, to get rid of the officers, who were no favourites of his.

After he had gone, Mr. Wriggles remained for some moments quite silent and motionless.

It was easy to see that he was pondering over some fresh thought.

Suddenly his eyes brightened, and he smacked his hand on his thigh, as he said:

"That will do. I shall have him now, let things turn out how they will. That's a brave thought—a good thought!"

What Mr. Wriggles intended to do will very quickly be seen.

In the first place, he instructed his men to conceal themselves somewhere in the neighbourhood, and keep close watch for the appearance of Dick Turpin, but on no account to let themselves be seen, or allow their presence to be suspected.

Having made these arrangements, and having also seen them to some extent carried out, he proceeded to take the next step in his plan, which was to gallop to London with as much speed as he could.

He did so, taking the nearest road, and leaving his men in ambush near the farm-house.

After rather more than three hours' hard riding, he reached London, and went direct to the Bow Street Police Court, where he asked for, and obtained, an interview with the chief magistrate.

"Your worship," he said, "is well aware what a many attempts have been made to capture Dick Turpin, all of which have failed. It is highly important that he should be made prisoner, and not allowed to set the laws at defiance any longer."

"But how is it to be done?" said the magistrate,—"it seems to me an impossibility."

"If your worship will render me your assistance, I think we shall be able to make sure of him and capture him with so little trouble that all the world will be surprised."

"Anything I can do to bring about such a desirable result, you may depend I shall do with great willingness," replied the magistrate.

"Well, then, as your worship is aware, this Dick Turpin is generally accompanied by a female, who, I have heard, is his wife, but I think it would suit us best not to believe the report."

"What do you mean, Mr. Wriggles?"

"Just this, your worship—I know where this young woman is at the present moment. I have left my men watching the house she is in. From what I have told you, don't you think we may reasonably come to the conclusion that she is an accomplice of the highwayman?"

"Certainly."

"You do think so, your worship?"

"I do."

"Well, then, if so, you will, of course, have no objection in giving me a warrant, authorising me to take this young woman a prisoner."

"I shall have no objection to order such a document to be issued," replied the magistrate. "There are good grounds for it, but how is that to assist you in capturing Dick Turpin?"

"Ah! that is it, your worship!" said Mr. Wriggles.

shaking his head wisely. "It is a good plan, and so you will say when you hear it."

"Go on, then!"

"Well, your worship, I have good grounds for saying that there is rather a remarkable attachment existing between Dick Turpin and this young woman I have mentioned, who is said to be his wife. She is with him nearly always, and he has incurred much extra peril, I might say, solely on her account. It is extraordinary to me that he should have left her, but he has done so, and it will be a fortunate thing for us."

"You are talking at random, Mr. Wriggles! I am impatient for you to come to the point!"

"I am coming to it as fast as I can, your worship. The reason why I want the warrant for the apprehension of the girl is that, if she is lodged in Newgate charged as being an accomplice, Dick Turpin will try at once to get her at liberty. Now, do you see my plan, your worship?"

"I think I do," said the magistrate, doubtfully, who was certainly no more clear-headed than police magistrates generally are.

"Of course you do!" returned Mr. Wriggles, in a triumphant voice. "I shall take her prisoner, place her in Newgate, and then keep my eyes open. Dick Turpin will come and try to release her; very likely he will bring his three notorious comrades with him; if so, I have only to take my measures properly, and then we shall have them all four, as sure as a gun."

The magistrate rubbed his hands slowly together as he said:

"That is a good plan. You are a clever man, Mr. Wriggles!"

"Your worship is too good," returned the officer, with a bow and a smirk. "I am glad you approve of my plan."

"It seems to me a very likely one to succeed. You shall have the warrant, never fear; I have excellent grounds for issuing it, for she is clearly, upon your testimony, an accomplice."

"Thanks, your worship! It doesn't matter a straw whether she is an accomplice, or whether she is not—or whether the charge can be proved against her, or not! The thing to be done, is to get her in Newgate! Ha, ha! She will be a decoy duck, your worship, and will draw them all four to destruction! Ha, ha! It is very good!"

Mr. Wriggles was evidently highly delighted with his plan, and well he might be, for who could doubt that it would probably be successful?

We fairly tremble for Dick Turpin's safety when we think upon it, for in his anxiety to set Maud at liberty he would rush into any peril.

The warrant authorising Mr. Wriggles to apprehend Maud and lodge her in the prison of Newgate was duly made out, and handed over to the astute police officer.

He folded the document up and put it into his pocket with a feeling of greater satisfaction than he had known for a long time.

He felt sure, in fact, that he should now be able to capture Dick Turpin, and so be recompensed for all his numerous defeats.

"I will leave you now, your worship, for I have more than three hours' ride before me, in order to reach the farm-house I spoke of. By that time it will be getting towards night. I am much obliged to you for issuing this warrant, and the next you hear of me will be the intelligence that this young woman is safely lodged in Newgate, and after that——"

"I hope the next thing I shall hear will be that you have captured the four daring offenders who have had such a long and unprecedented career!"

"I will try," said Mr. Wriggles, "and I think that I shall succeed!"

He left the court as he spoke, and, obtaining a fresh horse, galloped off towards the farm-house, for while influenced by his present excitement, he was insensible to fatigue.

As he had predicted, night was close at hand when he reached the spot where he had left his men in ambush.

His first question was whether they had seen anything of Dick Turpin.

He was replied to in the negative, and at last he had felt no one had left the farm-house.

"Then," said Mr. Wriggles, making great efforts to keep his triumphant feelings within bounds, "all will go well! Follow me, and we shall do the best night's work that we have done for many a long day."

The officers were rather curious to know what Mr. Wriggles intended to do, but they knew their irascible commander too well to think of putting a question to him upon the subject.

In a stealthy manner they all passed through the gate, and then they dismounted.

The horses were left in charge of one of the men, who was instructed to lead them slowly up towards the door of the farm house.

Mr. Wriggles and the rest preceded on foot, for he imagined, by adopting this course, he should be less likely to give the alarm.

No notice appeared to be taken of their arrival, and they reached the homestead without being seen or questioned by anyone.

Mr. Wriggles held up his hand and proceeded to reconnoitre.

He peeped through the various windows in succession, until at last he caught sight of that which he wished to see.

He could scarcely contain his joy.

Seated in a comfortable old-fashioned arm-chair, which was drawn up to a table before the fire, sat Maud.

The firelight flickered upon her countenance, revealing it distinctly.

Mr. Wriggles had no doubts whatever about her identity.

He glanced rapidly all round the room, but as far as he could tell, Maud was the sole occupant of it.

Having made out all this, Mr. Wriggles next noted the position of the room, and of the front door of the house, so that he might make his way towards it with the least possible delay.

"Now, my men," he said, "follow me silently. If we can get into that chamber unawares, without making an alarm, so much the better, because then we shall be able to do our work with all the more ease. Follow me, I say, and be silent."

With his constable's staff in one hand, and a pair of handcuffs in the other, Mr. Wriggles crept cautiously towards the front door of the farm-house, his men treading closely in his footsteps and wondering what was going to happen next.

CHAPTER DLXXI.

MAUD FALLS INTO THE TOILS.

Why could not some fairy whisper in Maud's ear, and warn her of the danger with which she was so closely threatened, and so give her the opportunity of escaping the grasp of Mr. Wriggles?

But no such warning came, and she sat by the fireside gazing into the flames, and wondering where Dick Turpin was at that moment.

The fear that he was in some kind of peril was always present to her imagination, but she never dreamt that she was in peril too.

So absorbed was she in her meditations, that she did not hear the door creak as Mr. Wriggles pushed it open; and if the faint sound made by the footsteps of the officers as they crossed the floor reached her ears, yet it did not penetrate her understanding.

The first intimation she had of the presence of anyone was a loud "Ahem!" which Mr. Wriggles gave on purpose to attract her attention.

She looked up, and the moment she caught sight of the police officers, she uttered a loud and piercing scream.

Mr. Wriggles made an ironical bow, and flourished his little gilt staff before her face, while he kept his right hand, with the handcuffs in it, behind his back.

"Make no disturbance!" he said. "Consider yourself in custody upon the charge of being the accomplice of Dick Turpin! Here is my staff—here is my warrant for your apprehension! Rise and prepare to accompany me! Resistance will be quite useless!"

Maud was so stunned and overpowered by these words that she was unable to move or to speak.

She instantly jumped to the conclusion that Dick was already in custody and that her apprehension was a secondary step.

The loud cry to which she had given utterance had the effect of attracting the attention of all the inmates of the farm-house, and they hastily rushed into the room by a door opposite the one at which the police officers stood.

They were thunderstruck when they beheld the scene before them.

The farmer's daughter, between Maud and whom a certain feeling of friendship had already sprung up, rushed towards the chair in which Maud sat, and breathlessly demanded to know the meaning of what she saw.

"Young woman," said Mr. Wriggles, "I would advise you not to attempt to interfere with me in the execution of my duty. If you do, you will find the consequences rather serious. I have a warrant here for the apprehension of this person on the charge of being an accomplice of Dick Turpin. Stand aside! and don't interrupt me, or you yourself will be liable to a charge of felony!"

The girl was amazed, and looked with a stupified kind of wonderment, first into Maud's face, and then into that of Mr. Wriggles.

"It's all right," said Mr. Wriggles, and then addressing Maud, he said:

"Do you intend to come with me quietly, or do you intend to make a resistance?"

Maud glanced around her, with her eyes full of tears.

How could she hope to resist so many strong, well-armed men?

She bent her head, and let her hands fall into her lap.

To tell the truth, she, as yet, scarcely realised her position.

"I am glad to see you behave like a sensible woman!" said Mr. Wriggles. "You might just as well have given in as not!"

Although he spoke thus, there was a certain amount of vexation perceptible in the tones of his voice; it would have been a satisfaction to him if he could have had a pretext for treating Maud roughly.

At the best, revenge is but the great effort of a little mind, but Mr. Wriggles could even be paltry and contemptible in his revenge.

He knew Dick Turpin well enough to be aware that the highwayman would feel an injury inflicted upon Maud with greater keenness than one inflicted upon himself.

"Now rise," he said, "and hold out your hands. I have a pair of bracelets here—extra small size—which will fit you exactly!"

He held up the handcuffs as he spoke.

Maud felt almost choked, but still she managed to gasp out:

"Surely—surely you would not fetter me! I have done nothing to deserve that! I am willing to go with you peaceably and quietly!"

"Very glad to hear it, but I must slip these on if it is only as a matter of form. Then, you know, it is making doubly sure. Don't be afraid, they won't hurt you! There, it's done!"

Mr. Wriggles was an adept at putting on a pair of handcuffs, and prided himself on the dexterity he had acquired by long practice.

Before she was aware of it, Maud found her wrists encircled with the manacles.

She felt the humiliation bitterly, but she could not help herself—she was forced to succumb.

She rose to her feet as she said:

"I hope your indignities are over now. I say again, I will follow you peaceably and quietly wherever you wish; I don't intend to make a resistance!"

"That's all right," said Mr. Wriggles "There you are—you are quite safe now. I shall want you to wait a moment or so; a hackney-coach will be here directly. You see, I have had more consideration for you than you expected or deserved. I might have made you trudge all the way to London on foot."

"And you would have used your power if it would have answered your purpose to do so!" said Maud, irritated by his manner. "It is out of no consideration for myself that you are going to allow me to ride to London."

"And that's all the thanks I get, is it?" said Wriggles, assuming an offended air. "Well, never mind; the coach is here by this time, I dare say. Come this way!"

He attempted to take hold of Maud by the arm, and lead her out of the farm-house; but she shrank back as she said, or rather shrieked:

"Don't touch me!—don't touch me! I say I will follow you wherever you may go; but don't put your hands upon me!"

"Ha, ha!" said Mr. Wriggles. "Mighty fine!—mighty fine, indeed! but I am not going to stand any of your foolery! Come along!"

He darted forward and grasped her roughly by the arm.

Maud did not resist, but allowed him to lead her quietly, being determined not to give him further pretext for ill-usage if she could help it.

With her voice almost choked by sobs, Maud bade the inmates of the farm-house farewell, and was then led out into the open air by Mr. Wriggles.

They went on down the path until the gate was reached, and then Mr. Wriggles said:

"Look up the road, Smithson, and tell me whether you can see the coach coming."

"There's something on the top of the hill, sir," was the reply.

"That is it, then,—it will not be long."

The coach to which Mr. Wriggles alluded was one that he had given instructions to be sent after him, in order to convey the prisoner to Newgate.

In a few minutes it arrived.

It was filled full of officers, about half of whom got out.

Maud was then placed inside the coach along with the remainder, and the other half climbed upon the roof.

"Be careful of your prisoner," shouted Mr. Wriggles to them. "You are answerable for her safe keeping, and you will get into trouble if she escapes. I shall follow you to London in the course of a few hours."

The hackney-coach was once more set in motion, and Mr. Wriggles watched it until it was out of sight.

Then turning to the officers who were with him, he said.

"That much is over, and well over too. Now, then, come back to the farm-house; we will take up our quarters there, and wait for Dick Turpin to arrive; he will walk up to the house unsuspectingly, and then we shall have him as sure as a gun."

The officers gave a shout of satisfaction, and followed their leader up the narrow winding path towards the farm-house.

Here, to the great terror of the inmates, they insisted upon taking up their quarters.

They were allowed to do so, for the farmer's wife could not tell what might be the consequence of a refusal.

Here Mr. Wriggles waited patiently, in the expectation that Dick Turpin would arrive.

He informed all the inmates of the homestead of his intentions, and laid the strictest injunction upon them not to utter a word that might get to the ears of the highwayman, and so put him upon his guard.

He knew it would be no easy task to capture Dick Turpin, no matter how favourable the circumstances were, and he wished to make sure of doing so; therefore, if he could keep himself in concealment, and allow Dick Turpin to enter the house without suspecting anything, he would then stand a much better chance, for it would be much easier to make him prisoner within the limits of a room, which would prevent him from struggling so desperately as he would if in the open air.

He took care to let them all know what the penalty would be if they assisted the highwayman to escape, or if they warned him of his danger.

Not content with this, however, he kept a sharp look-out upon them all.

As the time appointed for the arrival of Dick Turpin drew near, Mr. Wriggles's agitation became extreme.

In spite of all his threats as to the consequences, there was one who, in her own mind, resolved to let the highwayman know of the danger that threatened him.

This was the farmer's daughter, who had taken a sudden liking for Maud.

Now that she knew all, she determined for the latter's sake to try her best to get Dick out of his difficulty.

On the third night, then, she took up her station at the

of the upper windows of the house, from which a view of the lane and the gate opening into it could be obtained, and here she sat and watched for his arrival.

At last she saw him near the gate, and no sooner did she catch sight of him than she hastily descended the stairs, and ran out into the garden in the manner we have described in a former chapter.

Mr. Wriggles, too, was on the look-out, but as he was on the ground floor, he did not see Dick Turpin at the gate, but he did see the farmer's daughter speaking to him.

He was aware, then, that promptitude of action was necessary, for, of course, the girl's object in meeting the highwayman was to apprise him of his peril.

Hastily shouting to his men, he ran to the door and out into the garden.

He pointed out two figures in the distance, which were plainly visible by the early morning light.

All saw them, and, compressing their lips, ran after Mr. Wriggles, who on this occasion was determined to die rather than fail to effect his purpose.

Dick Turpin was so overcome by the unexpected intelligence he had received, that although he saw the officers rapidly approaching him he made no effort to escape.

The farmer's daughter clutched him convulsively by the arm, and fairly shook him backwards and forwards as she said:

"Fly! Oh, fly!—fly, or it will be too late! Fly while you have the opportunity of doing so! Fly, and you may yet be in time to save her!"

"From whom?—from what?" said Dick, grasping the saddle. "Tell me where she is gone!"

"The police came and took her in a coach to Newgate."

"Newgate?"

"Yes, that's all I know. Fly—fly now, or all is lost!"

Dick Turpin's heart swelled with rage when he heard what had befallen Maud, and he wondered why her capture had been made at the instigation of his old enemy, Mr. Wriggles.

By this time the momentary stupor that had come over him had quite disappeared.

To remain there he knew would be perfect madness, and although he burned to avenge the injury which had been done to her he loved so well, yet, when he saw the numbers of his foes, he was compelled to abandon the idea.

He might have avenged her, but it would have been at the sacrifice of his own life.

He resolved, therefore, to mount his steed and fly, and then to know no rest until he had freed Maud from her imprisonment.

This was exactly what Mr. Wriggles had foreseen, and was his sole motive for placing Maud in Newgate.

With his usual agility, Dick sprang into the saddle and galloped off.

He was only just in time, for the officers were very close behind him, the time occupied by his brief conversation with the farmer's daughter having been sufficient to enable them to traverse the distance between the farm-house and the spot where that conversation took place.

The officers came on at a gallop, all holding pistols in their right hands.

The narrowness of the path along which they had to go seriously impeded the movements of so dense a body of men.

There were several awkward collisions between their horses, but heedless of this, and of every other minor danger, they bent all their attention upon capturing the highwayman.

Mr. Wriggles had strong hopes of being able to come up with him before he had time to mount his steed, and he cried out to his men:

"Dead or alive!—mind, dead or alive! As soon as you are near enough, fire upon him!"

The officers all had their pistols ready for immediate use, and just as Dick galloped off they discharged a volley after him, the first shot having been fired by Mr. Wriggles.

Dick was quite maddened at the thought of the indignity that had been offered Maud, and when this volley was fired upon him he turned round in the saddle and fired a couple of pistols at his pursuers.

The compact body of officers was an object he could scarcely miss, and the two shots he fired did serious execution.

Directly afterwards he allowed the reins to fall upon the neck of Black Bess, and he uttered that peculiar cry which he always made use of when he wished her to put forth her utmost speed.

CHAPTER DLXXII.

MR. WRIGGLES CONTINUES TO FEEL THE GREATEST CONFIDENCE IN THE EXCELLENCE OF HIS SCHEME.

It was a five-barred gate of the usual height which formed a means of communication between the farm and the lane, and the upper portion of it was, as usual, garnished with a row of short iron spikes.

To Black Bess, however, such a gate was a barrier easily surmounted, and so she galloped towards it at full speed, and then, rising in the air, leaped over it and descended lightly enough in the road beyond.

But not one of the officers liked the idea of making the attempt to leap over this obstacle, and so as they approached the gate they gradually lessened their headlong speed, until finally, by dint of hard pulling, they managed to run up their horses close to it.

Mr. Wriggles then called out to one of his men to alight and unfasten the gate.

The man who dismounted set about his task in a very confident manner, but soon found it was more difficult to open the gate than he had imagined.

It was not secured by a padlock, but by an iron chain and a staple, very ingeniously fixed, and there was only one means by which this fastening could be undone.

Those who were in the secret could open the gate in a moment, but this officer was not, and he fumbled about with the chain in a manner that greatly exasperated Mr. Wriggles, for while this delay was taking place Dick Turpin was galloping swiftly up the hill in the direction of London.

"You fool!" roared the chief police officer. "How much longer do you intend to keep us waiting? Why don't you open the gate?"

"I can't, sir. Blest if I can understand how it is fastened; there is a piece of iron at the end of the chain, and I can't get it through the staple."

"Why not, you idiot?"

"Because it is too large, Mr. Wriggles; it won't come through at all."

With an angry yell, Mr. Wriggles sprang from his horse and went to the gate.

He was quite confident about being able to open it, although his follower had failed, and he said:

"Look here, you jackass, this way!—eh? d—n it!"

This last exclamation came from the lips of Mr. Wriggles as he found the chain resolutely refuse to pass through the staple, although when he first began to speak he had made quite sure that it would do so.

The other police officers grinned, and enjoyed the discomfiture of their chief immensely, but not so much as the man who had been trying to open the gate.

"Curse them all!" cried Mr. Wriggles. "What fools they must be to fasten a gate in this fashion! Here, tear it down—smash it, somebody—we must get through! Ah! I see how it can be managed; dismount all of you, and come to my assistance, and don't sit there like a parcel of fools!"

The officers dismounted, and by the direction of their chief took hold of the other end of the gate, and by dint of great exertion they managed to lift it from its hinges.

"Fling it down into the road!" cried Mr. Wriggles. "Serve them right for having such gates!"

There was a crash, and the heavy five-barred gate lay in the roadway in a manner that was calculated to be exceedingly dangerous to anyone who might happen to come along that way and not see it.

It is not to be supposed, however, that Mr. Wriggles would trouble himself about that.

He ordered his men to mount, and set the example of so doing.

Then, with his whole troop at his heels, he commenced the ascent of the hill.

Upon gaining the summit he looked all around him.

By this time it was broad daylight, and the sun was several degrees above the horizon, so he was enabled to see objects at a great distance.

But for all that, he failed to perceive the bold highwayman and his steed.

Both had completely disappeared, though in what manner he could not tell.

Mr. Wriggles put up with his disappointment with wonderful calmness.

Indeed, he quite chuckled with satisfaction as he said to himself:

"The woodcock is near the gin now; it is all right; my plan will succeed—I feel sure of it! What a glorious scheme. He will, like a fool, be hanging about Newgate in the hope of being able to effect the girl's escape. I shall have him—I'm sure I shall have him! A little care is all that will be necessary."

Mr. Wriggles was highly delighted at the prospect before him, and it might be said with perfect safety, that he was never in a better temper than he was at that moment.

All of a sudden a fresh thought occurred to him.

"I had almost forgotten that," he said, "and it is fortunate that I have remembered before it was too late. It will be necessary for me to be in London this morning some time before noon. I shall manage it by galloping straight to my destination. As for Dick Turpin, he can, for to-day, go just where he likes. I shall have him! Ha, ha! instead of my having the trouble to go to him, the fool will come to me!"

With these words, Mr. Wriggles set off at a gallop on the way to London, his whole troop following closely at his heels.

Whether Dick Turpin will be quite such a fool as Mr. Wriggles imagined remains to be seen.

The police officers did not draw rein until about half-past ten in the morning, when they stopped with a prodigious clatter in front of the vestibule of Newgate.

And now let us return to Dick Turpin.

After leaping over the gate he galloped up the hill, and when he reached the top looked back.

He saw the police officers standing before the gate endeavouring to open it.

"All is well so far," he said, patting Black Bess on the neck. "Thanks to you, my lass, we have got a good start of them."

It was, however, with a great amount of dissatisfaction that Dick Turpin perceived it was broad daylight.

He wished most fervently that it had been night, because then he would have made sure of effecting his escape, whereas now there was a certain amount of doubt about it.

Black Bess sped down the hill at a wonderful rate, and upon reaching the foot he once more looked behind him.

But the police officers were not in sight.

They had not reached the brow of the hill as yet.

"They cannot see me," said Dick. "I have now an excellent opportunity of hiding myself. I will do so; it will be much better than galloping on with them at my heels during the busy part of the day; it will suit me much better to have them on the road before me."

He raised himself in the stirrups as he spoke, and took a glance over the face of the country.

On each side of the road were some tall hedgerows, which promised to afford him the means of concealing himself; but he fortunately remembered that as the officers stood on the top of the hill they would, when they looked down, be able to see him on both sides of the hedge, so that if he was hiding there he would be discovered at once.

On his left hand, however, was one of those umbrageous lanes which are to be so often met with in England.

On both sides tall trees were growing, and their branches uniting and intermingling above formed a kind of leafy canopy.

As this lane ran at right angles to the highway, or nearly so, it follows that the trees upon one side of it would be quite sufficient to conceal Dick Turpin from the view of the officers when they reached the top of the hill.

As a matter of course, this lane was not straight—lanes seldom are—so that as the highwayman pursued its devious course he was completely hidden from observation.

It was not long before he made the discovery that the officers were not behind him, and as soon as he found such was the case he allowed Black Bess to go at an easier speed, for he never allowed her to distress herself by unnecessary exertion.

Believing himself in safety, he gave himself up to reflection. He felt there was great necessity for thought.

He was not able to entertain any doubt as to the truth of what the farmer's daughter had told him, and his first wild impulse had been to hasten to London and set Maud free.

But very little calm reflection served to show him the difficulties that would be in the way of his accomplishing anything of this kind, and he began to ask himself the important question of how he was to proceed in this matter.

The circumstance of Maud's capture was wholly unforeseen by him—he had never dreamed of taking such a thing into his calculations.

Moreover, he was considerably puzzled to make out how it was that Mr. Wriggles discovered she was at the farm-house.

It seemed impossible that he could have derived the information from any source, and he could scarcely bring himself to believe that the discovery was a purely accidental one.

His breast filled with rage and mortification at the thought that at that moment Maud was an inmate of a cell in Newgate.

"By what right have they taken her?" he asked himself, with excited voice and gesture. "What has she done? In what manner has she violated the laws? I have committed crimes, I know, but she has not, and surely they would not dream of punishing her for my misdeeds! It is a dastardly act, and if I can only discover who the persons are who have planned and executed it, they shall suffer dearly for their pains!"

Dick Turpin fully meant what he said, and if Mr. Wriggles could have believed it possible for his scheme to fail, he would have trembled at the thought of being the object of Dick Turpin's vengeance.

"She is a prisoner," said Dick, "and by some means or other she must be liberated, and, let the danger to myself be what it may, she shall, ere many hours are over, be at liberty! Oh! if I had my three faithful comrades with me, how much easier would this task be! Between us, I should make sure of accomplishing it!"

When Dick Turpin thought of his absent friends, a feeling of great uneasiness came into his mind, and he began to wonder what could have happened to detain them so much beyond their allotted time.

Speculation in this direction was, however, utterly useless.

"Surely," he thought, "they must by this time have come back! If they have not, I shall come to the conclusion that they have been slain, or met with their deaths in some accidental manner. If they had been captured, I fancy I should have heard of it."

Then, after a short pause, he continued:

"If they have returned, surely the warning words upon the board will have kept them from running blindly into that danger! What shall I do? To venture into London except when it is dark, would be running too great a risk. I must be doubly careful now of what I am about, because if I am captured there would be an end to setting Maud at liberty at once. I must be very careful! I will run into no unnecessary peril, and, although I long to set her free, I will control the impulse which I feel to hasten to Newgate, and in the meantime think over my proceedings. How much easier all would be if my three comrades were only with me!"

Dick Turpin was silent again, and by his manner it could be seen that he was pondering over the plan of action that would be best for him to follow.

"I will endeavour to make my way round by unfrequented paths to the deserted mansion. There will be little danger in that, for I feel pretty sure I can reach it unperceived; and if the officers are within, I shall take care not to go too close to them. If my friends have not arrived, I will make one more attempt to meet them."

Now that he had got something to do—something that he could set about at once,—Dick Turpin felt much better, and, without going at such a pace as would distress Black Bess, he made his way by a circuitous route to the deserted mansion.

By the exercise of unrelaxing caution, he managed to reach his destination unperceived.

He turned down the lane so well known by the reader, and pulled up when at a little distance from the dilapidated gates.

He looked at them, expecting to see his warning words still displayed upon them.

But he was disappointed.

The board had been carefully removed, and not a trace of it remained.

This discovery set him thinking.

"What conclusion am I to draw from this?" he asked himself. "Have my friends returned? and have they removed the board as a sign to me that they have seen my warning and acted upon it? It is probable enough; and yet, on the other hand, it is quite as likely—or, when I come to think of it, even more so—that some of the police officers have seen the board. If this is the case, it would clearly be to their interest to remove the caution, and then they would hide themselves somewhere in the grounds or in the mansion itself, and wait for the appearance of my comrades."

Both these suppositions seemed very likely ones, but which was correct was more than Dick Turpin could determine.

He remained for some moments buried in profound thought, and then he said, mentally:

"I will creep cautiously a little closer to the gates. I may be able to discover something. The ground there is soft and sticky. I may be enabled to come to a conclusion upon this perplexing point."

It must be understood that Dick Turpin had paused in the lane at a considerable distance from the gates themselves, but yet he was near enough to be able to perceive that the board had been removed.

Grass was growing on each side of the lane, and by walking Black Bess over this, he was able to advance almost noiselessly.

At last he came to the gates.

All around him was perfectly silent, and, having glanced hastily about him, he looked down upon the ground.

He saw the marks of many horses' feet; some seemed quite fresh, and others were almost obliterated—some showed that the horses had gone in the direction of the mansion, and others that they had left it.

He came a step nearer, and looked through the gates

Just at this moment, he heard a sudden rushing sound, and then a voice cried:

"Surrender, Dick Turpin, or we fire!"

Scarcely had the words been uttered, than the silence about that deserted spot was broken in upon by the discharge of many firearms.

CHAPTER DLXXIII.

MAUD IS COMMITTED FOR TRIAL UPON THE CHARGE OF COMPLICITY WITH DICK TURPIN.

We must now devote a few words to Maud, for her position fully deserves some amount of attention.

When she was placed in the coach along with the officers she felt completely broken-hearted, and sank down on the seat, and, concealing her face with her hands, wept bitterly.

Most keenly did she feel the humiliation of her present situation, but still it was not that nor the indignity of being fettered like a felon that told so heavily upon her spirits. It was the reflection that in a few hours Dick Turpin would arrive at the farm-house, unconscious of what his enemies had done, and, expecting to find her there, he would fall helplessly and hopelessly into their power.

It was this reflection that made her weep and sob.

Those officers who were seated with her in the interior of the vehicle amused themselves by jeering her and uttering coarse remarks; but, fortunately for herself, Maud was so entirely absorbed in her grief, that, although the words they spoke came upon her ears, yet it was as an incomprehensible sound—she did not understand a syllable.

Perceiving the total indifference with which she treated all their remarks, the officers grew tired of making them, and for a change occupied themselves in talking to each other.

It was a long and miserable ride in that hackney-coach from the farm-house to London.

The horses that were harnessed to the cumbrous equipage were miserable creatures, and already fatigued by the journey they had made from London, and their homeward progress was miserably slow.

Maud wept without ceasing all the way, and by degrees she lost all consciousness of the peril of her position as she contemplated the fearful danger into which Dick Turpin would run with his eyes blindfolded, for Maud was unaware that the farmer's daughter had generously determined to place him on his guard.

At last London was reached.

The appearance of the hackney-coach with a number of officers seated on the top of it and others within, at once made those who saw it aware that a prisoner of some importance had been taken and was on the way to Newgate.

Now that the end of the journey was almost reached, the progress of the hackney-coach was slower than ever, so that the people who were attracted to it were easily able to follow on foot.

This made the vehicle more conspicuous than ever, and others seeing people following it also joined in the throng, so that by the time Newgate was reached an immense crowd had assembled.

The stopping of the coach roused Maud from her abstraction, and looking out of the window she caught sight of the black and frowning walls of Newgate.

She shuddered, and her heart seemed to suddenly grow cold.

The officers got down off the roof of the coach and opened the door.

The others got out and assisted Maud to follow.

She was quite passive, because she felt that any resistance she might make, so far from being any benefit to her, would only be the means of calling forth harsh usage.

She caught one hasty glimpse of the immense crowd of people, and was terrified.

They were shouting and yelling after the fashion of English crowds, but when they saw what the prisoner was like they became suddenly silent, and then their opinions changed as suddenly as a weathercock turns round when the wind changes, and they began to groan and hiss at the police officers.

This, however, lasted but a moment.

The door of Newgate had been opened, and Maud was hurried up the steps into the vestibule.

She saw a confused mass of objects before her, but she was too agitated to make out what they were distinctly.

Then with a clang that seemed to thrill through her whole frame the door was closed.

She dashed the tears from her eyes as well as the handcuffs about her wrists would allow her, and made a great effort to be calm.

The turnkeys who were present looked on in considerable surprise, and wondered what one so young and beautiful could have done to bring her within the clutches of the law.

Mr. Cawthorn was summoned, and he too was astonished when he beheld the prisoner.

But his astonishment materially increased when one of the police officers stepped forward and placed the warrant in his hand.

He just glanced at it, and folding it up and putting it in his pocket, he said:

"Accomplice of Dick Turpin, eh? Oh, very good! I shall know what to do with you. This warrant is perfectly correct. There's your receipt," he added, addressing the officer. "I will be responsible for her safe keeping."

So far, then, the ceremony was over.

A couple of turnkeys came forward and took off the handcuffs, and having done so, they stood on each side of her, holding her by the arms.

She shrank instinctively from their touch, and perceiving it, the men with a malicious pleasure, finding how distasteful it was, pressed closer to her.

"Number fifteen," said Mr. Cawthorn. "Get the key, Winch, and lead the way; I will follow."

Winch went up to one side of the vestibule, where a number of keys were hanging on separate nails, and taking one of them, he proceeded to lead the way to the cells.

With the bunch of keys he carried about with him he opened the intervening doors.

Maud and the two other turnkeys followed, while Mr. Cawthorn, with a satisfied smile upon his face, brought up the rear.

His was a mean, grovelling, paltry spirit, and he determined to treat Maud in the same way as he would have treated Dick Turpin if he had only had the opportunity of doing so.

As the reader may be sure, the Governor of Newgate was terribly wroth to think that Dick should have played him such a prank as he had, and that the prisoner brought by the dragoons should have taken advantage of the confusion to escape.

He felt that he must have his revenge upon some one, and in his opinion Maud was a very proper object.

"Ahem!" he said. "Newgate is quite honoured—it is indeed! Be assured that every consideration shall be shown you—oh dear yes—every consideration,—you shall have no occasion to complain! Open the door, Winch,—that is number fifteen."

Winch paused before the door of a cell, and unlocking it, pushed it open.

A dark, gloomy-looking place appeared beyond.

"Now," said Mr. Cawthorn, assuming a very great deal of mock respect, which could not fail to be exceedingly offensive and disagreeable to the object of it, "walk in, if you please! This is your abode—not quite so comfortable as you have been used to, perhaps, but it is the best you will get here, I can tell you! Oh, pray walk in! Jones and Griffiths," addressing the two turnkeys, "let go of the lady's arm. Winch, show the lady into her apartment. Mind you don't stumble over the step my lady!"

This was a delusive caution.

One would have judged from his words that there was a step into the cell out of the corridor, whereas, on the contrary, there was a step down.

It was a wonder Maud did not fall into the trap thus laid for her by the Governor.

If in obedience to his words she had raised one foot, as though to place it upon a step, she would have had a rather awkward fall.

By the merest chance in the world, however, Maud happened to see, and only just in time, that the floor of the cell was below her.

Now that she was on her guard, all was well, for she stepped down lightly into the cell, to the infinite vexation of the Governor, who would have rejoiced if he could have played any practical joke upon her.

But he was defeated, and he was more angry than ever.

Then the turnkeys began to snicker when they saw how he had been outwitted by the prisoner.

Of this Mr. Cawthorn had the prudence and good sense to take no notice

He cried out:

"Close the door, Winch, and fasten it securely!—close it at once, and follow me! Mind that you leave all secure or you will find the consequences serious!"

The Governor turned round and led the way back to the vestibule, leaving the turnkeys to follow him.

It was a great relief to Maud when her dungeon door was shut. It was infinitely preferable to be alone

At first she could scarcely distinguish anything, so small a quantity of light was it that came through the little grated window into the cell, but in a few moments her eyes became accustomed to the gloom, and perceiving in one corner a kind of stone bench, she sat down upon it, and wept with so much violence that it seemed as if her heart was about to break.

Her mind was filled with the danger which Dick Turpin would incur when going to the farm-house, and as such was the case, she did not feel as she would have done the humiliation of being the tenant of one of the gloomy cells of Newgate, and exposed to the ribaldry of the Governor and his subordinates.

Wearily—most wearily—the time passed by.

At length, however, after what seemed to be an age, the darkness in the cell perceptibly increased, until at length she was unable to see anything save the grated aperture high up in the wall. And then she knew it was night.

Had she been in the lowest vault beneath some huge cathedral, the silence could not have been more profound; it was painful to the utmost degree.

Oh, what a wretched night that was for Maud!—wretched, not only because of the place in which she had to spend it, but because she knew full well, while she sat there helpless and a prisoner, Dick Turpin was riding on to his destruction.

She strained her sense of hearing to the utmost, thinking, perhaps, that if he was brought there a prisoner, as she fully expected he would be, she should hear some sounds indicative of his arrival.

But throughout the whole of that long and tedious night the silence remained unbroken, and at last the darkness seemed to grow less and less, and then day came.

Maud had not slept for a single moment.

But now that morning had come, her anxiety was even greater than it had been during the night, for she reflected that Dick Turpin had told her not to expect him until the dawn, and if he had been captured at that hour, there had not been time for him to have been brought to Newgate.

Maud did not know, as the reader does, that Dick Turpin had managed to make his escape from the farm-house.

She was, therefore, alarming herself unnecessarily.

But as the time passed on, and all continued silent, her hopes began to revive.

Breakfast was brought in, but she could not touch the coarse food and unclean water.

At about eleven o'clock the cell door was again opened, and two turnkeys entered.

They requested her to rise and follow, and she obeyed.

The gloomy passages were once more traversed, until presently she found herself in the vestibule.

Here the Governor and many others were assembled, including the under-sheriffs, and as the latter gentlemen were present Maud was saved any further indignity.

Had it not been for them, it is very probable that the Governor of Newgate would have insisted upon Maud walking to the Bow Street Police-court, for it was for the purpose of being taken before the magistrate that she had been removed from the cell.

The police van was in those days unknown, and most of the prisoners were dragged through the streets, chained together like so many slaves.

The sheriffs, however, happening to possess a little more feeling, ordered a hackney-coach to be called.

And in this Maud was placed, and driven off under a strong escort of police officers.

Mr. Wriggles arrived with his troop a few minutes after the hackney-coach had started, and he hastily rode after it, for his object in returning to London from the farm-house with all speed was that he might be present at the examination, in order to give his evidence before the magistrate of Maud's complicity with Dick Turpin.

He overtook the coach, and followed the prisoner into the court.

The same magistrate presided who had issued the warrant to Mr. Wriggles, and after the understanding they had come to, there was but little doubt that he would make out the order for Maud to be committed to Newgate to take her trial.

It was a painful moment for her when she found herself placed in the dock, but she experienced some consolation when she discovered that the people who had crowded into the court were unable to gaze into her face, as she stood with her back to them.

On her left hand stood several police officers, and just behind them was the witness-box.

Before her was a table, at which sat the magistrate's clerk, and just above him was seated the magistrate himself.

The charge against Maud was then read over.

It set forth that she was an accomplice of Dick Turpin's, and that she had aided and abetted him against the laws of these realms.

Maud was asked the usual question by the clerk of the court, as to whether she was guilty or not guilty.

After a moment's hesitation, she said in a choking voice:

"Not guilty."

Mr. Wriggles then came forward, and gave evidence that he had frequently seen the prisoner in company with Dick Turpin, and mentioned several instances, among others, those connected with the deserted mansion, the flight from thence, with Mr. Tuttle and the farm-house.

Several other officers were called, who fully corroborated all that Mr. Wriggles had said, and then the magistrate asked Maud what she had to say for her defence.

She comprehended, her situation better, perhaps, than anyone imagined; and she said in her defence only four words, and yet those words were better, and produced more effect, than if a counsel had addressed the Court for an hour.

In reply to the magistrate's question she said:

"I am his wife!"

There was a moment's pause, and then the magistrate said:

"We cannot believe that until your assertion is proved. If you are the wife of Dick Turpin, the charge against you falls to the ground, but your word is not sufficient proof. Your marriage certificate must be produced. Where is it?"

Maud had it not, and recollecting the circumstances under which the marriage ceremony had been performed, she felt there would be very great difficulty in proving herself to be Dick Turpin's wife.

The magistrate repeated his question.

"Can you produce the proof?" he asked.

"I cannot!" she replied. "I have it not."

"Then my duty is clear enough before me. It is to commit you to take your trial at the ensuing assizes, when, if you can prove that which you assert (though my own conviction is that you cannot), you will be acquitted."

This was but poor consolation for Maud.

As for Mr. Wriggles, he did not care very much whether she was acquitted or not; he had gained his object, which was to have her committed to Newgate, for he felt sure if he did, that his plan would go forward just as he wished it, and he should capture Dick Turpin long before the sessions commenced.

And so, the examination having been concluded, Maud was taken back to Newgate, there to await her trial.

CHAPTER DLXXIV.

DESCRIBES WHAT BEFEL DICK TURPIN AT THE GATES OF THE DESERTED MANSION.

When Black Bess enabled Dick Turpin to escape from the very dangerous position by leaping through the window into the garden, it will be remembered that Jim Lickfold and his officers did not attempt any pursuit, because none of them were provided with horses.

It will have been noticed ere this that Jim Lickfold was rather clever in coming to conclusions; and on the present occasion he was quite correct when he supposed that the chance of finding booty in the deserted mansion was at an end.

It was not, therefore, because he had any idea himself that he should be likely to find what he wanted that he made his way back into the deserted mansion, but simply because he was urged to do so by his comrades; and he knew quite well that they would be more content when they had satisfied themselves by a rigorous search that there was no money there.

Moreover, he felt constrained to allow them to have their own way, in a great measure because he had been the first to propose this expedition, and had spoken of it with a very great amount of confidence—indeed, assuring them that they could scarcely fail.

Now, however, they had lost the chance of capturing Dick Turpin and getting the booty as well.

It was such reflections as these, then, that induced him to listen to his companions when they expressed so strong a desire to search the building, and he accompanied them.

The task of following the police officers in their search would not be a very interesting one, because the reader knows full well that the money they were in search of was safe in Dick Turpin's pocket; so we will briefly say that, after spending some hours in poking about in every corner, they at last gave the job up in despair, and, thoroughly fatigued by their exertions, determined to return to the inn in order to refresh the inward man.

This was done; and when their appetites had been satisfied they felt very much better, and were inclined to put up with their defeat in a calm and philosophic manner.

Jim Lickfold, however, was not inclined to sit idly down when something might be done that would turn out to the advantage of all present, and so his companions found. He had something else to propose.

"Look here, mates," he said. "Here we are, as one might say, on the sick list; old Wriggles is off, and won't trouble his blessed head about us—he will think we are staying here in order to get better."

"So we are!—so we are!" cried the officers.

"Just so," coincided Jim; "but, then, I can't quite see why we should remain idle while there is the chance of doing some good for ourselves. Now, I have got the idea in my head somehow, that these highwaymen have not paid their last visit to the deserted mansion. They may have done so, of course; but still, I do not think they have."

"Why not?" asked one of his companions.

"Well, I can't tell you. You see, it's a sort of feeling I've got without knowing why. But this is my proposal: We might just as well be sitting in that there old mansion as sitting here—mightn't we?"

"It wouldn't be quite so comfortable," said another officer.

"Well, I grant that it mightn't be so comfortable; but still, it wouldn't be so very bad after all. There's many a worse crib than that, I can tell you!"

"I know that."

"Well, then, to-night, suppose we all got our horses and ride over there. I'll show you where we can put our horses for them to be all right; and we can each of us take something to eat and drink, and so we shall sit there, and be as jolly as you please!"

"And d you think the highwaymen will come, Jim?"

"I do! somehow, I feel almost sure of it; and if we are waiting—which we might be as well as not—we shall have a glorious chance of capturing them! And, you know, it's dead or alive now! We need not stand on no ceremony with them—dead or alive, and the reward is just the same! So, you see, mates, if so be they come—good! If they don't, why what does it matter? We might just as well be sitting—as I said before—in that old place as sitting here, where there ain't no chance of our doing good for ourselves!"

This proposal elicited a great deal of discussion.

The majority of the officers were by no means prepossessed with the deserted mansion, and did not altogether like the idea of staying. They would have preferred the inn.

But at last, through putting his arguments in a more forcible manner, Jim Lickfold induced them to accompany him and try their luck.

"There is no time like the present," he said, as soon as he had got their decision. "Let us order our horses at once, and we will be off!"

This was done; and in less than a quarter of an hour afterwards the little troop of police officers, with Jim Lickfold at their head, took their way towards the deserted mansion.

It will be remembered that while they were on their way to their destination they passed by the place where Dick Turpin was concealed.

Of course, they had no idea he was there, and he was too well hidden to be discovered by any chance glance that might be given, and so they passed on in happy ignorance.

The reader now knows why they had returned.

After seeing them, Dick had thought fit to shift his quarters, and, before he had gone, had cut the warning words on the board on the gate.

Jim Lickfold resolved to make himself as comfortable as he could in the deserted mansion; so they broke open one of the doors, and seated themselves in a spacious apartment with a bow window, where they made a glorious fire by breaking up some of the furniture, and passed away the time very agreeably by eating, drinking, smoking, and telling tales.

Before the day was out they had exhausted the supply of drink and provisions that they had brought with them, so one of their number was instructed to ride over to the inn and bring more.

The officer set off on this errand; and as he came back, his eyes, of course, fell on the words which Dick had cut on the board.

He was a thick-skulled fellow, was this officer, and could not tell great A from a bull's foot; but he knew the appearance of the board was altered, so when he got into the mansion he told Jim Lickfold what he had seen.

That individual's curiosity was immediately aroused, and, jumping up, he put down his pipe and hastened to the gates.

As soon as ever he saw the words newly cut into the wood he snapped his fingers and slapped his thighs, and altogether behaved himself in a manner expressive of the utmost delight.

His comrades crowded eagerly round him anxious to know what he meant.

"You see that board," said Jim. "It proves that I am right—that it does! I knew they were coming here, and that proves it!"

"How so?—how so?"

"Can't you see? Why, one of 'em—I don't know which—by some means, has found we were occupying the old crib. So, you see, he has cut thes words on the board, so that, when his companions come they will know that officers are within, and so will ride off."

"Is that it, Jim?"

"Yes; I am as sure of it as that is a nose that you have got stuck in the middle of your face! Not that it's any ornament—but that's neither here nor there."

The men all laughed at this, for the officer to whom Jim Lickfold alluded had a very small, turn-up nose, which bore a ludicrous resemblance to a lump of putty.

"But what are you going to do, Jim?" they asked. "How is all this to end?"

"I'll tell you, mates, and then you will see what it is to have a leader possessed of a little common sense. Now I'll make this perfectly clear to all of you. Just listen!"

All were silent, and Jim proceeded as follows:—

"I said a minute or two ago that one of these highwaymen—I don't know which—has found out that we are in the mansion, and, in order to let his companions know it, he cut those words on the board—not a bad dodge, I must say! Some might not have understood what was meant by it; but I rather think I have hit the right nail on the head this time. Now, mates, I'll tell you in half a dozen words what I mean to do. I shall pull that board down, and throw it away among the trees, and so I shall do away with the warning. Then presently we shall see some of these gentlemen riding to the gates in an easy sort of a way, and then—pop!—bang!—we have them, for it's dead or alive, and we can hide ourselves close to the gates."

The officers now fully understood what was meant, and gave a faint hurrah to express their delight.

To Jim Lickfold must certainly be given the credit of having exactly hit upon what had occurred; but, as we have already said, he was rather clever in drawing conclusions from any fact that might be presented to his notice.

The board affixed to the gate was old and rotten, so they soon had it down.

They broke it to fragments in the process, but that did not matter, and they threw them in different directions as far as the strength of their arms would allow.

When all this was done, Jim Lickfold said:

"I can see we are in the way of earning money. We sha'n't be quite so comfortable as we have been for the last few hours, but, Lor' bless me! what does that matter when there is money in view? We sha'n't be able to go indoors. We must hide ourselves among this 'ere vegetation. Of course whoever comes will ride up to the gate, and we shall see them plain enough; but, mind, you are not to fire until I have spoken, because, you know, according to law, I am obliged to call upon them first to surrender. I shall do that, and you can fire as soon as ever you like after I have spoken; but mind you don't give them a chance of making their escape!"

Having made all these dispositions, Jim Lickfold and his men placed themselves in ambush among the trees close to the gates.

Here they waited patiently very many hours, but nobody came; there was not a sign of a living creature.

Their watch, therefore, was a terribly dull affair, but still Jim Lickfold had faith in its efficacy, and endeavoured to reconcile the others to remaining.

At last, when even he was beginning to grow tired and despairing, Dick Turpin made his appearance in the manner we have recorded at the end of a former chapter.

Owing to his having taken the precaution to approach at a walk, and in consequence of Black Bess having trod on the soft, springy turf which grew on both sides of the lane, his progress had been noiseless, and he halted a few paces off the dilapidated gates without the officers who were in hiding having the remotest notion that he was so close at hand.

Then, as we know, Dick hazardously rode forward to look for some signs of his companions having been near that spot, but failing to find any, had looked through the gates.

It was Jim Lickfold who, in a loud voice, uttered the words:

"Surrender, Dick Turpin, or we fire!"

Almost before the last words were out of his mouth, the officers, in accordance with the instructions he had given them, brought their pistols to a level, and fired point-blank at the highwayman.

It seemed as though it was inevitable that Dick Turpin and Black Bess should be swept from the face of the earth.

But it proved otherwise.

A rapid movement saved his life.

It must not be lost sight of that Dick Turpin was aware of the presence of the officers in and around that spot, and he had been from the first perpetually on the look-out for them.

Therefore, when he heard the rushing sound, he was not taken by surprise and rendered motionless with astonishment, because he knew full well what it meant.

The word "surrender" came upon his ears before he could turn Black Bess round, but ere Jim Lickfold had time to utter the remainder of his brief sentence, Black Bess had given one of those terrific bounds she always did when about to gallop at full speed.

Dick Turpin did not go up the lane towards the high-road, for a double reason.

In the first place, there might have been an ambush; and in the second it would have been disagreeable and dangerous in the extreme to have been hunted into the high-road with this pack of officers at his heels.

Therefore, he went down the lane in the opposite direction.

We have previously stated that it did not extend far in this direction, and its termination was formed by a high wooden paling.

It would have been a formidable obstacle to many horses, but to Black Bess it was nothing.

She cleared it with the utmost ease, and came down with a scarcely perceptible shake upon the soft turf meadow beyond.

Then away she went over the open country at a tremendous speed and both horse and rider were quickly lost to sight.

As before, Jim Lickfold was unable to institute an immediate pursuit.

He did not believe it possible for anyone to escape from such a discharge of firearms, or to move quickly enough to avoid the bullets, but Dick Turpin had done so and was gone.

His fury at this defeat, after he had made so sure of victory, is a thing we shrink from describing.

We are quite incompetent for the task, and can only say that Jim Lickfold behaved in so violent and eccentric a manner that the men who were with him, although mortified beyond measure, could not forbear a smile.

But his rage and disappointment became subdued by degrees.

Then, nothing daunted by his defeat, he said:

"Look here, mates; attend to me, and I hope you will be of the same mind as I am. We are licked this time, and I own it, but we will try again." That was Dick Turpin, and you see by the way we acted we gave him time to make his escape; now I firmly believe the others will come. I do—it's a fact; but if they do come they'll have to look pretty sharp. Will you agree to what I am going to say?"

"What is it?"

"It's illegal—its wrong; but nobody need know that if we don't split upon it ourselves, and you wouldn't be such d—d fools as to open your mouths and get your necks into trouble, would you?"

"Certainly not, Jim."

"Well, then, we will place ourselves so that we can fire the very moment anybody appears at the gates. That is what we will do; and whether Dick Turpin, or Claude Duval, or Sixteen-String Jack, we won't call out to them to give them warning—we won't give them the chance of surrendering. As soon as ever they show their noses, we will fire our pistols, and d—n the consequences!"

With one exception, the officers rather approved of this cold-blooded proposition, and that one, in a feeble, hesitating sort of way, said:

"It's all very well, Jim, and I don't say your plan won't succeed, but doesn't it look a great deal like murder?"

"I don't care a d—n what it looks like," returned Jim. "My orders are to take them dead or alive. I have tried to take 'em alive, and can't do it; so now I shall try to take them dead, and it's very odd to me if I don't succeed."

CHAPTER DLXXV.

DICK TURPIN IS MUCH PERPLEXED BY THE DIFFICULTIES OF HIS POSITION.

EVERYTHING which had lately happened, and every hour which had elapsed, only served to increase Dick Turpin's uneasiness with respect to the fate of his three comrades.

He could not help fancying that something terrible had happened to them, and he tortured his mind in many vain attempts to account for the long delay which had taken place.

He trembled, too, for their safety in case they should return unsuspectingly to the deserted mansion. Indeed, it seemed to him that their sole chance of safety rested upon his meeting with them on their return, for if they rode up to the gates unaware that the officers were in ambush, they would assuredly perish.

He could judge that by what had happened to himself, for he knew his life had been saved simply because he was on his guard and had the presence of mind to make a rapid movement.

That his three comrades had met with many difficulties and dangers on their journey he felt certain, or so long a delay would not have taken place.

Upon reaching the deserted mansion, however, they would imagine that all their troubles were at an end, and would ride up to the gates unsuspectingly.

He shuddered when he thought what would be the result of this act.

He was anxious in the extreme to meet with them, and felt that he would gladly run into any peril—incur any danger—so long as he could manage to put them on their guard.

That was all he wanted to do, but it seemed impossible.

Then, as if his perplexities were not enough, there was the fact of Maud's imprisonment in Newgate.

Had it not been for this, it is quite certain Turpin would never have left the saddle until he had either been slain or succeeded in meeting with his three faithful comrades.

Now, however, he was divided, and knew not what to do.

There was Maud a prisoner in a noisome Newgate cell, and all for his sake.

Was it not clearly his duty to lose not a moment in getting her at liberty?

It was, and he was aware of it; but there were difficulties in the way at the best. Some time would have to elapse before his object was accomplished. Many would have shrunk altogether from such a task, believing it to be impossible.

But Dick did not; only he was harassed with the knowledge that while he was engaged in this important business his three comrades would be journeying on to their destruction.

Would it be well, then, for him to leave Maud where she was for a time, and turn, first of all, the whole of his attention to searching for his companions?

That seemed the wisest course to take; but Dick could not contemplate with any amount of patience the idea of leaving her he loved so well for such a length of time an inmate of a prison cell.

Moreover, he could not tell what charge would be brought against her—he could not comprehend even the ground or motive for her arrest; and while he was engaged in seeking his three friends she might be placed altogether beyond the reach of his succouring and protecting arm.

Continued reflection, so far from making Dick Turpin's position any clearer, only served to complicate it, and he felt that he was fast growing distracted.

"I cannot think this matter out myself," he said, at length, "I am incapable of it; I require some one I can consult—some one whose brain is clear and fertile in invention—some one who will show me the way out of this perplexing maze."

Evidently, this was what Dick Turpin did want; but where was he to find the counsel he required?

This perplexed Dick, and he rode on for some time in silence, until, at length, his face lighted up as a fresh thought occurred to him.

"Matthew!" he said—"old Matthew Gale—that is who I want; surely, if anyone can show me the way out of this difficulty—if any human being has the power to tell me what is best to do—he has! I have had proofs of his ability before now. Yes! I must consult old Matthew Gale; but how can I do that?"

A ready answer would have been "Ride to Drury Lane and see him;" but Dick Turpin had a lively recollection of the narrow escape he had had when he was there on the last occasion, and he did not doubt, although a long time had elapsed since then, that the same watch was still preserved around the premises, so that it would scarcely be possible for him to enter the old public-house unperceived.

How, then, was he to communicate with Matthew?

He was at a loss to think, and was obliged to come to the conclusion that so far from having got himself out of one difficulty, he had plunged himself into another.

Just at that time his life was more valuable than ever it had been, not with respect to himself, but with respect to his three comrades, for truly it was upon him and him alone, that they depended for their safety.

So he felt that he was not justified in rashly running into any danger, and the more he reflected, the more convinced did he feel that it would be hazardous in the extreme to attempt to visit Drury Lane.

At the same time, he knew that if he could only see Matthew—if he could only talk the matter over with him, he would be able to give sound and practical advice, and in all probability, say with precision what was the best thing to be done.

Dick passed his hand over his brow and strove to be calm, but he could not control his excitement, which had the effect of producing a most distracting throbbing in the brain, which was altogether destructive to clear thought.

In the consideration of the peril of others he almost forgot his own; in comparison, it now seemed nothing.

His brain throbbed and whirled, and minute after minute glided by without his being able to arrive at any definite conclusion; he was rendered more anxious than ever by the consciousness that time was passing while he was inactive, when he ought to be availing himself of every second.

"If I could but find a messenger," he said—"some one on whom I could rely, who would take a letter from me and deliver it to Matthew Gale, all would be well; but it seems a total impossibility to find anyone who would perform this service."

He still continued his course across the country, taking almost mechanically the direction that would lead him to the New Forest.

Suddenly he emerged upon a common of vast extent.

It was covered with gorse bushes, and seemed to stretch in every direction as far as his eye could reach.

The vast expanse looked an ocean of prickly plants.

The only thing that broke in upon their regularity was something white in the far distance.

This common was intersected by a narrow path, and along this Dick Turpin proceeded, paying but little attention to what was going on around him, but perplexing his brain in a vain attempt to arrive at a definite conclusion.

Presently, looking up, he saw that the white object which had attracted his attention consisted of the tents of a gipsy encampment, which had been pitched as nearly as possible in the centre of the common.

There was a yellow caravan and several canvas tents—There was every appearance of a large tribe having taken up their quarters in this situation.

Dick Turpin continued to gaze upon this scene without feeling any particular interest, when all at once he said to himself:

"I remember now that it was somewhere in this locality that I once encountered a tribe of gipsies. Tom King was with me then. We were weary, having been chased for a long distance by our foes. They granted us safe shelter, and allowed us to depart in peace. They were faithful, for they made no attempt to betray us This may be a similar tribe. I may be able to remain with them for a few hours, and it is possible that one of their number may be willing to be my messenger to Drury Lane. They could have no possible suspicion of who I am."

The more Dick thought over this idea, the more he was pleased with it, and he resolved at any rate to make the trial.

If he failed, he would have to think of something else

Accordingly, he quitted the narrow path which all along he had been pursuing, and made his way in a direct line for the encampment, which was about two hundred yards off on his right hand.

Before he had gone far, a man, who had been lying down on the grass, rose to his feet, and demanded his business.

There was something about the man's voice, manner, and appearance that was familiar to Dick, and he looked closely at him.

"I am an outcast from the house-dwellers, like yourself, and stand in need of a little rest and shelter. If you will accord it to me, I will pay you liberally."

"I have seen you before," said the man. "You are welcome!"

"Then," returned Turpin, "where have you seen me?"

"It is a long time ago now; but another was with you. It was not far from this spot."

"I remember now quite well," said Dick. "Is this the same tribe among the members of which I once before found a refuge from my foes?"

[THE GIPSY GIRL PROMISES TO DELIVER DICK TURPIN'S LETTER TO OLD MATTHEW.]

"It is. You have broken bread with us, and you are welcome. Follow me—I will lead you to the encampment."

Dick dismounted, and walked by the side of the gipsy, for he was anxious to conciliate him.

Upon reaching the encampment, the gipsy clapped his hands, and cried:

"Sebel—Sebel!"

In response to this call, a tall, vigorous lad came forward.

Turpin recognised him as the one who had before taken charge of the horses.

He was called for this purpose now, and he led Black Bess away to a little distance, and placed her along with the horses belonging to the tribe.

Dick Turpin was well remembered by most of those who were present, and, as on the former occasion, he was in a few moments quite at home, and, throwing off his perplexity, he laughed and chatted with them as though they had been friends for years and years.

At length he approached the subject that was so important to him.

"I want to send to London," he said. "Who is there among you who would undertake the task of delivering a letter? That is all I want done. Of course the letter is an important one."

A brief discussion took place after Turpin thus spoke, and a gipsy, who seemed to hold some authority over the rest, rose and said:

"There is not one here who would not gladly perform the service you require. All you have to do is to look around you and make your selection. Whoever you pick out will go."

"I would rather you find a messenger for me," said Dick. "I should much prefer that."

"Let me go," said some one, in a soft and musical voice—"let me go! I will deliver your letter safely!"

Dick looked up, and saw that the words had been uttered by a girl who, but for the extreme swarthiness of her complexion, would have been singularly beautiful.

Her age could not have been more than sixteen, and as he gazed into her countenance, Dick saw that she was gifted with no ordinary intelligence, and the conviction came over him that, had he been enabled to select from thousands, he could not have picked one more suitable.

That the girl would be faithful he did not doubt—that she would be cautious and secret he was sure.

"You shall go," he said. "You will suit me admirably, and you shall be well rewarded for the task I wish you to perform."

A pleased smile lighted up the handsome countenance of the young girl as she murmured her thanks, and asked when she should depart.

"In a few moments," said Dick Turpin. "I have only the letter to write."

As he spoke, he rose from the side of those near whom he had been sitting, and, going to a little distance, felt in his pockets for writing materials.

He was fortunate enough to find a memorandum book.

He turned over the leaves until he came to one upon which there was no writing, and then, wetting the lead pencil with his lips, he pressed heavily upon the paper, so that there should be no fear of what he wrote becoming obliterated.

It took him but a few moments to write the following letter:

"Dear Matthew,

"I am in serious trouble and perplexity, and am greatly in need of your advice. I am now staying with some friendly gipsies, one of whom has agreed to be the bearer of this letter.

"I cannot come to you, because I know your house is watched. Will you, then, add one more favour to those you have already conferred upon me, by meeting me at night-fall at the foot of the gibbet on the Finchley Road? You know the spot. I will be there at dusk, and wait till you arrive. Don't fail to come!

"DICK.

"P.S.—I have told the bearer that you will give her two guineas when you receive this letter. I adopt this precaution in order to ensure its delivery."

Dick folded the paper up, and secured it as well as he was able. Going to the young girl, he placed it in her hand, and gave her a guinea, saying:

"Deliver this letter with all speed to Matthew Gale, the landlord of the White Horse, in Drury Lane. Be sure you give it to no other person. If an attempt is made to wrest the paper from you, destroy it, but do not let it be seen by anyone save the person I have mentioned. When he gets it, he will give you two guineas for a reward."

The girl made a low curtsey, and seemed much delighted with the idea of obtaining so much money, and she started off upon her errand without delay.

It was a long journey that she had to perform; but Dick Turpin was well aware that the gipsies were fleet of foot, and were indifferent as to the distance they might have to travel.

As he watched her form gradually recede from his view, a feeling of calm content stole over Dick Turpin's heart, and he felt almost as though his perplexities were over.

"Such a girl as that," he murmured to himself, "will never be suspected of being a messenger of mine. With all their cleverness, the police officers would never think of that. I have the most implicit faith in her fidelity. Old Matthew will receive the letter safe enough, and I am indeed mistaken in my estimate of him if he is not on the spot I have named at the time I have appointed."

Dick Turpin remained for some time longer with the gipsies, but as time began to pass away, his anxiety returned.

A thousand fears crept into his heart, and at last unable to remain inactive any longer, he called for Black Bess, gave a liberal gratuity to every member of the tribe, and then, bidding them farewell, he sprang into the saddle, and rode away.

CHAPTER DLXXVI.

RELATES HOW TOM KING AND HIS TWO COMRADES OBTAIN POSSESSION OF THREE FRESH HORSES.

It is so long since we gave any attention to the proceedings of Tom King and his two comrades that, although Dick Turpin's proceedings are of a more than usually interesting character, we feel constrained to leave him for a time, while we return to those in whose fortunes, it is hoped, an almost equal amount of interest is felt.

It may be necessary to remind the reader that when we last saw the three highwaymen was when they had managed to effect a most daring escape from the road-side inn.

They had taken possession of three horses belonging to the police officers, and on these they had galloped off, until they quite got out of reach of their pursuers.

Then they paused, and congratulated each other upon their good fortune, and then they began to wonder how they were to manage to obtain possession of their own steeds.

The horses they had taken from the police officers were of a very indifferent quality, and not at all suited to them.

But it seemed little short of madness to make the attempt to return to the inn to take possession of them.

A long discussion was held upon this point, and eventually it was determined that it would be running too much risk to return to the inn, so at the same time they abandoned the idea of doing so, and the hope of recovering their steeds.

"And now we have come to this determination," said Tom King, "it will be necessary for us to make up our minds what we are to do. These horses will be worse than useless to us. It often happens that our lives depend upon the swiftness of our horses."

"How are we to get any better?" asked Claude Duval.

"We have money, and yet not enough to buy three horses of the kind we require, even if we should be lucky enough to meet with the opportunity of purchasing them."

"How far is it to the nearest post-town, Tom?" asked Sixteen-String Jack, suddenly.

"About twenty-three miles, I should think. But why do you ask?"

"Because I have thought of a plan."

"To obtain fresh horses?"

"Yes."

"Let us hear what it is."

"Willingly. It is but a rude, half-formed idea at present; but still, I think we shall be able, between us, to make something of it. Listen."

Sixteen-String Jack then communicated his idea to his friends, and they highly approved of it.

What this scheme was will be best seen by the manner in which it was worked out.

Tom King considered a moment, so as to make quite sure of the direction in which he ought to go, and then he led the way.

They trotted on pleasantly enough.

Had it been daylight, the probability is that they would scarcely have met with anyone; but as it was night, they had all the road to themselves.

The horses they bestrode were terribly knocked up, and neither whip nor spur had the least effect in accelerating their speed.

Luckily, the road was good, and so, at a shambling kind of trot, they went towards the next town.

On their way, the conversation turned upon the series of misfortunes they had met with from the time they had sought for the miser's gold.

It seemed as though their excursion would result in nothing but disappointment, for on every hand they met with nothing but reverses.

It was close upon ten o'clock when Tom King raised his riding-whip and, pointing in advance, said:

"Yonder, my friends, is Winchester."

"How far are we from it now?"

"Two miles at the most."

"Well, now," said Jack, "comes the consideration—shall we ride into the town upon these horses, or shall we abandon them and enter upon foot?"

"I should say it would be best to abandon them," replied Tom King; "they are not of the slightest service to us, and they might be recognised by their trappings as belonging to the police force. I fancy we shall be avoiding a serious danger by getting rid of them."

"That is precisely my opinion," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and we shall do much better on foot than on horseback."

"So we shall," chimed in Claude Duval; "and, as we have such a little way to go, I think we had better dismount here, and drive the horses off over the fields. If we ride nearer, we may be seen; and then such an extraordinary proceeding would be sure to excite curiosity, if not suspicion."

His two comrades were of the same opinion as himself, and they all three dismounted.

Before they abandoned the horses, they took care to possess themselves of the pistols that were in the holsters.

Close at hand, there was a gate leading into a meadow.

This the highwaymen opened, and then they drove the horses into the field.

While thus engaged, they believed they had not been seen by any human being, and accordingly they took their way towards Winchester with very great confidence indeed.

The walls of the ancient city were quickly reached, and as they walked boldly along one of the streets, Sixteen-String Jack said:

"Now, do not forget the details of our scheme. Walk boldly and fearlessly, and assume, if you can, the air of one who belonged to the whole place."

His comrades laughed, and passed on, until at length they paused before a large and very pretentious clothier's shop.

It was the finest in all the city, and the three highwaymen walked in with an admirably-assumed carelessness.

Just as they entered the shop they were met by a boy, who was carrying the shutters, for the time for closing the premises had arrived.

A man who was behind the counter gave a smirking sort of a smile, and a low bow, as he desired to know his customers' pleasure.

"We want some ready-made garments," said Tom King. "Have you any?"

"Yes," was the reply. "We have plenty in stock of all kinds."

"Well, we wish to look at some officers' undress uniforms."

"We can suit you then, gentlemen, exactly. Please step this way."

Our friends were ushered into a large room behind the shop, which was piled with garments of every description.

"The quality must be first-rate," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"We have none but the best quality," said the shopman, producing the articles the highwaymen had mentioned.

They were looked over, and, finally, our friends chose three suits which they imagined would fit them exactly, and enable them to carry out the plan which Jack had conceived, and which they had moulded into form.

"Where can I send them for you, gentlemen?" asked the tailor.

"Nowhere," said Tom King; "but, if you would allow us, we should be glad to exchange our clothing here, as we have an important visit to pay to-night."

"Certainly, gentlemen, by all means! You can have this room to yourselves."

The highwaymen hastened to avail themselves of this permission, and in a few moments a very great improvement was visible in their appearance.

The costume set off their figures to great advantage, and they contemplated each other with much satisfaction.

"This will do bravely!" said Tom King,—"we shall be able to carry out our scheme now, never fear!"

Having completed their toilets, they paid for the clothing, and departed.

We fancy our readers will be somewhat surprised when we state that, after leaving the tailor's shop in their new attire, the highwaymen walked direct to the largest and best hotel in the city.

Their appearance was rather distinguished, and they were received with every possible mark of politeness.

They announced their intention of taking up their quarters there for several days.

Apartments were placed at their service, and, having partaken of a good supper, they slept peacefully all night in the chambers which had been allotted to them.

It was clear that no one had the least suspicion with regard to their identity.

They partook of breakfast in great style, and then, summoning the landlord, Tom said:

"We want to take a little journey between now and dinner-time,—can you recommend us to any place where we can hire three good horses for a few hours?"

The landlord was highly pleased with the appearance and manner of his guests; so, with a bland smile, he said:

"Certainly—I can give you the information you require. I will write down the address on the back of one of my cards, and then you will find that the best horses in his stable will be at your service."

While speaking these words, the landlord took a card from his pocket, and wrote an address on the back of it.

Our friends thanked him, and took their leave, having first ordered a sumptuous dinner.

Upon gaining the street, they walked boldly towards the livery stable-keeper's whose address had been given them, and on their way they could scarcely conceal the exultation which they felt.

Their plan had succeeded very much better than they had dared to anticipate.

Now that they had a species of recommendation from the landlord of the chief hotel in the city, there would be no difficulty in the way of hiring horses.

They found they had only about five hundred yards to go.

They found the keeper of the stables superintending the dressing of a horse, which apparently had been injured by a fall.

He came towards our friends the moment he caught sight of them, and Tom King, glancing at the card, said:

"We are staying at the Stork Hotel, and upon informing the landlord that we wished to hire three first-class horses for a few hours, he recommended us to come to you."

"Certainly, gentlemen. I am much obliged."

Tom handed the card to the keeper of the stables, who immediately recognised the handwriting of the landlord, who happened to be a particular friend of his, and he came to the conclusion that all was right, and hoped he had got hold of three good customers.

He treated our friends with an overwhelming amount of respect, and had all the horses brought out into the yard, in order that they might make their selection.

Our friends chose three magnificent creatures, worth at least a hundred pounds apiece.

"You know how to choose horses, gentlemen," said the livery stable-keeper; "these are the three best animals in my stables."

"They are very fine indeed!" said the highwaymen, with one voice.

"They are as good as they are handsome, as you will find as soon as you mount."

The horses were got ready, and the best saddles and bridles on the premises were put upon them, and then our friends mounted, and, with a slight inclination of their heads, trotted out of the stable-yard into the street.

The keeper of the livery stables came to the top of the yard, and, standing there, watched them ride off down the street.

"They are good riders," he said to the ostler, who was standing near him, "and will show the horses off to advantage. I fancy they will turn out good customers."

He was never more mistaken in all his life, and when, a moment afterwards, he saw them disappear round the corner, he little thought that he had seen his three horses for the last time.

As soon as they were out of sight of the stables, the highwaymen resolved to allow their horses to make speed, and off they flew at a gallop, which delighted them beyond measure.

At last they slackened their pace, and Tom King exclaimed:

"I fancy we have got far enough now to be out of reach of any danger. It was a good plan of yours, Jack, and but for you it would never have succeeded."

"They are splendid creatures indeed," added Claude Duval. "I fancy they will suit us admirably. At any rate, we shall never have any room to complain of the high price we gave for them."

Jack laughed.

"If we lose our horses again, I shall not think so seriously of it. We shall be able to put this scheme into practice again."

"I hope we shall be spared the necessity," said Tom King, "for we shall never get finer cattle than we have now."

"And we are in every respect in capital condition for the road. All we want now is a good adventure."

"A profitable one," said Tom King.

"Yes," replied Claude, "for the state of the exchequer is rather low just at the present time. All the money we possess is that which we took from the horse-coper, and since making our purchases in Winchester its amount has sensibly diminished."

"I suppose so," said Tom King; "but I don't think it is very prudent of us to be riding along the road in this fashion by broad daylight. We may pass unnoticed, and yet we are running a great risk of being recognised."

"It is certain we can't commence business until after dark," said Sixteen-String Jack. "But what are we to do until then?"

"Don't stop at an inn, whatever you do!" cried Claude. "I have had quite enough of that!"

"There seems to be a wood of considerable extent yonder," exclaimed Tom King. "Among those trees we shall certainly find some retired spot where we can pass the time between now and nightfall."

"Agreed! Let us repair there at once. I might say that we want for nothing, and we can rest ourselves, so as to be prepared for the night's fatigue, and our horses will do very well in grazing round the trees."

The wood Tom King had spoken of was little more than half a mile distant, and was separated from the road along which they were travelling by a piece of waste ground, which was dotted here and there with various stunted shrubs.

Before they left the high-road the highwaymen were careful to look up and down it, in order to make sure that no one was near enough to observe them, and then, feeling satisfied upon this point, they turned their horses' heads towards the wood, and, despite the unevenness of the ground over which they had to take their way, pressed into a hard gallop.

A very few moments served to bring them under the shade of the trees, and, happening to find a broad leafy glade covered with green turf, they continued along it until they reached its termination.

Then, plunging amid the dense mass of foliage, they selected a suitable spot to halt in, and, slipping from their saddles, removed the bits from their horses' mouths, and made themselves as comfortable as the circumstances would allow.

CHAPTER DLXXVII

TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK MEET WITH A PROFITABLE ADVENTURE.

The hours intervening between noon and nightfall slowly passed away, or appeared to do so to our friends, who were impatient in the highest degree.

At last, however, the welcome shades of evening began to fall around, and as soon as they found this to be the case, they began to make preparations for their excursion.

They had but little to do, and in a short time were quite ready.

As a simple matter of precaution, they took their way through the wood, and emerged from it at a different point to that by which they had entered.

Tom King was their guide, and an occasional glance up at the stars in the sky enabled him to proceed with great precision.

"Here is the high-road at last," he said, "and here are we in readiness for an adventure."

"I can speak for myself," said Claude; "but the adventures to-night, bear in mind, must all be of a profitable nature. We have already been absent from the deserted mansion for too lengthened a period, and I am anxious to get back."

"So am I," said Tom King—"exceedingly so; and I will endeavour to prevent any further delay. It is impossible for us to tell what may have taken place during our absence, and although Dick was evidently recovering, yet he was in a precarious state, and may have had a relapse."

"Let us hope not," said Sixteen-String Jack. "I am no less desirous of getting back than you are; but I don't at all relish the idea of returning without any money at all. It seems unfortunate, after running so many risks, and coming so near to success, that we should, after all, lose every guinea of the miser's gold."

"Perhaps it's all for the best," said Tom King.

"I should be inclined to think so, perhaps," said Claude, "if we had made up for our loss in some other way; but as it is, we are, I might almost say, empty-handed."

"One good night's adventures, however, will remedy all that," said Tom King, "and the only thing we have to make our minds up to is this, that we do not allow ourselves to be led away by any interesting adventure that may befall us."

"There's the difficulty," said Claude Duval; "but, in the first place, doesn't a stage-coach run to Winchester?"

"Yes."

"Shall we have any probability of meeting with it?"

"That I can't tell," replied Tom King. "I am tolerably familiar with this part, but yet, I could not say at what hour the coach arrives at and departs from the town."

"We will ride on, then, and trust to meeting it. Between the three of us, we shall not have much trouble in stopping it, and we are sure to obtain a large sum from so many passengers."

"Something is coming now," exclaimed Tom King, suddenly. "It may be the stage-coach, and it may not; at any rate, we will draw to one side, and await the result."

"With all my heart!" said Claude. "If it is the coach, we could not have found a spot better suited to our purpose."

This was true enough, for our friends had just arrived at a kind of hollow in the road, which, from various circumstances, was plunged in deeper darkness than the rest of the highway.

Before them, looking towards London, was a very steep hill, and it was quite evident that down this hill some vehicle was coming.

Listening a moment, the highwaymen unanimously came to the conclusion that it must be the stage-coach, and awaited its arrival with the greatest impatience.

"We are all right!" said Tom King. "That's the stage-coach, and in order to come down such a steep hill as that, they will be sure to skid one of the wheels. When they reach the bottom they will pull up for the purpose of removing the slipper, and then we shall have a glorious chance."

"Yes," said Claude, with a laugh; "there will be no necessity to cry 'stand!' We shall only have to say 'deliver,' for the coach will be stopped already."

"Hush! Be prepared! Now it's coming!"

Unconscious of the danger that was awaiting it, the stage-coach came rolling down the hill, and, as Tom had foretold, the driver pulled up at the bottom, and the guard got down from behind in order to release the wheel.

This was the moment the highwaymen chose for action.

It seemed to the driver as though Tom King became suddenly developed out of the darkness, as with one bound he reached the stage-coach, and, presenting a pistol, cried:

"Drop the reins and sit still, or you are a dead man!"

At the same time Claude Duval hastened towards the coach, and, seeing the guard in the act of unskidding the wheel, he seized him by the back of his neck, and before the guard knew what had happened, he found himself head-over-heels in a muddy ditch that ran by the side of the road.

A chorus of screams from the interior of the vehicle now ensued, and the passengers on the roof gave vent to sundry profane oaths.

Sixteen-String Jack made his way with all speed to one of the doors of the coach, and as the window had already been let down, he thrust his head into the interior.

"Don't be alarmed, ladies and gentlemen," he said, coolly; "there will be no harm done, and the delay will be trifling, providing you have the good sense to hand over without resistance whatever valuables you carry about with you!"

A complete silence followed this demand, and Sixteen-String Jack put his head still further into the coach, in order to ascertain what persons occupied it, for within all was dark.

Suddenly a sharp clicking sound came upon his ears, and he turned like lightning in the direction from which it came.

His eyes were now accustomed to the gloom, and he saw seated nearly in the centre of the vehicle a young man who, with a cry of rage, was cocking his pistol again, having missed fire the first time.

"Don't meddle with things you know nothing about!" said Sixteen-String Jack, calmly. "You are not used to firearms—I can see that plainly enough! I hope no one else will be foolish enough to follow your example. At any rate, they shall see how I will serve you!"

While speaking these words, Sixteen-String Jack leaned still further into the coach, and suddenly seized the man who held the pistol by the coat collar.

Then, placing his left hand against the side of the coach, Sixteen-String Jack put forth his utmost strength, and dragged the man completely through the window.

He released his hold, and then, with a cry of terror and pain, the traveller fell into the road.

"Would anyone else like similar treatment?" said Jack, as calmly as ever. "If not, just comply with my demands; if you refuse, the coach will be very much behind its time when it gets to the end of its journey!"

"Take that," said some one, in a gruff voice,—"there's my purse, and I hope you will buy a rope with the money!"

"There will be no necessity for me to do that," said Jack — "the country will find me one free of expense!"

"There's many a true word spoken in jest, as the old proverb says," replied the passenger who had given the purse. "Now, ladies and gentlemen," he added, turning to those who were with him, "follow my example! Take my word for it, it's the best thing you can do: it's the only way you can get rid of these gentry!"

"Attend to the words of the speaker of common sense!" said Sixteen-String Jack, with so much mock solemnity that the passengers could not forbear a smile, although they had the prospect of losing their money so close before them.

The words spoken by the traveller with the gruff voice evidently produced an effect upon the rest, for various articles of value were handed to Jack without his being put to the trouble of renewing his demand.

When he looked at the speaker, however, he did not wonder that his words should be so well attended to, for he was very tall and very stout—being, in fact, rather larger than human beings of the ordinary size.

The highwayman had seen enough to be aware that it is generally the biggest man who sways the opinions of his fellows. It would almost seem that people are under the impression that a colossal body and a colossal mind must go together.

Sixteen-String Jack rapidly placed the articles in his pocket as they were handed to him, and finding he had taken a very considerable booty, he made a bow and said:

"That will do, ladies and gentlemen—you will be molested no further. For what you have given me I am much obliged! Please to remember that I have only taken what you have offered!"

"A good joke that!" said the gigantic traveller—"a very good joke! Upon my word, the fellow deserves something; and after all, what does it matter if you do lose your purse on the highway?"

"I don't suppose it matters much to you, sir, who have plenty of money to spare," said a man, in a shrill, piping voice, whose personal appearance somehow or other seemed to resemble a weasel. "It don't much matter to you; but as for me, the loss of a purse is of very great moment indeed!"

The other passengers looked at the one who had last spoken, and then, when they saw what a little, shrivelled-up, insignificant being he was, they concluded that it was not worth while to take any notice of what such a one said.

Sixteen-String Jack did not wait to hear any more, but looked around him in order to ascertain whether either of his two comrades required his assistance.

All seemed to have gone well, however, for he caught sight of Tom King standing on guard over the coachman, while Claude Duval was taking watches and purses from the travellers on the roof.

Towards these Jack now turned his attention, and it was a very fortunate thing that he did so.

It will be remembered that Claude Duval had flung the guard into the ditch, from which he had made no attempt to extricate himself, being under the impression that while he remained there he was safe, and that if he tried to get away he should be murdered.

As is well known, it was the guard's duty to protect the passengers, and prevent them from being robbed on the highway.

For this purpose, he was always provided with that obsolete firearm, a blunderbuss, which was slung in a wicker case side by side with his long tin horn.

While he lay in the ditch, of course he could not make use of this weapon.

One of the outsiders, however, who happened to be close to the guard's seat, and who was much exasperated at the loss of his property, was suddenly seized with the idea that he might be able to obtain some revenge.

He saw how intently Claude Duval was occupied in taking the property away from the rest, and this prompted him to make the attempt to draw the blunderbuss out of its case.

He did this slowly and carefully, and placed it against his shoulder without Claude being in the least aware of what he was about.

Of course those who sat nearest to the adventurous traveller knew very well what he was about, but they kept perfectly still, and looked forward with a grim species of satisfaction to the moment when the trigger would be drawn, and the highwayman swept from the face of the earth.

When Sixteen-String Jack looked up, then, the passenger, with the butt-end of the blunderbuss against his shoulder, had risen up a little out of his seat in order to take a better aim at the highwayman, whose back was turned towards him, and in order to escape the risk of injuring his fellow-travellers.

To have called out to Claude, and warn him of his danger, Sixteen-String Jack well knew would be useless.

He comprehended instantly that his friend's life depended upon his quickness.

With a flash like lightning, his sword flew from its sheath, and with it he struck the barrel of the blunderbuss a heavy blow, causing the muzzle to be elevated many degrees higher in the air than it had been.

The passenger was in the very act of pulling the trigger, and could not arrest the movements of his muscles.

There was a tremendous report and a blinding sheet of flame.

A loud cry followed, and with a crash the adventurous traveller fell backwards over the hind part of the coach into the road.

The cause of his fall was simple enough.

The clumsy firearm had been too heavily loaded, and the propensity to recoil which all blunderbusses have is well known.

The recoil of this one was very great, and had the traveller been standing on the ground, it certainly would have caused him to stagger back two or three paces.

As it was, however, he was in a half-sitting posture, and the blunderbuss recoiling, threw him off his balance, and he tried in vain to recover himself.

He was also alarmed and very much taken by surprise by the suddenness of Sixteen-String Jack's attack.

As for Claude Duval, the unexpectedness of the loud report made him for several seconds feel quite doubtful as to whether his head had been blown from his shoulders or not.

CHAPTER DLXXVIII.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN CONTINUE TO MEET WITH EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS ON THE HIGHWAY.

THE report was such a one as could only come from the bell mouth of a blunderbuss, and Sixteen-String Jack, although aware that the explosion would take place, was nevertheless half stunned by it.

The passengers on the roof, too, were not a little alarmed, and several wondered where the discharge had come from, for the report and the disappearance of the adventurous traveller were simultaneous occurrences.

As soon as he could recover himself a little. Jack said:

"It's all right, Claude—there is no danger! I was just in time!"

This was a fact; for had Jack been a second later, Claude's destruction must have been certain.

Tom King had not taken a very active part in the proceedings, and yet the duty which he fulfilled was a most important one.

The calm, steady manner in which he held the pistol was quite enough to cause the driver to sit perfectly still; while, as for the horses themselves, they were only too glad to avail themselves of the opportunity to rest and breathe a little.

In addition to this, Tom kept a sharp look-out both up and down the road, so as to be aware at the earliest moment of the approach of any of their enemies.

Like all the rest, Tom King was taken by surprise by the explosion of the blunderbuss, and moreover he felt very anxious and alarmed about his companions.

To his joy, however, as soon as the smoke had cleared away, he saw them sitting on their horses calmly and contentedly enough.

But almost immediately afterwards the dull, hard beat of many horses' hoofs on the road came to his ears, and, looking up, he saw a compact body of horsemen descending the hill.

Whether they were officers, or dragoons, or travellers, he did not stop to inquire, nor would it have been wise for them to wait and ascertain.

He at once gave the alarm to his comrades.

"Fly!" he said, "and quickly! Over the hedge with you! Off and away!"

Claude and Jack obeyed his command instantly, and with all the more alacrity, since they had quite finished their task of taking contributions from the travellers within and without.

The hedge had been broken down in one part, leaving a gap, and through this they made their horses leap in rapid succession.

A smooth piece of pasture ground was beyond, and they galloped over it at a speed which they felt certain the officers could never equal.

In a moment, the high-road, the coach, and the pursuing officers seemed to be left behind.

Away into the darkness they flew, nor did they draw rein until they were quite sure that the officers were out of sight and hearing.

At last they stopped, and Claude Duval exclaimed:

"Hurrah! This has been a brave and profitable adventure. There was not a single passenger from whom I did not receive a good booty. What success did you meet with, Jack?"

"Excellent, my friend! The travellers were all very civil, and handed over their purses without resistance, and some were heavy ones, I can assure you."

"So much the better," said Tom King, "and I trust that this will foreshow the success we are destined to meet with. Remember, our sole idea is to get together as much money as we can, in order to recompense us for our losses."

"Just so; and as we are out of all danger as far as our late pursuers are concerned, I am quite willing to take my stand on the highway again."

"I was about to propose that we should do so," said Tom King. "Follow me,—I fancy we are much nearer the high-road than you anticipate."

As he spoke, Tom King turned off at right angles from the direction he had been taking, and in a few moments afterwards the three highwaymen emerged into the high-road at a point not very distant from the scene of their late exploit.

"Let us stay here and wait," said Tom King; "the spot is a convenient one, and these trees behind us will throw such a shadow that we shall be quite concealed; besides, we have our pistols to see to, and we ought not to delay any longer."

To all this Claude and Jack fully agreed, and they took up their position beneath the shadow of the trees Tom had mentioned.

They were poplars, and about twenty in number, and shot up into the sky to a great height.

Convinced that the shadow would thoroughly conceal them, our friends carefully reloaded and primed their pistols.

When all was in readiness, Tom King held up his hand, and cried:

"Hush!"

All listened, and then Claude exclaimed:

"A single traveller is coming, and from the direction of London; who shall encounter him?"

"I think," said Jack, "we had better all three ride forward at once; the business will be over more quickly then. If he should happen to be a bold man, he will never be so rash as to resist all three of us."

"We will try your plan, Jack," said Tom King, "and see how it answers."

The traveller came on at a trot that showed his steed was of no common quality.

Little dreaming of the danger to which he was hastening, he rode on until he was suddenly startled by hearing a voice pronounce the word "Halt!"

The tones were abrupt and commanding, and, almost as if by instinct, the traveller checked his steed.

In another instant he was surrounded by the three highwaymen.

They spoke in succession.

"Surrender your purse and other valuables you have, and you may ride on in safety. If you refuse, the consequences will be on your own head."

The traveller looked from one to the other as they spoke, and as soon as the last finished, he replied:

"So, there are three of you, are there? Well, I hold my life at a higher price than what I may have about me. I will trust to your word. Here is my purse and my watch. I have nothing else worth your taking. Now let me ride on."

"You are perfectly free to do so," said Tom King, as he placed the articles the traveller handed to him in his pocket. "Ride on, sir—you will be molested no further."

The traveller touched his horse with the spurs, and was out of sight in a moment.

Doubtless he thought he had had a lucky escape.

"Fortune favours us," said Claude. "A few adventures like these, and by the morning we shall have enough to answer our purpose."

"Very true," replied Tom. "I like your scheme, Jack—it is a good one; we will try it again."

"Then you will soon have the opportunity of doing so," was the rejoinder, "for, if I am not mistaken, I can hear the grating of wheels upon the gravelly road. Listen!"

"You are quite right," said Tom King, after a moment's pause. "Some light vehicle, drawn by two horses, is approaching. It is probably a private carriage. It does not make lumbering enough to be a post-chaise."

"Look!" said Claude. "Can you see anything of the lamps?"

"No."

"That's strange, then."

"It is—very, for they are coming at a terrific speed, and it is certainly not safe to come along a dark road at such a pace without lights."

"Safe or not safe," said Claude Duval, "it will make no difference to us. You will stop the carriage, Tom, of course?"

"Certainly."

"Then, I hope it will be worth the trouble."

"We shall see."

"Stand aside, and when we command the driver to pull up, be in readiness to gallop after him, in case he should refuse. You know the old way of bringing a carriage to a standstill, by twirling it broadside across the road."

"Oh, yes! I know," replied Claude. "You leave that to me."

Not another word was said, and the highwaymen, fixing their eyes in the direction from which the carriage was coming, waited its approach impatiently.

They had not to wait long.

Upon Tom King devolved the task of calling out to the driver to stop.

Experience had taught him that the most effectual way to accomplish his purpose was to fire a pistol in the air beforehand, and then take advantage of the momentary confusion that the report was sure to occasion to call out "Halt!"

In nine cases out of ten the vehicle would be brought to a standstill at once.

But on this particular night Tom King wished to make no more noise than was absolutely necessary.

He was well aware that his enemies were on the road, and his impression was that the police officers had been attracted to the stage-coach by the discharge of the blunderbuss.

As soon as the carriage was near enough, he planted himself boldly in the centre of the highway, and cried out:

"Pull up your horses, coachman, or you are a dead man!"

The tones of Tom King's voice were quite sufficient, one would think, to convince anybody that he fully meant what he said.

But the driver of this particular carriage paid not the slightest attention to his command.

On the contrary, he lashed his horses fiercely with his whip, and had not Tom King moved promptly on one side, he would certainly have been ridden over.

With a rush, the carriage swept past, but Claude Duval was in readiness, and by a few bounds he soon had his horse on a level with those which were harnessed to the carriage.

We have frequently described the method they adopted when stopping a carriage.

Claude seized hold of the bridle of one of the horses, and pulled it towards him.

Of course the horse obeyed the impulse, and curved round, the one on the other side of the pole naturally following his example.

Before the driver was aware of it, the carriage was placed across the road.

He pulled the reins violently, but the horses only backed, and the consequence was that the hind wheels sank into the ditch with a crash.

Claude retained his hold upon the horse's bridle, for he knew his companions would be quite sufficient to attend to the occupants of the carriage.

The driver saw him, however, and knew what he was about, and, thrusting his hand into a sort of case by his side, drew out a pistol, which he rapidly brought to the level and fired.

The bullet in its course made a disagreeable furrow in Claude's cheek, and caused not a little acute pain.

"Confound you!" said Claude, whose passion for the moment got the better of him. "Take that!"

He fired as he spoke, and the driver rolled off his seat on to the road.

Whether he was killed, or whether he had altogether escaped injury, Claude could not tell.

At the same moment, a loud shriek reached his ears.

It came evidently from the interior of the carriage, and from female lips.

In the meanwhile, Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack had galloped after the carriage, and as soon as it was drawn across the road, they rode up to the windows.

Sixteen-String Jack went to the one on the further side, and narrowly escaped being hurled into the ditch when the horses backed so suddenly.

But he escaped, and that was sufficient.

The next moment he was at the door of the carriage, and he let down the window at the same moment that Tom King let down the one on the other side.

Both rested their pistols on the ledge of the window in a somewhat threatening manner, and then, bending their heads, looked in.

What they saw, however, considerably astonished them, and was totally unlike what they had anticipated.

On the back seat of the carriage three persons were seated, and two more occupied the front seat.

The two last were men, and attired in a grotesque and singular-looking style, which savoured more of the monastic than aught else.

At least, that was the impression of the two highwaymen at first sight.

And after a closer investigation, they were the more convinced.

The other three persons were females.

The one sitting next to Tom King, and the one next Sixteen-String Jack, were attired precisely alike.

They had on their heads white bonnets of a most peculiar fashion, which projected at least six inches from their faces, forming a kind of tube.

Their gowns were perfectly black.

All this the two highwaymen saw at a glance, and were satisfied by bestowing a glance upon them.

The whole of their attention was excited by another object—and they literally riveted their gaze upon the person who sat in between the two females we have just described.

CHAPTER DLXXIX.

OLD MATTHEW KEEPS HIS APPOINTMENT WITH DICK TURPIN AT THE GIBBET ON THE FINCHLEY ROAD.

THE sun had set, and confusing shadows were beginning to stretch themselves over the landscape, when Dick Turpin quitted the gipsy encampment.

Half an hour's gallop would take him to the gibbet on the Finchley Road, which was the spot appointed for the meeting, and so he was quite sure of reaching his destination in good time.

He took every precaution he could think of to avoid meeting with or being seen by anyone; and at last he crossed the little triangular-shaped piece of ground at the junction of the roads, and concealed himself among the trees, as he had done on the occasion when he waited there for the appearance of his three comrades.

Even at that early hour the dismal spot seemed lonely and deserted; but Dick Turpin was proof against all foolish fears, and so, dismounting from his steed, he flung himself at full length upon the ground, and longed for the moment to arrive when his old and well-tried friend should make his appearance.

He summoned up all the patience he could, for he knew that it was very probable old Matthew would be unable to reach the appointed spot before midnight.

His house might be watched, and he might have a difficulty in getting away unperceived; and Dick knew well enough that old Matthew would not be the one to get him into trouble by any careless or thoughtless act.

But his thoughts almost drove him distracted, for ever present before his mind was Maud seated in one of the gloomy cells of Newgate.

At last Dick Turpin's ears caught the sound of revolving wheels.

He listened for a moment, and then he murmured:

"The stage-coach is coming. Well, it will not be stopped by me to-night."

The peculiar beat of the horses' hoofs, as well as the rapidity with which the lumbering vehicle was drawn along the road, convinced Dick that he was right.

In a little while the coach, with its steaming horses and bright shining lights, came into view and swept past instantly.

He listened to it as it receded.

It was going from, not to, London.

Suddenly it stopped, and then, after a minute's delay, started again.

Dick rose to his feet and peered through the branches of the trees.

In a little while a dusky-looking figure came in sight, and he watched it with breathless suspense.

It crossed over and paused at the foot of the gibbet.

Then a faint whistle, like the cry of some night-bird disturbed upon its perch, broke the silence that reigned around, and Dick Turpin, with a half-suppressed cry of pleasure and satisfaction upon his lips, rushed forward.

In another minute he was tightly grasping old Matthew's hand.

"Come this way, Matthew," he said, hurriedly—"come this way! We will not remain here for fear we should be seen. Black Bess is close at hand, and we can remain by her side with the certainty of being seen by no one."

"All right, Dick!" said Matthew, with emotion, as he seated himself by the highwayman's side. "I am delighted to see you, Dick! I am glad to find you are still in safety. Not having heard from you for so long, I wondered what had happened."

"No doubt you would, but I must postpone the relation of my adventures to another time. I have something very important to say to you. You got my letter, of course?"

"Oh, yes! That pretty gipsy girl brought it. By-the-way, Dick, is that a new sweetheart of yours? Where did you find her?"

"I met her by chance," was the reply, "and she offered to be the bearer of the letter, that's all I know about her. I entrusted her with it, because I could tell by her countenance that she would deliver it faithfully."

"So she did, Dick, and in a manner that won my heart completely. Since you paid me a visit last, my house has been more closely watched by the police than ever. They are continually coming in and out all the day long, and watching everything I do.

"Well, when this girl came in, a couple of police officers were standing at the bar counter.

"They looked sharply at her, I can assure you, and I suppose they came to the conclusion that it was not you in disguise.

"Well, she came up to the counter, and instead of making any fuss about the matter, or assuming any secret or mysterious aspect, she said:

"'Are you Mr. Gale?'

"'Yes,' I replied.

"'Then,' said she, 'here is a letter for you.

"She gave it to me in the most unconcerned manner you could imagine—in fact, I was quite taken in by it, for I didn't believe it was anything of importance. However, when I opened it, I found how much I had been mistaken."

"And you gave her the two guineas, Matthew?"

"Of course I did! Bless her heart, she ought to have had four! If she had come creeping in, and whispering, and making a great secret of it, I should have had the officers after me to-night watching every step I took, so that it would have been impossible for me to meet you."

"Are you sure that none have followed you as it is?"

"Oh yes—quite sure.

"I put the letter in my pocket, and said to the officers that I told you were standing at the counter:

"'I have had a bit of bad news, gentlemen.'

"'What is it, Matthew?' they asked.

"'Well,' said I, 'you know St. Albans?'

"'To be sure we do!'

"'Do you know the Bull's Head there?'

"'Is it that inn opposite the market-place?'

"'Yes,' I replied, 'that is it. Did you happen to know that that was kept by a brother-in-law of mine?'

"'No,' they said, 'we don't.'

"'Well, it is, and he's just sent his girl over to me with a letter to say that my sister has been taken suddenly ill, and is not expected to live. She wants to see me very much, so I shall be off this afternoon. Do you know what time the coach starts?'

"'Yes—at half-past four.'

"'Well, then,' said I, 'it's time I began to get ready.'

"Well, Dick, with that I made all my preparations, and walked off to the coach-office in Piccadilly.

"I looked behind me all the way I went, and just as I was getting on the top of the coach I saw one of the officers peeping round the corner.

"He did not know that I saw him, but I did, and I saw his countenance change, and I could tell by the expression of it that he had made up his mind all was right, and that for once in my life I had told him the truth."

"Do you feel sure, Matthew, that he had no suspicion? It will turn out very awkward for both of us if he had."

"Don't distress yourself on that score, Dick, my boy. Take my word for it that all is right. Would it not be proof enough in all conscience? I spoke off without any hesitation as soon as ever I read the letter, and then he would see me get into the St. Albans coach, and you must also know that my brother-in-law does keep the Bull's Head, which is the largest inn in the town.

"I stopped the coach a little while ago, got down, and here I am."

"I am much beholden to you, Matthew," replied Dick, "more so than I can express."

"Pho—pho! Don't talk about that. You said in your letter that something serious had happened, that you were in trouble, and wanted my advice. Let me have all the particulars at once."

For a moment Dick was undecided whether to tell Matthew first what had befallen Maud, or what had become of his three companions.

He resolved upon the latter, and, in as few words as he could, told the landlord how they had gone off to the New Forest in search of the treasure, and had not returned, although they ought to have done so several days back.

He ended by telling about the officers being in the deserted mansion, and asked him if he could suggest any means by which they could be warned of their danger.

Old Matthew was puzzled, and rubbed his bald head vigorously.

"Do you know which way they are coming back?"

"No, that I do not know."

"Then it is more awkward than I thought. I was going to propose that you should ride off in the direction of the forest, and endeavour to meet with them."

"I should do that, Matthew, but something else has occurred which prevents me."

Dick then communicated to old Matthew what particulars he could respecting Maud's capture.

Matthew heard him to the end, and expressed his indignation in no measured terms.

"I had heard about this," he said, "but I did not believe it, simply because so many false tales had been set afloat. However, it seems that this is perfectly true."

"It is true," said Dick, "though what object they could have in making her a prisoner, or what charge they could prefer against her, I am at a loss to conceive."

"Let me consider a moment," said old Matthew. "I did not pay so much attention to what I heard as I ought to have done; however, it amounted to this—I was told some young woman had been captured and taken before the magistrate at Bow Street, upon the charge of being an accomplice of yours."

"Taken before the magistrate?" exclaimed Dick.

"Yes, that's it! And I heard she was committed to take her trial upon the charge."

"What charge?"

"That of being your accomplice."

Dick was silent for a moment, and then he asked, in a trembling voice:

"Do you think this is really true, Matthew?"

"I feel pretty sure of it, after what you have told me, though at first, as I said, I took no notice of it."

"This vexes me greatly," said Dick, "and so you see the dilemma in which I am placed. Maud is a prisoner in Newgate. Do you think I could maintain my patience while she is within those gloomy walls? No, she must be set at liberty at once!"

"But how, Dick—how?"

"That I don't know, Matthew. My position is a difficult one. Pray give me your advice!"

"I must have a little time to think, Dick. There's one important question I want to ask."

"What?"

"Do you know whether Mr. Wriggles had any hand in making Maud prisoner?"

"I cannot speak from actual knowledge," said Turpin, "but I believe he had; at any rate, he was on the spot."

"That's quite sufficient," said old Matthew.

"What do you mean?"

"Simply this. Mr. Wriggles is rather a clever fellow—I mean he is cunning. He has had one or two pitched battles with me, but has always come off second best."

"He has."

"Well, then, you may make sure that if Mr. Wriggles took Maud prisoner, he had some particular motive—some end to serve by doing so."

"But what?"

"That I don't know, but by thinking the matter over from beginning to end, we might manage to hit upon the truth."

[OLD MATTHEW IS SEIZED AND RECOGNISED BY THE POLICE OFFICERS.]

"Did you not say that Maud was your wife?"

"Yes."

"Were you married in the regular way?"

"Well, not exactly, but as nearly as we could manage We had a real parson to read the service, though the remony wasn't performed in a church."

"Then you are married?"

"There can be no doubt about that!"

"Does Mr. Wriggles know it?"

"Yes. I am sure he knows she is my wife."

"Then that makes the matter a great deal clearer," said Matthew.

"I can't see that?"

"But I can. As she is your wife, of course she could be charged with being your accomplice. She uld be free from all punishment on that ground."

"Then why has she been made prisoner?"

"Why, I suppose Mr. Wriggles has often seen you both gether—has he not?"

"Many times."

"And would come to the conclusion that you were much attached to each other?"

"Very likely he would."

"Then I think I can put two and two together, and make four of it!"

"Speak out plainly, Matthew."

"I will; and if this isn't Mr. Wriggles's plan I am not half so clever as I have always believed myself to be!"

Dick Turpin waited impatiently for Matthew to continue.

"He would pretend to know nothing about the marriage—he would pretend to disbelieve she was your wife, and so get her taken up before the magistrate and committed for trial. I suppose Maud would be unable to produce any proof of her marriage?"

"Quite."

"Then Mr. Wriggles has gained his purpose by having her confined in Newgate! Can't you see that?"

"No; I cannot."

"Well, then, he thinks if she is there you will not rest until you have set her at liberty. He calculates that you will try some desperate scheme or other to assist her to escape. He will think that you will be hovering round Newgate like a moth round a candle. He will have lots of men about, and all of them very busy looking everywhere. When he caught sight of you near the prison, he would gradually close his forces round you; and then, when you had unsuspectingly gone into some place from which you could not make a retreat, he would bring all his men down upon you, and, as a matter of course, nabbed you would be!"

Old Matthew delivered his opinion with considerable emphasis.

Dick Turpin was silent—almost stunned, in fact,—it was quite a fresh revelation to him.

"And, Matthew," he asked at length, "do you really think that is his scheme?"

"I do, Dick. The more I ponder over it, the more convinced do I feel that I have hit the right nail on the head this time!"

CHAPTER DLXXX.

OLD MATTHEW GIVES DICK TURPIN SOME ADVICE, AND IS INTERRUPTED IN HIS CONFERENCE.

This time old Matthew spoke with more emphasis than before, for every second that elapsed only served to convince him that he was perfectly correct in his surmises.

As the reader knows full well, he had arrived very closely at the truth, and it may seem not a little strange that he should be enabled to do so.

But the fact was, the landlord of the White Horse Inn possessed, in a very great degree, that faculty which is called intuition.

He never could explain the process, but in some mysterious way he seemed to jump at conclusions.

On the present occasion, however, he had more to guide him than he usually had, for he had made the character of Mr. Wriggles a perfect study for some time past.

Besides, several little schemes which had been planned by the astute officer, and which from some cause or other had failed, had been brought under his notice, and, judging the man's disposition and the temperament of his mind, he came to a conclusion which was so much like the truth as to scarcely differ from it in any particular.

Dick Turpin was amazed, not so much at Matthew's having arrived at a solution of the affair in the way he had, but at the cunningness of the plan itself.

Some minutes elapsed before he spoke a word in reply, and then he said:

"Do you really think that Mr. Wriggles has planned such a deep-laid scheme as this? The villain shall rue the consequences of having put Maud to this indignity!"

"I feel pretty sure of it," said Matthew—"as sure as I could of anything that I do not positively know to be true. What you are to do in the matter I really have not the least idea."

"As to what is to be done," exclaimed Dick, "Maud must be set at liberty—that is perfectly clear. The thing to be considered is the manner in which it is to be done."

"Exactly!" replied Matthew. "And it strikes me that is just where you will find the difficulty."

Dick Turpin clasped his hands tightly over his forehead, as though by that means he could calm the turmoil of his thoughts.

There was again a silence, for old Matthew was thinking too.

"Matthew," said Turpin, removing his hands, "Maud must be set at liberty without delay! Can you tell me how it is to be done?"

"I can't, Dick. Mr. Wriggles quite anticipates that you will come to this decision. You can't set Maud free without going to Newgate. Mr. Wriggles and all the police officers in London will be surrounding it, so that it will be impossible for you to approach without being captured."

"It is most perplexing!" said Dick, 'and to add to my annoyance, my three comrades are far away. If they were with me, we might, by conferring together, manage to hit upon something."

"But how—how? What could you do? Maud is in Newgate, and it would be certain death for either of you to go near the place!—and you may depend no ordinary precautions will be omitted in order to make her quite secure.'

"But is it not impossible that she should remain a prisoner in one of those loathsome cells? I know from experience what it is to be confined in Newgate, and can imagine the indignities to which she will be subjected."

"Well, I confess I can't, for the life me, see how she is to be set at liberty. You are truly in an embarrassing situation, Dick. The position of your three comrades is certainly very critical. You say you expect them every hour?"

"I do. They ought to have been back days ago."

"Then perhaps at this very moment, while we are sitting here conversing together, they are riding, unsuspectingly, into a terrible danger. The thought that the police officers have taken up their quarters in the deserted mansion, and are on the watch for their return, will never occur to them."

"Don't picture anything so terrible," said Dick, "or you will drive me mad!"

"I have no wish to do that, or alarm you unnecessarily. All I want to do is to enable you to understand your position fully."

"I know you have the best intentions, Matthew. I fancy from your manner that you have something to propose?"

"Well, I have, Dick; and to me it seems that it is the only reasonable thing you can do. My advice, however, will not, I fancy, be very palatable to you, therefore, if you have thought of anything yourself—if you have anything to propose—let me hear it first; if not, then I will speak."

"Matthew, my friend, I am so bewildered and perplexed, and torn by so many conflicting emotions, that I am unable to come to any determination at all."

"I do not wonder at that; and although I am not quite so deeply interested as yourself, yet I am nearly so; it is, therefore, reasonable that I should be calmer of the two."

"Well, Matthew, let me hear what it is you have to propose. I can assure you I am quite baffled, and cannot think of anything myself."

"I suppose, then, that I am right in thinking that you have more affection for Maud, and that you have her welfare nearer to your heart, than that of your companions."

"You are right, Matthew! And can you wonder at it?"

"I don't; and I only mentioned it in order that I might feel sure I was correct as I proceeded."

"Go on, then! You are quite right so far."

"But, Dick, you would not be so selfish and unjust as to be heedless of their deadly peril simply because Maud is in a disagreeable position?"

Dick Turpin bent a searching gaze upon his companion, but said nothing.

"I may as well come to the point at once," continued old Matthew, "without beating about the bush."

"Do so—do so!"

"Well, then, to speak plainly, I should recommend you to allow Maud to remain where she is until you have rejoined your companions."

"Never—never! I cannot listen to such a proposition as that for a moment! It is my duty to see that she is set at liberty, and I will do it! That consideration rises above all others. No—no, Matthew, I cannot consent to that!"

Turpin spoke with great impetuosity, and the landlord made no attempt to interrupt him.

As soon as he had finished his excited speech, however, Matthew said:

"I was prepared for great and violent opposition on your part. I knew you would not relish my proposal, yet if you will give me your consideration for a little while, I think I shall be able to reconcile you to it."

Turpin shook his head doubtfully.

"At least," urged Matthew, "you will not refuse to hear what I have to say in favour of my proposal?"

"No, certainly not! You have every claim upon my attention."

"If you do not think my reasons good and sufficient ones, you have no need to do as I desire."

"I am impatient, Matthew, to hear what you have to say. If I don't accede to your proposition unconditionally, and as it now stands, yet something may be moulded out of it."

"Precisely! There is no need for me to speak of the perilous position of your three comrades. Destruction may come upon them at any moment."

"True—true!"

"Does not their case seem urgent in the extreme? Upon their part, any delay in receiving a warning from you would be fatal; and if they were made prisoners as well as Maud, then what kind of a position should you find yourself in?"

Dick was silent.

"Your hands would then be tied behind your back completely," continued Matthew. "You would not be able to do anything. I can judge how mortified you feel at the manner in which Maud has been treated; but the mischief has been done—the worst is over. To you it is repulsive in the highest degree that she should remain a prisoner a moment longer, yet as she is already there, can being detained a little longer make much difference?"

"I understand what you mean, Matthew," replied Dick, "and I am forced to admit that you have reason and common sense on your side."

"Good!" said Matthew, rubbing his hands together.

"But my brain burns when I think of Maud being a tenant of that gloomy abode, and I seem as though I could not resist the desire to make a bold and desperate effort to set her free!"

"That will never do, Dick—take my word for it—that will never do! I am certain that such measures have been adopted that you could not go within half a mile of Newgate without being surrounded by at least fifty police officers, and when you were in that position what could you do? You would either have to surrender, or else allow yourself to be slain; and, provided either of these things happened, what chance would Maud have of getting free then?"

Dick was silent, for he found himself unable to frame a reasonable reply to Matthew's last question.

"And," continued the landlord, perceiving that he had gained a point, "I really do not see why you should not resign yourself to Maud remaining a prisoner for a little while. If you could only do that, there would be no need of setting her at liberty at all."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean this—things are very bad indeed, and you must make the best of them. I consider you would be making the best of them by allowing Maud to remain in Newgate a few days longer, and then she would be set at liberty by the authorities themselves."

"Set free?"

"Yes. Next Monday the sessions will begin at the Old Bailey, and, to put a great many words into a few, my advice is that you permit Maud to be brought to trial upon the charge against her. I will suggest a means to you by which you may almost make sure of her acquittal, and, under any circumstances, I shall appeal to you whether it would not be better to let things take their course than to run your neck into a halter just for the sake of three or four days' discomfort?"

"No—no, Matthew! I cannot and will not accede to anything of the kind! The idea of Maud being brought to the bar at the Old Bailey is most repugnant to my feelings! It must not—shall not be!"

"I can't help thinking you very foolish for pronouncing such words," said old Matthew; "and, if I am not mistaken, you will change your determination in a little while. Do you not think that, if the circumstances were explained to Maud, she would gladly and willingly consent to remain a prisoner for a few days, rather than you should attempt the hopeless, impossible task of setting her free?"

"She would consent to it!" replied Dick; "she would make any sacrifice for me! But I am determined that she shall not in this case!"

"Turpin, my friend, if I thought there was the ghost of a chance of your succeeding in setting her free, I would not make this proposal; but my deliberate conviction is that you might as well try to put the full moon into your waistcoat pocket—and that's about the most impossible thing I can think of," added the landlord.

"I am certainly most awkwardly placed," said Dick; "I can see the full force of all you have said, but yet I can't bring myself to think with any amount of patience upon the prospect of Maud remaining a prisoner."

"Well, as the sessions are to begin so soon, it does not appear a very dreadful matter. If it was determined that you should set her free, and you began to take the necessary steps to-day, say without any further delay, the probability is, that three days at least would elapse before your purpose could be accomplished. You could not do it in half-an-hour, could you?"

Dick Turpin was forced to admit that he could not.

"Remember your comrades, too," added old Matthew. "They have been faithful friends to you, and never hesitated to make any sacrifice, in order that your safety might be secured. While situated as they now are, journeying as I might say to certain death, don't you think it is your duty to use your best exertions to save them (and doubtless if you tried you would succeed) than to obstinately persist in doing that which can only result in your own capture or death.

CHAPTER DLXXXI.

DICK TURPIN'S CONFERENCE WITH OLD MATTHEW MEETS WITH A SUDDEN INTERRUPTION.

Matthew Gale pronounced these words with great impressiveness and emphasis. Every syllable he uttered seemed to strike upon Dick Turpin's heart with full force of conviction.

The worthy landlord warmed with his subject, and finding the highwayman made no effort to gainsay him, he determined to proceed.

"I know you have the greatest affection for Maud," he said; "and I can easily comprehend the state of your feelings; but in considering her, you must not overlook your companions. While in Newgate she is at least in safety—at the very worst, all that she can suffer is a little longer imprisonment and an appearance before the court. On the other hand, unless some active steps are immediately taken, the doom of your companions is sealed."

"Matthew," said Turpin, "I requested you to come here in order that I might obtain your advice, I felt that I was incompetent to reflect and to decide upon any course of action, therefore I do not close my ears to what you say, though I find it very hard indeed to agree with you."

"No doubt—no doubt; but then my mind is not so perturbed as yours, and on these grounds I think what I say should be entitled to your consideration."

"I know you would advise me for the best."

"I would, Dick—I would; and now I will ask you this: whether it would not be better for Maud to be honourably and legally acquitted of the charge preferred against her, and so set at liberty unconditionally, than for her to be taken out of prison by violent and illegal means. In the first case she could never be apprehended on this charge, and I imagine it is the only one that can be brought against her, while in the second case, all police officers would have an undisputed right to seize and make her a prisoner again."

Turpin saw the force of this, and began to waver.

"If," he said, hesitatingly, "I could feel sure she would be acquitted, and if I could make certain of saving the lives of my comrades, I don't think I should hesitate to do as you advise."

"I rejoice to hear you say that, Dick, because it makes me think that in a little while you will coincide with me entirely."

"You said you could suggest some means by which an acquittal could be obtained?"

"I did," replied Matthew.

"What is it?"

"Did you not tell me that a regular authorised parson performed the marriage ceremony between you?"

"Most certainly."

"But I suppose, owing to peculiar circumstances, you omitted to obtain from him a certificate that the ceremony had been performed?"

"I did omit it," replied Dick, "for I never thought that such a thing would be needed."

"I thought not; but, nevertheless, it is a great pity, for if you only happened to have that certificate, it could be put in as evidence at the trial, and would conclusively prove that Maud was your wife, and then, as you know very well, she would be set free."

"But I have no paper of the kind," said Turpin.

"But I should not think it impossible to obtain one. Do you know where this parson lives?"

"No, but my comrades do, for they went and fetched him."

"Then there's all the more reason why you should seek them out; and if you were to go to this parson's residence, don't you think that the four of you could persuade him into giving you the certificate you want?"

Old Matthew placed such a peculiar emphasis on the word "persuade" that Dick could not forbear a smile

"I might do such a thing, certainly," he said.

"Of course you might, and very easily, too. Now, I appeal to you whether this is not a reasonable proceeding for you to adopt? Maud only suffers a temporary inconvenience. No harm will befall her. You save the lives of your comrades, obtain proof of your marriage, have it handed into the court, and Maud is set free; but, independently of all that, I should rejoice if it was done!"

"Why?"

"Because old Wriggles would be defeated once more. I can picture to myself how he felicitates himself upon having hatched up such a scheme, and when he finds it so easily defeated, and that such a good chance of capturing you has been lost, he will be so enraged that I should not wonder if he was to run out and lay violent hands upon himself in his desperate disappointment."

Old Matthew chuckled over the prospective discomfiture of his old foe.

The more Dick Turpin reflected upon what the landlord had said, the more he became convinced of its likelihood to answer the end in view.

He could not deny that it would be much better for Maud to regain her freedom by proper and straightforward instead of illegal means; and then came the consideration of his companions, about whom he felt the greatest possible amount of dread.

It was not likely that so astute an individual as Matthew should be unaware of the effect he had already produced, and so he determined to clinch the matter.

"And," he cried, "supposing that Maud was not acquitted? She would be taken back to Newgate, and you would be no worse off than you are now—not so bad, indeed, because by that time you would have your three comrades with you, and you would stand a much better chance of setting her free; and, after all, it is not so dreadful that she should remain prisoner for such a little while."

"You must not think," said Turpin, "that I am reconciled to your plan; but I feel constrained to adopt it, because I can't see what else is to be done under the circumstances. I can't bear the idea of Maud being a prisoner, while you think of it with comparative unconcern."

"She is not in danger of her life," said old Matthew, "and your companions are, besides which, as I said before, and as you yourself know very well, it would be impossible for you to set her at liberty."

"Well, Matthew, I shall act upon your advice. We will part now. I am heartily obliged to you for the kind interest you have shown—you have cast a new light upon everything, and I will lose no time in riding off to meet my companions. Then we will obtain the certificate from the parson, and I hope all will be well."

"So do I," said Matthew; "but before I leave you, I should be glad to know how near you are to the accomplishment of your idea of obtaining an inn for yourselves?"

"I am glad you spoke of that, Matthew, for it reminds me of something. I can't stop now to tell you my adventures; but, however, it will be sufficient for me to say that I have about me a very large sum of money. It is an encumbrance to me, and I should be glad if you will take charge of it until it is required. Who knows where I shall have to go, and this money, so far from being any service, would be a hindrance to me."

"I have no objection to oblige you in such a pleasant affair as that!" said old Matthew. "Hand it over to me!"

Dick Turpin thereupon gave to old Matthew nearly the whole of the money he had been successful in taking from the deserted mansion, retaining only a few guineas for his immediate use.

This transaction did not occupy many minutes, and when it was concluded, Dick said:

"Now, where can we arrange to meet again? Let us appoint some place! Shall it be here? We have, then, only to fix the time."

Old Matthew suddenly took hold of Turpin by the arm, and clutched it tightly.

Bending forward until his mouth was close to the highwayman's ear, he said:

"Hush! Listen! I fancied I heard a dry twig snap, as though some one was endeavouring to approach us unperceived!"

Dick Turpin started, for during this interview he had, to a very great extent, forgot his usual caution, which is not to be wondered at considering the nature of the subjects under discussion.

The very next moment the sound which had attracted the attention of old Matthew was repeated.

"There's some one creeping up behind us!" he whispered. "Quick, Dick! Mount and ride away for your life—make haste! Leave me here—I can shift for myself, and am in no danger—quick, I say!"

Thus urged, Turpin sprang into the saddle. He had been holding Black Bess by the bridle, and was about to leave, so that this was all the more quickly accomplished.

Scarcely had he done so, however, than he heard the rush of footsteps behind him.

Convinced that there was danger, and that his best plan was to fly, he uttered that faint cry which Black Bess so well understood.

She gave one bound forward that took her clear of the vegetation around, and then the open, triangular space was gained.

Across this she flew at full gallop, and was instantly lost to view in the darkness of the night.

In the meanwhile, those persons who had rushed forward laid violent hands upon old Matthew, who, however, made no resistance at all.

Dick Turpin was so quickly out of sight that they knew it would be folly for them to attempt to overtake him, and so they all clustered round the landlord, resolved to make sure of one prisoner at least.

Despite his remonstrances, they dragged him through the trees in the direction they had come, and directly afterwards emerged upon the broad high-road.

"We've got one of them!" cried a voice, and Mathew, looking around, found the suspicions he had entertained to be confirmed.

He had been seized by a number of police officers who were on foot, while others on horseback were drawn up across the road.

"Bring him along, then!" cried out some one else, in reply.

In obedience to the command, the officers dragged the landlord forward.

It was a very dark night, and objects could not be distinguished with anything like plainness, and the officers and their prisoner only seemed a dusky, indistinct mass.

The officers paused when near to those on horseback, and one of them said:

"We've lost the right one, I fancy; but here's one of his accomplices at any rate!"

"A lantern!" said a voice,—"where's the lantern?—show a light here at once!"

A little confusion followed this order, and then a dark lantern was produced.

The slide which was over the lens was removed, and then a broad beam of light streamed forth.

This beam of light was directed upon the prisoner.

Old Matthew's countenance was fully revealed, and he looked at the lantern before him with an unwinking eye.

Then the voice which had ordered the production of the lantern uttered a bitter execration:

"We've done no good," he cried—"not a bit! I know that rascal well enough—he's the landlord of the White Horse in Drury Lane, and the deepest old file in London! Release him—let him go—he's a dangerous article to meddle with; we can get no good by detaining him; there's no reward offered for his apprehension; we can prove nothing against him—let him go!"

"But we heard him talking, if you please sir!" said one of the officers, who had hold of old Mathew.

"Never mind—I am not going to run the risk of getting myself into trouble! He's a great deal too cunning to be meddled with! Let him go, I say!"

The officers let go their hold, and old Matthew took off his hat and made a low but ironical bow.

"I am much obliged to you, gentlemen," he said, "and I have the pleasure of wishing you a very good evening! You can take me prisoner if you like, I am indifferent about it!"

"I dare say you are; you'd like to get us all into trouble rather than otherwise; but you sha'n't do it with me, Mr. Gale—we know better, and you may find that there are others in London quite as cunning as yourself!"

CHAPTER DLXXXII.

OLD MATTHEW WORKS THE OFFICERS UP TO A HIGH PITCH OF AGGRAVATION.

THROUGHOUT the progress of this history it has been our aim to leave as few strange circumstances as possible unexplained; and as the sudden appearance of the officers, and the behaviour of the one in command may seem not a little mysterious, we will give some words of explanation which will have the effect of making all clear.

To do this, it will be necessary to remind the reader of what old Matthew had stated with respect to the arrival of the gipsy girl at the inn.

The offhanded, careless manner in which she delivered the letter, and the cleverness with which old Matthew so quickly hatched up a pretence for leaving home, had the effect of disarming the officers of their suspicions.

At the first flush the affair seemed straightforward and open enough, and the probability is, that if anyone else but old Matthew had told them such a thing they would have believed it without hesitation.

But after the lapse of a little while, when they began to think over what he had said, and to remember the character of the man himself, their suspicions sprang into existence very rapidly and very strongly indeed.

In anticipation of a visit being paid by some of the highwaymen, a very close watch had for a length of time been maintained by the officers in and about the old inn.

In addition to this, the landlord himself was generally followed wherever he went, for although they could not bring it home to him, yet the officers were quite certain that he maintained an intimacy with the knights of the road.

As time passed on the suspicions of the officers grew stronger and stronger, and when finally old Matthew took his departure, they reached the culminating point.

Then there was a long, whispered discussion upon the subject, and at last the one in command said:

"The tale he told was plausible enough, and surely ought to be believed; but I doubt the man, and I think you do so too?"

"We do—we do!" was the response.

"Very well, then; what shall we do?"

The officers unanimously proposed to follow old Mathew.

But their chief, when he heard the proposition, put his finger to the side of his nose, smiled, and shook his head in a very waggish, knowing manner.

"He's as cunning as a fox is old Matthew," he said, "and it may be that the very thing he wants to do is to draw us all out of the house and lead us off upon some false scent. What we have seen has very likely been devised by him, with the intention of throwing us off our guard."

This was a fresh view of the case to the remainder of the officers; but when they heard it, all considered it sounded very probable indeed.

"It won't do for us to leave this place; I feel more certain of that the more I think about it! No—no, old Matthew won't make a fool of me so easily!"

"But what do you propose?" one of the officers ventured to ask.

"Well, it may be that the whole affair is genuine, and that he is really going off to St. Albans for the purpose he mentioned: the thing is to find that out. Now, I'll mount, and take a circuitous route to some spot from which I can command a view of the coach office, and also see the coach start."

The officers nodded their heads and murmured their approbation.

"I shall keep a sharp look-out upon that coach, you may depend," continued the chief. "If old Matthew comes up in a proper business-like way, and books his place and enters the vehicle and it drives off with him, I shall think for once he has told us the truth, but if he dosen't come, and the coach starts without him I shall make the best of my way back here, and we can keep an uncommonly sharp look-out."

"And so we will while you're gone, sir," said the man.

"You can't do better, and as we understand each other quite well I'll be off, or else I shall hardly be in time to see the coach start."

With these words the officer took his departure, and the reader will remember that old Mathew told Turpin that just as he was getting on to the roof of the coach he caught sight of an officer peeping round the corner.

This was the officer of whom we have just been speaking, and who, as we are well aware, had the satisfaction, if such it was, of seeing the landlord in the most straightforward manner possible pay for his place and take his seat.

Then the coach drove off, and the officer, with something like disappointment on his features, turned his horse's head in the direction of Drury Lane.

But before he had gone very far the feeling of disappointment which he had experienced wore away, and fresh ideas began to rise up in his mind.

The tenor of his thoughts may be guessed by the following words which he muttered half aloud and half to himself as he drew rein:

"I have a good horse," he said—"a very good horse, one that can do a short journey at an amazing speed; I'll follow the coach—that's what I'll do, and see the matter out to the end!"

Accordingly, the officer at a sharp trot made his way towards Piccadilly, from which place the coach had started.

But his thoughts changed, and he said:

"No, I will not follow the coach, that won't do—old Matthew is too cunning; if he knew I was behind he would ride right on to St. Albans, and go to the public-house he spoke of. I think I shall be a match for old Matthew after all; I will take the nearest way across the country, and by using the spur I shall be able to reach St. Albans half-an-hour before the coach arrives! I shall see then what old Matthew does, and be guided by circumstances! If I want assistance I can easily have it, for there are plenty of police officers in the town!"

We cannot refrain from giving to this police officer the amount of credit which was his due, for it was certainly a very ingenious proceeding upon his part.

Away, then, he galloped across the country, urging his horse onwards by every means in his power, and finally pulled up in front of the Bull's Head, with his steed covered with foam.

He swung himself from the saddle in a moment, and, breathless with impatience and anxiety, he said to one of the stable helps:

"Has the coach come from London?"

"No," was the reply—"won't be here for half an hour."

The police officer was content, and walking into the inn, called for a glass of cold brandy-and-water at the bar-counter.

He was served by the landlord—old Matthew's brother-in-law.

"My respects," said the officer, as he raised the glass of brandy-and-water to his lips. "I am sorry to hear your wife is so ill. Here's hoping she may be better."

With an affectation of unconcern, the officer drank some brandy-and-water, but all the time he fixed his gaze upon the countenance of the landlord.

"Eh? — what?" stammered that individual in the greatest surprise. "Hope my wife is better? Is she ill?"

"I should think you ought to know!" said the officer, with a grin. "I was told that she was lying at the point of death."

"Oh, it's all nonsense, then! There's some mistake! My wife is well enough! Here she comes!"

As he spoke, the landlady entered the bar.

"I have been misinformed, then," said the officer, calmly. "Well, I'm glad of it. I hope, ma'am, you'll continue to enjoy good health for a length of time."

A few more words passed, and then the officer strolled away.

"Ha, ha!" he said, as soon as he was outside the inn. "That is it, is it, Mr. Matthew? I shall be a match for you yet! I have found him out for once, at all events! Now, then, to see if he will arrive by the coach. If he does, won't I keep my eye on him—that's all!"

With exemplary patience, the officer waited for the arrival of the coach, and at last, with a prodigious clatter, it stopped in front of the inn.

The officer was not much afraid of being seen in the darkness, so he came quite close to the coach, and carefully noted every passenger who descended.

But, as the reader knows full well, old Matthew was not one of the number.

"Confound him!" muttered the officer, in a rage. "He's given me the slip after all! I wonder where on earth he is? Ah, a good thought! I will speak to the guard—I shall be sure to find out something then!"

No sooner was this resolution made than it was carried out.

Going up to the guard, the police officer took out of his pocket the little ebony staff with the gilt crown on the top of it, which was in those days considered as the badge of an officer's authority.

He flourished it round his head once, and then held it within an inch of the guard's nose.

"Do you see that?" he asked.

"Not very well," was the reply, "for I don't squint!"

"I am a police officer! Just pay attention to what I have to say!"

"All right—crack along!"

"Do you remember a big fat man getting up on to the top of the coach at the booking office in Piccadilly?"

"Had he got a blue coat on with brass buttons?"

"Yes—yes! That's the man I mean!"

"Oh, yes! I saw him get up! Is he the chap you're after?"

"Yes."

"Well, who'd ha' thought it now?"

"I want you to tell me just where that man with the blue coat and brass buttons on it, got down?"

"Oh, do you?"

"Yes, I do; and if you are wise, you will tell me without delay—it will be better not to have any suspicions raised that you're an accomplice of his."

The guard seemed rather dismayed at this idea, and he said:

"I'll tell you where he got down with the greatest pleasure in life!"

"Where was it, then?"

"Do you know the gibbet on the Finchley road—I mean where old Hatfield is hung in chains?"

"Yes—yes, I know it!"

"Well, then, it was about a couple of hundred yards this side of that gibbet that he called out for me to stop the coach, and he got down, although he had booked his place, and paid his fare as far as St. Albans."

"Very good!" said the officer, who was highly delighted with the intelligence he had gained. "That will do! If your information turns out to be incorrect, it will be very serious for you!"

"It's quite true!" said the guard. "I'll take my oath any minute that the man in the blue coat and brass buttons got down about two hundred yards this side of the gibbet!"

"Now, what shall I do?" asked the officer to himself. "What's he doing there? What's it mean? I don't know; but I'll try to find out! I'll ride up to the police station and get as many officers as I can, and we will be off to the gibbet! I know the place well, and we shall be sure to find out something!"

This, then, is how it happened that the police officers reached the spot which Dick Turpin had appointed for his conference with old Matthew.

The officers came on with great secresy and caution, and the one from London, constituting himself their chief, commanded several to dismount and creep about in various directions, instructing them, if they found anything unusual, to raise an immediate alarm.

Of course a great deal of time had been consumed by all these proceedings.

After putting down old Matthew, the coach had gone on to St. Albans. Then the officers had collected together and rode back to the gibbet, so that, by the time they began to search about, the long conversation between Dick Turpin and the landlord was almost at an end.

The officers crept cautiously about, peeping and prying into every nook. Presently they fancied they heard the sound of voices, and, in order to ascertain whether they were right or not, pushed on as noiselessly as they could.

Luckily old Matthew heard them, and, as Dick Turpin was just on the point of riding away, he was able to spring into the saddle in a second, and he was off and out of sight in a moment, almost before the officers were aware of what had taken place.

As we have previously described, they seized old Matthew, and brought him into the presence of the officer, who on that night had taken so much pains to achieve so little good.

As a matter of course, he recognised old Matthew instantly, and thoroughly knowing the character of the man made him act in the manner we have already described.

Although circumstances were suspicious, yet there was nothing which could authorise him to take the landlord into custody, so he ordered those who held him to let him go.

It is quite certain that old Matthew would have taken every advantage in his power of any little excess of duty of which the officer might be guilty.

After wishing them good evening, the landlord, chuckling over the officers' defeat, walked at an easy pace along the high-road, in the direction of London.

He had not gone far before he made the discovery that the officers were following him.

"Perhaps they think to find something out," he muttered. "Well, if they are bent upon having a little amusement, I'm not the one to disappoint them!"

Just as old Matthew made this reflection, he noticed that by the side of the road was a broad milestone, and upon this he seated himself as comfortably as he could, and, taking a flask from his pocket, solaced himself with a little drop of the spirit it contained.

In the meanwhile the officers, ignorant of the fact of his having come to a standstill, trotted along the road, and, owing to the darkness of the night, did not perceive old Matthew sitting down until they were close to him.

The landlord was determined they should not pass him by unnoticed, and so he said:

"Good evening, gentlemen, you'll be at London before me."

The chief officer uttered a curse, but he went on down the road for a little while, and then, drawing his men on one side, determined to wait for old Matthew to make his appearance.

When he imagined that their patience was thoroughly exhausted, Matthew rose to his feet and walked a little further.

He passed the spot where the officers were on the watch, and, going a few hundred yards further, he sat down again.

This time he waited longer than before.

The idea now began to take root in the officer's mind that something was meant by all this, and that, if he only had patience and watched, something to their advantage would certainly turn up.

Old Matthew, however, had no other intention than that of making the return journey of the officers to the metropolis as tedious a one as he possibly could, so, to their infinite rage and disgust, he sat down at about every half mile, and waited for an unreasonable long time.

Every time the officers passed him, he repeated his salutation, ending by saying:

"Well, yours are either bad horses, or else mine are very good legs! I should have laid a wager with anybody that you would have got to London a long time before me, but it seems I keep overtaking you every now and then."

Then the officers would utter some very dreadful curses, which grew worse and worse. Every time Matthew repeated his trick their aggravation increased by geometrical proportion; they were very reluctant to confess to themselves the strong probability there was that old Matthew was only playing off a hoax upon them, but every time they passed him the conviction that this was really the case grew stronger and stronger.

Of course old Matthew was immensely gratified when he saw what a furious state all the officers were in.

At last, when they were within about a mile of the coach office in Piccadilly, old Matthew seated himself upon the top rail of a low fence.

"Good evening, gentlemen," he cried, as soon as the officers came past, "I shall beat you yet. They are uncommon bad horses of yours. I could never have thought that I could have come this sort of thing at my time of life, and carrying such a weight as I do, but I do feel awfully tired now. I shall be obliged to take a long rest, and that makes me doubtful now whether you won't get to London first."

"Rest and be d—d!" roared the officer, foaming with passion. "You're a very clever man in your way, Mr. Gale, and you've played the fool to-night with us pretty well, but you shall suffer for it, rest assured of that. Sit there and be d—d!"

"I know it must be very aggravating to you," said old Matthew, "to think that I should be able to keep up with your horses in the way I do, but I can't help it. I shall lay two to one now that I'm in London first."

Nothing would have pleased the officers so much as to have had some revenge upon old Matthew there and then, but they shrank from the thought of meddling with the man; he was a ticklish customer to deal with, and if they did anything more than the law authorised, he would be down upon them like a hammer.

Old Matthew was rather tired, having walked so far, and just in Piccadilly he was so fortunate as to meet with a hackney-coach, which he hired, and in less than an hour afterwards he was seated in the bar parlour at the White Horse, chuckling to himself at the trick he had played the police, and the impotent rage which they had exhibited.

CHAPTER DLXXXIII.

TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK PERFORM A GOOD DEED ON THE HIGHWAY.

We now return to Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack, who, as the reader will remember, were left one at each side of the carriage they had stopped, looking into the interior.

Their attention was immediately concentrated upon the female who sat in between the two others.

It was a young girl, and, so far as they could judge by the dim light, fair and beautiful.

Some rude kind of hood had been flung over her head, which concealed a considerable portion of the countenance.

But what elicited the indignation and astonishment of the highwaymen was that a bandage had been tied round her face in such a manner as to gag her completely.

A piece of cloth had been twisted until it resembled a rope, and this had been forced in between the young girl's teeth, and tied tightly at the back of her head.

Consequently, she was unable to give utterance to any sound louder than a moan, which could not be heard at any great distance.

Her arms also were tied behind her back.

Of course the highwaymen were quite at a loss to comprehend the meaning of this outrage.

Tears were rolling down the prisoner's cheeks, while her features were convulsed with anguish.

It did not take the highwaymen more than a moment to thoroughly comprehend all that we have described.

Tom King was the first to speak.

"What is the meaning of this outrage?" he asked in an imperious tone of voice. "Who are you? By what right have you made this young lady your prisoner?"

"Perhaps you will excuse me if I ask by what right you stop the carriage and propound these questions," said one of the men in the monastic-looking gowns, and speaking in a mocking tone of voice.

"Answer my question! Why have you made that lady your prisoner?"

"As the matter in nowise concerns you, I decline to answer."

"Very well—that is sufficient! Jack!"

"Yes, Tom!"

"Out with the old woman on your side! We will soon settle this business! And," he continued, addressing the two men, "if you venture to resist, you will find the consequences serious, and they will be on your head!"

No notice of this speech was taken by the persons to whom it was addressed.

While speaking, the two highwaymen had simultaneously opened both doors of the carriage, and each seizing hold of the woman nearest to him, dragged her into the road.

It was when the highwaymen thus proceeded to carry their threat into execution that the scream was uttered.

As they were women, our friends offered them no further violence after placing them in the roadway.

But while they were thus engaged, the two men, apparently undeterred by the highwaymen's threats, leaned forward and grasped the young prisoner tightly.

As soon as they saw what had been done, Tom and Jack uttered loud cries of rage.

"Release your hold!" they cried, presenting their pistols.

The sight of the firearms, and the determined manner of those who held them, produced a visible effect, for the two men let go at once.

Half fainting with terror and the rough treatment to which she had been subjected, the young girl was lifted out of the carriage by Tom King.

He swung her easily on to the saddle before him, and retained her in that position by clasping his left arm round her waist.

The two women set up a volley of shrieks, and they obstinately refused to be silent, in spite of the threats to which Claude Duval gave utterance, who, finding he was unable to perform any other service, made himself useful in this way.

The two men were furious with rage, but they evidently thought discretion the better part of valour.

They did not offer to make the least resistance.

"Claude and Jack!" cried Tom King, as soon as he had placed the young girl in the position described.

"Yes—yes?"

"Just see if you can find anything worth taking, and then we will be off."

"All right!" was the ready reply.

"While you are so engaged, I shall have plenty to do; but make haste, or we shall perhaps meet with an interruption!"

During the time he was issuing these instructions, Tom King was by no means idle.

The girl he had rescued from her abductors seemed to have fallen into a state of entire insensibility.

It was an awkward task he had to perform, for he set about removing the twisted piece of linen with which she had been gagged, and which was no doubt a serious impediment to free respiration.

As he was only able to make use of one hand, it was difficult, for the knots had been tied with extreme tightness.

At last, however, he was able to remove the bandage and he was rewarded by hearing a faint sigh issue from the young girl's lips.

What now remained was to untie the bonds by which her arms were secured.

This did not take so long as the former operation.

As soon as ever she felt herself so far free, the young girl, very much to Tom's surprise, commenced a desperate resistance, trying her utmost to get away.

There can be no doubt that she fancied she was still in the hands of her foes.

Tom tried to reassure her.

"All is well," he said, in a calm and soothing voice—"believe me, all is well! You are saved—you have been rescued from those who were evidently bearing you somewhere against your own free will and inclination!"

"Oh yes—yes!"

"Their power over you exists no longer—you are free!"

"And you," said the girl, faintly, and endeavouring to catch a glimpse of Tom's countenance—"who are you?"

"Never mind now—you will know more in a little while. For the present be content with the knowledge

All around him was perfectly silent, and, having glanced hastily about him, he looked down upon the ground.

He saw the marks of many horses' feet; some seemed quite fresh, and others were almost obliterated—some showed that the horses had gone in the direction of the mansion, and others that they had left it.

He came a step nearer, and looked through the gates

Just at this moment, he heard a sudden rushing sound, and then a voice cried:

"Surrender, Dick Turpin, or we fire!"

Scarcely had the words been uttered, than the silence about that deserted spot was broken in upon by the discharge of many firearms.

CHAPTER DLXXIII.

MAUD IS COMMITTED FOR TRIAL UPON THE CHARGE OF COMPLICITY WITH DICK TURPIN.

We must now devote a few words to Maud, for her position fully deserves some amount of attention.

When she was placed in the coach along with the officers she felt completely broken-hearted, and sank down on the seat, and, concealing her face with her hands, wept bitterly.

Most keenly did she feel the humiliation of her present situation, but still it was not that nor the indignity of being fettered like a felon that told so heavily upon her spirits. It was the reflection that in a few hours Dick Turpin would arrive at the farm-house, unconscious of what his enemies had done, and, expecting to find her there, he would fall helplessly and hopelessly into their power.

It was this reflection that made her weep and sob.

Those officers who were seated with her in the interior of the vehicle amused themselves by jeering her and uttering coarse remarks; but, fortunately for herself, Maud was so entirely absorbed in her grief, that, although the words they spoke came upon her ears, yet it was as an incomprehensible sound—she did not understand a syllable.

Perceiving the total indifference with which she treated all their remarks, the officers grew tired of making them, and for a change occupied themselves in talking to each other.

It was a long and miserable ride in that hackney-coach from the farm-house to London.

The horses that were harnessed to the cumbrous equipage were miserable creatures, and already fatigued by the journey they had made from London, and their homeward progress was miserably slow.

Maud wept without ceasing all the way, and by degrees she lost all consciousness of the peril of her position as she contemplated the fearful danger into which Dick Turpin would run with his eyes blindfolded, for Maud was unaware that the farmer's daughter had generously determined to place him on his guard.

At last London was reached.

The appearance of the hackney-coach with a number of officers seated on the top of it and others within, at once made those who saw it aware that a prisoner of some importance had been taken and was on the way to Newgate.

Now that the end of the journey was almost reached, the progress of the hackney-coach was slower than ever, so that the people who were attracted to it were easily able to follow on foot.

This made the vehicle more conspicuous than ever, and others seeing people following it also joined in the throng, so that by the time Newgate was reached an immense crowd had assembled.

The stopping of the coach roused Maud from her abstraction, and looking out of the window she caught sight of the black and frowning walls of Newgate.

She shuddered, and her heart seemed to suddenly grow cold.

The officers got down off the roof of the coach and opened the door.

The others got out and assisted Maud to follow.

She was quite passive, because she felt that any resistance she might make, so far from being any benefit to her, would only be the means of calling forth harsh usage.

She caught one hasty glimpse of the immense crowd of people, and was terrified.

They were shouting and yelling after the fashion of English crowds, but when they saw what the prisoner was like they became suddenly silent, and then their opinions changed as suddenly as a weathercock turns round when the wind changes, and they began to groan and hiss at the police officers.

This, however, lasted but a moment.

The door of Newgate had been opened, and Maud was hurried up the steps into the vestibule.

She saw a confused mass of objects before her, but she was too agitated to make out what they were distinctly.

Then with a clang that seemed to thrill through her whole frame the door was closed.

She dashed the tears from her eyes as well as the handcuffs about her wrists would allow her, and made a great effort to be calm.

The turnkeys who were present looked on in considerable surprise, and wondered what one so young and beautiful could have done to bring her within the clutches of the law.

Mr. Cawthorn was summoned, and he too was astonished when he beheld the prisoner.

But his astonishment materially increased when one of the police officers stepped forward and placed the warrant in his hand.

He just glanced at it, and folding it up and putting it in his pocket, he said:

"Accomplice of Dick Turpin, eh? Oh, very good! I shall know what to do with you. This warrant is perfectly correct. There's your receipt," he added, addressing the officer. "I will be responsible for her safe keeping."

So far, then, the ceremony was over.

A couple of turnkeys came forward and took off the handcuffs, and having done so, they stood on each side of her, holding her by the arms.

She shrank instinctively from their touch, and perceiving it, the men with a malicious pleasure, finding how distasteful it was, pressed closer to her.

"Number fifteen," said Mr. Cawthorn. "Get the key, Winch, and lead the way; I will follow."

Winch went up to one side of the vestibule, where a number of keys were hanging on separate nails, and taking one of them, he proceeded to lead the way to the cells.

With the bunch of keys he carried about with him he opened the intervening doors.

Maud and the two other turnkeys followed, while Mr. Cawthorn, with a satisfied smile upon his face, brought up the rear.

His was a mean, grovelling, paltry spirit, and he determined to treat Maud in the same way as he would have treated Dick Turpin if he had only had the opportunity of doing so.

As the reader may be sure, the Governor of Newgate was terribly wroth to think that Dick should have played him such a prank as he had, and that the prisoner brought by the dragoons should have taken advantage of the confusion to escape.

He felt that he must have his revenge upon some one, and in his opinion Maud was a very proper object.

"Ahem!" he said. "Newgate is quite honoured—it is indeed! Be assured that every consideration shall be shown you—oh dear yes—every consideration,—you shall have no occasion to complain! Open the door, Winch,—that is number fifteen."

Winch paused before the door of a cell, and unlocking it, pushed it open.

A dark, gloomy-looking place appeared beyond.

"Now," said Mr. Cawthorn, assuming a very great deal of mock respect, which could not fail to be exceedingly offensive and disagreeable to the object of it, "walk in, if you please! This is your abode—not quite so comfortable as you have been used to, perhaps, but it is the best you will get here, I can tell you! Oh, pray walk in! Jones and Griffiths," addressing the two turnkeys, "let go of the lady's arm. Winch, show the lady into her apartment. Mind you don't stumble over the step my lady!"

This was a delusive caution.

One would have judged from his words that there was a step into the cell out of the corridor, whereas, on the contrary, there was a step down.

It was a wonder Maud did not fall into the trap thus laid for her by the Governor.

If in obedience to his words she had raised one foot, as though to place it upon a step, she would have had a rather awkward fall.

By the merest chance in the world, however, Maud happened to see, and only just in time, that the floor of the cell was below her.

Now that she was on her guard, all was well, for she stepped down lightly into the cell, to the infinite vexation of the Governor, who would have rejoiced if he could have played any practical joke upon her.

But he was defeated, and he was more angry than ever.

Then the turnkeys began to snicker when they saw how he had been outwitted by the prisoner.

Of this Mr. Cawthorn had the prudence and good sense to take no notice

He cried out:

"Close the door, Winch, and fasten it securely!—close it at once, and follow me! Mind that you leave all secure or you will find the consequences serious!"

The Governor turned round and led the way back to the vestibule, leaving the turnkeys to follow him.

It was a great relief to Maud when her dungeon door was shut. It was infinitely preferable to be alone

At first she could scarcely distinguish anything, so small a quantity of light was it that came through the little grated window into the cell, but in a few moments her eyes became accustomed to the gloom, and perceiving in one corner a kind of stone bench, she sat down upon it, and wept with so much violence that it seemed as if her heart was about to break.

Her mind was filled with the danger which Dick Turpin would incur when going to the farm-house, and as such was the case, she did not feel as she would have done the humiliation of being the tenant of one of the gloomy cells of Newgate, and exposed to the ribaldry of the Governor and his subordinates.

Wearily—most wearily—the time passed by.

At length, however, after what seemed to be an age, the darkness in the cell perceptibly increased, until at length she was unable to see anything save the grated aperture high up in the wall. And then she knew it was night.

Had she been in the lowest vault beneath some huge cathedral, the silence could not have been more profound; it was painful to the utmost degree.

Oh, what a wretched night that was for Maud!—wretched, not only because of the place in which she had to spend it, but because she knew full well, while she sat there helpless and a prisoner, Dick Turpin was riding on to his destruction.

She strained her sense of hearing to the utmost, thinking, perhaps, that if he was brought there a prisoner, as she fully expected he would be, she should hear some sounds indicative of his arrival.

But throughout the whole of that long and tedious night the silence remained unbroken, and at last the darkness seemed to grow less and less, and then day came.

Maud had not slept for a single moment.

But now that morning had come, her anxiety was even greater than it had been during the night, for she reflected that Dick Turpin had told her not to expect him until the dawn, and if he had been captured at that hour, there had not been time for him to have been brought to Newgate.

Maud did not know, as the reader does, that Dick Turpin had managed to make his escape from the farm-house.

She was, therefore, alarming herself unnecessarily.

But as the time passed on, and all continued silent, her hopes began to revive.

Breakfast was brought in, but she could not touch the coarse food and unclean water.

At about eleven o'clock the cell door was again opened, and two turnkeys entered.

They requested her to rise and follow, and she obeyed.

The gloomy passages were once more traversed, until presently she found herself in the vestibule.

Here the Governor and many others were assembled, including the under-sheriffs, and as the latter gentlemen were present Maud was saved any further indignity.

Had it not been for them, it is very probable that the Governor of Newgate would have insisted upon Maud walking to the Bow Street Police-court, for it was for the purpose of being taken before the magistrate that she had been removed from the cell.

The police van was in those days unknown, and most of the prisoners were dragged through the streets, chained together like so many slaves.

The sheriffs, however, happening to possess a little more feeling, ordered a hackney-coach to be called.

And in this Maud was placed, and driven off under a strong escort of police officers.

Mr. Wriggler arrived with his troop a few minutes after the hackney-coach had started, and he hastily rode after it, for his object in returning to London from the farm-house with all speed was that he might be present at the examination, in order to give his evidence before the magistrate of Maud's complicity with Dick Turpin.

He overtook the coach, and followed the prisoner into the court.

The same magistrate presided who had issued the warrant to Mr. Wriggles, and after the understanding they had come to, there was but little doubt that he would make out the order for Maud to be committed to Newgate to take her trial.

It was a painful moment for her when she found herself placed in the dock, but she experienced some consolation when she discovered that the people who had crowded into the court were unable to gaze into her face, as she stood with her back to them.

On her left hand stood several police officers, and just behind them was the witness-box.

Before her was a table, at which sat the magistrate's clerk, and just above him was seated the magistrate himself.

The charge against Maud was then read over.

It set forth that she was an accomplice of Dick Turpin's, and that she had aided and abetted him against the laws of these realms.

Maud was asked the usual question by the clerk of the court, as to whether she was guilty or not guilty.

After a moment's hesitation, she said in a choking voice:

"Not guilty."

Mr. Wriggles then came forward, and gave evidence that he had frequently seen the prisoner in company with Dick Turpin, and mentioned several instances, among others, those connected with the deserted mansion, the flight from thence, with Mr. Tuttle and the farm-house.

Several other officers were called, who fully corroborated all that Mr. Wriggles had said, and then the magistrate asked Maud what she had to say for her defence.

She comprehended, her situation better, perhaps, than anyone imagined; and she said in her defence only four words, and yet those words were better, and produced more effect, than if a counsel had addressed the Court for an hour.

In reply to the magistrate's question she said:

"I am his wife!"

There was a moment's pause, and then the magistrate said:

"We cannot believe that until your assertion is proved. If you are the wife of Dick Turpin, the charge against you falls to the ground, but your word is not sufficient proof. Your marriage certificate must be produced. Where is it?"

Maud had it not, and recollecting the circumstances under which the marriage ceremony had been performed, she felt there would be very great difficulty in proving herself to be Dick Turpin's wife.

The magistrate repeated his question.

"Can you produce the proof?" he asked.

"I cannot!" she replied. "I have it not."

"Then my duty is clear enough before me. It is to commit you to take your trial at the ensuing assizes, when, if you can prove that which you assert (though my own conviction is that you cannot), you will be acquitted."

This was but poor consolation for Maud.

As for Mr. Wriggles, he did not care very much whether she was acquitted or not; he had gained his object, which was to have her committed to Newgate, for he felt sure if he did, that his plan would go forward just as he wished it, and he should capture Dick Turpin long before the sessions commenced.

And so, the examination having been concluded, Maud was taken back to Newgate, there to await her trial money or valuables about their persons, but still it is better than nothing."

"Exactly!"

"We must manage to pocket some more money between this and London, or else we shall not be very well provided with the funds necessary to carry out our excellent plan!"

"You are right there, and I propose that to-night we stop everyone we meet, and try how much booty we can take!"

"Agreed!" said Tom King. "And I hope we shall be able to get sufficient to content us. In the event of doing so, we will gallop with all speed to the deserted mansion!"

"It is high time we were back!"

"It is; and I am anxious in the extreme to return. The time allotted for our journey has been long exceeded. Dick Turpin will be full of uneasiness and apprehension—he will conclude something serious has happened, and may run into great and unnecessary danger!"

"I am no less anxious to see the old place again than yourselves," said Sixteen-String Jack. "We have been an unreasonably long time over our expedition! I wish we could reach the gates to-night!"

"So do I!—so do I!" murmured Tom King and Claude.

It was strange that this desire to return to the deserted mansion should come so suddenly and so strongly upon them, but such was the fact.

Fortunate indeed was it for them that they were at such a distance as to make an immediate return impossible.

But for this, they would have ridden unhesitatingly and unsuspectingly into the very jaws of death.

"Mount and prepare, Tom!" cried Claude, a moment afterwards. "If we are to stop everyone, we must make haste, for I can hear there is a horse upon the road!"

Tom sprang into the saddle, and looked to the priming of his pistols.

The clear, sharp beat of a horse's hoofs could be plainly heard.

"It is a very heavy horse that is coming," said Jack. "I wonder who it can be riding upon such a brute?"

"It does sound like a cart horse, but I can hear no wheels."

"No. Some one is riding—sure enough. Be patient—in a few moments we shall know all!"

"Let me manage this little affair!" said Claude Duval. "I did not take a very active part in the last adventure; and if it is necessary, you will easily be able to come to my assistance!"

"As you will!"

Shading his eyes with one hand, Claude looked down the road, and, as his eyes were accustomed to the darkness, he presently made out the figure of a stout, bulky man, who was seated on a horse even more bulky than himself.

Beyond this, in consequence of the obscurity, Claude was able to make out little or nothing.

Just as the traveller was passing by the spot where the highwaymen were concealed Claude set his horse in motion, and was in a second abreast with the stout man and bulky horse.

"A fine night!" said Claude, in a pleasant voice—"rather dark, but it is none the worse for that,—in a general way, I am not very fond of Oliver myself!"

It would be hard to say what surprised the traveller most—the sudden appearance of Claude by his side, which looked like the effects of magic, or the strange words that had been addressed to him.

Apparently, however, the traveller did not like his companion, so he made a furious attack upon his horse in order to get away.

But although he cracked his whip in a most desperate manner, he failed altogether to get the lumbering horse which he bestrode to go at any faster pace than a shuffling trot, which Claude was able to keep up with easily enough.

"Are you riding far to-night?" continued Claude. "If you have a long journey before you, what a long while you will be upon the road, and it is dangerous, too, I can assure you!"

"What's dangerous?"

The words were spoken in a drawling voice, as words generally are spoken in rural districts.

Claude set the man down at once for a farmer, and his attire, as well as his horse, confirmed this supposition.

"Why, the roads are dangerous!" replied Claude—"there are a great many highwaymen about!"

"That for your highwaymen!" cried the farmer, snapping his fingers. "I only wish I could see one o' the varmint—that's all! I'd show him what was what, and no mistake! You look like a gentleman, but whether you are or not, I'll tell you this—I am not afraid of any highwayman living, although I have got a largish sum of money about with me! If one stopped me, it would be woe to him!"

"You look like a man capable of defending yourself!"

"Rather, sir! I can give a knock-down blow with any man going! I ain't afraid—not a bit of it!"

The farmer cracked his whip in a defiant manner as he spoke.

"But it is not everyone that has as much courage as yourself," said Claude Duval, "and so well able to defend himself. Now, if a highwayman stopped you, what do you think you should do?"

"I don't mind telling you, sir!" said the farmer, who began to like Claude rather than otherwise, and grow more communicative to him. "I should settle his hash in a very simple way!"

"As how—as how?"

"You see this whip, don't you?"

"I can just see it," said Claude, "but I don't perceive anything peculiar about it."

"Well, there is nothing very peculiar. The only thing is, it has got a strong lash, and the butt-end of it is loaded with a pound and a half of lead."

"Then it must be rather fatiguing to carry, I should think?"

"Not a bit of it! Bless you, sir, it is no more than a straw! Howsomever, to go back to what I was saying. There is no highwayman would face me, I am sure, and I'll tell you how I should serve him."

"How?"

"I should twist the thong of my whip round my hand like this, and then I should be able to take firm hold of the stock! You see, it don't take me a minute to do it!"

"I see it doesn't," replied Claude, for while he was speaking, the farmer had suited the action to the word.

"Now," said the farmer, waving his whip in the air, "you might not think it, but with one blow with this whip I could fell an ox! Perhaps you can guess now how I should manage with a highwayman."

"I think I can."

"No pistols for me, sir, and nothing of that sort! I wouldn't beg a cartload of 'em! They are always missing fire, or not going off when you want 'em! But as for my whip, it is always ready; and before a highwayman knew where he was, or the first words hardly out of his mouth, my whip would come down on the top of his head, and then he'd find himself lying down on the ground!"

"You quite surprise me!" said Claude, affecting a great deal of admiration. "Its really a most excellent scheme! I wonder it is not adopted by travellers generally."

"If it was," said the farmer, who was highly delighted to think that his plan was approved of, "these highwaymen would not be able to do such a good trade as they have been doing lately; it would be all up with them."

"I am inclined to think so," said Claude. "Would you mind letting me have a look at your whip?"

"Certainly not, sir! You can look at it with the greatest pleasure in life!"

"Thank you! I only wanted to see what kind of whip it was, in order that I might have one made for myself like it."

"You can't do better, sir!"

"I have always depended on pistols myself," continued Claude, "but I don't think I shall for the future."

"Here's the whip, sir!" said the farmer, who, while this little conversation had been going on, had untwisted the thong from round his hand.

Claude made a polite bow as he received it.

"Dear me! it is a very great weight! I should think there must be more than a pound and a half of lead in it!"

"No, sir, that's just the quantity; but perhaps you are not so strong in the wrist as I am; and if so, when you make your whip made, I should recommend its being a little lighter."

"I think that would be best," said Claude. "I suppose your object in coiling the lash round your hand is to prevent you from losing your hold?"

"That's it!"

"A capital idea! This is the way you do it, is it not?"

Claude wound the thong of the whip round his hand as he spoke, and took firm hold of the stock.

"You do it capitally well!" said the farmer—"there's no mistake about that!"

When the whip was thus held it was certainly a most formidable bludgeon.

Claude felt that he could wield it with ease, and that one blow with it would be sufficient to deprive anyone of life.

"Well," said Claude, suddenly changing his tone, "it happens that I am a highwayman! Now I have got your whip, and thanks to you! I know well how to use it! Hand over, in an instant, all the money you have with you, or down the butt-end comes on the top of your head, and you are a dead man!"

"Oh lord!" said the farmer, with a groan.

"You had better make haste and hand over your money!" said Claude. "I would sooner receive it in that fashion than be at the trouble of searching your dead body!"

CHAPTER DLXXXV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN CONTINUE TO BE SUCCESSFUL IN THEIR DESIGNS.

THE sudden change which had come over the farmer's countenance was really most amusing to look upon, and though Claude Duval was fully in earnest, he could scarcely forbear laughing aloud.

In his agitation, the farmer jerked the reins, and the heavy horse, only too glad to come to a stop, stood still at once.

His rider was too frightened and too bewildered to make the least attempt to urge him onward; not that it mattered, for all his efforts would have been of no avail—nothing but a liberal application of the whip would have set him in motion again.

Claude stopped his own horse, and held the whip in the air in such a manner that he could bring it down instantaneously.

The farmer shook all over like a huge jelly, and his face assumed a dusky yellow tint, while his eyes seemed starting from their sockets.

Claude grew impatient.

"Hand over!" he cried, in a loud voice—"hand over, or my patience will be exhausted! I can't stop here all night! I will count three, and when I have done so, if you don't hand over the money, down comes the whip!"

"Mercy—mercy, good Mr. Highwayman!" said the farmer. "Pray have mercy upon me! I am a poor man—I am indeed!"

"Don't believe it!" said Claude, "and whether you are or not, doesn't much matter to me! All farmers are poor by their own account! Now, look out—no more words! One—two——"

"Stop—stop!" cried the farmer, hurriedly thrusting his hands into his pockets—"stop—stop!"

"Hand over your money, then!"

"I am—I will! But oh, spare my life!"

"I have no wish to take it, without you force me to do so! If you hand over the money as I command you, you will meet with no harm!"

"But I shall be ruined!—oh, I shall be ruined! I wish I had taken my wife's advice, and not sold that drove of oxen till next week! Oh dear!—oh dear!"

"Then you've got the money that the sale of a drove of oxen fetched you, have you?" said Claude. "That must be a good round sum! Be quick and hand it over! As for your being ruined by the process, that's all stuff and rubbish!"

With a succession of the most dismal groans that it is possible to conceive, the farmer placed in Claude's hand a good-sized leather bag, which was filled to the very top with coins.

Its weight was considerable, and Claude dropped it into his coat pocket with a feeling of the greatest satisfaction.

"Quick!" said Claude. "I have not done with you yet! Hand over the rest of your money! Make haste, I say!"

"Good Mr. Highwayman, is not that enough?"

"No—I must have all! How do I know but what this bag is full of penny-pieces? I was served that trick once, but I don't intend to be served so again! I know the way you farmers have,—you generally keep bank-notes in your pocket-books, gold in one bag, silver in another, and copper in another. You must hand over two more bags! Be quick, or down comes the whip, as sure as you're a living man!"

In all probability, no weapon would have held the farmer in so much awe as his own whip.

Pistols he despised, because they missed fire, but a blow on the head with the butt-end of his whip would be fatal.

He knew this, and, like a wise man, preferred his life to his money.

If he lost the first, he could not replace it; but with respect to the other, it was another affair altogether.

Claude shook the whip threateningly, and the farmer handed over two more bags, both of which were smaller than the one which he had first delivered, which confirmed Claude's suspicion that it contained coppers and nothing more.

The three bags, however, he felt sure contained a large sum of money, and with it he resolved to be content.

"I don't know whether you have any bank-notes about you or not, Mr. Farmer. Whether you have or not doesn't matter—I don't want them; they are troublesome things, and the man deserved to be tarred and feathered who first invented such spurious kind of money as that. Ride on now—make the best speed you can—and good-night!"

"My whip," shouted the farmer—"give me my whip!"

"Certainly! Here it is—I don't want it!"

As he spoke, Claude unwound the lash from his hand, and gave the whip to the farmer.

No sooner did that individual catch hold of it than he aimed a desperate blow at the highwayman.

Claude easily avoided it by touching his horse with the spur.

"Ha, ha!" he said, "I am a match for you, never fear! Do you want your money back? If so, you had better come after me, and take it! I am just in the humour for a gallop myself!"

Now that he had regained possession of his whip, the farmer's courage seemed suddenly to return to him.

He lashed his horse in a most furious manner—with such good will, indeed, that the sluggish animal broke into a gallop, a feat he had not accomplished for many a year.

But the idea of his being able to overtake Claude was quite preposterous.

In less than a moment the highwayman was out of sight.

Claude galloped on until he came to the spot where he had left his companions.

"What luck?" they asked, eagerly, as soon as he rejoined them.

"Excellent!" was the reply—"better than I have had for many a day! That man was a farmer, and I take it he was just returning home after having sold a drove of oxen."

"And have you got the proceeds?"

"All but a few pounds, I think."

"Then we are so much nearer to the accomplishment of our purpose," said Tom King. "If we can only have a continuance of the good luck we have met with to-night, we shall not have done so badly by our journey to the New Forest."

"Decidedly not."

"Well," said Sixteen-String Jack, suddenly, "you, Tom, have had what I may call your adventure, and you, Claude, have had yours, so I think it nothing but fair that I should have my turn next."

"Then you won't have long to wait," said Tom King, "for I can hear something coming now."

"So can I—it sounds like a carriage."

"That's what it is, too, and drawn by a pair of horses. Look, yonder are the lamps!"

"I am ready," said Sixteen-String Jack. "You remain here, and I will ride forward and meet it; should it be necessary, you will come to my assistance!"

"Make your mind easy about that."

Matters being arranged, Sixteen-String Jack trotted gently in the direction of the carriage.

As they were both approaching each other, a meeting quickly took place.

One of Jack's pistols was loaded with powder only.

As soon as he was on a level with the carriage he fired it, for he was well aware of the beneficial effects of such a shot.

It made the coachman and travellers think that an attack was being made in good earnest.

Jack pointed the pistol in the air above the coachman's head, and as soon as he had pulled the trigger he cried:

"Halt!"

The carriage stopped as if by magic.

The smoke from the pistol cleared away, and then, to Sixteen-String Jack's unutterable surprise, the coachman had disappeared.

Had he not been quite certain that there was no bullet in his pistol, he would have concluded that he had been killed by a chance shot.

So long as the carriage was stopped, however, it mattered little to him what had become of the driver.

For the satisfaction of the reader, however, we may as well say that the driver fell down off his box into the roadway from sheer fright, and he lay there, opening and shutting his eyes in a bewildered sort of way, uncertain whether he was dead or alive.

Sixteen-String Jack hastened to the door of the carriage.

A shrill scream came from the interior as soon as ever he made his appearance.

The lamps were circular ones, and a portion of their light found its way into the vehicle, and it was by the aid of this that Sixteen-String Jack perceived a female form on one of the seats.

She seemed of great age, though every means had been resorted to to conceal the ravages of time.

On her head she wore a head-dress of a most singular description, such as was the fashion in the reign of Queen Anne.

Her face was powdered and rouged, and various pieces of plaster were stuck about it, in accordance with a fashion that still prevailed.

In her hand she carried a monstrous fan, which positively glittered with precious stones, as did her hands and her whole costume.

The old lady screamed violently, fanning herself all the while, and looking over the top of her fan with what seemed a coquettish air.

All this Sixteen-String Jack saw at a glance.

Removing his hat, he made a low and very respectful bow.

"Reassure yourself, madam, I beg!" he said. "No harm whatever is intended you—you are perfectly safe; but there's a toll on this road, and I am appointed to receive the money. The tax is levied on beauty and wealth. For the latter, in your own case, I cannot speak with so much certainty as the former—you cannot evade the tax upon beauty!"

Sixteen-String Jack made another low bow as he brought this speech to a conclusion.

The old lady fluttered her fan, and feigned a great deal of confusion.

"Oh, sir!" she said, with a simper, "you flatter!"

"Not at all," said Jack—"quite the reverse; it would be impossible for anyone to flatter you. I must appear presumptuous in the extreme, but your beauty has made an impression upon me," and Sixteen-String Jack accompanied the words by placing his hand upon his heart.

The old lady fluttered her fan, and smiled, and wriggled about in a manner that was highly amusing.

"Ah, sir!" she said, speaking with great agitation, "you do indeed remind me of the days of my youth, when gentlemen were gentlemen!"

"That cannot be so very long ago," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Excuse me, madam, for my plain speaking, but your form has scarcely yet arrived at maturity."

"My dear sir, you do indeed flatter me!"

"No, no, madam—I would not be guilty of flattery for the world; but I am fond of plain speaking."

"So am I," said the old lady, with a languishing look.

"And," continued the highwayman, "it deeply grieves me to put you to the slightest inconvenience or alarm; but as I am here to collect the tax, I must do my duty."

"Oh, charming!" said the old lady. "How delightfully romantic!"

The words were addressed more to herself than anyone else.

"What is the amount of the tax?" she added, in a louder tone, with an additional flutter of her fan.

"That depends entirely upon yourself."

"Myself?"

"Yes! Far be it from me to constitute myself a judge of the value of your beauty; let me rate it as high as I may, I am sure I shall fall beneath its true worth."

The old lady's vanity was evidently quite tickled by these fine speeches; no doubt very many years had elapsed since any such words had fallen upon her ears, for her age must have been something over seventy.

"Madam," said Sixteen-String Jack, "here's my hat; place in it whatever amount you may consider represents the extent of your beauty; I am aware there is a difficulty in the case, for I question whether any amount of money, however vast, would represent it."

Jack held his hat into the interior of the carriage, and waited patiently.

Some kind of struggle seemed to be going on within her breast.

At last she produced a small purse, and as she was in the act of placing it in the hat she said:

"Young man, whoever you are, I am sure you are worthy of a better calling than that which you appear to follow. Abandon it, and I will put you in the way of earning a livelihood by honest means!"

"I am a collector, madam," said Jack, "and I find my occupation an agreeable one. Many thanks for this purse, am I to consider it the estimate of your beauty? Remember, I have something more to demand—I have to collect the tax on wealth."

"Take all I have!" said the old lady, bursting into tears, and rapidly placing a number of valuable articles in the highwayman's hat as she spoke—"take all these—take what I have, to me they are nothing; I shall not miss them. I have been amused by your manner, and I reward you for my gratification, with the additional hope that you may put this money to good use and abandon your present course of life."

Sixteen-String Jack took the articles proffered, and the old lady, placing her handkerchief to her face, continued to weep.

To reply to what she had said was impossible, so Jack satisfied himself by adding:

"You shall suffer no further molestation, and you shall resume your journey without delay."

As soon as the last words left his lips, he withdrew from the carriage door.

He remembered, then, before the old lady could continue her journey it would be necessary for him to find the coachman.

He was guided in his search by a succession of faint, smothered groans.

Going in the direction from which the sounds proceeded, he came at length upon the body of a man lying in a huddled-up mass in the roadway.

Jack had a pistol in his hand, and he pressed it rather hard upon the man's cheek.

"Do you feel that?" he asked.

"Mercy—mercy!"

"Can you feel it?" repeated Jack, increasing the pressure.

"Y—yes, I feel it!"

"Do you know what it is?"

"S—something cold!"

"It's the muzzle of a loaded pistol, and——"

The coachman uttered a deep groan and let his head fall back.

"It's the muzzle of a pistol," continued Jack, "and if you don't get up into your seat and drive the carriage off before I can count ten, I will plaster the road with your brains!"

This idea was a horrible one, and the coachman groaned more dismally than ever.

"Now I am beginning to count," said Jack, "and rely upon it I will be as good as my word! One, two——"

"Stop—stop—have mercy!"

"Three—four——"

"I will be on the box in a moment—in less than a moment, but don't fire! I will drive off; I am getting up—I am up!"

"Five, six, seven, eight——"

Before Jack could say nine, ten, the coachman gave the horses two violent cuts with the whip, and off went the carriage at a furious and highly dangerous rate.

Jack hastened to rejoin his companions.

And when he had done so, they noticed that he looked more pensive than he usually did.

"You have had bad luck," said Claude Duval; "I can tell that by your face."

"You are mistaken, my friend," was the reply; "I have taken a very good booty indeed."

"What's the matter, then?"

"Oh, nothing; only I wish I had managed the matter in a different way. Confound her! what did she want to speak to me like that for?"

These words were highly enigmatical to his comrades.

CHAPTER DLXXXVI.

DICK TURPIN IS HOTLY PURSUED ACROSS THE COUNTRY BY A TROOP OF DRAGOONS.

WHEN Dick Turpin sprang on to the back of Black Bess and galloped away, he acted more on the impulse of the moment than reflection, and before he had gone far he suddenly drew rein.

"I have done wrong—I ought not to have deserted my old friend in such a fashion! It was his own fault; and it seemed an instinct to get as far away from the police officers as possible. Am I pursued, I wonder?"

He listened, and soon satisfied himself that he was not.

"I should be very sorry for old Matthew to get into any trouble on my account—and he shan't either! I'll make my way back stealthily, and if he is in any trouble I will get him out of it, let the risk be what it may!"

Having come to this determination, Dick rather foolishly turned his mare's head round, and as noiselessly as possible made his way back towards the spot where the meeting had taken place.

He quickly perceived that a number of horsemen had drawn themselves up across the high road, and so he cautiously directed his steps towards this place.

By making use of all possible caution, he managed to get near enough to see what was going on.

The brief dialogue between old Matthew and the chief officer was over, and Dick had the satisfaction of seeing his old friend walk off unmolested.

He imagined this to be sufficient, and indeed it was only natural that he should come to the conclusion that old Matthew was in safety.

To stay longer in the vicinity would only be tempting fortune, so he once more sped across the country at a gallop, going in a straight line to the deserted mansion.

As he approached it he was obliged to bring his caution into operation again.

It was not likely that he should forget the narrow escape he had had on the occasion of his last visit.

His intention was to get as near to the gates as he dared, and then to ride off towards the New Forest, trusting to his own luck, or rather judgment, to hit upon the road by which his three comrades would be most likely to return. His heart turned cold within his bosom as he made the reflection that it was just possible they had already returned, and unaware of their danger, had been slain or made prisoners.

In either case he imagined he should be able to learn something by the general appearance of the place.

To have gone close to the gates would have been an act of madness, so he was obliged to content himself by surveying them from afar.

All around was as silent and apparently as deserted as it had ever been, and after a little while he came to the conclusion that his comrades had not yet returned.

"The only hope," he said to himself, "is that I may be fortunate enough to encounter them before long; if I can meet them between this and daybreak I shall care little. Old Matthew's advice may be good, and this may be my best course of action, yet I can scarcely bring myself to think so, the idea of Maud being a prisoner in Newgate is so terrible that I cannot contemplate it."

He cantered on as he spoke.

"It's all chance," he said, "and if I can manage to meet with them, I shall esteem myself the favourite of fortune. There are a thousand ways, I might say, by which they could return. They will choose the most indirect and least frequented paths. How, then, am I to hope to meet with them?"

Turpin's errand did indeed seem to be a hopeless, useless one, for the probabilities were all against a meeting.

After a great deal of deliberation, Turpin finally decided upon the route he was to take.

It was that which he had followed on the occasion of his own visit to the New Forest, when he had made the journey in company with Tom King.

He rode along gently, in order that he might not attract too much observation.

Suddenly, however, as he was journeying slowly along, he was startled by hearing a voice close at hand pronouncing the word "Halt!"

To speak the truth, Dick's thoughts had been with Maud in Newgate, and on his way he had not been so careful as he should have been.

In his preoccupation, he failed to notice that a small troop of dragoons were drawn up on one side of the road.

It was from the officer in command of it that the injunction to halt had come.

Dick was alive to this danger instantly.

Under the circumstances, he scarcely knew what to do, and yet he had not a second allowed him for reflection.

Almost mechanically he had obeyed the order to stop, and the commanding officer exclaimed:

"Advance and show yourself, sir! Have no fear—we are the armed patrol."

To have attempted to gallop past the soldiers would have been absolute insanity, and to have fled in the direction of London would have been fraught with the greatest danger.

There was but one course open to him.

With the speed of thought he turned his mare's head towards the hedge, which fortunately was not a high one.

A word and a slight touch with his heel were sufficient.

With a bound she cleared the hedge and alighted in the meadow beyond; but this leap, effective as it was so far as the leap was concerned, was yet a very serious circumstance, inasmuch as it made the officer aware that the person he had challenged was afraid to undergo an examination.

"Halt, in the King's name!" he roared. "Stop, or I fire!"

Of course Turpin paid no attention.

"That's one of the men we seek, depend upon it!" exclaimed the chief officer, addressing his followers. "Hurrah! we have been fortunate enough to find one of the rascals at last! Quick—after him! We will give him a close pursuit! If we are resolute, we shall certainly hunt him down!"

This officer was by no means devoid of courage, and all his men pressed eagerly after him, not so much because they were equally courageous as himself, but because they were utterly weary of their work, and anything in the shape of a change from the dull monotony of riding up and down and challenging all passers by, was acceptable in the highest degree.

As the hedge was a low one, the dragoons did not hesitate to put their horses to it, and in a very short time indeed they were all within the meadow.

Just at this moment, the moon, which had been hidden behind the clouds for more than an hour, suddenly broke forth. As if by enchantment, her pale silvery beams lighted up the whole of the country for miles round, and the soldiers, who, from having been for some time upon their post had grown familiar with the darkness, were now able to see with a degree of distinctness that was surprising.

"There he goes, my lads!" said the chief officer, pointing across the meadows. "Follow him! We shall have the rascal before we are an hour older!"

The flying forms of the highwayman and his steed were plainly revealed in the moonbeams.

Dick was annoyed when he saw the moon break forth, for he knew how much it diminished his chances of escape.

To be chased across the country just at this time was vexatious in the extreme, and if the moon continued to shine the officers might manage to keep on his trail till daybreak.

This was most unfortunate for he had a great deal to do.

For once in his life he felt inclined to press his mare to put forth her utmost speed.

Indeed, his only chance seemed to lie in his succeeding in quickly distancing his pursuers.

That Black Bess would be able to accomplish this feat in a very short space of time, he did not doubt, although he was well aware the dragoons were mounted upon horses of a superior description, and there was little fear that they would be sparing in the application of whip or spur.

He turned round and looked behind him.

Although he had made every allowance for the excellence of their horses, he was astonished to find they were so close behind him.

"I fear I shall have some trouble in shaking them off now," he said, "I fear it—I fear it. On, Bess, my lass! Let me see you put forth your utmost speed,—everything depends upon you!"

He patted her upon the neck as he spoke, and with a faint neighing sound the noble animal flew onward with increased velocity.

Away she went over the open country, leaping over every obstacle that presented itself.

Then Turpin looked back once more.

He had evidently gained upon his foes, yet for all that they were close behind.

By the excited manner in which they waved their arms, he could tell that they had him in full view, and that they were convinced in their own minds that they should succeed in capturing him.

Dick set his teeth hard.

"It grieves me, Bess," he said, "to push you like this, I would fain reserve your strength, for I may have many miles to travel. Confound those fellows, their horses must indeed be of the best quality or they would not be able to keep so close behind me as they do."

The ground now took an upward tendency, and, great as was the risk he ran by doing so, Dick slackened his mare's speed, for he knew how fearfully it would exhaust her if she galloped at full speed to the top of the hill.

The dragoons, however, had no such compunctions.

The horses to them were no more than machines, and after they had accomplished their purpose they would never trouble themselves in the least if they had fallen down dead.

So, although the hill was before them, they endeavoured to make them ascend it at the same speed as they had passed over the open ground.

All the whipping and spurring in the world, however, could not make the horses do this.

Consequently they did not gain much, if anything, upon the highwayman.

At length gaining the summit of the hill, Dick Turpin looked behind him.

He could not help experiencing a distressful feeling when he saw how close the dragoons were behind him.

"I shall have to try hard to shake them off—very hard, and how to do it is more than I could take upon myself to say."

He just pressed Black Bess upon the flanks with his heels as he spoke, and the gallant creature, obedient to the signal, flew down the hill at a speed that was absolutely terrific.

Careless of the consequences both to themselves and to their horses, the dragoons came thundering on with redoubled speed.

Dick glanced anxiously up into the sky.

A few fleecy clouds were scudding rapidly before the moon's disc, and there were others that appeared to be rising up from the north-west, but whether they would spread themselves before the moon in time to be of service to him seemed doubtful in the extreme.

Suddenly Dick came upon a ploughed field, and before he was fully aware of it Black Bess had galloped over it for some distance.

At every step, however, her feet seemed to sink deeper and deeper into the soft soil.

Anxiously the highwayman looked before him and saw that the ploughed field was of vast and unusual extent, stretching away in advance as far as he was able to see with distinctness.

What was he to do?

To turn back would be to run into the arms of his enemies.

To continue in his present course would be to exhaust and fatigue his mare more than a gallop of twenty miles upon the hard road.

There seemed to be nothing that he could do except to turn off at right angles to the course he was pursuing.

A few hundred yards to the right would take him to one of the hedges bounding the ploughed field, and once over that, all would be well.

This was what he did, but in the meanwhile his enemies had gained upon him in a fearful manner.

They saw him change his course before they entered upon the ploughed field, and so they were in time to pull up and avoid it.

They beheld the fugitive going at right angles, and with a shout of triumph the officer in command galloped off in a diagonal direction.

By the adoption of this manœuvre the distance between his own men and the fugitive was very much diminished, and he already felt certain in his own mind that ere many minutes were over he should succeed in making a capture.

His heart swelled with exultation, and he shouted in inspiriting accents to his men, calling upon them to follow him, and use every effort that lay in their power.

"Whip and spur," he cried—"whip and spur! Don't spare your cattle or your own trouble, and he is ours!"

CHAPTER DLXXXVII.

DICK TURPIN IS FORTUNATE ENOUGH TO FIND HIS WAY OUT OF A SERIOUS DILEMMA.

DICK TURPIN'S anxiety rapidly increased when, looking back, he saw how much the dragoons had gained upon him.

Black Bess was only able to make her way over the soft clayey soil at a comparatively slow speed, and, as the dragoons did not go upon the ploughed field at all, but cut off a large corner, a very great difference had taken place in their relative positions.

So near were they that the officer in command believed that the highwayman was within range of the carbines carried by his men, and acting upon this belief he shouted aloud:

"Surrender—surrender at once! Yield yourself a prisoner without further delay, or I give the word to fire, then the consequences will be on your own head!"

Turpin only waved his hand defiantly in response to this speech, and the commanding officer, enraged by the motion, turned quickly to his men and said:

"Make ready—present—fire!"

A rattling discharge followed the command, and Dick Turpin suddenly felt several smart shocks upon his back.

He was almost within the range of the carbines, but by the time the bullets reached him their force was nearly spent, so that, with the exception of being deprived of his breath for an instant, he received no injury whatever.

Still it was a very narrow escape indeed, for had the distance between himself and his foes been only a few yards less, his destruction must have been certain and immediate.

Luckily for him, he was in a smooth meadow of considerable size, and having the soft turf beneath her feet, Black Bess was again enabled to make use of her extraordinary powers of speed.

Away she went like the wind, and the dragoons were as much astonished as they were disappointed, for they had made up their minds that the highwayman was as good as in their hands.

Now, however he was distancing them with amazing rapidity.

"Spur your horses hard!" cried the officer—"don't spare them! We will not be beaten after such a close touch as this! Forward, I say!"

The soldiers spurred their horses in a truly barbarous manner, though very little effect was produced

Their steeds were all of excellent quality, but the accoutrements of the dragoons were heavy, and impeded their free motion.

As the moon continued to shine with undiminished brightness, they were still able to keep their eyes upon the fugitive, though he was fast vanishing from their view.

In fact, Dick Turpin was doing what he had never done before—he was urging Black Bess to make every effort.

The gallant creature obeyed willingly and freely, and every time he turned his head, he had the satisfaction of seeing that the dragoons were still further and further in the rear.

It was now that Black Bess's superiority over the other horses began to make itself manifest, for while they were so exhausted as to be insensible to the spur, Black Bess seemed no more distressed than at first; indeed, her velocity increased rather than diminished.

But a fresh source of danger now began to make itself apparent.

In the eastern horizon were unmistakable tokens of the rapid approach of morning.

The rays of the moon grew paler and paler, until at last her illumination was quite overpowered.

Day was dawning, and moment after moment different objects in the landscape were lighted up and brought clearly into view.

In a little while the sun would rise and the day begin.

The dragoons were still upon his track, and, aided by the broad eye of day, they would easily be able to keep in his rear.

A thin, whitish mist, however, began to float about in wavy masses.

Sometimes a large space of country would be entirely hidden from view, then a faint puff of wind would send the fleecy mist rolling onward to obscure some other spot.

Most fervently did Dick hope that this mist would continue to grow denser and denser.

There was not much likelihood of it, though, for the sun would entirely dissipate it as soon as he had climbed a few degrees above the horizon.

Leaping over a hedge, Turpin found himself in a smooth and rather broad road.

It could scarcely be called a lane, and yet it was not the high way.

Along this he determined to proceed, for as it was rather lower than the meadows, the space between the two hedges was completely filled up with mist.

Going a little way further, he looked back, but found himself unable to see more than a few feet.

Consequently he was out of sight of his pursuers.

Just as he was congratulating himself upon the occurrence, and racking his brain to think of some scheme by which he could throw them off his track altogether, a faint sound reached his ears which made his cheeks turn pale, and filled him with the utmost alarm.

Apparently it was a very trifling sound indeed to produce such an effect upon him.

It was not that he heard anything approaching him on the highway, or that he feared the rapid appearance of his foes.

The faint clattering sound was made by Black Bess as she sped along the high-road, and as soon as he heard it Dick knew well what it was.

One of her shoes had, by some accident or other, become loosened, and he knew well before he had gone far at his present speed the shoe would fly off altogether.

If this happened, it would, in fact, put an end to his flight, for even if he forced his mare to gallop with her hoof unprotected, she would fall totally lame before she had gone a mile.

It was only by going at a gentle rate that he could hope to keep the shoe upon her foot, even for a little while; but if he pulled up the dragoons would soon be upon him.

He could not hear the dull, heavy beat of their horses' hoofs on the road behind him, but he expected to do so every moment.

The shoe rapidly became looser, as was evidenced by the additional clatter it made every time Black Bess put her hoof to the ground.

This circumstance, so entirely unforeseen as it had been, threatened to overwhelm him with ruin.

"I will trust to my luck!" he said. "I would rather run a very great deal of risk than my mare should suffer any injury. It is fortunate this whitish mist envelopes all objects like it does. It is possible that even yet I may be able to elude my foes."

This was but a faint hope, though but for the defective state of his mare's shoe, his task of getting away would be comparatively easy.

He reduced the speed of Black Bess to a walk, and even at that pace the loose-shoe clattered most ominously, and finally, as it chanced to come in contact with a stone, it flew off altogether.

In vain Turpin endeavoured to look around him for some place where he could take up his quarters for a short time; but it was only on rare occasions that he could see the hedgerows on each side of him, for his wish had been granted—the mist had grown denser and denser.

Desperate as his position appeared to be, he was, nevertheless, able to find some degree of consolation in it.

Things might have been much worse.

The accident might have happened when the dragoons were so close behind him, or before the mist had made its appearance; but now, as he listened from time to time, he was still unable to hear any signs of their approach.

Not that he thought much of this, for in half an hour, at the most, the mist would surely clear away, and then, as the general character of the country was level, and as the dragoons were probably at no great distance, they would again catch sight of him.

"If I could only find some place where I could hide myself," he said—"some secure place of concealment—all would be well; but that, I fear, is quite impossible."

While he continued to walk his mare along the road, her hoof was not likely to suffer much injury.

He had already gone some distance; still, he could hear nothing of his foes.

But the mist showed unmistakable symptoms of rolling away.

Then, as if a curtain had suddenly been drawn up, he was enabled to see before him for many miles, as the whole country was brilliantly lighted up by the rising sun.

Like lightning, he turned his head to look back.

The mist was rolling away at great speed.

But as he looked back, he was not able to distinguish anything except those objects close at hand, and which were disclosed by the mist receding from them.

In this fog, then, his enemies were enveloped, and he still stood a chance of concealing himself somewhere unknown to them.

Once more he looked in advance, and in the distance saw a number of roofs and chimneys, indicating the proximity of a village or small town.

By the roadside, about half-way between the spot where he stood and the roofs that were visible among the trees, was a small, rudely-built shed, the roof of which was composed of bright red tiles, making it a conspicuous object.

"If that was but a blacksmith's forge, now!" Turpin thought, as soon as he beheld it. "But I can't hope to be so fortunate, yet I can see smoke curling out of the chimney and out of the door and window. It may be a blacksmith's forge, after all. If it is, I shall be able to laugh at my pursuers, for I can get a shoe put on in a few minutes!"

He ceased speaking to listen, in the hope that he might be able to hear something of the hammers

All was still.

He was beginning to despair, when the deep silence that prevailed around was broken by a sharp, ringing, clanking sound, which could only be produced by the rapid blows of a hammer upon an anvil.

It was wonderful to see how the highwayman's face lighted up.

"All is well now," he murmured—"all is well! My troubles are completely over! Quick, Bess—a little quicker! We have not far to go!"

He slightly accelerated his mare's speed, so anxious was he to reach the forge.

Not a minute elapsed without his turning round to look behind him.

Each time that he did so, he found that the mist had retreated further and further, and a more extensive prospect was spread before his view, yet, to his joy, the dragoons remained invisible.

In a very short space of time the door of the blacksmith's forge was reached.

Although the hour was such an early one, the blacksmith was industriously at work, and the bright sparks flew rapidly from the piece of red-hot iron that lay upon the anvil, and which he was rapidly working into shape.

Dick felt as though a very heavy weight had been lifted off his heart.

In finding this unexpected way out of a serious difficulty, he almost forgot all his other cares and troubles.

Slipping off his saddle, he said to the blacksmith:

"My mare has just cast her shoe. Can you fasten another on for me in the space of a few minutes—for I am most anxious to continue on my journey? Every moment is of the greatest importance to me, for it is a matter of life or death!"

"I don't mind obliging you," said the blacksmith, coming forward, "if so be you make it worth my while to leave off the work that I am engaged upon."

"Don't fear for that!" said Turpin. "The matter is of the greatest urgency. I shall pay you liberally, rest assured—that is, if you are quick."

"This way, sir, then! Lead your horse in while I get my tools ready; and, though I say it myself, there's not a man on the whole countryside who can shoe a horse so quickly as I can."

"Then, I am glad that accident has brought you in my way."

While he was speaking, Dick led Black Bess into the forge.

As soon as the blacksmith had got his box of tools ready, he fastened Black Bess by the bridle, and then, lifting up her foot, surveyed the damage done, and also took the measure for the size of the shoe she would require.

"It's a good job you didn't have to go much further with her," he said. "If you had, she would have knocked her hoof to bits. Can you wait while I make a shoe, or shall I put one on?"

"If you have one by you that is anything near a fit, put that on, for, as I told you, every moment is of the greatest consequence."

"All right, sir! Here's a shoe that will do very well. I will have it on in less than two minutes. It's only a matter of knocking half a dozen nails in now."

Dick Turpin received this intelligence with very great satisfaction, for his ears, which had continually been on the stretch, caught that peculiar sound which he knew so well as indicating the rapid advance of the dragoons.

CHAPTER DLXXXVIII.

DICK TURPIN STILL FAILS IN HIS ENDEAVOUR TO SHAKE OFF HIS PURSUERS.

"THEY have kept well upon my track," he murmured to himself. "They are on the road, and cannot be very far off. I will see"

As he spoke, Dick went to the door of the forge, and peeping out, looked cautiously in the direction he had come.

One glance was sufficient to show him that his fears were fully realised.

By this time, the sun had attained a considerable elevation, and his beams poured with full force down the road, revealing everything with rare distinctness.

The glorious golden rays shone brightly on the glittering accoutrements of the dragoons as they came galloping onward at as rapid a speed as their horses were capable of making.

They were certainly not more than half a mile distant, and Dick Turpin again became a prey to great uneasiness.

Turning round to the blacksmith, he said:

"Have you almost done?"

"Yes, sir, I sha'n't be a moment longer."

"Pray be as quick as you can!"

"I will, depend upon it. What a splendid nag this is of yours, sir! She's a real beauty, and no mistake! I never saw her like. You have been riding her very hard, and yet she seems scarcely distressed. If you are going much further, and will condescend to take my advice, you will let me give her a little hay and water."

"I should be glad if I could properly attend to her wants," said Turpin. "She's a brave mare; her equal was never foaled."

"She is a real beauty, and no mistake! And, if you won't take offence, I think I can say who she is and who she belongs to."

Turpin started.

The words had been spoken in a peculiar tone, and, as he looked in the blacksmith's face, he saw it wore a peculiar expression.

The first feeling he experienced was that of alarm, but it soon abated, for the highwayman mentally asked himself the question:

"Shall I trust this man?"

The time for deliberation was very short indeed.

The dragoons were now frightfully close at hand, and in two minutes at the most they must inevitably reach the forge.

The blacksmith smiled and looked pleased, and, after a hesitation that was so slight as to be scarcely perceptible, Dick said:

"I shall take no offence—speak freely."

The last nail had been knocked into the shoe, and the blacksmith rose to his feet.

"Well, then, sir, I feel almost certain that this is no other than Black Bess."

He patted her as he spoke.

"You are quite right," was the reply, "and I am her owner, Dick Turpin."

The blacksmith nodded.

"You don't look like a man who would betray me," continued Dick. "I have quite a different opinion of you—in fact, it is my belief that you would rather do all that lay in your power to assist me to escape from my enemies."

"I would—I would!—there's no mistake about it! I should be very glad to do such a thing, if it was only for the sake of this bonny creature here."

"Then you have the opportunity!" cried Dick, quickly. "Hark! Can you hear that loud trampling of horses' feet upon the hard roadway? Listen!"

"My hearing is not so good as it used to be," replied the blacksmith; "but I can hear that plain enough."

"It is a troop of dragoons that are coming on at that furious speed. They have chased me through the night, and I have had great difficulty in eluding them so far. For what you have already done for me I will well reward you, and, if you can conceal me or assist me to escape, you shall receive for the service a larger amount of money than you could earn by a month's industry!"

"I'd do it for nothing," said the blacksmith, grasping the highwayman by the hand. "I have heard of you, Dick, and I have heard of Black Bess as well; and I have wished many a time that I might have the chance of doing you a service."

"Be quick, then, or it will be too late!"

The blacksmith scratched his head.

"My will is good," he said. "I am only at a loss to know in what way I can render you assistance."

Dick glanced rapidly around him.

"Is there no place where you can conceal me?" he said. If you can hide me all will be well. The dragoons may not stop here, and if they do, you would only have to say that you had not seen me, and then they would ride on and be content."

"But there's no hiding-place in this shed at all," said the blacksmith, "that's the worst of it!"

[THE MEETING OF DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES.]

"It is awkward. I hoped your reply would be different. Where does that door lead to?"

Dick pointed, as he spoke, to one that was almost opposite the door by which he had entered.

"Oh, that's no good," was the reply, "it only leads into the back shed. I've got two or three horses in there now. It's where I keep the horses that come here to be shod."

"I will go into that back shed," said Dick; "I have no resource but to do so. If the dragoons ride by, all will be well. If they halt, I shall be able to hear what they say, and if they are suspicious, and take it into their heads to search this place, I suppose I can get out at the back?"

"Oh yes; certainly you can!"

"That will do, then, and in case I should have to make a retreat without seeing you, take this as a reward!"

Dick Turpin pressed into the blacksmith's hands all the money he had about him.

The next moment he led Black Bess through the second door, and closed it after him.

Scarcely had he done so, than, with a great dash and confusion, the troop of dragoons drew up in front of the blacksmith's forge.

The one in command alighted and entered at once.

The first thing he saw was the blacksmith industriously at work at the bellows blowing the fire.

"Hallo there!" he cried. "Come here, Mr. Blacksmith—I want to speak to you!"

The blacksmith came forward, touching his forehead with his finger at every step.

"Just pay attention, will you?" cried the officer. "I want to know whether you have seen a man mounted on a jet-black horse anywhere about here!"

"Yes," was the unhesitating reply, "I seed him, that is, if the man wore a red coat!"

"Yes, yes—that's the chap I want!"

"Well, I did just see him," said the blacksmith, "and that's all. I happened to be standing at the door, you see, and I saw him gallop past like a streak of lightning!"

"He went up the road, then, you say?"

"Yes—as straight as ever he could go."

"Then I don't believe you!"

"Don't believe me!—why not, sir?"

"I have good reasons for not doing so."

"What reasons?"

"Do you see this?"

"Yes."

"You know what it is, I suppose?"

"Well, rather—I've seen a great many o' 'em in my time! It looks to me as much like a horse's shoe as anything!"

"That's just what it is!" said the officer.

"Do you want it fastened on, then, sir? I didn't understand what you meant!"

"No, I don't want it fastened on! Now, we're after a highwayman, and one that has given us a great deal of trouble. We lost sight of him for a time in the mist, but we kept steadily on, and when the mist cleared away, he was nowhere in view."

"Lor', now, you don't say so?"

"But it so happened that as I was riding along, I saw a horse's shoe lying on the ground, and I picked it up."

"Is that it?"

"Yes—that's it."

"Well, now, how do you know it's a horse's shoe?"

"Of course it is—what else can it be?"

"Well, I don't know," said the blacksmith, with a grin, "but it seems to me to be very likely a mare's!"

The officer did not appreciate the joke, and in an angry tone of voice he added:

"Just pay attention to me, now, or you may find yourself in trouble! When I saw this shoe, I guessed, of course, that the highwayman's horse had lost it, and I thought to myself 'We shall have him before long;' then I caught sight of your shed here, and then I felt certain that the highwayman, at all risks, would stop and have a new shoe put on. I'd lay a wager of five pounds to a penny that he's done it! He's paid you well, I dare say, and told you to hold your tongue, or rather told you to say that he's gone off in a direction opposite to the one he has taken. I understand how all these things are managed! Now, Mr. Blacksmith, tell me at once, and truly, where that man with the red coat and the black horse went to—which way did he take?"

"I have told you!"

"You have told me a lie!" said the officer, "because if he had gone in that direction I should have seen him! Give me the information I want at once, or I will take you into custody!"

The blacksmith looked rather alarmed, and began to think it was not quite such a nice thing to befriend a highwayman as he had thought it.

He imagined he was about to get into serious trouble.

He was relieved from his embarrassment, however, in an unexpected manner.

The soldiers, who had remained in their saddles, grouped round the door of the forge, suddenly set up a shout.

"There he goes—there he goes!" they cried—"there he goes! Yonder—yonder! Look—there he goes! He's flying over the meadows like the wind!"

The commanding officer flung down the shoe, and made a rush out into the road.

There, sure enough, at a considerable distance, he could discern the flying forms of the highwayman and his steed.

He scrambled into the saddle in a very unmilitary manner, and, without stopping to put his feet in the stirrups or get his seat properly, he made his horse set off at a gallop, and shouted aloud to the dragoons to follow him.

They were able to keep the highwayman in sight with great ease, and would succeed in doing so for a considerable length of time, owing to the level nature of the country.

The blacksmith watched them ride off, and then, scarcely knowing whether to believe what they had said or not, he went to the inner door and opened it.

But Dick Turpin and Black Bess had disappeared.

How it was that he had managed to get so far off before they were seen by the officers is easily explained.

The shed that was built at the back of the others had no proper doorway, one side being quite open, and, as the blacksmith had stated, it was only used as a place where the horses could wait when they came to be shod.

Dick waited, with his ear pressed close against the door leading into the forge, and listened to what was said.

As soon as he heard the intelligence about the shoe, he was quite convinced in his own mind that the officer's suspicions would be strong enough to induce him to make a thorough search of the premises, and so he resolved to beat a retreat at once.

This he did, and leaping into the saddle, he set off across the field in the rear at a gallop, taking care to pursue such a direction that the shed would hide him from the view of the dragoons, who were clustered round the door of the forge.

Black Bess was much refreshed by the brief and insufficient rest she had had, and flew over the fields at a prodigious rate, and it was not until Turpin was more than a mile off that the dragoons managed to catch sight of him.

Dick Turpin looked back, and was soon aware that the dragoons were once more in full pursuit.

He could not avoid experiencing some uneasiness when he made this discovery.

A chase across the open country by daylight, when so many of his foes were on the watch, and when the chances of his being able to conceal himself anywhere were so much diminished, was no pleasant affair.

He could only push on, in the hope that ere long something or other would occur that would enable him to baffle them.

This would be a difficult task, for the fact of the officer observing the shoe lying in the road, and picking it up, and drawing such deductions from it as he did, shows plainly enough that he had all his wits about him, and that his perceptive faculties were unusually well developed.

Whether Dick Turpin was equal to deceiving such a one remains to be seen.

By the manner of the officer and the soldiers under his command, it was perfectly certain that they were by no means tired of the pursuit, although they had galloped so far without meeting with much success.

It may seem strange, but their repeated failures only made them more ardent in the chase.

CHAPTER DLXXXIX.

DICK TURPIN PUTS INTO EXECUTION A VERY CLEVER SCHEME TO BAFFLE HIS PURSUERS.

Black Bess still galloped on, and Dick Turpin occupied himself in looking from right to left, in the hope that somehow or other he should be able to get out of sight of his pursuers.

While he remained in their view it would be useless for him to attempt to carry out any manœuvre, no matter how excellent—not that anything had as yet occurred to him; but the first act would be to get out of their sight, and to doing this he directed all his energies and attention.

There were very few trees visible.

Had there been any shady lane in his passage, down which he would have been concealed by the overhanging bows, or had there been some little wood or plantation, by galloping round which he could have hidden himself from view, all would have been well, but as far as ever he could see nothing of the kind was visible.

Once more he quitted the meadows and took to the open road.

Along this he could make better speed, for there were few obstacles in his way.

Galloping on at the same headlong speed, he found that he was still getting further and further from the dragoons.

In a few moments afterwards he passed the mouth of a lane, which, although unshaded by trees, was bounded by hedgerows of unusual height.

Down this he turned without hesitation, bending his head well down on to his mare's neck, as by this means he imagined he should render himself invisible to those behind.

To his extreme disappointment, this lane, so well suited to his purpose, was little more than a mile in length; and in consequence of the great speed he was going at, it seemed as though he had no sooner entered it than he reached its termination.

It led into the broad highway which leads from London to Guildford.

Finding this to be the case, he pulled up abruptly.

He was only just in time to avoid coming into collision with a waggon and a team of horses, which were coming round the corner out of the high-road into the lane.

Turpin drew aside to let them pass.

He was much annoyed, for he was seen, and could not avoid it; and doubtless the driver of the waggon would presently encounter the dragoons, and he would at once say exactly where he had seen him.

The waggon was a large one, covered with tarpaulin, and drawn by three horses.

The driver was perched up in his high seat, looking as though only half awake.

Nevertheless, he saw Dick Turpin by the roadside.

Without a word he passed on.

The horses were going at a sort of a jog trot, and this rate of speed, together with the lumbering noise which the waggon made as it rolled over the road, convinced Dick Turpin that it was empty, or nearly so.

It was strange that he should take notice of such a trifling thing, but then he was on the look-out to observe all circumstances, and do the best to turn events to his own advantage.

No sooner did this conviction come over him, than a wild, daring, desperate idea entered his brain.

And no sooner had it done so, than he resolved to carry it out.

The waggon passed him, and, as he looked after it, he could see that it was quite empty, with the exception of a quantity of loose straw that was littered over the bottom of it, for the two pieces of canvas that hung at the back had been drawn to one side and tied there.

With great rapidity Dick Turpin turned Black Bess's head round, and galloped after the waggon. Of course he reached it in a moment.

"Hi, hi!" he cried, "stop—stop—pull up: I have some particular to say."

The driver pulled up upon being thus called upon to do so, and looked down in the road at each side of him, expecting to see the person who had hailed him to make his appearance.

But he saw none.

The fact was, as soon as the waggon stopped, Dick, who was close behind, made Black Bess leap completely into it.

It was a feat which she had performed more than once before, and she seemed to understand in an instant what she was wanted to do.

The driver was greatly surprised upon finding no one appeared, so he stood up and looked over the top of the waggon.

By this means he could see the road behind him, but he failed to catch sight of a living creature.

"Dang me!" he said, as he sat down, "if this ain't a queer thing! I'll swear I heard a voice! I wonder who it was? Howsomever, it don't matter to me—I'll be off again!"

Accordingly he cracked his whip, and the horses set off at a trot once more; but, although he had affected to treat this matter in such an offhand way, he was, in reality, rather uneasy about it, and every moment that elapsed caused his uneasiness to increase.

"I'll swear I heard a voice—I didn't dream it! A wonder what it means? Is anything going to happen to me? I'll have another look."

The waggoner stood up again, and looked behind him along the road as well as he was able.

But not a single living thing was visible upon it.

"It's very strange, I'm certain, and it does put me about! 'Tain't nobody inside the waggon surely? I'll look!"

As soon as ever Black Bess had jumped into the waggon, Dick Turpin slipped out of the saddle, and took hold of her head in order to keep her quiet.

Then, placing his other hand against her shoulder, he applied a gentle pressure, which the gallant creature immediately understood, for she slowly and gently laid herself down upon the straw.

Patting her caressingly upon the head and neck, Dick Turpin bade her lie still, just as though he was speaking to a human being.

There was plenty of loose straw in the waggon, so, gathering it up in both arms, he covered his mare over, and anyone looking into the semi-darkness which prevailed in the interior of the vehicle would never have suspected for a moment the presence of a horse there.

By the time he had done this, the waggoner had made up his mind to have a look, in order to ascertain whether the mysterious voice had proceeded from inside the waggon.

For this purpose he drew aside the canvas in front just behind his seat, and put his head in.

This was just what Turpin wished the man would do, and as soon as ever his head appeared, the highwayman took hold of him by the collar of his coat with both hands, and forcibly and quickly drew him inside.

The man was so astonished and so terrified that he was deprived of his breath, and could not give utterance to a single sound.

"Silence!" said Dick, in a gruff voice—"keep silent! If you utter a word above a whisper, or make the least resistance, I will twist your head off!"

The horrible nature of this threat, and the uncertainty that the waggoner felt as to who his assailant might be, increased his terror.

He trembled violently from head to foot.

"Do just as I tell you," continued Dick, "and you will not be harmed in the least. Listen, and obey!"

"I will!" the waggoner managed to gasp out.

"Very well, then, be quick; off with your coat and off with your hat, and give them to me!"

The waggoner pulled off these articles of apparel more quickly than he had ever done in his life before.

"Very good!" said Dick; "and now the next thing I want is a nice piece of rope. Ah! I see; here's the very thing."

Hanging up against one side of the waggon was a coil of very thick and very strong rope, which was used for the purpose of loading and unloading.

Although he was almost frightened out of his wits, the waggoner wondered what in the world could be wanted with the rope; but his speculations upon this point were quickly set at rest.

The rope was several yards in length, and at one end of it Dick made a running noose, which he slipped over one of the waggoner's wrists.

Drawing the cord tight, he next coiled it round his other wrist, so that his hands were tied behind his back.

Satisfied that all was secure so far, Dick passed the rope under the elbows, and drew them so tightly together, that the waggoner uttered a roar of pain.

"Beware," cried Turpin, "or you're a dead man!"

While he spoke, he passed the rope across the lower part of the waggoner's face, then he cried:

"Open your mouth!"

The waggoner obeyed in an instant, but afterwards regretted his ready compliance with this order.

Dick pulled the rope in between his teeth, and, looping it at the back of his head, drew it so tight, that the man could neither open nor close his mouth, nor give utterance to a sound.

As he had yet plenty of rope to spare, he passed it round the waggoner's body, about half-way between his elbows and his shoulders, and there securing it, brought it down nearly to his knees, where he tied it again.

When this was done, there was just enough rope to reach down to the waggoner's ankles, so he tied them together as well.

"I rather think you are secure now!" said Dick, who could not help smiling at the manner in which the waggoner was bound. "I will defy you to move a muscle, or to utter a sound! You can see and hear, and that's quite enough for the present! Think yourself lucky that you have been let off so easily! You can feel as well, so that, if you get scuffling about the bottom of the waggon, or making any moaning sound, I shall run you through with my sword, and then there will be an end of you altogether!"

The waggoner closed his eyes and made the reflection that he was as good as a dead man.

Dick Turpin was highly satisfied with his progress so far, but time was rapidly slipping away, and he had yet much to do.

Gathering up more straw, he covered the waggoner over with it entirely, and placed a little more over Black Bess, who lay as still as death itself.

In case anyone should look inside the waggon, they would be unable to see anything of a suspicious character.

But not wishing to court observation, Dick went to the back and untied the strings which held back the canvas.

The back of the waggon was now completely covered over, so that no one could see into it without drawing the covering back, and even then they would not be able to see very well, for the interior was quite dark.

Quite certain now that he should be successful in outwitting the dragoons, Dick Turpin put on the long and ample overcoat which at his direction the waggoner had pulled off.

It had a very broad collar and came close up in the throat, and when he had buttoned it up the lower part of the highwayman's countenance was completely concealed.

The hat was of a slouching character, made of white felt, and furnished with a broad, flapping brim, so that when he had put this on and drawn it as far over his head as he could, the highwayman was so well disguised that there was little or no fear he would be able to pass a cursory examination without being recognised.

Of course if he was looked at with a suspicious eye the state of affairs would be completely altered, and the probability is that he would have been detected at once.

Patting and stroking Black Bess for the last time, Dick scrambled out of the waggon and placed himself in the driver's seat.

In front of this was a large piece of canvas which the waggoner used to wrap round his legs and so protect himself from the inclemency of the weather.

This was just the very thing that Turpin desired, since it would enable him to completely conceal the lower portion of his attire, which, of course, did not look much like a waggoner's.

He pulled the apron round him, so as to cover as great a portion of his body as possible, drew the collar of his coat round his face and before his mouth, for it was a chill morning, and no suspicion would be aroused at his muffling himself up.

By the time he had made all these preparations and taken the whip and reins in his hand he looked about as much like a waggoner as anyone possibly could.

He was in high spirits, for he did not doubt that he should be able to carry his plan to a successful termination.

He could imitate the broad Essex dialect to a niccty for he had heard it much in his youth, and he felt sure that the officers could not fail to be deceived by it.

It would have suited Dick's purpose best to have turned the waggon round and gone in the opposite direction.

This, however, would have been hazardous, and provocative of suspicion, because it was quite possible that the dragoons in the distance might have noticed the waggon creeping slowly along.

Therefore he had no resource but to drive straight to his foes.

It looked a most hazardous proceeding, but there was no help for it.

Dick smacked the heavy whip in true waggoner's style, and at a very tolerable rate of speed indeed the waggon lumbered along the lane.

"Now for it!" muttered Dick, presently. "Two more minutes will settle the matter either one way or the other. If they find me out I shall be in rather an awkward fix, I fancy!"

CHAPTER DXC.

DICK TURPIN ENACTS THE WAGGONER TO GREAT PERFECTION.

As Dick Turpin spoke these words the troop of dragoons came round a bend in the lane, about a quarter of a mile in advance, at full gallop.

They certainly kept upon the highwayman's track in a very clever and creditable manner, for, as the reader is aware, they were following in Dick's exact steps.

On they came at undiminished speed, and as they came closer and closer without showing the least signs of drawing rein, Dick really began to hope that they would gallop past the waggon, leaving him unquestioned.

This, however, was not realised.

It is scarcely to be expected that such a sharp and astute individual as the officer in command of the troop of dragoons unquestionably was should allow a vehicle of any kind to pass him without endeavouring to extract from the driver some information as to whether they were on the right track or not.

"Halt!" he cried, in a clear, ringing voice, which reached Dick's ears distinctly.

The dragoons drew up their horses with a sudden dash, and Dick Turpin immediately found the waggon surrounded by his pertinacious foes.

"Pull up your waggon," cried the officer, "I want to ask you a few questions! Pull up, in the King's name!"

Dick Turpin preserved his calmness in a most admirable manner, and pretended to make a desperate effort to stop the horses.

At last he brought the team to a standstill.

The officer did not give Turpin time to open his mouth, but asked, abrubtly:

"Where have you come from?"

"Eh, sir?" replied Turpin, assuming a countryman's language and manner to perfection. "I be reether hard o' heerin', so I mun ax you to speak again."

"Where do you come from?" bawled the officer, at the top of his lungs.

"Thaxted," replied Dick, giving the name of his native place. "I comes from Thaxted, and I be goin' to Suthton."

"Suthton?" said the officer. "I know no such place as that."

"Eh, sir?" said Dick again, who had determined to make the officer say everything twice over, without he bawled loud enough to be in danger of cracking his throat.

"I think he means Southampton," said one of the dragoons, addressing his officer. "I have heard it called Suthton before now."

"Where's Suthton?" roared the officer. "Do ye mean Southampton?"

Dick grinned and nodded as he replied:

"You can make a big mouthful of it by calling it 'Southampton,' if you like—I calls it 'Suthton!'"

"Well, that don't matter," said the officer. "I want to know whether you've passed a man on horseback lately?"

"Eh, sir?"

"Oh, d—n it!" cried the officer, beginning to lose his temper—"the fellow's as deaf as a post!"

"Eh, sir?" said Dick again, of course pretending not to know what was said to him.

"Have—you—passed—a—man—on—horseback?" roared the officer, giving a separate shout for each word.

Dick grinned again, and shook his head slowly backwards and forwards.

"Noa," he replied, "not with this waggon I ain't! I've got some good horses in my team, but they arn't very likely to pass anybody on horseback. Noa, noa—they arn't swift enough for that!"

"I don't mean that," said the officer—"I mean have you seen a man mounted on a black horse pass you?"

"A man sir?" said Dick, putting his hand to his ear.

"Why the devil don't you listen?"

Dick did not consider the words were spoken quite loud enough, so he cried again:

"A man, sir?"

"Oh, damn your man!"

"I think we had better push on, sir!" said the dragoon who had before spoken. "This fellow is as stupid as a pig, and if he saw our man pass by he'd hardly know it!"

The officer, however, was in doubt as to whether Dick had turned down this lane or not, and therefore he took so much pains in questioning the waggoner, as it was of vital importance that this should be ascertained.

"Have you seen a man on horseback?" roared the officer.

This time Dick was not content with grinning, but burst out into loud laughter, which made the officer more furious than ever.

"Have I ever seed a man on hossback?" repeated Dick. "That be a question to ax to be sure! Now, sir, do you think as I've druv a team o' hosses all over the country for a matter of five an' twenty year wi'out seein' a man on hossback?"

"Oh, curse the fellow!" said the officer. "I wish I could make him understand! It strikes me that he's quite as much knave as fool!"

"A man, sir?" said Dick, in the same tone of voice.

"Have you seen a man on a black horse within the last half hour or so?"

"Was it summat such a looking chap as yourself, sir?" asked Dick. "Had he got a red coat on, with gold lace all over it, like yourn?"

"Yes,—yes!" cried the officer, eagerly—"that's him! Where did you see him? How long ago?"

"A man, sir?"

"Where did you see him?" said the officer again, as loud as he could, but not so loud as before, for he found he was fast getting hoarse.

"Well, dang me, if I didn't loik to a run over him, hoss and all! I were a comin' round the corner o' the lane just below, out of the Lunnun road! I never seed him!—he was going at full gallop. 'Dang me,' thinks I as soon as I seed him, 'there's a go!' But I won't tell you any more—if I do you'll call me a liar, though what I've seed I've seed!"

"Which way did he go?" asked the officer, not forgetting to raise his voice to the required pitch. "Did he go towards London or Guildford?"

"Well, sir, he was a comin' down the lane full split. 'Dang me,' thinks I to myself, 'here's a go! He'll run into me, for sure it's a case with Captain!' But dang me, sir! up went the black hoss in the air, and jumped over Captain's back as clear as anything!"

"What horrible rubbish is the fellow talking now?" said the officer, who found himself at a loss to thoroughly understand what was meant.

"I think I can explain," said the dragoon again. "You see he's got three horses in his waggon, and one is in front. He calls that leading horse Captain, and he means that, as Dick Turpin came galloping on, in order to save himself from a collision, he made his mare leap over this horse's back. We are on the right track—there can be no doubt about that!"

The officer nodded his head.

"Ah!" he said, "I thought that was it," when in reality he had not thought anything of the kind, only he did not like to confess as much to his subordinate.

"Which way did he go?" he roared.

"Why, Guildford way, of course! How could he help it? Didn't I tell you I was a comin' round the corner from Lunnun, and he was galloping down the lane, that as he jumped over Captain's back! How could he go to Lunnun? Noa, he went Guildford way! I watched him myself!"

"That will do, then," said the officer, "we will lose no more time. You may depend we have got the truth out of this fool at last!"

"Eh, sir?" cried Dick.

The officer shook his fist.

"Drive on," he cried—"drive on, and be d—d!"

"All right, sir," replied Dick, flourishing his whip, and making it crack like the report of a pistol.

Before, however, he had done much more than set the horses in motion, the dragoons were far off down the lane.

After what they had been told, they did not entertain the shadow of a doubt that Turpin was on the way to Guildford.

After they had gone, Dick amused himself for some time by laughing over the whole occurrence, for, by assuming so much stupidity, and needlessly causing the officer to say everything twice over, he had had a little revenge upon him, which was sweet indeed.

"They will go to Guildford now, sure enough, and I think I may safely calculate that I have got rid of them at last. Bravo, this is a capital scheme! I won't go much further like this though! As soon as I take the next turning I will mount my mare again and be off! While I have been occupied in this manner, my comrades have had a thousand chances of passing me; I can do no more than keep a sharp look-out."

After going rather less than half a mile, Dick Turpin came to the corner.

From his elevated position on the top of the waggon, he was able to command a very extensive view of the country around him, and, to his great satisfaction, he discovered that there was not a sign of his enemies to be seen.

Accordingly he stopped the horses, and scrambled inside the waggon again.

Black Bess had laid perfectly still, which is not so much to be wondered at, for, after all her exertions she necessarily felt considerable fatigue, and the rest was very grateful indeed.

The waggoner lay just where he had been placed, and seemed half dead with fright.

Turpin rapidly unbound him, and, having done so pulled off the coat and hat which had done him such good service, and resumed his own apparel.

"I have used you rather roughly," he said, "but never mind. Here's a guinea for you. I wish it was more, but it's all I have. I didn't know I'd got that, for I fancied I'd cleared my pockets."

The waggoner took the guinea with a very sullen air.

"You're not much the worse off," said Dick, "and I am a great deal better. You can get up in your seat and drive on without fear. I sha'n't trouble you again."

"Then it was you that cried out 'stop!' when I was in the lane?" said the waggoner.

"It was."

"Well, I wish I'd ha' known, and you'd ha' seen whether I'd ha' pulled up! You won't play me the same trick again—I'll take good care o' that—not if you shout till you're black in the face!"

"All right," said Dick, "it's a thousand to one if we ever meet again; if we do you will find I shall reward you rather substantially for the service you have done me."

With these words, Dick slipped out of the back of the waggon and called to Black Bess to follow him.

She did so as obediently as a dog.

"Bravo, my lass," said Turpin, with pride and satisfaction in the tones of his voice, "there are few horses who could do what you have done to-day! If any harm should happen to you, or if I were to lose you, things would go very hard with me, that is certain."

Dick could not contemplate with any calmness the prospect of one day losing his gallant steed.

He banished the thought as he always did whenever it occurred to him, and sprang lightly and quickly into the saddle.

"Now then to perform my task," he said. "I must find my three comrades—I wonder in what direction I shall look?"

He paused for an instant to consider, and then having made up his mind, he allowed the reins to fall loosely on to the neck of Black Bess, and away she bounded like an arrow from a bow, and very soon the lumbering old waggon was lost to view.

The waggoner cracked his whip, and as his team once more set itself in motion, he said, with an air of the greatest determination:

"If I stop again when anybody calls out, I hope I may be rammed into a cannon and drawn out through the touch-hole!"

CHAPTER DXCI.

THE OFFICER OF DRAGOONS AT LENGTH DISCOVERS WHAT A DREADFUL MISTAKE HE HAS MADE, AND LEARNS HOW NEAR HE WAS TO CAPTURING DICK TURPIN.

It is necessary that we should give a little attention to the further proceedings of the dragoons, who were so cleverly deceived by Dick Turpin when he played the part of waggoner.

Not doubting that the information was perfectly correct in every particular, they galloped off along the high-road towards Guildford at as great a rate of speed as their horses were capable of achieving.

But as they looked in advance—and, the road being straight, they could see for a great distance—as they looked in advance, we say, and failed to see any signs of the highwayman, doubts for the first time began to flit before their minds.

At last they saw the Guildford stage-coach approaching, and the officer determined to ask the guard whether he had seen anyone answering Dick Turpin's description.

He had not long to wait, and in obedience to his command the coach was brought to a standstill.

The driver, upon being appealed to, stoutly declared that no one answering in the least degree to the description given had passed him on the road.

"And," he added, "I could not have missed seeing such a person—I should have noticed him at once! I have had my eye, too, on the country on both sides of the road. As I dare say you know, you can see for many a mile, but I saw no redcoated man on a black horse."

Having thus, as he considered, settled the matter, the coachman whipped up the horses and away rolled the coach, leaving the dragoons standing stock-still in the road, and looking with a puzzled, half-angry expression into each other's countenances.

"What's the meaning of this?" cried the officer. "D—n me if this fellow is not more trouble than the reward's worth!"

"What's your opinion, Hackett?"

Hackett was the name of the dragoon who had ventured to make a few very sensible remarks when his superior officer was questioning the supposed waggoner.

Of course he felt rather flattered to think the officer should ask him for his opinion, and he at once assumed an air of preternatural sagaciousness.

"Ahem, sir! I am much obliged, I am sure, and I hope you'll excuse me for speaking plainly."

"Oh, speak out, Hackett—don't be afraid!"

"Well, then, sir, taking all things into consideration—I mean weighing them separately and then collectively—I am forced to come to the conclusion that the waggoner gave us false information."

"But what could be his motive?"

"That's not for me to say, sir. I could not pretend to answer that question."

"Perhaps you will allow me to make a remark?" said another of the dragoons.

The officer looked at him rather sharply, and said:

"Well, what have you got to say?"

"Well, sir, it may be important, or not, just according to the view you take of the matter; but as we were all standing round the waggon I looked at the driver and fancied he had got a murstarche."

"A what?"

"A murstarche—hair on the lip—you know what I mean."

"Of course, you idiot! I was only surprised at such a thing! Are you sure he had a moustache?"

"Well, I wouldn't like to take my bible oath of that same; but I feel pretty sure of it nevertheless."

"I noticed that he had got the lower part of his face muffled up very much," said Hackett; "and, now I come to think of it, I do believe I saw something very much like a moustache."

"I said from the first," responded the officer, "that that fellow was more knave than fool. He has been playing with us! I'd lay a ten-pound note to a brass farthing that it was no waggoner at all, but Dick Turpin dressed up in the waggoner's clothes!"

This was a fresh idea to all the dragoons, and they looked at each other in doubt and perplexity.

"But if it was him," said Hackett, "what's he done with his horse?"

"How the devil should I know?" retorted the officer. "What's the horse got to do with it, I should like to know!"

"Oh, nothing, sir, only I——"

"Silence! If you can't speak sense, hold your tongue!"

Thus rebuked, Hackett drew back, muttering many and divers oaths as he did so.

"There's a mystery connected with that waggon, any way," cried the officer. "To make the least of it, the waggoner told a lie. Now, he must have had some motive for doing so. We are clearly quite off the scent, so we will be off after the waggon. It can't have gone far, and we shall overtake it in a very little while!"

As a matter of course, it did not lie in the power of the dragoons to gainsay anything their officer might propose, and so, with that readiness which was the result of discipline alone, they turned round their horses' heads and galloped after him along the road, until they came to the lane, round the corner of which they swept at rather a dangerous speed.

Something less than five minutes brought them to its extremity, and, looking about him, the officer presently espied the waggon in the distance.

"There it is," he cried, pointing with his sword towards it! "Come along, my men—we shall soon get to the bottom of this!"

At quite a fast gallop, considering the state of the cattle, the dragoons swept along the road, and as their rate of speed was about four times greater than that of the waggon, it follows that they overtook it in a very short time.

As soon as he was within hailing distance, the officer put his hand to his mouth and cried out:

"Hi!—hi!—stop—stop!"

It will be remembered that these were the words that Dick Turpin had made use of just before he made Black Bess jump into the waggon.

The driver heard them plainly enough, but so far from paying the least attention to the command, he cracked his whip violently, and made his horses go faster.

"Stop, is it," he cried,—"I rather think I see it! I don't stop if I know it! You may take an old bird in once, but you can't do it twice—the burnt dog always dreads the fire! Come up, will you!" and he favoured his horses with another cut, and the waggon rolled on faster than ever.

"Stop, you villain!" roared the officer of dragoons—"stop, I say, or I will order my men to fire, and they will blow you and your waggon to bits!"

As may have been guessed, by the readiness with which he submitted to Dick Turpin, the waggoner was by no means the most courageous individual in the world, and this threat was of such a dreadful character that it almost frightened him out of his life.

Rather than run the risk of such an awful catastrophe, he thought it would be better to endure again what he had previously put up with.

Accordingly he brought his horses to a standstill directly.

"Surround the waggon," cried the officer, "and two of you cover that man with your carbines! If he attempts to move, or if he refuses to answer my questions, don't wait for me to give the word to fire, but shoot him at once!"

To the intense alarm of the waggoner, a dragoon posted himself on each side of him and pointed his carbine full at his head.

"Unbutton your coat!" was the officer's first command.

Wonderingly, the waggoner obeyed.

It then became abundantly manifest that he wore no moustache—his face was as clean shaven as anyone's could be.

Seeing this, the officer considered his suppositions about the identity of the waggoner blown to the winds, and so he went on a fresh track.

"You rascally villain!" he cried, "what made you give us that false information? The man on the black horse didn't go Guildford way!"

"I never said he did!" retorted the waggoner.

"Do you mean to sit there and call me a liar to my face?" screamed the officer, shaking with passion,—"I say—do you mean to sit there and call me a liar?"

"I am ready to do just what you desire."

"I shall take you into custody! I have abundant grounds for doing so. You can hear now plainly enough every word that I say, and before you pretended that you were deaf, and made me shout every word at the top of my breath! You are an accomplice of Dick Turpin's, and you shall be punished accordingly."

"I am no accomplice of Dick Turpin's," replied the waggoner, "and you can take me into custody if you like—I don't care!"

"Search the waggon," cried the officer, suddenly struck with a fresh thought—"search the waggon: very likely the man we want is hidden in it!"

This supposition produced an immense amount of excitement.

But boldly enough the dragoons made their way to the hind part of the waggon, and, drawing aside the canvas flaps, looked in it.

"There's nothing here," said one—"the waggon's empty, with the exception of some straw that is scattered about the bottom of it."

"Of course it's empty," replied the waggoner. "Why the devil didn't you have sense enough to look in the waggon before, and then you'd ha' found something worth having."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, I mean if you'd looked in the waggon when it was down the lane, you'd ha' found it all out!"

"Speak out, you wretch! and don't you attempt to deceive me again!"

"I haven't deceived you at all!" said the waggoner; "and if you'd only patiently listen to reason, you'd very soon learn the ins and outs of the affair from beginning to end!"

"Go on, then—speak! But first of all I caution you, and bid you beware!"

"Well, then, if you'd ha' looked into the waggon, you'd ha' seen me lying down on the straw bound neck and heels with one of my own wain ropes, and by the side of me you'd ha' seen a black horse lying down on the straw too, and sitting here on this damned identical seat, where I am sitting now, you'd ha' seen the man you were after!"

"Damn me if I didn't think that was it!" cried the officer, slapping his thigh, and pleased rather than otherwise to find that he had not been mistaken after all.

"That's the truth of the matter, sir!" said the waggoner "and I'd take my bible oath to it any minute!"

"Explain it all, will you?"

"I can in a very few words, for betwixt seeing and hearing, I know all about it!"

"Go on, then! It is possible you may clear yourself, and remove all the suspicions I have in my own mind against you; but, at the same time, I hardly think you will. Why didn't you stop when I called after you?"

"I can tell you that," was the reply, 'if you'll only give me a little time."

"Go on! Take as much time as you like!"

In a very circumstantial manner, the waggoner, after receiving this permission, gave a full, true and particular account of all that had happened, and concluded by giving his reason for continuing to drive on when the officer called after him to stop.

There could be no such thing as doubting the truth of what the waggoner had said.

It was not possible that such a tale could be concocted by him.

The furious rage and intense mortification of the officers and dragoons are things which it is possible the reader may be able to imagine, but which are entirely out of our power to describe.

They were compelled, however, to recover their equanimity in the best manner they could.

It was clear that they had been "done brown"—"sold," and after such a delay, it would be worse than useless for them to attempt to recommence the pursuit after the highwayman.

They were quite aware that he had had plenty of time to get miles and miles off, and it was an additional source of aggravation to them when they made the reflection that in all probability at that very moment Dick Turpin was resting himself somewhere, and exulting over his victory.

"Let me once catch sight of him again!" cried the officer of dragoons—and the tone of his voice showed how fully he meant what he said—"let me catch sight of him again, and damn me if I rest a minute till I have caught him!"

"Come, my lads, we must put up with our disappointment in the best way we can! We will stop at the next inn we come to to rest ourselves and our cattle, and then perhaps something may come to our knowledge."

After their long and fatiguing ride, the dragoons were quite delighted at the idea of having a rest, and so they rode after their leader without experiencing so much disappointment as might have been expected.

The prospect of a sojourn at a country inn was a consolation to them.

CHAPTER DXCII.

DICK TURPIN AT LENGTH HAS THE PLEASURE OF REJOINING HIS THREE COMPANIONS.

When the officer of dragoons said that Dick Turpin was in all probability exulting over their discomfiture he was not very far wrong, but was in error when supposing that the highwayman was safe in some secure hiding-place.

So far from this being the case, Dick Turpin was busy looking anxiously around him in the hope that he might see something of those three persons he so much desired to meet.

It was in vain, he could see nothing of them, and he bitterly regretted the series of mischances he had met with, which had driven him so far out of the course he had made up his mind to take.

But very often we repine when we ought to rejoice, and Dick Turpin soon found that it was really a fortunate circumstance that he should have been chased by the dragoons in the way he had been.

At the very time when the incidents we have just described were happening, Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack were in the vicinity of Guildford.

Dick Turpin little thought it, but there was indeed every probability that before many hours had elapsed he should rejoin his old and faithful comrades.

Fearing to put up at an inn lest he should be recognised, Dick Turpin pushed on during the remainder of the day, only halting once in a green meadow and removing the bit from Black Bess's mouth in order that she might feed upon the sweet green herbage.

By repeated examinations he had satisfied himself that his enemies were nowhere in sight, and he rightly enough imagined that they had for the present abandoned the pursuit.

Dick Turpin was very awkwardly situated, for he could not do as others would.

It was impossible for him to pause every now and then and inquire of various people whether they had chanced to see three individuals answering to the description which he could give of his companions.

Such a course as that was not to be thought of—he must trust to himself, and to himself alone.

Gradually the day passed away, and the dim shadows of evening began slowly to creep over the whole landscape.

It was during the night that his companions were most likely to be travelling, and consequently then that he stood the best chance of meeting with them.

Although quite ignorant of the circumstance, he was at this time within three miles of those he so much wished to see, for it was upon this night of which we are writing that the three highwaymen had their adventure with the young lady, with the clever farmer, and with the old lady in the carriage.

The words which this old lady had spoken, it will be remembered, made a deeper impression upon Sixteen-String Jack than he cared to show or to own, and his comrades ineffectually endeavoured to draw from him an account of what had taken place.

They were obliged to content themselves with the assurance he gave that he had been successful in obtaining a tolerable amount of booty.

After this all three rode forward towards London.

Tom King was exceedingly anxious to return to the deserted mansion, and he had resolved to do so provided they met with anything like success in their attacks upon travellers.

They rode on then rather swiftly towards the metropolis, determined not to allow anyone to pass them unchallenged between then and daybreak

Ere they had gone far, the clatter of a horse's feet came upon their ears, and it was Tom King who said:

"A single traveller is approaching, mounted on horseback; we will stop him and take what he has!"

This was agreed to, and the three highwaymen drew themselves up in a line across the road, and waited for the horseman to approach.

He was coming along in capital style.

As soon as he was near enough, Tom King, who was a little in advance of his two comrades, exclaimed:

"Stand and deliver! Hand over your purse without resistance, and no harm will happen to you!"

"I should know that voice," replied the traveller, "and you must also recognise mine; I am rejoiced that we should have met at last."

It was indeed Dick Turpin who had thus encountered his companions, and the next moment his hand was tightly clasped in that of his old friend and ally Tom King.

Claude and Jack both pressed forward eagerly, for they were equally rejoiced that a meeting should at last have taken place.

When the joy and excitement which their meeting occasioned had somewhat subsided, the three highwaymen quickly noticed the dejected state of Turpin's spirits.

"What ails you, captain?" they asked—"what has happened since we parted that has distressed you so much?—how come it that we should have met you on this road to-night? The understanding was that you should have remained at the deserted mansion until our arrival."

"That was the understanding," returned Turpin; "but I have much to tell you that will both astonish and grieve you. I might, myself, ask you how it is that you have been so much longer on your journey than we had calculated upon? I have been full of alarm on your account."

"No doubt—no doubt!"

"The fact is," said Claude Duval, "that an explanation is necessary on both sides. Since we parted we have had some rare adventures."

"We have," added Tom King; "and a great deal of time will necessarily be consumed in recounting them; we shall not be able to do it on the high-road."

"However surprising and remarkable you may consider your own adventures to be," said Turpin, "you will find that what I have to tell you will far transcend them."

This announcement made the highwaymen impatient and anxious in the utmost degree to learn what had befallen their captain during their separation from him.

"The chief thing we have to tell you," said Tom King, "may be summed up in a very few words indeed We have failed to bring away any of the miser's gold."

"That is but a minor evil," replied Turpin, with a sigh.

"But cannot you inform us of the utmost extent of your calamity in the course of a few words without going into details?" asked Tom King, "If you can you will greatly relieve our hearts."

"I can only briefly make the announcement, then, that Maud is a prisoner in Newgate!"

Ejaculations of astonishment and indignation burst from the lips of the three highwaymen upon the receipt of this unexpected intelligence.

Indeed, so extraordinary was it, that at first they were quite incredulous.

"I cannot enter into particulars now," continued Dick Turpin. "We must come to a halt as soon as we conveniently can; I will then begin my narrative from the beginning, and acquaint you with all that has happened up to our present meeting."

"It will take some time, I fancy?"

"It will indeed, for I have more to tell you than you can possibly dream of."

"Our meeting was strangely brought about, was it not?" remarked Sixteen-String Jack.

"Very—very, though I have been stopped on the highway before."

"The fact is," added Tom King, "we had resolved to stop everybody on the road to-night, and to take all the booty we could possibly lay our hands on."

"Why did you make such a determination as that?" asked Turpin.

"Because hitherto we have had such bad luck; it was, as we may say, the only chance of improving our position."

"And what luck have you had?"

"Very good up to stopping you."

"And was not that good?" inquired Turpin, with a smile,

"The best," was the reply.

"Well, day will not dawn for some hours at least," said Dick Turpin; "and I don't wish to be the means of balking your intentions. Let us do the best we can between now and daylight."

"Agreed—agreed!"

"Afterwards we will take up our quarters at some inn, and spend the day there. We shall have plenty to do for the recital of our adventures will occupy many hours."

"Rest assured of that!"

"I am glad you're determined to join us, captain," said Claude Duval; "and, as we are all four together, I propose that we attempt something out of the way."

"What do you think we shall have a chance of doing? Shall we stop the mail-coach?"

"That is about the extent of what we can accomplish. But we managed to do it between us a short time back."

"A stage-coach is always worth the stopping," said Tom King. "If we mind what we are about, we can get as much booty from it as we should derive from half a dozen more trifling adventures."

"The stage-coach be it, then," said Turpin. "I don't think our patience will be put to a very severe trial, for the coach that leaves London in the evening ought to be here by this time."

"By Jove, yes!" cried Claude Duval. "And it carries with it the mail bags, doesn't it?"

"You are quite right—it does."

"Then I foresee a glorious and profitable adventure!"

"Get all your weapons in readiness," cried Turpin. "This is the last adventure we shall have for some time to come, and, moreover, we require a good supply of cash."

"Do you mean to carry out your original plan?"

"I intend to do so: but the money will be required for a far different purpose."

"Tell us now."

"I cannot; you must wait until I can explain all to you from the first to last. Hark! Isn't that the guard's horn?"

Turpin was silent instantly, and then all four of the highwaymen listened with the utmost intentness.

The shrieking, unmusical notes that issued from the long tin horn carried by the guard came distinctly though faintly to their ears.

"She's a long way off yet," exclaimed Turpin. "So much the better! We shall have all the more time to make our preparations."

While this conversation had been going on, our friends had been trotting gently along the road, but now they paused.

On one side of the highway, just where they came to a halt there was a huge mass of something black, that resembled a haystack as much as anything.

It was not this, however, and Sixteen-String Jack, whose curiosity was strongly roused, made his way towards it to ascertain what it really was.

"I thought so," he muttered, as he put out his hand and touched it. "Captain," he cried, in a louder tone of voice, "I think I have hit upon a capital idea!"

"What is it?"

"Do you see this?" asked Jack, pointing to the black-looking mass.

"Not very well—what is it?"

"It's a great block of loose faggots," was the reply. "I suppose they have been lately cut down, and left here in order to be carted away."

"Well, what's your idea?"

"Why, that this stack of faggots will enable us to bring the mail-coach to a stop very suddenly, and without any trouble on our part."

"How—how?" asked all three of his comrades anxiously, for as yet they failed to grasp at his meaning.

"Why, I propose that we all four set to work to place these faggots loosely across the road, and pile up as high as we are able. As the coach is at some distance, we shall have plenty of time to do it The leading horses will entangle their feet among the twigs and branches, down they will go, they will pull the other pair after them, and then, of course, the coach will be brought to a complete stop."

The highwaymen now fully comprehended their comrade's intention, and set about carrying it into effect with right good will.

The word "faggot" scarcely describes what the stack consisted of.

They were not straight pieces of wood, but cuttings from the trees and hedgerows, and they ranged from the longest twig up to a branch several inches in diameter, and six or eight feet in length, with numberless little branches shooting out from them in every direction.

[CLARD RECEIVES A VISITOR IN NEWGATE.]

The celerity with which the highwaymen pulled the stack to pieces and placed the faggots across the road was truly amazing.

In less than three minutes they had completed their task.

The faggots reached from one side of the road to the other, and were quite two feet from the ground, while the width was more than a yard.

Truly was it a barrier of a most formidable character, and it would be impossible, we fancy, to devise anything so well calculated to bring the coach to a stop.

Quick as they had been in all their movements, the highwaymen were only just in time.

By the time they had remounted their steeds and got their pistols in readiness, the mail-coach was clearly in sight, and not more than a hundred yards off at the most.

With great anxiousness they now awaited the result of this new experiment.

On came the horses in slashing style, little dreaming of the impediment that lay in their path.

The two leading horses were going at full gallop, and raising their fore-feet high in the air.

At length the barrier was reached, and then, instead of finding their feet come down upon the roadway, they got entangled among the twigs.

They could not stop themselves, and so, with a rare instinct, they gave a tremendous bound forward, anticipating, no doubt, that they should by this means get clear of the obstacle. But they were mistaken.

All four of their feet became hopelessly entangled, and after a few gallant struggles, down they both went with a crash.

As Sixteen-String Jack had foreseen, they pulled the other two horses down after them, and something else which he did not foresee.

This was the coachman.

When he felt his leading horses stumble, he gathered the reins up very tightly with both hands, in order to keep them upon their legs.

When they fell down with such suddenness, as a matter of course they gave the reins a tremendous jerk, and before he had time to wink his eye, the coachman found himself making a frantic endeavour to stand on his head upon the faggots.

This feat, however, he failed to accomplish, and the next moment he and his four horses were rolling, struggling, and kicking in the most furious manner conceivable, as they all frantically endeavoured to scramble to their feet.

The confusion was immense.

Such a chorus of shrieking and swearing as came from the inside and outside of the coach had surely never been heard before.

About the success of Sixteen-String Jack's manœuvre there could be no possible doubt.

The mail-coach was completely at a standstill, and the passengers wholly at the mercy of the highwaymen.

CHAPTER DXCIII.

DICK TURPIN FINDS THE OFFICER IN COMMAND OF THE TROOP OF DRAGOONS A VERY TROUBLESOME CUSTOMER.

As our friends were four in number, they were able, in a manner of speaking, to take the coach completely by storm, by surrounding it at all points.

Dick Turpin and Claude Duval repaired to the doors of the coach with the intention of looking after the inside passengers, while Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack attended to those on the roof.

When the former took up their positions, they found that the windows had been already let down by the terrified passengers.

Those who had been valorous enough to put out their heads and look around, precipitately withdrew as soon as ever the two highwaymen approached.

The shouting and screaming which had up to that moment rent the air now suddenly ceased.

The close proximity of the danger seemed to have the effect of chaining their tongues.

All knew that the coach had been stopped by highwaymen and they would not be allowed to proceed on their journey until they had delivered up whatever money and valuables they had about them.

It was rather terrifying to see Claude Duval and Dick Turpin both appear at the two windows of the stage-coach at the same moment.

The passengers glanced from one to the other in dismay.

"Make haste!" said Dick. "The worst harm that will befall you will amount to no more than the loss of a few pounds,—that is, if you are prudent enough not to resist!"

"If you do resist," said Claude Duval, rattling the barrel of his pistol on the ledge of the coach window, in what seemed to be a highly dangerous manner—"if you do resist, the consequences will be upon your own heads!"

"D—n me if I stand this!" said a voice from the interior of the coach. "There are four men among us,—let us all unite! If we make a bold stand we shall lose nothing!"

"You will lose both your money and your lives if you don't submit quietly and at once!" exclaimed Turpin. "Now, sir, I'll begin with you!" he continued, addressing the passenger who sat next the door.

"You're all d—d cowards!" said the voice which had previously spoken, "and you deserve to lose your money if you have not the courage to take care of it!"

"All in good time!" said Claude, who could dimly make out the figure of the man who spoke. "Your time will come directly, and we shall see!"

The passengers in the mail-coach on this occasion were six in number.

Four were males and two females.

With the exception of the one individual we have mentioned, they were inclined to part with what they had peaceably enough, and the two highwaymen both found their pockets rapidly getting heavier.

At last Claude addressed the man who had spoken in such a valorous manner.

"Hand over!" he cried, briefly—"it's your turn now!"

"You're a d—d cowardly set to suffer yourselves to be robbed in this manner by two men! Of course I must submit myself, because you have refused to join me. It would be madness for me to encounter two men!"

"Don't have any fears on that account!" cried Turpin. "I will not interfere,—you can settle matters with my friend entirely!"

"But I stand no chance," was the reply—"I carry no firearms!"

"But you carry weapons of some kind, I suppose?" said Claude.

"Oh yes," chimed in one of the passengers—"he has a sword by his side."

"Oh, indeed!" said Claude, "so have I; and if you will step out of the coach I will give you a chance of keeping your money!"

"No," was the reply, "I am not going to get out in order to be butchered by a lot of ruffians—I have more sense than that!"

"Hand over your purse then!" said Claude, impatiently. "It is not likely that we are going to allow you to remain an exception!"

The passenger seemed quite as unwilling to part with his gold as to get out of the coach.

"You have been very fast to call your fellow-travellers cowards," said Claude, "but the emptiest vessel always makes the most sound!"

"What do you mean by that?" asked the passenger, fiercely.

"Why, that you, making the greatest outcry about your courage, are the biggest coward of the lot!"

"Do you call me a coward, sir?"

"I do—and take that! We will see now whether you have courage or not!"

While speaking, Claude had drawn his sword, and he struck the pugnacious passenger a smart blow with the flat side of it.

"I can't allow this insult to remain unpunished! Let me get up, will you! I see I must fight him after all!"

"There's nobody hindering you from getting up," said the man who sat next to him. "Why don't you get up?"

The person thus addressed rose to his feet.

Yet he did not make very great haste to reach the coach door, and it almost seemed by his manner as though he wished some traveller would seize hold of him and prevent him from carrying his design into execution.

So far from doing this, however, they shrank back, in order to allow him as much space as possible to get out.

In the meanwhile, Claude Duval opened the door of the coach and slipped off his horse.

The passenger now made his appearance, and Duval saw that he was attired as a soldier.

He was a tall, strapping fellow, though of very dandified appearance.

By his side he carried a sword.

So far as he could tell by a glance, he had no other weapons about him.

"Now, sir," said Claude, "I am waiting for you, and I will give you a chance of keeping your money. If you can vanquish me at the sword's point—good—you shall keep your purse; if you cannot, why, I shall force you to surrender it!"

It was evident that the soldier by no means relished this proposition, and although he heartily wished that he could withdraw, shame compelled him to put on an air of resolution which he was far indeed from feeling.

He stepped lightly to the ground, and, drawing his sword, placed himself in an attitude of defence.

Claude approached; but before they could cross swords the soldier, imagining he saw a loophole by which he could creep out of his position without compromising his courage, said:

"This is not fair! When they find you are getting the worst of the fight, your companions will come to your assistance!"

"Nothing of the kind!" said Dick Turpin, who had come round to that side of the coach. "I will be one to see fair play, and I will promise not to interfere—that is, if the passengers in the inside of the coach will give their word not to interfere also."

"We won't interfere!—we won't interfere!" cried a chorus of voices from within. "We want to see some of the courage he has been talking about so much during the whole of the journey!"

The soldier looked highly indignant, and the passengers on the roof gazed in surprise on this scene, which they could not very well comprehend.

"Now, sir," said Claude, "be quick, for time is very precious with me, I can assure you! Defend yourself!"

As he spoke, Claude commenced the attack.

There are some animals that will avoid an encounter of every kind as long as they are able, when they think they cannot make certain of success, but which, when forced to the combat, will, by sheer desperation, make a formidable resistance.

There are men who resemble these animals, and the soldier was one of them.

When he saw that by no means whatever, save that of absolutely confessing his cowardice, could he avoid the encounter he worked himself up to the necessary pitch.

He returned Claude's attack with great impetuosity.

But the highwayman, calm and cool, behaved in a manner strikingly different to his antagonist.

There were very few in all England who could handle a sword with greater skill and effect than Claude Duval.

He had been much accustomed to the use of the weapon in his youth, and he parried all the wild blows the soldier struck with an ease and gracefulness that was delightful to look upon.

Then suddenly watching his opportunity, Claude entangled his own sword in that of his adversary and twisted it out of his hand.

The soldier had fought in the desperate manner we have described because he fully believed that Claude would take advantage of the first opportunity to kill him—that indeed the contest was one of life or death.

But Duval had no such intentions, and when he had disarmed his opponent he was content.

Advancing a few steps, he placed his sword against the soldier's breast, and said:

"Now, sir, I will give you one more chance of your life! Surrender what you have about you, and you shall remain unhurt!"

The soldier was greatly enraged at his defeat, and he had a very good reason for being so.

All the way he had come in the coach he had been vapouring about his skill in the use of the sword, and to have listened to his own account of the various exploits he had performed, one would have come to the conclusion that he was invincible single handed.

Claude, however, had conquered him in the space of a couple of minutes, and with an ease that looked like magic.

Burning with rage, the soldier did not say a word in reply to Claude's demand, but carried his hand to the pocket of his coat.

From this movement it seemed he was about to surrender his purse.

With the quickness of thought, however, he drew forth his hand, and as he raised it rapidly there was a bright flash and a sharp report.

It was a great wonder that Claude was not slain on this occasion.

He would never have attributed to his adversary such a treacherous act—in fact, he believed him incapable of anything of the kind.

By a mere chance, however, he saw something glittering in the soldier's hand when he drew it from his pocket, and warned, too, by the expression of his face that he was about to attempt something desperate, Claude stepped rapidly on one side.

Beyond all question, that movement saved his life, for the soldier's aim was a true one.

The bullet in its course passed exactly through the space he had just occupied.

A cry of rage burst from Dick Turpin's lips when he beheld this treacherous deed.

"Villain!" he cried, "you have been treated with misplaced clemency!"

No sooner did the soldier hear these words and discover that he had failed in achieving his object than he turned quickly round and ran off at full speed.

Dick and Claude were both so enraged at this conduct that each, without being aware of the other's intention, brought a pistol rapidly to a level and fired after his retreating form.

A series of yells rent the air, mingling strangely with the sharp reports of the pistols, and then, as they looked down the road, they saw the soldier clap both his hands to the hind part of his person, and, after a few spasmodic bounds, spring over a hedge and disappear.

Ere another word could be spoken, a low, chirping whistle came to their ears.

It proceeded from the lips of Tom King.

As soon as ever he heard the sound, Claude Duval sprang into the saddle, and in about another second the four highwaymen were together.

"Fly!" said Tom—"fly at once! By great good fortune I looked down the road and saw a troop of horsemen approaching. They are either police officers or dragoons; but I fear the latter."

"They most likely are the latter," said Dick. "I have had some trouble in eluding them during the night—for I have no doubt this is the same party that I told you of; they are commanded by a resolute fellow. Off, and away!"

The highwaymen put spurs to their steeds, and the stage-coach was rapidly left behind.

Tom King was allowed to take the lead, in consequence of the intimate knowledge he possessed of the nature of the country.

This knowledge made a wonderful difference to our friends, since the task of eluding their foes was made much easier by it.

He led the way across the open country; but not at random, for the road he took was smooth, and the horses met with very few impediments.

At last they came to the high-road, and as soon as they gained it Tom said:

"We will halt here and listen; I think there is no need for us to try our horses any further."

They stopped and listened.

All was very silent, and they came, without hesitation, to the conclusion that their pursuers were nowhere near at hand.

"It will still be necessary for us to push on," said Dick Turpin, "though we will not exert our horses too much."

"But we can't possibly reach London before daybreak," said Tom King.

"I know that quite well; still, we must get as far away from the dragoons as we can, and at the same time it will be necessary for us to find a place of shelter before morning breaks."

"I don't know where we are to look for it," said Tom King.

"Do you know of any inn?"

"Yes, several; but our experiences lately with regard to roadside inns have been so very disagreeable that I feel reluctant to take up my quarters at one again."

"But where else can we look for shelter," asked Dick, "if not there?"

"I don't know. It's very hard to think the landlords will show us such little favour."

"I am impatient to hear your adventures, Tom; I know they have been singular."

"You're right! But come, let us go at a swifter rate, we must trust to chance for a place of refuge. As we ride on it is quite possible we shall see something that will answer our purpose."

"I hope so," said Dick Turpin, "for Black Bess has been sorely tried to-night."

"Our cattle all want rest."

"No doubt; but Black Bess expressly stands in need of it. She has galloped more miles since I set out upon this expedition than I should like to count; and what's more—she has done it without having either proper rest or proper food."

"That's just where the difficulty is," said Sixteen-String Jack—"it's the food that does it. If it wasn't for that we could find a score of places where we could shelter ourselves; but, then, we have to look out for proper food for our horses."

"Of course we have," said Dick; "and I fancy as this is the only place where we can hope to find it."

"That's my opinion," returned Jack. "Here, Claude—perhaps you wouldn't mind lightening me of my load a little?"

CHAPTER DXCIV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN BELIEVE THAT THEY HAVE GOT INTO GOOD QUARTERS AT THE HEDGEHOG INN

CLAUDE DUVAL looked rather surprised when Sixteen-String Jack spoke these words, for he did not know to what he alluded.

The next moment, however, he perceived that his comrade carried before him on the saddle some very bulky-looking object.

What this was he could not conceive, for during the attack upon the mail-coach he had been too much occupied in attending to his own affairs to give much attention to the proceedings of his companions.

"What is it?" he asked.

"Well," returned Jack, "I rather think they are the mail bags."

"The mail bags?"

"Yes—the letters you know."

"How did you get them?"

"They were under the coachman's seat, and so I took charge of them. From their weight I fancy we shall find something else in them besides paper."

Hearing these words, Dick Turpin turned round, for he, too, was unaware of what Sixteen-String Jack had done."

"Do you mean to say," he exclaimed, "that you have really taken possession of the letter bags?"

"Yes—here they are, and they contain money as well—I am convinced of that."

"But I don't know what we are to do with them; anyone who sees them will know what they are at a glance, and suspicions will be instantly excited."

"And it may happen," added Tom King, "that they contain nothing of particular value."

"I propose we set that matter at rest," said Sixteen-String Jack, "by riding over to those trees yonder. We can sit down there, open the bags, and take out the money."

This was consented to, and the four highwaymen made their way to the place that had been mentioned.

The countenances both of Dick Turpin and Tom King were clouded by vexation.

Still, they said nothing with regard to their feelings.

Upon reaching the trees, which grew so thickly together as to form an effectual screen, all four dismounted, and the bags were opened.

Their contents were shot out upon the ground, and when he saw the pile of letters, Dick Turpin could not refrain from saying:

"I wish you had left them alone, Jack."

"Why, captain?"

"I have always made it a rule never to interfere with the mails."

"I don't care about it myself," said Sixteen-String Jack, "but I was tempted to carry off the bags on this occasion, because I felt certain that they contained gold; and look—here is a proof that I am right! Now, tell me whether I did wrong to carry them away?"

As he spoke, Sixteen-String Jack picked up from the ground, from among the heap of letters, a small leathern bag, which, from its size, appearance and weight, evidently contained coin.

"This is gold," he cried, "I'll warrant! and there's a good sum of it too! It would have been foolish to have let this booty pass—it will go far towards recompensing us for our previous losses."

"He cut the bag open with his sword as he spoke, and showed that it really and truly was crammed full of gold pieces.

Seeing this, Dick Turpin said no more, and Sixteen-String Jack rapidly transfered the gold into his pockets.

But there was more than he could carry, and he handed the remainder to Claude Duval.

"But what's to be done with these letters, now?" said Tom King.

"Leave them where they are—they will be found by some one."

"I am quite agreeable," said Sixteen-String Jack, "as soon as I have satisfied myself that there is not another bag of gold among them."

In order to ascertain whether there was or not, he rapidly turned all the correspondence over.

"No," he cried, "there's no more—only the letters!"

"I think we had better be off; it's a long time since we have met with such good luck."

"If we are not quick we shall have the daylight upon us."

"Forward, then!" said Tom King. "I will lead the way! I suppose there is no other resource but to stay for a few hours at an inn?"

"Our horses require rest," said Dick Turpin, "and it is upon their fleetness and powers of endurance that our lives depend; therefore, that ought to reconcile us to running a great deal of risk."

"I know one inn," said Tom King, "about seven miles from this spot; it is in a lonely, retired situation. I have no doubt the landlord will treat us well."

"Let us try, at any rate. We shall have to perform the distance at a gallop, or else we shall scarcely be there before it is daylight."

"It is daybreak now," said Claude—"look in the east."

In this quarter of the heavens the clouds looked somewhat lighter than they did elsewhere, but the difference was very slight, and this indication of the approach of morning would have escaped any but a well-practiced eye.

Tom King gave one glance, and then, touching his horse with the spur, set off at a hard gallop.

He knew in what a little time the whole landscape would be illuminated.

In something less than three-quarters of an hour he reached the vicinity of the inn of which he had spoken.

The trees and fields, and indeed all objects not very remote, could be seen with perfect distinctness, though the sun had not yet risen.

Suddenly turning round the corner, they came in sight of a picturesque old building.

The three highwaymen who had never seen it before were quite taken by surprise, for the inn was so surrounded by trees as to be invisible until they were within a few yards of the front door.

The inhabitants of this rustic dwelling had not yet risen, for on the upper floor the blinds were all drawn closely down, and below the shutters were all up.

"We are a little bit too early, it seems," said Tom King; "but never mind, I know these people are early risers, and it won't be long before the inn is opened."

"There's not much fear of our being seen while we wait, I think," said Dick Turpin, glancing around him.

"Very little. But if you like to follow me, I can almost put our discovery out of the question."

"How so?"

"Follow me, and you shall see."

There was a gateway at the side of the inn, and underneath this Tom King passed with his comrade close behind him.

The gateway communicated with the stables, which were built in the rear of the public-house.

"Now," said Tom, as they drew rein in the inn yard, "don't you think we are pretty secure here?"

"There is not much danger of our being seen, at any rate. Hush!—who's that?"

As the inn yard was paved with stones the horses' feet made a loud, clattering sound, sufficient to awake a sound sleeper.

Directly they had halted a voice cried:

"Good morning, gentlemen! This is an early visit! Never mind, I'll be down directly."

All four looked in the direction from which this voice proceeded, and saw a man's head projected from a small window of a room that was built over one of the stables.

"That's the ostler," said Tom; "he will be down directly."

These words were verified; for, in less time than one could have believed possible, the man who had spoken made his appearance in the yard.

"You are here uncommon early, gentlemen," he said, touching his forehead repeatedly. "You've come a good way, I should think. Your horses look very tired."

"They are," replied Tom; "and it's chiefly on their account that we want to stop here."

"You couldn't have come to a better place, though I say it."

"If you treat the horses well, it will be nothing out of your pocket, I can tell you that!"

"Well, sir, I have been stable boy for a matter of five-and-twenty years or more, and I've seen a good many things in my time. For instance, I'm able to tell by sight whether gentlemen is gentlemen or not."

"Very likely," said Tom, as he slipped half a crown into his hand. "There's something to drink our healths."

The ostler was profuse in his acknowledgments.

The highwaymen all dismounted rapidly, and the ostler led the horses towards the stables.

"I'm main sorry the master isn't up. This is his usual time, though, and we shall see him directly, I'll be bound."

"Oh, it doesn't matter" said Tom; "we are in no hurry."

The highwaymen were rather pleased than otherwise, in thus having an opportunity of seeing that their horses were attended to.

Dick Turpin in particular was most solicitous about Black Bess, who had exerted herself in a wonderful manner during the whole of the past night.

While the ostler was engaged with the other steeds, he rubbed her down with his own hands in a manner that elicited the ostler's admiration.

By the time Dick had finished this task, the inn was opened.

Nevertheless, the highwaymen refused to quit the stable until they had seen all the horses amply supplied with provender.

The ostler went on in advance to the inn, and, finding the landlord in the passage, he said to him, in a hurried whisper:

"Run out, master! There's four gentlemen come to stop, and jolly good customers they'll be!"

"How do you know it?"

"Oh, they're real, right-down gentlemen, and no gammon! One gave me half a crown to drink his health the very first thing after they came in."

Good customers at this little, out-of-the-way inn were quite looked upon as "black swans," and the landlord manifested accordingly an intense desire to pay them every respect.

By the time these few words had been communicated to him, our three friends arrived.

The landlord bowed to the very ground, and, in a most humble voice, desired to be made acquainted with their pleasure.

"We have travelled far," said Tom King, "and our horses are very tired, and so we have brought them here for food and rest."

"Very good, gentlemen! I will see that they meet with every attention."

"Thank you! We will stay here in the meanwhile."

"Yes, gentlemen. Would you like a private room? I have one that I shall be very happy to place at you disposal."

The landlord could easily say this; for the matter of trade that was done, they might all have been considered private rooms.

The four highwaymen followed him along the passage, and he ushered them into a room that was really comfortable, simply because it was clean.

The articles of furniture in it were of the rudest and commonest description, but they were substantial, and well scoured and polished.

"We want some breakfast," said Tom King. "What can you bring us nice and tempting?"

"Well, gentlemen, the fact is you've ratner taken me nonplush. I don't happen to have anything ready at the present moment, but I have some fine fowl, which can be cooked for you in a very little while."

"That will do, then. I think we might manage for once in a way to make a breakfast off roast fowl. In the meanwhile, let us have a bottle of the best wine you've got in your cellar."

The landlord of this inn was so exceedingly delighted at having such good customers, that he could scarcely contain himself within reasonable bounds.

It was many a day since the old Hedgehog Inn had had four such customers beneath its roof at the same time.

Tom King closed the door, and then the four friends seated themselves as close as they could to the window, and conversed with each other in a rapid and low tone of voice.

"Now, Turpin," Tom said, "let us know without any more delay all that's happened to you since we parted last—I am burning with curiosity to know it. Afterwards, I will satisfy whatever curiosity you may feel, by narrating all that has befallen us."

"It will take some time," said Dick Turpin, "to acquaint you with every particular; but perhaps it will be the best and shortest way, and so I'll begin at the beginning."

Dick Turpin then proceeded to relate all those events so well known to the reader.

He began from the time when he had been left in the deserted mansion by his three comrades, when they set out on their expedition to the New Forest, and concluded by describing the means by which he had at length got rid of the troop of dragoons, that had kept with so much pertinacity upon his track.

Long before this narrative was at an end, however, breakfast was laid upon the table.

The four highwaymen did ample justice to the good cheer laid before them, and those apprehensions which they at first felt at entering a public-house again disappeared.

They believed that this, at least, would prove an exception to the rest.

Afterwards Tom King in his turn related the exploits of himself and comrades.

Claude and Jack took advantage of this interval to lie down on a large sofa that was in the room, and have a couple of hours' slumber.

At the end of that time they were awoke, and Dick Turpin and Tom King took their places.

While they slept, Claude bade Jack keep guard.

There seemed to be but little need for such a precaution as this.

Still, it was as well to be careful, for their enemies on so many occasions had made their appearance when least of all expected, that the highwaymen fully understood the necessity of being constantly on the alert.

When Tom King and Dick awoke, the short winter's day had almost gone.

The atmosphere looked thick and heavy, and there seemed every prospect of the night being dark and obscure.

It was indeed such a night as would be favourable to Knights of the Road when carrying on their exploits.

Another meal had been prepared for them by the landlord, to which they did even better justice than to the preceding one, and after the table had been cleared Dick Turpin said:

"Now that we are all aware of what has taken place, the next thing to be done is to consider over our future proceedings."

CHAPTER DXCV.

NOTWITHSTANDING SIXTEEN-STRING JACK'S PRECAUTION, THE DRAGOONS ARRIVE VERY SUDDENLY AT THE HEDGEHOG INN.

"Before we begin to interchange any confidence," remarked Claude Duval, "I think we had better seat ourselves as far away from the door as we possibly can; the landlord is amazingly civil, and consequently he may feel curious to find out all he can concerning us. I don't say he would stand at the door listening to us, but such a thing might be."

"Your caution is a good one," said Dick Turpin, "and in speaking to each other we will raise our voices no higher than we are positively compelled."

"So long as we can just catch the sense of what is uttered, that is all that is necessary."

"Of course it is!"

It happened that the window of the room was farthest from the door, and here the highwaymen seated themselves.

The position had advantages in other respects, inasmuch as they were enabled to command a view of the front of the inn.

Sixteen-String Jack looked out of the window, but owing to the immense quantity of trees that grew all around, he was only able to see for a distance of a few yards.

"Before we begin to discuss our plans," he exclaimed, "I should like to consider our position a little. Doesn't it strike you that we should be in rather an awkward predicament if the dragoons were to ride up to the door?"

"We should; but I am in hopes they will not discover our retreat," replied Tom King.

"I know you are, but they might do so for all that!"

"I know the commanding officer is a resolute, determined man," said Dick Turpin, "and we ought not to omit any safeguard!"

"That was what I thought," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and the reason why I spoke. Now, if we sit here at this window, we can see out in the front of the inn, to be sure, but then I don't see what advantage that is; it would be a different thing if we could place ourselves at a window which commanded a view of the country."

"So it would," said Tom King, "but there's no window in this house from which a view can be obtained—it is so completely surrounded by high trees."

"Night is approaching," said Claude Duval, "and I must confess I don't like the idea of sitting here and not being able to discover the approach of our enemies until they are absolutely upon us."

"It would not be safe to leave," said Tom King. "It is too light."

"I think I can get you out of the difficulty," said Sixteen-String Jack, "if you will only be content to leave it to me."

"We will do so with every confidence," said Turpin.

"Well, then, I will go and make a little arrangement with the ostler that I feel sure will produce the most satisfactory result."

"Be careful!"

"Oh, never fear; I have had some experience with these gentlemen, and know just how to deal with them."

"You have managed very cleverly up to the present," said Dick, with a smile, "and I don't see why you should fail now!"

"I am not at all afraid of doing so," replied Jack. "for I have got a good scheme in my head."

"What is it?"

"Wait till I come back, and then I will tell you, for the sooner I put it into execution the better."

"Be off, then!"

Sixteen-String Jack left the room and immediately made his way to the stables.

First of all he took a good look at all the horses, and certainly what he saw was satisfactory in the highest degree.

All were well supplied with food, and looked already very much better for their brief rest.

Sixteen-String Jack expressed his approval in very warm terms, and then he added:

"I suppose you wouldn't mind performing a little extra service for me, if I paid you well for it?"

"Certainly not, sir!" replied the ostler, with a grin. "I shall be delighted to serve you in any way that lies in my power."

"I thought as much," said Jack. "I formed a favourable opinion of you as soon as I saw you this morning."

"Thank you, sir! What is it you might want me to do?"

"Something very important, and therefore I trust you will pay particular attention to my instructions."

"I will, sir; and though I don't like to boast of myself, yet I could promise you that your orders will be carried out entirely to your satisfaction."

"I have just the same opinion of you myself," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Now listen."

"I will."

"I suppose, then, that you have heard talk of Dick Turpin, and all his gang—have you?"

"Oh, yes; I rather believe you, I have! Stop a minute—I've got a paper up in the loft all about them!"

"Well, never mind—don't trouble yourself to fetch it!" said Jack, hastily, as the ostler was about to run off.

"Very well, sir!"

"I know all about that paper. You must know that not very long ago, I happened to be robbed by this Dick Turpin and his gang."

"Did you, sir, really?"

"Yes, I was all alone, and there were so many that I didn't dare make any resistance, so I gave up my money and thought myself lucky in getting off without injury."

The ostler nodded, and was deeply interested.

"However, I vowed to have revenge upon the rascal, and to try my utmost to capture him."

"Now did you though?"

"I did, and I spoke about it to three gentlemen friends of mine."

"Those that I saw arrive with you this morning?"

"The same. Out of their friendship for me they resolved not to spare their trouble, but to try their best to help me to capture the rascal."

"But what is it you want me to do, sir?"

"That's just what I'm coming to. You must understand that I have made some arrangements with a troop of dragoons and a troop of police officers."

"To help you in capturing them, I suppose?"

"Exactly. You have hit the right nail on the head, and you must know further that we had arranged to meet these police and dragoons at a place some distance from here; but during last night, happening to catch sight of the villains, we had a long chase after them, which knocked our horses up, and reduced them to the condition they were in this morning. We are so comfortable indoors, my friends and myself, that we should very much like to stop to the last moment, but we can't see far out of the window."

The ostler was at a loss to comprehend what obstacle their not being able to see out of the window should be to their stopping at the inn, so he stared at Jack with a puzzled, inquiring air.

"I would not miss this appointment for the world!" said Jack. "I don't know which will arrive first, the officers or the dragoons, and what I want you to do is simply this—to take up your position at some place where you are able to command a good view of the high-road."

"Yes, sir."

"I want you to stop and keep a capital look-out. The moment you see any police officers or any mounted soldiers approaching, lose not a moment in coming back to the inn and tell us of it, in order that we can mount our horses and meet them, so as to keep our appointment."

"I'll do it, sir—I'll do it with all the pleasure in life!"

"Perform your duty faithfully, and you shall be well rewarded, never fear!"

"Many thanks to you, sir, for you're a real gentleman and no mistake! I'll go up on to the top of the hill yonder, and as soon as I see any officers or soldiers coming, I will let you know, or I'll run and tell them you're here, if you like!"

"No, no!" said Sixteen-String Jack—"I don't want you to do that! We will ride to the appointed spot and meet them there."

"Very well, sir! You can depend upon me."

The ostler at once took his departure, and Sixteen-String Jack, believing he had arranged matters in a very satisfactory way, returned to the inn.

He was eagerly questioned by his comrades, who could not help laughing at the audacity of his scheme.

"Do you think you have thoroughly deceived him?" asked Dick. "If he happens to grow suspicious we shall be in an awkward fix."

"Not very, I think. But if you will take my advice, we will make all our arrangements as regards our future conduct between now and nightfall, and as soon as ever it is dark enough we will be off."

"That's precisely what I was going to propose," said Dick Turpin.

"And now, Dick," said Tom, "what is it you wish to do?"

Turpin was silent for a moment, and then he said:

"I have told you that Maud is confined in Newgate. While she is in one of those dismal cells I can know no rest. She must be set at liberty!"

"Well, Dick, let the risk be what it may, we will aid you in any scheme you like to propose. We are all ready and willing to lay down our lives, if that will save you."

"Many thanks, my friend! I don't wish to exact any such sacrifice from you; but at the same time I do desire that Maud should be set at liberty."

"And she shall be," said Claude Duval, "if we pull Newgate down stone by stone!"

"Dick Turpin was well pleased to hear his companions talk thus, but the thought that at that very moment Maud was in a dungeon was perfect torture to him.

"But," said Tom King, "I don't think old Matthew's suggestions and advice should be altogether lost sight of."

"Nor I," said Dick, quickly.

"When did he tell you the sessions would begin?"

"On Wednesday."

"And to-day is Monday, so you see we have but little time before us. It will be Tuesday morning before we can reach London, and it will be Wednesday morning, at the very least, before the escape can be accomplished."

"If not achieved by that time," said Dick, "she will be placed at the bar at the Old Bailey to take her trial."

"And the probability is," said Claude Duval, emphatically, "that she will be acquitted."

The reader must understand that Dick Turpin had made his three companions fully acquainted with all that old Matthew had said to him.

They one and all grasped at the idea that the plan had been concocted and carried into effect by Mr. Wriggles, in the hope of being enabled to capture them easily by drawing them into a trap.

"Dick," said Tom, at length, "if you say the word, I am ready to set out this minute, and gallop straight to Newgate and try my best to get Maud out by main force; at the same time I must ask you to consider what I have to say."

"I will do so willingly."

"Then I, like old Matthew, think that it could make but little difference to Maud if she remains prisoner a day or two longer, and that it will be an immense advantage if she is acquitted of the crime imputed to her, because then she would be free from any further persecution."

"But," said Dick, "if she undergoes the ordeal of a public examination, do you think there is a probability of obtaining her discharge?"

"Certainly I do! What can be easier for us than to gallop to-night as far as Parson Martext's, and force him to write and sign a regular certificate of the marriage?"

"I am sure it could be done," said Claude and Jack

"I am inclined to think so too," responded Turpin.

"Then," added Tom King, "let that be our plan. If it fails no one will be the loser, because then we should stand just as good a chance of effecting a rescue as we do at the present time."

"Better!" observed Claude.

"And think," continued Tom King, "how bitter would be the disappointment of Mr. Wriggles should Maud happen to be acquitted, as I feel almost sure she will be! The scheme that he has elaborated with so much pains will be completely blown to the winds, and he will be filled with mortification and despair."

"I am content to act upon your advice," said Turpin, "and to do as you desire."

"Then," added Tom, "as it is a long way to Parson Martext's, and as it is already quite dark, I propose that we set out at once."

"Unfortunately we cannot just at present," said Sixteen-String Jack, "for the ostler is away."

"Oh, we can get over that difficulty. Let us call the landlord, pay our reckoning, and depart."

Just as these words were spoken, they heard footsteps outside.

It was already quite dark; still, by looking through the window, they managed to perceive the outline of a human form, which, in a moment afterwards, they recognised as being that of the ostler.

Jack jumped up and tapped at the window.

The ostler heard the sound and came towards it.

Turning the little button, Jack opened the casement, and before he could address a single question to the new comer, the ostler said:

"I have just seen 'em, although it is dark, and they are very close too!"

"Seen whom?" asked Sixteen-String Jack.

"Oh, a troop of—of—mounted sogers! They do look fine! I was obliged to stop watching 'em for a little time, they did look so unkimmon well!"

"They were riding along the road, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir; and it seemed to me they were coming here—leastways, we shall know for certain whether they are not in a couple of minutes—for, as I said before they very close at hand."

"Make haste!" said Jack. "Saddle our horses with all speed! I don't want them to find us here! I would not miss the appointment at the proper place for the world! Run—and if you saddle the horses quickly you shall have a good reward!"

"I am off, gentlemen—I am off!" cried the ostler, and as he spoke the words he darted round to the back of the inn.

Considering it was high time to be gone, the highwaymen left the room in which they had been sitting, and slid out into the passage.

At the bar counter the landlord was standing, and here they stopped.

"We are obliged to leave rather abruptly," said Tom King, "and I am sorry to do it, for we have been made so very comfortable. However, if you will name your reckoning, we will pay you."

"Shall I order your horses to be got ready?"

"No, thank you—they are already saddled."

"You've seen the ostler, then?"

"Yes. Make haste—what's the amount of the bill?"

"Never mind the amount!" said Sixteen-String Jack, putting his hand in his pocket and taking out three guineas. "Here—this will cover the damage, I know!"

Just as he placed the coins on the bar counter, the dragoons drew up with a prodigious clatter at the front door of the inn.

CHAPTER DXOVI.

OLD MATTHEW RESOLVES TO COMMUNICATE TO MAUD THE RESULT OF HIS CONFERENCE WITH DICK TURPIN.

THE night was well-nigh spent by the time old Matthew reached his house in Drury Lane.

We have stated that he sat for some time in his little back parlour, chuckling to himself over the trick he had played the officers, and the state of exasperation he had got them into.

By degrees he calmed himself down, and as he was very tired, retired to rest, although some tinge of daylight could be seen over the contiguous house-tops.

In the morning he enjoyed another good laugh at the officers' expense, and thought what a delight he should feel if he could only communicate to somebody the particulars of all that had taken place.

Presently, however, his thoughts reverted to his old friend Dick Turpin, and then to Maud in Newgate.

"Poor thing!" he said. "I am very sorry for her, and yet she ought not to grumble, for as she made her own bed, so she must lie in it. I never could make out what Dick wanted to die himself to a woman for. He might have been sure some trouble would have come of it."

The entrance of an early customer at this juncture put an end to Matthew's further reflections.

"How dreadfully lonely and sad she must be, poor thing; I feel really sorry for her, and if I could do anything for her, I'm sure I would! Of course, she's not heard a word from a soul since she has been confined in prison, and she will begin to think she is deserted. What a consolation it would be, now, if I could manage to let her know the result of my conversation with her husband! It would lighten her heart of a heavy load, I feel quite sure of that; but the worst of it is, I can't see how it is to be managed—they won't allow me to pay her a visit, that's certain!"

Old Matthew rubbed his head—a common habit with him whenever he was perplexed about anything.

But it is hoped that by this time the reader is too well acquainted with the landlord's character to imagine that he would be baffled by such a circumstance as the present.

"I know very well," he resumed, "if she was only aware of what I could tell her she would put up with her fate, hard as it is, without a sigh; but if not a word is said to her, and if she finds she is allowed to be brought up for trial, I wonder what she will think of Dick and his comrades? No, no—it must not be; she must be communicated with somehow or other, that's quite clear!"

But if this was clear, the means by which she could be communicated with was not.

"It's a confounded nuisance to think that I should be so closely watched as I am—it's a thousand pities the officers have not something else to do! I know that so sure as I attempt to go out there will be a whole host of the rascals sneaking after my heels; but as it is quite certain that they would not admit me into Newgate, I must try to think of some one else that they would!"

Many individuals suggested themselves to old Matthew, but a the name of each he shook his head, as though to say, "He won't do."

Suddenly, a bright thought entered his mind, and quite a change took place in his whole deportment.

"Of course," he cried, "that's the very ticket! I wonder, now, how I could have forgotten it; I might just as well have forgotten the nose on my face! Ah, well, it don't matter; I think I can see my way straightforward at last."

Old Matthew was but a indifferent writer; nevertheless, after speaking these words he went into his private room, and on a sheet of paper scrawled the following words:—

"My dear Nell,
"Come here at once—I want to see you.
"From MATTHEW."

This laconic epistle Matthew folded up, and superscribed it—

"Mr. Charles Clark,
"No. 4, Cain's Place,
"Camden Town.
"For Nell."

Of course this letter was intended for no other than the poor apprentice girl, Ellen, who had been so kindly taken under the protection of Tom Davis and his wife in the time of their prosperity, and who had since so well requited them for their kindness.

In order to avoid discovery, and in order to conceal his identity, Tom Davis had adopted the name of Charles Clark when he took up his residence at the address above given.

And now, had old Matthew lived in the present day, the difficulties attending upon the delivery of the letter would have vanished in a moment.

He would only have had to walk out and drop the missive in the first pillar letter-box he came to.

But in those days the delivery of letters was expensive and uncertain, even when the distance they had to go was short.

Besides, the people at the post-office might be communicated with by the police officers, or the secret discovered in some way; but most of all, old Matthew desired that not a moment should be lost in the delivery of the letter.

Therefore he was forced to cast about him for some means by which he could achieve this object.

There was a young woman who lived in the house, and who, in the landlord's absence, took charge of the bar, but she was as well known to the police officers as Matthew himself, and therefore it would be useless to have despatched her upon the errand.

Yet if he left his own house suspicion would be aroused,—he had latterly had convincing proof of it; and so, quite bewildered, he resolved to call this barmaid, on whom he knew he could rely, and ask her advice about the matter.

"Come here, Lizzie," he said, "and shut the door."

He was obeyed.

"I want this letter taken immediately to Camden Town. You must not go, but do you know anyone who could?"

"There's my sister, sir, that works for a spangle-maker in Bow Street,—she might be able, perhaps."

"Of course—commend me to a woman for finding a way out of a difficulty. You often go to see your sister, do you not?"

"When I can."

"Take this letter, then, but be sure when you give it her that no one observes you, and ask her to deliver it at once. In the meanwhile, you will come back. Here's a crown piece, which you can give to your sister for her trouble."

Lizzie departed, and returned in something less than a quarter of an hour.

Old Matthew could tell by the look of her face that she had succeeded in her attempt.

"Will she go?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Did you see anyone following you after you got out into the street?"

"Yes—one of the police officers."

"I expected as much. Did you see him when you came out of your sister's?"

"Yes; and he followed me back here again."

"All right! That will do. I won't forget you for this, Lizzie!"

Having succeeded to this extent, old Matthew waited with very great impatience for the arrival of Ellen.

Considering all circumstances, it was perhaps quite as well that darkness had set in before the young girl made her appearance.

She was so much altered that there was little fear the police officers would recognise her.

Old Matthew called her on one side, and explained what it was he wished her to do.

When Ellen learned that she would have an opportunity of rendering Turpin a service, she was anxious in the extreme to set about doing it at once.

Matthew took care to inform her of all the circumstances so far as he was acquainted with them, in order that when she gained access to Maud she might be able to answer any questions that might be put to her.

"In the first place," he said, "it will be necessary for you to obtain an order to visit the prisoner."

"How shall I obtain one?"

"I don't think you will have any trouble if you wait upon one of the magistrates and state that you are sister, or cousin, or something of that sort, to the prisoner."

"And when shall I get the order?"

"It will be useless for you to try until to-morrow morning, so what you must do now is to go straight back to Camden Town, and in the morning set out in good time, but, above all things, don't call here; and as soon as you have got the order, go straight on to Newgate."

"You may depend I will do everything you desire," said Ellen, gently. "When I show the order at the door of the prison, I suppose they will admit me?"

"They dare not refuse; and when you succeed in gaining admission to the prisoner, I shall leave it to your tact to manage the rest."

This understanding having been come to, Ellen withdrew, and old Matthew was obliged to wait with what patience he could to learn the success of his scheme.

In the meanwnile Ellen reached her residence without accident, and in the morning set out upon her highly-important errand.

She had more trouble in getting an order for admission to see Maud than old Matthew had led her to anticipate; but at length, chiefly owing to the sweetness and gentleness of her manner, she received the paper she desired.

Armed with this, she made all speed to Newgate.

The sight of the gloomy, dismal-looking prison sent a thrill of horror through her blood.

She knocked in a resolute manner, and when, in response, the turnkey removed the shutter that covered the iron grating in the centre of the door, she immediately displayed her order for admission.

The fastenings were then removed, and the ponderous door swung open.

"I must send this paper to the Governor," said the turnkey, gruffly, "and while that is being done, you can step into that chamber, where you will be searched by the prison matron."

Ellen knew that she had this ordeal to go through, but cared nothing at all about it, for it was no part of her purpose to convey any forbidden article to the prisoner.

Mr. Cawthorn looked at the order with a suspicious eye.

It must be borne in mind that he knew perfectly well who Maud was, and, more than that, Mr. Wriggles had taken him entirely into his confidence.

He was told that the order had been brought by a female, and, remembering how on a former occasion he had detected Tom King in his disguise, the Governor with great importance, made his way to the vestibule.

One glance, however, at the feminine form and features of Ellen was enough to convince anyone of her true sex, so that whatever hopes the Governor might have had in this quarter were disappointed.

"Want to see the prisoner, do you?" he said, clasping his hands behind his back, and swaying backwards and forwards upon his toes and heels, as was his wont. "Pray, what's your business with her?"

[DICK TURPIN PERSUADING PARSON MARTEXT TO SIGN THE CERTIFICATE.]

"I do want to see the prisoner," said Ellen in reply, taking no notice of the last part of the Governor's speech. "When the magistrate gave me the order, he said that I might do so."

"Oh! very well—very well! Of course I know all about that. Mrs. Snoffle!"

"Yes, sir."

Mrs. Snoffle was the matron who attended to the female prisoners.

"Have you searched this young woman?" asked Mr. Cawthorn

"Humbly, yes, sir, I has."

"Anything suspicious?"

"No, nothink at all."

"Ahem! Mrs. Snoffle!"

"Sir?"

"You're sure it's a female?"

"Oh, sir!"

"I mean, Mrs. Snoffle, you're sure it isn't a man i disguise?"

"Oh, sir, how could you suppose such a thing, and I'v been shut up in the searching-room with her? Oh n Mr. Cawthorn—I am sure she's a female!"

Mrs. Snoffle simpered and giggled, and tried to mak herself as amiable as she could, for be it known that th lady in question entertained matrimonial designs again the Governor.

Mr. Cawthorn knew he could rely upon the truth what the matron said, and finding he was altogether upo a wrong scent on this occasion, he did not attempt raise any more obstacles to the visit.

"Winch," he exclaimed, "get the key of No. 15, an follow me!"

Winch obeyed, and under the escort of the turnkey an the Governor, Ellen was led through the gloomy corrido and down the steep stone staircases to Maud's cell.

The door was at length thrown open, and the Governor, stepping down into the cell, held out his hand to assist Ellen to follow him.

But disdaining to make use of it, she sprang down lightly and easily.

Coming out of the light into the darkness of the cell, she was at first unable to see around her with proper distinctness, for, in order to be revenged upon Dick, Mr. Cawthorn had chosen one of the darkest and most dismal dungeons in the whole prison for the reception of his wife.

Oh, if Turpin had only known the nature of the place in which Maud was confined, no entreaties—no considerations of safety would have induced him to lose a moment in making a frantic effort to set her at liberty!

For his own safety, for the safety of his three comrades, and for the welfare of Maud herself, it was a fortunate thing that he did not possess this knowledge.

A faint ejaculation that came from Maud's lips struck upon Ellen's ears as soon as she entered.

Hastening forward, she, in another moment and not without a strange sensation in her breast, found herself face to face with Dick Turpin's wife.

Mr. Cawthorn stood close by, with the intention of being an attentive auditor of all that was said by the visitor to the prisoner.

CHAPTER DXCVII.

MR. CAWTHORN FINDS ELLEN QUITE A MATCH FOR HIM.

Maud had suffered much during her sojourn in the prison of Newgate, and traces of all that she had gone through were legibly impressed upon her countenance.

She was borne down by an accumulation of distressful thoughts and feelings.

First, there was Dick himself, about whose safety she felt the greatest alarm.

Then there was her own unpleasant and degrading position, for such a one as Maud could not help feeling her humiliation keenly.

Deprived of light—of wholesome food and drink, and distracted by terrible reflections, she was worn almost to a shadow.

Sleep, too, was almost a stranger to her eyelids, for in that noisome place slumber seemed impossible.

Then, at intervals she was subjected to the jeers of the Governor and the turnkeys, the former of whom flattered himself that by treating Maud in this manner he was having some kind of a revenge upon his old foe, Dick Turpin.

His conduct was just what might have been expected from anyone having so mean and base a spirit as he possessed.

The time passed most wearily to her, and yet her sense of listening was ever on the stretch, for she dreaded continually to hear that Turpin had been made prisoner.

That he would endeavour to rescue her she felt assured, and trembled with horror at the bare thought, for she believed that any such attempt would only result in his own destruction.

When she heard the fastenings of her door removed, in order to admit Ellen, her heart beat so painfully that she could scarcely draw her breath.

She knew that it was an unusual hour for a visit to be paid to her by the officials of the prison, and therefore something of an extraordinary character had occured.

Her worst forebodings she imagined were about to be realised.

What was her surprise and satisfaction, then, to find, instead, that it was some one whose face beamed with kindliness and sympathy towards her who had entered.

She did not recognise her face; indeed, Maud had only heard of Ellen, not seen her.

But she was a friend—she was quite sure of that, and so miserable in her solitude as she had been, she felt that she could have clasped this stranger to her breast.

Ellen was scarcely less affected at the meeting, though from different reasons.

The gratitude which such a nature as hers was sure to feel for the benefit Turpin had rendered her had by degrees warmed into a deeper feeling, and it was not until she had learned the bold highwayman was married that she realised she loved him.

It was, therefore, only natural that she should be overpowered with emotion at the meeting.

Mr. Cawthorn stood unpleasantly close, screwing up one eye and looking inquisitively and mockingly into their faces, while he swayed himself slowly backwards and forwards.

Ellen did not know how to commence the conversation.

Had they been alone, she would have experienced some difficulty; but the unexpected presence of the Governor seemed to seal her lips.

Maud was burning with anxiety to ask after her husband's welfare, yet she feared to utter his name.

She only gazed speechlessly and inquiringly into Ellen's eyes.

"Half an hour is the time allowed for a visit," said Mr. Cawthorn, "so I advise you to make the most of the minutes that remain. What odd women you are! Why don't you talk to one another?"

"I did not know," said Ellen, "that anyone would be present during our interview."

"Oh, didn't you indeed, my chuck? Well, perhaps you might have been left alone, only I didn't consider it advisable, and in this place I rather reign supreme, you know, and do what I like."

"Would you not grant me the favour," asked Ellen, with beseeching earnestness, "to leave the cell while we interchange a few remarks?"

"It breaks my heart to refuse you—it does indeed!"

The Governor uttered the words in a laughing, bantering tone.

"You will have to say everything before me!" he at length exclaimed, getting irritated at their continued silence; "so I should advise you to begin at once. There's a quarter of an hour gone already."

"It's something for her ear alone that I have to say," replied Ellen.

"I quite expected so," rejoined the Governor, with a complacent smile at his own cleverness. "You might just as well speak as keep silent—I know very well what the subject of your speech will be."

Ellen looked at him half terrified.

"You want to concert some nice little plan of escape with the prisoner—to tell her what to do at a certain time, and such like; but you won't manage it while I am Governor of Newgate. I have had one daring escape, but I mean to guard against another."

From the manner in which the Governor spoke, it was quite clear that he fully meant every word he said.

Ellen's embarrassment increased.

"At all risks," exclaimed Maud, unable to bear the suspense any longer—"at all risks, although he may overhear your communication, tell me what you have come here to say!"

Ellen looked much distressed, and hesitated to reply as she had been bidden.

Maud repeated her entreaty with more vehemence than before, so that Ellen was constrained to say:

"The chief thing I have to tell you is that all you know and hold dear are quite well and in perfect safety at the present moment. You will be brought to trial on the charge that has been brought against you; but such evidence will be produced as will lead to your acquittal. You will then be set at liberty."

"Is that indeed the case?" asked Maud, clasping her hands together. "You are not deceiving me?—you are sure of what you say?"

"I am sure that I repeat that which has been told to me."

"Oh, it's quite correct, I should say," said Mr. Cawthorn, with a sneer; "I should think that's how it would end myself."

Of this speech neither took any notice.

"I am in a position," continued Ellen, "to answer almost any question that you like to ask me; but you must be on your guard, for you might let fall a word which would get your friends into serious trouble."

"Quite a young lawyer, I declare!" said the Governor, attempting to chuck Ellen under the chin.

This familiarity she had the spirit to resist by giving him such a slap on the cheek with her open hand, that it made it tingle again.

"You d—d little vixen!" he exclaimed, rubbing the part ruefully. "Do you know what you're about? I will have you locked up on the charge of being an accomplice!"

"You dare not!" said Ellen, resolutely, though while she spoke the words her heart quaked, for she had no means of knowing how far the Governor's power might extend.

Maud pondered over the last words spoken by her visitor, and finally asked:

"Are you sure that my husband is well and in safety?"

"Quite sure."

"Do you speak from your own knowledge? Have you seen him recently?"

"No, but the person who gave me the information is one upon whose word I am sure you would rely."

"And it was this person who sent the message?"

"Yes, and it is to the effect that you are to summon up all the fortitude and courage you possess, in order to undergo the ordeal of a public trial. The result is almost certain—you will be set at liberty."

"I shall, if my marriage can be proved," said Maud. "Will the proof be forthcoming?"

"That I have not been told," was the reply, "but I should not hesitate to say yes, because I was so expressly told that the trial would result in your discharge."

"Then I will forbear to ask any more questions, or inquire further into particulars," said Maud, stifling a sob.

It was hard indeed to think that a friend should stand before her who by her disclosures would probably be able to lift a great weight from her heart, or at any rate would be able to soothe the anguish which she suffered.

It was very hard that, in consequence of the presence of the Governor, she did not dare ask her to make a full disclosure of all the facts she knew.

"I have told you the main part of the message," continued Ellen, anxious to cheer the fair prisoner's drooping spirits. "I have only to add that you are earnestly desired to keep up your spirits as well as you are able, and then all will be well."

"And my trial?" asked Maud, "when will that take place?—will it be soon?"

"I think three days at the most."

"That intelligence is indeed welcome, for if I knew I had to stay much longer in this horrible place I should die?"

"No you wouldn't," said Mr. Cawthorn, once more joining in the conversation. "Prisoners don't die quite so easy. It would be a good job if they did, and then the country would be saved some expense."

Of this speech, like the last, no notice was taken by the persons to whom it was addressed.

This enraged the Governor more than words can describe.

"A thousand thanks," said Maud, once more taking Ellen's hands within her own—"a thousand thanks for your kindness in coming here, and for bringing me such joyful information. Before you go, tell me who you are?"

"I dare not do that at present," said Ellen. "I have been expressly cautioned against it—you must wait until after your liberation."

"I will—I will," said Maud, with the tears trickling down her cheeks. "Oh, how I wish that the day of my trial would arrive!"

"It will soon be here," said Ellen, and you must bear in mind that the time which has to elapse between now and then will be a busy one for your friends, who are obtaining the necessary evidence."

"I can already fancy myself at liberty," said Maud. "Now that I have only three more weary nights to pass, I feel content."

"Time's up now, you vicious jade!" interrupted the Governor once more. "Troop off, and think yourself lucky that you have not got into trouble! It's all owing to my kindness; if I liked, I could have locked you up!"

Maud was greatly alarmed at this threat, and was about to intercede, but Ellen prevented her.

"You have no power to touch me!" she said, boldly. "I came here under the protection of an order from a magistrate!"

"I know you did; and if you had not brought that piece of paper with you, the present interview would not have taken place. But, come, the half-hour has expired. Be off!—leave the cell! If you don't do so of your own accord, I shall use force!"

"I am going," cried Ellen. "Pray don't touch me!"

"Once more, a thousand thanks!" said Maud, still weeping. "I shall never forget you for this kindness. When you return, tell them that I am happy, and that I am waiting with resignation for my hour of trial to come!"

The two girls embraced each other, and then, rather than suffer the Governor to lay a finger upon her, Ellen darted quickly through the door of the cell, which had been opened by the turnkey.

The Governor noticed her aversion, and most fervently wished he was able to punish her in some way, but he was absolutely powerless.

The door of the cell was closed, and the fastenings put up, and then the little party returned to the vestibule.

The Governor resolved to make one more trial before Ellen left, and so, just as the man on the lock was about to open the door and allow her to go forth, Mr. Cawthorn made a sudden sign, and said:

"Wait a minute, my charmer—not so fast! You can't leave here until you tell me who you are! I insist upon it! Here is the book; you must write your name and address in it!"

Ellen trembled when she heard these words, for she knew not how to get out of the difficulty.

The Governor noticed her agitation, and rejoiced.

"Come along," he said, attempting to take hold of her arm. "No resistance—no foolery! Write your name down in plain black and white, and also where you live!"

"I shall do nothing of the sort!" Ellen managed to say at length.

"Oh, won't you! Then we will try if you can be made! You have your choice—you can either give me the information I want, or remain and be locked up a prisoner!"

"Then I will remain!" said Ellen.

This decision took Mr. Cawthorn by surprise.

He made sure that, in her terror, she would have disclosed who she was.

Resolved not to abandon the attempt until he had made one more effort, he said:

"Then, if you are so obstinate, you must consider yourself in custody. Winch, lock her up in one of the cells!"

Winch came towards Ellen at once with a large bunch of keys in his hand.

The poor girl trembled, and was so frightened that she was afraid she would fall into a swoon.

At last, by a powerful effort, she managed to ask:

"Upon what charge am I made prisoner? By what right do you lock me up?"

"It will be sufficient for me if I choose to do so," replied the Governor, "but, if it will be any satisfaction, I'll tell you."

"Why?"

"I have very good grounds for suspecting you to be an accomplice of Dick Turpin's, and, if such is my belief, I can keep you locked up."

"Then do so!" said Ellen, firmly. "I will rather die than give you the information you require!"

Mr. Cawthorn was surprised at the boldness of her behaviour, but thought that her courage in a short time would evaporate.

So he carried his threat into execution, and Ellen was locked up in a cell.

She suffered extreme terror during her incarceration, and, after the lapse of about a couple of hours—which seemed to her like a whole day—the fastenings of the cell door were removed.

The Governor appeared upon the threshold, and he said:

"I have come to ask you for the last time whether you will tell me who you are? If you refuse, I shall make the charge against you, and then you will be examined before the magistrate!"

"I will not tell you!" said Ellen. "You can do your worst!"

The Governor bit his lip.

It was more than he dared do to keep Ellen a prisoner, and he knew it, notwithstanding all he had said to the contrary.

"Well," he exclaimed, "you need not make such a fuss about it—it's only a matter of form; if you won't tell me you won't! You can depart."

Ellen had not expected to hear anything half so pleasant come from the Governor's lips, and at first she could scarcely believe that her ears had not deceived her.

"Come—be off," he said, "and don't stop here!"

Trembling all over like a leaf, the poor girl left the cell, and without further opposition offered to her she reached the street.

As soon as ever she was down the steps, Mr. Cawthorn beckoned a man to his side.

He was a shabby, repulsive-looking fellow, who performed various odd duties about the prison, such as assisting the turnkeys in the most disagreeable part of the work, and running out to fetch whatever they required.

"You saw that girl, Tates," cried the Governor, "that left me just this minute?"

"Yes, Mr. Cawthorn—I had a good long look at her."

"Then be off, follow closely in her footsteps, watch where she goes, and when you have housed her let me know; but, above all things, don't let her suspect that you are dogging her footsteps."

"All right, Mr. Cawthorn, sir! You leave it to me; I rather think I can manage a job of this sort as well as here and there one!"

CHAPTER DXCVIII.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS THREE COMPANIONS AT LENGTH ARRIVE AT PARSON MARTEXT'S.

THE landlord of the Hedgehog Inn was really and truly astonished to behold the suddenness with which the four highwaymen rushed down the passage and out of the back door into the yard after they had placed the money on the bar counter.

He was also surprised to hear the trampling of so many horses' feet outside.

Leaving him, however, to recover himself in the best way he could, we will follow the four highwaymen.

To close the back door of the inn after them, and to rush across the yard took them less that a moment.

Upon entering the stable, they saw that the ostler had made good use of his time, and that all four horses were almost ready for the road.

He was a little bewildered when they all rushed in pell-mell, and began fixing the trappings as if for their lives.

Almost before the girths were properly buckled and the bits fairly in the horses' mouths, they led them into the yard and mounted.

"Here, my fine fellow," said Sixteen-String Jack, "this will reward you for the trouble you have had! I suppose there's no way out of this yard except the gateway? Good-bye to you!"

While he spoke, Jack threw the ostler a guinea, fixed his feet in the stirrups, gathered the reins in his hand, and turned his horse's head towards the gateway.

"One quick rush through the gateway will do it!" said Dick Turpin. "They will be taken by surprise by the suddenness of our flight! Off, and away!"

The highwaymen urged their horses onwards by every means in their power.

As all four steeds had had plenty to eat and drink during the day, they rushed onwards with the utmost impetuosity.

They were through the gateway, and across the road, and over a meadow in the twinkling of an eye.

They met with not the slightest resistance, for the dragoons were all clustered round the front door of the inn.

The sudden rush caused them all to turn round, and when they caught a glimpse of the fugitives going at such a terrific speed, they burst out into frantic ejaculations of rage, and spurred their horses barbarously.

A hot pursuit was instantly instituted, and before they had gone half a mile, the highwaymen found that the dragoons were very close indeed upon their heels.

"It is fortunate our horses are so well rested," cried Dick Turpin. "On, my comrades—on! We must not be captured now!"

"Who talks of capture?" said Tom King. "All follow where I lead, and all will be well!"

The confident tone in which he pronounced these words was not without an effect upon his comrades.

When in a few minutes they turned their heads to look back, they found that they had gained materially upon the dragoons.

Tom King's knowledge of that part of the country was of immense benefit.

Although he took his course in an almost straight line across the face of the country, yet he managed to avoid any obstacles of a more formidable character than a hedge and a ditch.

"We have the necessity to take a long ride to-night," cried Dick Turpin, addressing his comrades, "and as the dragoons are inclined for a gallop, they may as well have it! Long before we reach our destination, I expect they will get tired, and give up the chase in despair."

Tom King did not reply, but reserved his breath.

In his own mind, he was wishing that they might be fortunate enough to avoid coming into collision with any other troop.

Should this unfortunately occur, their position would grow ticklish, as their horses would be tired, while those of their pursuers would be fresh.

He did not think it worth while to communicate these fears to his companions, but bending the whole of his attention instead to looking before him and choosing the road which he thought would take them clear of their enemies.

The speed which the horses maintained was terrific.

This was not so surprising, because they had every advantage.

The soft turf, over which, for the most part, they took their way, suited much better than the hard high-road possibly could have done, and they were able to avoid any sudden curves and turns.

The general tendency of the ground, too, was downward—another highly favourable event.

The excellent mettle displayed by their steeds, the rapidity of the motion, and the desire they felt to reach the vicinity of Enfield Chase without delay, made all four highwaymen feel in capital spirits.

The troop of dragoons, which had driven them from the inn rather more precipitately than they intended to have left it, were by this time so far behind that they had little apprehensions concerning them.

"On—on, my friends!" shouted Turpin, patting Black Bless upon the neck the while. "We are going two feet to their one; and if we persevere, they will soon be out of sight altogether!"

This prediction was verified in much less time than either Dick or his companions expected.

When they looked back again the dragoons were out of sight.

"I suppose they have abandoned the chase," said Claude Duval, "as they found that we are so much better mounted than they are! But we must keep on while the ground is good, for it's many a mile yet to Enfield!"

"You're right there!" said Tom King. "But now that our horses have been so well fed and dressed, I make no doubt they will accomplish the journey some time before midnight."

No more was said, for it was difficult to keep up a conversation while they were galloping at such a tremendous speed.

"There's a piece of water about a mile and a half in a straight line from where we now are," said Tom King, some minutes afterwards. "What do you say—are you for swimming across it, or will you go round?"

"We can afford to slacken speed to deliberate upon that point, I think," said Dick Turpin, setting the example of drawing rein.

They did not stop, but only went at a gentler pace than before, which allowed their horses to recover their wind, while at the same time made conversation easier.

"Is the water deep?" asked Claude Duval

"It must be in the centre."

"And what's the distance across?"

"More than a quarter of a mile."

"The horses would swim, no doubt," said Dick Turpin "But as we have got so far, and left our pursuers in the rear, I don't think there is any necessity for wetting ourselves to the skin, as we should have to do."

"As you like," said Tom King "As we are not hard pressed, the fact of it being a mile or two further round will not much matter."

"But it will!" shouted Sixteen-String Jack suddenly. "Look there—is that magic?'

The three highwaymen, hearing these words, immediately turned their heads and saw, within a very short distance of them indeed, a troop of dragoons very similar to those that had been pursuing them.

"That is not the same troop," said Dick; 'but they see us evidently. We must cross the water after all."

Once more the horses were urged onwards by the highwaymen, for this second troop of dragoons was too close behind to be at all pleasant.

A few minutes brought them to the margin of a large sheet of water, which was as smooth and unruffled as a mill-pond.

The horses entered the water without hesitation, and as soon as they had sufficient depth to swim, the highwaymen slipped from their saddles and swam also, by which means they relieved their horses of much fatigue.

Of course they made for the nearest point on the opposite shore.

Upon coming suddenly upon the edge of the lake, the dragoons drew up with great abruptness

Some kind of council then took place—doubtless it was as to whether they should take to the water or not.

At last they were determined to do so, but by the time they were fairly immersed, the highwaymen were shaking the water from their apparel on the opposite bank.

So far from being in the least degree exhausted by the exertion of swimming, their horses were, on the contrary, greatly refreshed, and when their riders regained the saddles, they were astonished to feel with what readiness they obeyed the spur.

How long it took the dragoons to swim across the pond, or whether they ever got across at all, our friends never knew.

Certain it is that they were troubled no more with them during their ride.

As they came nearer and nearer to their destination, Dick Turpin took the lead.

Finding after a while that no pursuers were either in sight or hearing, he proposed that they should stop for a moment at the next roadside inn they came to.

This was agreed to unanimously, though they resolved not to dismount.

It was shortly after this that they pulled up before one of those inns which are scattered all over England.

They called, in a loud tone, for the ostler, and had their horses supplied with a little hay and water.

The highwaymen also took a reviver after their cold bath in the shape of brandy.

This stoppage altogether did not consume more than five minutes, and at the end of that time they were again on the road to Parson Martext's.

"I've not the least idea where this parson lives," said Dick Turpin, "so I shall have to place myself once more under your guidance. You recollect, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes, quite well, although I've only paid the place that one visit during the whole course of my life. I don't even know the name of the village."

"That doesn't matter a jot, so long as you can find where the parson lives!"

"Have you determined upon your proceedings?"

"I have in the main, but I have not gone into details, nor would it be worth while until we see the place."

"It would be easier then, of course."

"Can you guess how much longer we shall be?"

"An hour, at the very least."

"Then it will be hard upon midnight before we arrive."

Although the highwaymen went at a gallop, yet they did not push their horses so as to distress them, though they got over the ground in amazing style.

Without the occurrence of any other incident, they managed to reach the little village near to which Mr. Martext dwelt.

The old square tower of the church was quite a prominent object, so it was quite easy to make direct towards it.

In order to avoid creating any alarm, they reduced their horses' pace to a walk.

In this manner they approached the vicarage as close as they could, and then dismounted.

"Who will keep charge of the horses?" asked Dick. "Some one must remain here with them. It will not do for them to be left."

"Certainly not!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "I will stop if you like."

"Pray do! I shall esteem it a great favour."

As Sixteen-String Jack was left in charge of the four horses, the highwaymen did not feel the slightest concern with respect to them.

Their minds were left quite free to accomplish the purpose they had in view.

By taking care to keep in the shadow of various objects, they managed to get quite close to the walls of the parson's house without being discovered by anyone.

The precautions they took did indeed seem rather excessive, for there was only one window in the dwelling from which a light proceeded.

"Now, Dick," said Tom King, "we are here at last, and I am exceedingly anxious to know how you are going to proceed."

"I shall ask your advice upon that point," replied Dick, "and be greatly guided by what you say, simply because you know the place better than I do."

"The amount of our knowledge only extends to the exterior of the premises, and I suppose, for you to gain your object, it will be necessary for you to go inside."

"Certainly."

"Then, with respect to that, we know no more than yourself."

Dick Turpin looked up at the white stone edifice, and then said:

"I fancy that light must proceed from some room where the parson is sitting. What do you think?"

"It is very likely."

"Well, then, what we must do is to get inside of the house unperceived, and without creating the least alarm, and after we have done that, we must make our way to the room where he sits."

"Just so," said Claude Duval, "and then he will have the choice offered him of having his brains blown out, or writing the paper you require!"

"And, judging by what I know of the man," added Tom King, "I can form a pretty good idea of which evil of the two he will prefer."

"I think our first step should be to ascertain for certain whether he is really an inmate of yonder room," said Dick Turpin.

"It would be best if we could manage it, but the curtains seem to be drawn across very closely. I wonder what he is at?"

"I will endeavour to find out," said Dick Turpin. "Remain here a moment, and I will creep forward."

Tom King and Claude obeyed, and Dick crept silently along the outside of the house towards the window from which the light proceeded.

It was but a dull, faint gleam, in consequence of the light having to shine through some rather thick substance that was drawn before the window.

Upon reaching it, Dick Turpin made several attempts to get a peep at the interior.

But he failed, in consequence of the curtains being closely drawn.

At the upper part of the window, however, they were separated an inch or two, and if he could only climb so high, there would be a chance of taking a peep in.

He had to be extremely careful in all his movements, lest some slight sound should attract the attention of the person within, and so cause an alarm to be raised.

With great care and silence, Dick got up on the window-sill, and then, by standing on tiptoe, he was able to reach the required height.

The first glance he obtained showed he was quite right as regards his conjecture.

Parson Martext was the inmate of the apartment, but he was not sitting down at the table, busily engaged either in perusing some work on divinity or preparing his next Sunday's sermon.

On the contrary, he was standing close to the book case that faced the window.

In his hands he held a very large decanter, the mouth of which was placed to his lips.

Turpin watched this drinking operation for a minute or two, and then, springing lightly from the window-sill into the garden, hastened to join his two comrades, who were standing together at a little distance.

CHAPTER DXCIX.

DICK TURPIN SUCCEEDS IN OBTAINING THE CERTIFICATE OF HIS MARRIAGE FROM PARSON MARTEXT.

"Is he there?" asked Tom King.

"Yes."

"Alone?"

"Well, yes, I suppose he is, for when I looked he was paying his respects to a bottle of something that I'll be sworn tastes better than water."

Tom King and Claude laughed, but Dick, becoming serious, said:

"Let us get this business over without delay; besides, Sixteen-String Jack will grow impatient."

How they were to enter the parson's house without being seen or heard seemed a mystery.

The first step they took towards the accomplishment of their design was to walk round the house, and try the various windows in succession.

At last they were so lucky as to find one which, though it had been fastened, yet in so negligent a manner that they were able to push the casement open without making the least noise.

To step over the window-sill into the room was easy enough.

All three stood close together for a few seconds, in order that their eyes might get accustomed to the darkness.

By doing this, they were enabled to perceive the door, towards which they stole on tiptoe.

They were lucky enough to avoid coming into contact with any articles of furniture.

The door was closed, but the latch was on the inside, so that they were able to lift it noiselessly.

They opened the door only a little way at first, when, finding that the darkness on the other side was profound, they ventured to cross the threshold.

They then found themselves in the entrance-hall, not far from the bottom of a flight of stairs.

Before entering, the highwaymen had taken particular notice of the position of the window from which the light came, and the one through which they had entered.

By this means, Turpin was able to decide with tolerable certainty as to the precise door that would lead into the apartment occupied by the parson.

As a mistake might be productive of serious consequences, he was exceedingly careful, but finally he made his choice.

"I will enter alone," he whispered, faintly. "If he sees all three of us, he may become outrageous. If I cannot succeed without your assistance, however, I will call you."

This being agreed upon, Turpin opened the door with great suddenness, and glided into the room.

His companions closed the door after him, so that, should the parson utter any sound, it would not penetrate into the building.

Whether Parson Martext had not stopped drinking since Turpin looked in at the window and saw him so engaged, or whether he had just got up again to have another refresher, is hard to say.

Certain it is that the decanter was again at his lips.

With three strides Dick crossed the apartment, and then, in a suppressed but emphatic tone, he said:

"Silence, on your life! If you utter a sound, you are a dead man!"

The sudden change which came over the parson's face upon hearing these words, and upon finding himself suddenly confronted by Turpin, when he firmly believed he was alone, was really most ludicrous to witness.

His fingers relaxed their hold upon the decanter, and the fragile vessel would certainly have reached the ground with a terrific crash, had not Turpin had the presence of mind and the promptitude of action to dart forward and catch it as it fell.

The parson opened and shut his mouth a great many times in succession, like some huge fish gasping desperately for breath.

But he uttered no sound.

"Silence!" cried Dick again, as he placed the decanter on the ledge in front of the book-case and presented a pistol to the parson's head. "This is loaded to the muzzle, and, if you utter a sound above a whisper, I will scatter your brains on the floor!"

The parson had by no means got over the terror which the sudden appearance of Turpin had caused, and this last horrible threat, uttered as it was in a most deliberate and cold-blooded tone, made him still more alarmed.

His legs shook about under him as though they were hung on wires, and he appeared to be in imminent danger of falling to the ground.

"Sit down!" said Turpin, pointing to the arm-chair—"sit down this instant!—refuse at your peril!"

Mr. Martext made many efforts to gasp out a reply, but failed entirely.

By clutching hold of the table with his hands, he managed to reach the chair, into which he sank as though suddenly deprived of life.

Content with the success he had already met with, Turpin lowered his pistol.

This caused the parson to revive, and, being fearful that he would utter a cry, Turpin hastily raised it again, and renewed his threats.

"Now," he added, "do not give way so much to alarm. I don't intend to inflict any injury upon you. On the contrary, I want you to do me a service. Do you understand fully what I am saying?"

The parson's teeth chattered together like castanets, and he nodded his head and kept time to them.

Turpin took this for an affirmative sign, and continued:

"The service I want you to perform will do you no particular harm, but will render me a very great deal of good; and I come to offer you the alternative of doing just what I desire, or sitting there and having your brains blown out!"

Evidently the parson prized his brains as being a very valuable article, for the least mention of doing them any injury put him in a terrible fright.

He nodded his head, and chattered his teeth more violently than before.

While he was in this abject state of fear, he would hardly be able to do what was required, so Turpin endeavoured to reassure him.

This, however, was by no means an easy task.

"Mr. Martext," said Dick, in a gentler voice, "I have been obliged to present myself before you in a very rough way, which I can't help. Don't think for a moment that I wish to do you an injury,—I have too much respect for you! You are quite safe, and in no danger, provided you are silent and comply with my demand."

"Who are you?—what do you want?" the parson at last managed to get out.

"That you shall know in good time. I want first of all to be sure that you perfectly understand what I am saying."

"I do—I do!"

"Very well then. Perhaps you may remember my face, for you have seen me before. Do you recognise me?"

Mr. Martext slowly shook his head.

"You don't?"

"No."

"Then your memory is defective. I must remind you of something. Do you remember performing the marriage ceremony once in Enfield Chase?"

This was anything but an agreeable reminiscence. A greenish tinge seemed to creep over the parson's yellow, wrinkled countenance.

He trembled excessively, and leaned back in his chair as though he was about to faint.

"Beware!" said Turpin. "Do you, or do you not, remember the circumstance I have just mentioned? Answer me at once!"

"I—I—I do."

"Well, then, answer me this truthfully. Do you consider that marriage, as performed by you, lawful and binding?"

This was a question that the parson did not relish.

He remained silent.

Dick repeated his question, but this time in a fiercer tone of voice.

"I would rather not give my opinion upon the point," Mr. Martext at length said.

"But I insist upon it!" said Turpin. "And if you don't answer me, say the shortest prayer you know—you will be a dead man!"

"My opinion is not worth much when it is given," he said, rather more quickly.

"I am the best judge of that!" rejoined Turpin. "Is it lawful and binding, or not?"

"I am obliged to confess that it is."

"And a very good confession it is, too, [illegible] you may not think it."

"I should be ruined," exclaimed the parson, "if it once got to the ears of the bishop that I had performed the marriage in such an irregular way!"

"But I will take care he knows nothing about it!" said Turpin. "I am very glad you have made the admission you have, because now you can have no reason for refusing to comply with my request."

The parson looked uneasy.

"You say the ceremony was irregular," said Turpin, "and so does the lady. You omitted to furnish us with any certificate, and now I require one."

The look of uneasiness on the parson's countenance changed to one of the blackest horror.

Turpin noticed the change, but went on nevertheless.

"Now, Mr. Martext, I give you your choice of two evils. Here is a loaded pistol before you! On the table is paper and writing materials! Write out this moment the certificate of the marriage you performed in Enfield Chase—or, if you refuse, I will blow your brains out, so sure as you are a living, breathing man at this instant!"

"But what you ask me to do is neither more nor less than perfect ruin to myself!" moaned Mr. Martext.

"Nonsense! You will never get into any trouble about it! Write the certificate!"

"I can't—I can't write a certificate so long after the ceremony! It ought to have been done at the time."

"Beware!" said Dick. "I will not be trifled with! You know the consequences of a refusal! Comply, or make up your mind to immediate death!"

The parson looked into the highwayman's countenance, and noticed its fixed and resolute expression.

The decisive way in which the last words had been uttered could not be overlooked.

Then his eyes rested upon the dreadful pistol.

He imagined he could see into the barrel of it.

Literally, death was staring him in the face.

"To save my life," he groaned at last, "I would do anything! I will write the paper you want!"

"You have come to a wise determination," responded Dick. "Beware how you attempt to deceive me, for so sure as you do, your fate shall be such that all men will shudder when they hear it mentioned!"

Mr. Martext broke out into a cold sweat, and made several ineffectual efforts to pick a quill pen up from the table.

For a long time his hand trembled so excessively that he could not.

Succeeding at last, he took it up, and Dick spread out a large sheet of paper before him.

"Now," he said, "write on this the particulars I require."

"It will be no good if I do," was the reply; "we must have the proper book."

"Where is it?"

"At the church."

"Come, then, we must go there and fetch it!"

"It is impossible—the sexton has the keys!"

"Well, then, write upon that piece of blank paper what I require; it will answer my purpose, I have no doubt! What I want you to express is, that you performed the marriage ceremony according to proper form, and that the parties are really and truly man and wife; and that paper you must sign!"

The parson finally, though not until he had been threatened with the pistol, wrote out the document the highwayman required, and placed his signature at the foot of it.

Dick picked it up in triumph, and hastily ran his eye over it.

All was perfectly correct, though the parson's handwriting looked very shaky and uncertain in places.

"Now," said Turpin, "I have a few words to add before I go. This little piece of paper which I have forced you to write is of more importance to me than you can possibly imagine; now I have got it I am very thankful, and disposed to show my gratitude towards you; this I am willing to do in a substantial manner if you will give me your word that you will raise no alarm, and will say nothing about what has taken place to-night. I will leave you, and when I have been gone five minutes open your window, and on the ledge outside you will find something that will atone for the terror you have had to-night, and the trouble you had some time ago."

Turpin did not wait to hear the reply the parson seemed inclined to make, but backed out of the room, and closed the door after him.

"I have got the paper!" he said, in a tone of triumph, to his two companions. "I have managed capitally; but the sooner we are out of the house the better! You, Tom, lead the way—I am too excited to do so myself!"

Tom obeyed, and in less than a moment they were standing on the outside of the building.

In as few words as possible Dick explained to his comrades the nature of the promise he had made to the parson.

They thought he had done perfectly right, and they hurried off to where Sixteen-String Jack was waiting.

From him they obtained quite a large sum of money in gold, which they carried and placed upon the window sill.

This done, they mounted their steeds with all possible expedition and galloped off.

"We have a great deal to do yet," Turpin exclaimed, "although we have been lucky enough to succeed so far! Now we have got this certificate we must make use of it in the best possible manner!"

"What do you intend to do with it?"

"We must make our way to London, and engage some solicitor to appear on Maud's behalf; to him we will give this certificate, and explain all the facts of the case! Luckily we have money enough left to give him a handsome fee."

"But will it not be highly dangerous to return to London to-night," asked Tom King, "or I should say this morning—for morning it really is?"

"It would not take us long."

"True; but then there would be the difficulty as to how we should dispose of ourselves during the day; if you will take my advice you will spend a few hours in Enfield Chase, which will enable us to thoroughly mature our plans before we attempt to carry them into execution."

"But I don't like the delay," said Dick: "I am all impatience now to bring this matter to a termination."

"I know you are; but nothing will be gained by being rash; allow yourself to be swayed by me on this occasion—I am not so likely to be led astray by my feelings as yourself."

"And you think our visit to London had better be postponed?"

"Yes, until nightfall, or rather until dark. We will set off then, and we shall have the advantage of arranging our business with the solicitor at a time when few people will be abroad, and when we shall be in little danger of recognition."

"As you will," replied Turpin. "Perhaps it would be best, though I confess I find myself unable to see it."

CHAPTER DC.

DESPITE HIS RESOLUTION, DICK TURPIN ACHIEVES A RATHER LUDICROUS ADVENTURE ON THE ROAD TO LONDON.

These words were considered sufficient to settle the matter, and Dick Turpin and his comrades turned their horses' heads in the direction of Enfield Chase.

They reached the friendly shadow of the trees without meeting with an interruption of any kind.

"Safe at last!" said Tom King. "Some time will have to elapse before daylight comes. But never mind—we can rest! Perhaps we may as well avail ourselves of the opportunity we have got. Who can tell what circumstances may arise, making rest or sleep a matter of total impossibility?"

The three highwaymen fully felt the remark.

"We must find some place of shelter," said Claude.

"I propose we remain beneath the trees. It is not so very cold, and we shall be safer in case of an attack than we should be in a cavern or any similar place," said Tom King.

"No cavern," exclaimed Turpin—"no cavern for me! I cannot rest if there is anything more above me than the tree tops! We shall be able then to keep near our steeds."

Turpin could not bear the idea of entering a cavern but for other reasons than the one he gave his comrades.

There was not a single object around him that did not serve to bring Maud vividly before his mind.

He thought of the happy hours he had passed in old Enfield Chase, with Maud for a companion.

Now she was lingering and pining in a Newgate cell.

This was a thought which almost drove the gallant highwayman into madness.

His blood bounded within his veins, and every nerve throbbed like an artery.

In the meanwhile, the four friends penetrated rather deeply into the wood, and finally paused upon the bank of one of those beautiful, picturesque little dells with which the place abounded.

After a brief deliberation, they resolved to take up their quarters here, and descended accordingly.

The bottom of the dell was covered with soft, green grass, which was particularly grateful to the horses, and there was also a tiny stream, which fell down one side in a kind of mimic cascade.

That they would be able to make themselves comfortable here there could be little doubt.

They occupied the time partly in considering over their future arrangements, and partly in sleep—each one taking his turn to keep watch and ward.

This was a precaution it afterwards appeared that could have been easily dispensed with.

The deep, delightful silence remained unbroken, save by those natural sounds which are ever to be heard in such a place.

It seemed pretty evident that the police officers had quite forsaken the spot.

This was the case.

All those who had been set to perform the duty of searching for and capturing Dick Turpin and his companions were, by Mr. Wriggles's instructions, concentrated around the prison of Newgate.

Consequently, only the dragoons remained, and too long a time had elapsed since the highwaymen had been seen or heard of in the vicinity of Enfield for the soldiers to be particularly on the look-out.

All promised to go well.

Dick's impatience increased as night approached, and almost before it was dark enough to be prudent he insisted upon setting out for London.

"Understand," he said, as they emerged from the trees, "the object we have in view—it is to make our way with all speed to London. Every precaution must be taken to guard against any hindrance. No matter what adventure lies before us—no matter what we see—we must pass by unheedingly, with our eyes closed to everything, save our immediate purpose."

His comrades agreed unhesitatingly, for they were scarcely less interested in the matter than their captain himself.

Whether they would be able to proceed so far without meeting with some kind of interruption was open to very grave doubts indeed.

Fortune favoured them, however.

By avoiding all the principal roads, and taking their way for the most part over the open country, they at last drew rein upon an eminence—then a little way out of London, but now completely surrounded by bricks and mortar.

It was comparatively early in the evening, being little more than seven o'clock.

But it was as dark as Dick Turpin could have wished.

"I think we had better make some fresh arrangement," said Tom King, thoughtfully.

"In what way?"

"It is only necessary for one to visit the lawyer."

"True."

"One might pass undetected, while four would be discovered."

"I have been thinking the same thing myself," replied Dick.

"In my judgment," replied Tom King, "it would be infinitely better for us to remain here while you go on alone, and I say this more out of consideration for your safety than my own."

"I know it—I know it! And I too have a regard for your safety."

"You ever had, captain.'

"I can see now that what we originally intended is not feasible. For all four of us to go to Lincoln's Inn, so far from being of the least benefit, would only serve to quadruple the danger."

"And the probability of detection.

"Just so."

"How shall we act, then, captain?"

"I think you had better remain here, if you possibly can, until I return. If you are compelled to relinquish your position, fall back upon the Chase, and conceal yourselves among its recesses."

"And so, when you return, if you do not find us here. you will make your way to Enfield Chase."

"I will."

"Then, we thoroughly understand."

"Farewell, then!"

"But your disguise? It will be necessary for you to assume one."

'I fear it is impossible."

"It will never do to enter London in that attire."

"How can I disguise myself? Where can I procure the necessary articles?"

"In the night time an elaborate disguise is scarcely needed."

"Right! Darkness makes all the difference."

"A long cloak, such as some horsemen wear, which will cover up the whole of your person, is, in reality, all you need. You can clasp it round your throat, and so conceal your features."

"That does not get me out of the difficulty. I have no such cloak."

"But you might obtain one."

"How?"

"Easily. You will not ride far along the high-road without meeting some one carrying this article of apparel."

"Of course!—that will be the best and simplest plan."

"Decidedly!"

"Once more, then, I say farewell!"

With these words Dick Turpin trotted off, leaving his companions to await his return.

His form was soon lost to sight in the darkness.

He made his way direct to the nearest high-road, resolved to put his plan into execution as soon as possible.

Before he had gone half a mile after reaching it, his ear caught the sound of horses' footsteps.

Some one was travelling rapidly in the same direction as himself—namely, towards London.

Dick stopped at once, in order to allow whoever was coming to overtake him.

But as soon as he was satisfied that only one horseman was coming, he allowed Black Bess to proceed at a half-walk—half-trot, just keeping her in motion, but no more.

The night was cold and rather frosty, so that Turpin fully expected to find nearly every horseman provided with a cloak.

The traveller quickly came up.

At a glance Dick saw he wore a cloak, and that he was a stout-built, apparently middle-aged man.

As the traveller passed by, Dick took off his hat, and, making a slight bow, said:

"Good morning, sir!"

The traveller did not deign to take any further notice of this salutation than by turning rapidly towards him.

Then, to signify his disinclination to getting into conversation, he struck his horse with the spur and went on at a more rapid pace.

Dick loosened the rein upon Black Bess's neck.

In half a dozen bounds he overtook the uncivil traveller, and, without the slightest exertion, kept pace with him.

[DICK TURPIN SEEKS ADMITTANCE TO LINCOLN'S INN.]

"Excuse me, sir," he exclaimed, "but I think you have acted somewhat discourteously towards me!"

"Well, perhaps I have," was the reply, given in a growling voice, "but it does not do in these days of ours to fall into the company of every person you pass on the highway."

"Very true," said Dick, "and the circumstance is much to be regretted."

Hearing Turpin speak thus, the alarm which the traveller had at first felt subsided.

"I do not wish, however, to intrude myself upon you," continued Dick. "In fact, I will at once fall back into the rear if you will grant me the slight favour I was about to ask when I first saluted you."

"As you are evidently a gentleman," said the traveller, "your company will be agreeable rather than otherwise. Pray be good enough to name the favour which you require at my hands?"

"Willingly! You wear a cloak."

"Eh?"

"I say you wear a cloak."

"Well, sir, and what if I do?"

"Oh, nothing particular, except that——"

"That what, sir?"

"I want you to lend it me."

"Well, that's cool, I'm d—d if it isn't!"

"Do you allude to the weather?"

"No—I don't! I allude to your impudence!"

"Sir!"

"I say what I mean!"

"So do I! I say I am in urgent need of your cloak, and fully mean it!"

"Oh, indeed!"

"And will you lend it me?"

"No—I'll see you d—d first!"

"Then," added Turpin, "I must insist upon having it!"

"Insist?"

"Yes. You see this?"

Dick presented a pistol as he spoke.

The traveller trembled.

"Then you are a highwayman after all?"

"What I am matters little! I want your cloak."

"But it's cold, and I cannot spare it."

"I cannot help that!"

"D—n!"

"I stand more in need of it than you do yourself!"

"Yes—but d—n it, sir, is it right or reasonable that a man should give up his cloak on a bitter cold night, simply because he happens to meet with an impudent rascal who says he has more urgent need for it?"

"Well, sir, you can either hand it to me, as I requested, or you can force me to take it from you; but, one way or the other, I am determined to have it!"

"D—n me if it isn't cool!"

"If you speak with regard to the weather, I fully agree with you! I quite shiver with the cold!"

"And what the devil am I to do when I have given up my cloak?"

Dick shrugged his shoulders and replied:

"The best you can!"

"I'll be d—d if this isn't a good joke!"

"I am glad to find you are inclined to make light of the transaction!" replied Dick, as imperturbably as ever.

"Curse me!" cried the traveller. "I don't know which to admire most, your calmness or your impudence!"

"I will leave you to debate over it. In the meanwhile I'll trouble you for your cloak!"

"Trouble is the word!"

"I won't insult you by saying it's a pleasure!"

The traveller laughed, in spite of himself.

"You have a villanous wit!" he said.

"Come, sir," exclaimed Turpin, "we are on good terms with each other at last, and, such being the case, I hope such a trifle as the surrender of your cloak will not upset it!"

"Oh, d—n you for a knave! Take the cloak, and don't let me be troubled with your company any longer! You are a great deal too much like a highwayman for me to care about your society."

"It is not always wise to be candid. I might resent your insinuation," said Turpin, catching the cloak the traveller threw to him. "If I am a highwayman, I must be an eccentric one!"

"Why?"

"Because I shall let you pass on without troubling you for your purse, watch, or other valuables! Good night, sir, I am much obliged to you! If ever it lies in my power I will return the favour! Anyhow, when I see you again you shall have your cloak back."

With these words, Dick Turpin—having obtained what he desired—galloped off, leaving the traveller to think what he might of the whole transaction, and to get home without his cloak in the best way he could.

CHAPTER DOI.

DICK TURPIN HAS AN INTERVIEW WITH LAWYER LAZENBY, IN LINCOLN'S INN.

HAVING thus obtained the article of attire of which he stood so much in need, Dick Turpin pushed on in a tolerably straight line for his destination.

But not for long could he allow Black Bess to continue her course at a gallop.

He drew in the reins by degrees, for, above all things, he wished to pass through the streets without attracting attention.

With the darkness had come a sharp frost, which seemed every moment to increase in intensity.

The cold was extreme, and there was a strong northerly wind blowing, which made travelling unpleasant to a degree.

This, however, was all the better for the highwayman, since, on such a night as the present, no one would be likely to be abroad who could possibly remain within doors.

On his way he met with very few people.

Not one of them gave a single glance towards him; they were all too much occupied in protecting themselves from the cold.

Nor was there anything about Dick Turpin's appearance to attract notice.

The long cloak was of that description usually worn by horsemen.

More with the view of disguising himself than obtaining protection from the cold, Dick had drawn the cloak close up to his neck, and secured it in front.

When the broad, fur-lined collar was turned up, all the lower part of his face was completely covered.

Then the cloak, which was of very ample dimensions, fell in heavy folds, completely concealing his person down to the knees.

The back part rested gracefully upon the crupper of Black Bess.

Dick's intention was to visit Mr. Lazenby, the lawyer who resided at No. 8, in the Old Square, Lincoln's Inn, and who has already been introduced to the reader.

Although he had failed to do any good in Tom King's behalf when entrusted with his defence, yet the fault was none of his own.

Dick knew this well, and therefore he resolved to let him engage a counsel, and generally arrange for Maud's defence.

One very great recommendation was, that Dick felt perfectly certain that he could trust him.

No matter how large was the reward offered for his apprehension, and no matter how good was the chance of earning it, Mr. Lazenby would not be tempted to stir an inch.

As he drew nearer and nearer to Lincoln's Inn, the streets became much busier, and more thronged with people; still, as it was dusk, and as his form was so well concealed, Dick believed that he stood a much better chance of remaining unnoticed than he would have done had there been but few travellers besides himself.

Without meeting with the least interruption, and without, as he firmly believed, having excited the suspicions of anyone, Dick Turpin trotted gently down Chancery Lane, and stopped before that large and ancient-looking gateway which forms the chief entrance to the lawyers' stronghold.

The gates were closed, and the whole place appeared to be deserted.

Dick knew very well, however, that this was not the case.

At a certain hour, when a bell was rung, all the gates leading into Lincoln's Inn were closed, and no one allowed to pass either in or out without the knowledge of the gatekeepers.

Aware of this, Dick rapped loudly upon the huge wooden door, and waited patiently for a response.

His patience was not put to a very severe trial, for the man who attended to the gate had frequently to let people in and out.

Suddenly the little door let into the large gate, and contrived for the convenience of persons on foot, was opened, and the figure of an old man bearing a lantern in his hand appeared at the aperture.

He evidently expected to see some one standing close at hand, and for a moment failed to perceive Dick on horseback.

"Hallo!" said Dick. "Open the gates—I have business inside!"

The old man raised his lantern, so that the light fell upon the forms of the highwayman and his steed.

"A nice time o' night this," he grumbled, "to have to open the big gates! Why, it a'most breaks my back every time I do it!"

Dick glanced at the ponderous iron-studded wooden doors, and could easily believe the old man's assertion.

Feeling certain that some time would elapse before the gates could be opened, and by no means desiring to remain in the street in the meanwhile, he said:

"I won't put you to any more trouble than I can help, but I have important business with a lawyer, whom I must see to-night. I shall not be long; and I fancy that I shall be able to lead my horse through that little door if you're agreeable to let me try."

"Oh yes, sir—oh yes! Try by all manner of means—I'm perfectly agreeable!" replied the gatekeeper, in quite a changed tone of voice.

He was glad enough to be saved the labour of turning the huge key, and removing the ponderous bolts, and bars, and chains.

So, in an attitude of the greatest imaginable respect, he stood aside, so as to hold the door open, and prevent it from swinging shut, which it had a tendency to do.

Dick slipped quickly from the saddle.

That Black Bess would make her way through the small aperture he did not doubt.

He patted her upon the neck, and passed through before her.

It was difficult for the mare to follow, for the bottom of this little door was not on a level with the ground, but about six or eight inches above it, so that it was necessary she should raise her feet to step over it.

This, however, she succeeded in doing, and as soon as she was fairly through the door, the old man released it, and it closed.

A sensation of tolerable security now came over Dick Turpin's heart.

While he was in this ancient building, where no persons were allowed to intrude, the danger of Black Bess being recognised was very slight indeed.

"Ah, sir!" said the gatekeeper, admiringly, "that's what I do call a horse, now! Only think what a world of trouble she has saved my poor old bones! There's not many that could be made to do it!"

"I know that!" said Dick, with a smile, and with a slight touch of pride in his tone.

The rare docility and sagacity of Black Bess was certainly one of the bold highwayman's weak points.

When anyone expressed admiration at her matchless qualities, he was sure to add some words of praise of his own, and, as the reader will be able to remember, on more than one occasion he spoke with so much enthusiasm as to give rise to suspicion.

"She's a beautiful-looking creature, too!" continued the gatekeeper, as he allowed the light of the lantern to play upon her glossy skin. "I don't pretend to be much of a judge in horseflesh, but my opinion is she's a real beauty!"

"She is!" exclaimed Dick, with sparkling eyes. "She has no flaw—no blemish, and her speed and endurance have never had an equal, and, when she has gone, never will!"

"... you're going on business, sir, to any of the chambers in the Inn, I'll take care of her the while, if you wish."

Dick hesitated a moment, and felt more than half inclined to accept this proposal, but a second glance into the old man's countenance, which was now more plainly revealed to him than it had been hitherto, induced him to change his half-formed determination.

"No," he said—"it is not necessary. She is quiet. I shall not wait long."

"Very good, sir!" said the old man, humbly. "I hope you'll excuse me for speaking!"

"There's no harm done," said Dick. "Just be in readiness to let me out when I return. I sha'n't be long."

"Very good, sir—but it's a tremendous cold night!"

"True, and when I leave you shall drink my health in something that will warm your old blood for this night at least!"

With these words Dick Turpin led his mare by the bridle to that paved area which is called the Old Square.

The old gatekeeper stood in such a position as to be able to command a view of the direction Turpin took.

His face wore a strange expression, and muttered words came from his lips.

"I wonder who the deuce he is?" he said, presently, in a louder tone. "He's some one uncommon, I'm quite sure of that. And there's that horse, too. I could never have believed that any four-legged animal, except a dog or a cat, could have passed through that door in such a sensible way. I have my suspicions. Suppose now that that should be Dick Turpin?"

This was a startling supposition, and the old man stroked his chin in deep reflection.

"Such a thing is more than likely," he said. "He is bold and daring enough to make his way even into Lincoln's Inn! And that's a black horse, and I have heard tell of some extraordinary things done by a mare—Black Bess—that they say Dick Turpin rides on. Perhaps that's her. I wish I knew for certain. If I did, what a good thing it would be for me!"

For the present, however, we will leave the old gatekeeper to his speculations and suspicions, while we follow in the footsteps of Dick Turpin.

Although the square was very dark, the only illumination being that which came from some few windows, he made his way with readiness and certainty to No. 8, which was the house where Mr. Lazenby's chambers were situated.

The front door was wide open, as is always the case.

Dick patted his mare upon the neck, and in a suppressed voice, he said, addressing her:

"Wait here Bess, my lass, till I return!"

Whether the highwayman's mare really understood this injunction we cannot say. Evidently, however, if she did not comprehend the purport of the words, she did the tone in which they were spoken.

She understood, too, the caress, and rubbed her head gently against her master's breast, as was her wont.

Patting her once more, Turpin hastily passed through the doorway of No. 8, and ascended the staircase which was just opposite to him.

Black Bess remained perfectly still, in the same attitude as when her master let go his hold upon the reins.

She watched him until the angle of the staircase hid him from her sight.

Never dreaming for a moment that the old man at the gate had any suspicions of his identity, and being under the impression that few people would enter the Inn at that hour, Dick Turpin felt quite secure in leaving Black Bess in the manner we have described, for he knew that he could trust her to remain in one spot and not stray away.

With great nimbleness and alacrity he ascended the stairs, and, upon reaching the top of the flight, he paused before that door upon which the lawyer's name was painted.

He rapped smartly with his knuckles, and, as he listened for the approach of some one to respond to his summons, he heard a confused noise within.

Of what character it was, he was unable to form an opinion, nor was he allowed much time for speculating upon the matter.

The door was opened, and the shrivelled-up form of the avaricious old lawyer appeared upon the threshold.

"It's all right, Tho!" said Dick, making use of the very same words as Claude did on the occasion of his former visit.

The lawyer started, and holding up the candle somewhat higher, peered inquisitively into the countenance of the highwayman.

Dick turned back the collar of his coat and lifted his hat, in order that he might be seen all the more easily, and, as he did so, he said:

"You remember me, do you not?"

"I do," ejaculated Mr. Lazenby. "You are——"

Never mind who," added Dick, hastily, fearful lest his name should be overheard. "I have particular business for you, and I can pay you well."

"No doubt—no doubt!" said the lawyer. "You always do pay well, and so you ought for such service as you get. Come in, by all means."

Dick Turpin followed Mr. Lazenby into his inner or private room, where his important consultations were held.

"Now," he said, seating himself in a chair, "I am at your service. Explain what you want."

Dick knew very well the old man's avaricious nature, and so, without further preface, he took from his pocket a bag of gold, which he had taken care to provide himself with, and tossing it on to the table, so that its golden contents should make a pleasant jingling sound, he said:

"There's a trifle as an earnest towards the money I am going to pay you for the service I require."

The sordid heart of the miserly lawyer quickened its action, and sent a faint flush of colour into his cheeks.

His eyes brightened; but, as if by magic, this expression of satisfaction disappeared, and the hand which he had held out, as if to clutch the bag of gold, he let fall by his side.

"What ails you?" said Dick, quickly—"what's the matter?"

"You offer to pay largely if that is but an earnest of what you intend to give. The service may be too dangerous at any price!"

"Have no fears on that head!" said Dick, endeavouring to reassure him. "My wife has been made prisoner and confined in Newgate on the charge of being my accomplice."

"But that's impossible!" said the lawyer, quickly. "By English law, a wife is bound to succour her husband, and therefore cannot be his accomplice."

"I know that full well," replied Turpin, "but she's a prisoner nevertheless!"

"Then it is upon a groundless charge."

"I am glad to hear you say as much—it makes me feel more sanguine respecting her acquittal."

"But if she is your wife," said Mr. Lazenby, "why suffer her to remain in confinement?"

"There is the difficulty!" was the reply. "They will not take either my word or hers. They say she is not my wife, and demand a proof that she is."

"Oh! I see! Then that may be awkward."

"It may be. Yet here is a certificate from the parson who performed the ceremony. I believe she will be brought up for trial the day after to-morrow. You must engage a counsel to defend her and obtain her acquittal!"

"I will do it," said the lawyer, at once pocketing the bag of gold—"I will do it. Don't be afraid of that!"

"You cannot tell how much my heart is lightened by that simple observation on your part!"

"The service is a simple one, and the marriage can be easily proved."

"And when that is done she will be set at liberty?"

"Of course! But what price do you intend to pay for this?"

"You shall name your own terms," said the highwayman, "let them be what they will! Obtain her liberation at the earliest possible moment—prove to all the world that she is my wife, and make it an impossibility for her to be again brought up on the same charge, and your demands, however great they may be, shall be——"

The remainder of this speech was never uttered.

Dick paused suddenly, with half-opened lips, and then started to his feet.

The lawyer, too, seemed to collapse and sink into the antique chair on which he sat, while his face became expressive of the utmost consternation.

For a sound such as neither had heard in the whole course of their lives before came upon their ears, and some moments elapsed before Dick Turpin could recover himself sufficiently to decide as to what this sound really was.

CHAPTER DCII.

BOTH DICK TURPIN AND BLACK BESS ARE MENACED BY A TERRIBLE DANGER.

To explain, it is necessary that we should return to the old gatekeeper.

The notion that the steed whose outlines he could just dimly see was no other than Black Bess having once entered his mind, took up a firm position there and would not be dislodged.

For a long time he argued with himself upon the probability of his speculations being correct, but without being able to arrive at any definite conclusion.

"I will call in old Mike, the watchman," he said at length, "and take him into my confidence in the matter. He's rather a clever chap, is Mike, and the reward is large enough to stand a division between two persons. Oh! if it should really be Dick Turpin, what an excellent thing it will be for me!"

While speaking these words, the old man bent his steps to the little door, which he opened.

He projected his head through the aperture, and looked up and down the silent street.

A little lower down, on the opposite side, could be seen the outlines of one of those wooden boxes with which the watchmen in the last century were provided.

A flickering oil lamp shed a dim and dubious light upon it.

"I'd wager my head to a brass farthing that old Mike is sitting down asleep. I know he does take a nap generally about this time. I must run across and wake him."

So saying, the old man stepped out.

In order to guard against the possibility of the horse and rider making their exit before his return, he carefully locked the door on the outer side.

With nimble steps he crossed the road, and upon reaching the wooden box, directed the light of his lantern into it.

Seated in as comfortable a manner as the nature of the place would permit, was the so-called guardian of the night.

He used to make his rounds every hour, and proclaim the time, but as soon as this duty was over he regularly settled himself down for a nap, waking always, from long habit, at just the right moment.

Mike, the watchman, had buttoned his coat very tight across his chest, and round his mouth and nose he had wound a thick woollen comforter.

In one hand he held his rattle, and with the other he supported the side of his head.

His lantern was suspended from the roof.

"How he does snore!" said the old gatekeeper, as the light of the lantern fell on the watchman's face. "He's as sound asleep as a church; but I'll wake him pretty quick."

From the manner in which the gatekeeper grinned, it was evident that he intended to play the watchman some practical joke.

With a chuckle, he opened his lantern and took out the little piece of candle it contained.

Holding it between his finger and thumb, he placed the flame in very close proximity to the end of the watchman's nose.

The experiment succeeded to admiration.

Mike awoke up in a moment and sneezed awfully.

"Hallo! murder!" he cried. "What's that?"

"'Tisn't murder," said the gatekeeper, "it's fire."

"Oh, d—n it! it's you, is it?" said Mike, who was by this time wide awake and in full possession of all the senses he had—"it's you, is it? Now what the devil did yer want to come and play me that trick for?"

"Hush, Mike! I wanted to wake you without making any noise. I've got something very important to say—it may be a matter of five hundred pound in your pocket!"

"Oh! be aisy now!" exclaimed Mike. "Five hundred pound? Only think o' that!"

"There's not a moment to be lost," said the gatekeeper. "Come across with me to the Inn, and I'll tell you all about it."

Without any ado, the watchman left his post and accompanied the gatekeeper across the street.

A very few words served to place him in possession of all the facts the gatekeeper was able to communicate.

"Dick Tarpin, is it? Oh, we'll have him, niver fear for that!"

"But, Mike, do you feel sure that it's Turpin?" asked the gatekeeper. "It would be a very awkward thing if we were to make a mistake."

"Let me have a look at the horse, and I'll tell you for certain."

"Come on—here she is!"

"I saw her once, and I should know her again from a thousand. Oh! she's a beautiful creeter, anyway—much too good for a blackguard highwayman."

Both men carried their lanterns, and with rather stealthy steps they made their way across the Old Square, and paused close to where Black Bess was still standing.

They were able to cast a tolerable amount of light upon the highwayman's steed, and the watchman, after an attentive observation, said:

"Och! by the powers, it's him! I could swear to that horse bein' a mare better than I could swear to my own father!"

"Could you now?"

"Oh, divil a doubt about that it's him!"

"Dick Turpin?"

"Yes, Dick Tarpin, an' that's his mare Black Bess!"

"Then," said the gatekeeper, sinking his voice to a solemn and impressive whisper, "we must nab him!"

"We must!" was the equally emphatic rejoinder.

"But how?"

"That's to be considered, my jewel!"

"Do you think we can manage it, or shall we get some assistance?"

"No, no!—no assistance, my bhoy! The more fingers there is in this pie, the less we shall get! Just leave me to consider, will you?"

"Yes, but you must not take up much time about it, for the gentleman told me he should be back in a minute."

"Och! bad cess to the blackguard if he comes before I have made up my mind! Whisht, now! I've got it at last!"

"Where—where—where?"

"Hold your row, now, and I'll be afther telling you! Shure, it's as aisy as winking!"

The gatekeeper rubbed his hands in gleeful anticipation.

"Shure now, isn't it that brute of a baste yonder as makes the highwayman what he is! Now, where would this famous Dick Tarpin be if his horse was took away from him?"

"What do you mean, Mike?"

"Don't you understand?"

"No, not quite."

"Well, then, can't you see that if he hadn't got Black Bess he'd be nabbed aisy enough?"

"Yes, but he has got Black Bess."

"Shure enough, but we'll take it off him, my bhoy!"

The gatekeeper slapped him on the shoulder.

"You ought to be the Lord Chancellor, or something of that sort! That's a good plan! Suppose, now, you go and catch the horse?"

"No, by the powers! If we're to share the reward, we must share all the risk and danger, without you'll agree to divide it this way—I'll catch the horse, and you'll catch the man."

"No, no, Mike, that wouldn't be fair! You must recollect that it was a favour for me to think of you, and not go to anybody else."

"Oh, be aisy now! Where is there a man, within a mile of the place anyway, that could have been of so much service?"

"Well, I know all about that; but how shall we catch the horse?"

"Shure, now, my brains is as full of new ideas as a piece of old cheese is of maggots!"

"What have you thought of now, Mike?"

"Och, by St. Patrick, I won't catch the horse—I'll do something else!"

"What?"

Mike did not reply, but thrusting his hand into one of the huge pockets in his coat, produced an immense clasp knife, which he opened by means of a spring in the back.

"Shure now, an' isn't that illegant!" he exclaimed, as he flourished the brightly-polished blade.

The gatekeeper retreated a few steps as he asked, with evident trepidation:

"But what is it you're going to do with that, Mike?"

"Why, shure now, we'll creep forward, and you shall take hold of the baste by the bridle, and I'll creep round behind her, and with this beautiful little toothpick I'll cut some of the sinews in her hind legs. What do you think of that for a scheme, my honey? Dick Tarpin will get on the back of Black Bess, but it's divilish little use she'll be to him!"

The gatekeeper was not a man who, in a general way, stuck at trifles, and yet he shrank from the atrocious proposition of his companion.

"Oh, Mike!" he said, "that's an awful thing to do, and such a splendid horse as it is, too!"

"Oh! bad luck to yer white heart! What's a horse but a horse? An' is a nate little job like that to stand in the way of our getting five hundred pound? Come on, ye coward, or, be jabers, I'll do it myself!"

Much as he disliked the idea of maiming the beautiful creature whose graciousness and docility had elicited his utmost admiration, still, the prospect of obtaining five hundred pounds enabled him to banish his scruples.

"I'm no coward, Mike," he said, "and you're a liar if you say so! Come on—I'm ready!"

"That's right, me bhoy! I see you've got some pluck, afther all! When you once get hold of the reins, cling tight! Niver mind if she kicks—don't let go till I've crippled her!"

With these words, the two men placed their lanterns on the ground and stealthily drew near to Black Bess.

Little did Turpin dream of the imminent peril with which his gallant steed was menaced.

Black Bess did not attempt to move as the two men, with such diabolical intentions towards her, crept nearer and nearer.

"Now, then," cried Mike, the watchman, "I'm all ready! Just lay hold o' the rein, and I'm right! This knife is as sharp as a razor, for I ground it myself a few hours back! Just one stroke with it 'll do the business, and the thousand pounds reward will be ours!"

The two villains were obliged to keep the idea of the reward before them, or surely their better natures would have revolted at the barbarity they were about to practise.

The severance of some of the tendons in the hocks of Black Bess, which, as the watchman had said, could be done with one stroke of the knife, would effectually cripple her for the remainder of her existence.

The mischief once done could not by any possibility be repaired.

Surely some accidental circumstance will take place that will frustrate the diabolical intentions of these two men.

But the Old Square was dark and silent, and there were no signs of any other living beings in it save the gatekeeper and the watchman, who had succeeded in their design so far as to get side by side with the steed.

The gatekeeper stretched out his hand suddenly, and took firm hold of the reins.

CHAPTER DCIII.

DICK TURPIN FINDS DANGER RAPIDLY THICKENING AROUND HIM.

"HAVE you got the reins?" said the watchman.

"Yes."

"Hold tight, then, and I'll soon do the rest!"

He crept along towards the mare's hind legs as he spoke.

Black Bess had allowed the gatekeeper to take hold of the bridle without offering the least opposition to such a proceeding.

This was strange, for in a general way she would not suffer anyone to touch her save her master, or the person into whose charge for the time being he had given her.

When a stranger approached she was generally so restive, and put on such an aspect of viciousness, that any thought of taking hold of her would be abandoned by a prudent man who knew anything bout horses.

The old gatekeeper grasped the reins with all the strength he could call forth.

He was determined that the plan should not fail through him.

But Black Bess turned her head.

She either saw or felt the skulking figure creeping round behind her.

The watchman was highly delighted when he found how quietly Black Bess stood, and made sure of accomplishing his purpose with much less trouble than he had looked forward to.

One more step brought him near enough.

Raising his huge knife, he was about to effect his purpose, when Black Bess, disapproving of anyone being so close, suddenly lifted up her feet and kicked out with terrific force.

There was a dull crash, a hideous cry—half a yell half a groan—another crash, and then the watchman could be seen lying on the stones in the square in a confused, huddled-up heap.

The kick had been a most effective one, and both of the heavy iron-bound hoofs had struck him.

It was a just and fitting punishment.

As for the gatekeeper, he was so terrified by the sudden movement of Black Bess that he let go the reins in a moment, dropped to the ground, and rolled over and over like a ball, until he was brought to a stop with great suddenness by a brick wall.

There he lay, more dead than alive, trembling from head to foot.

Dolorous groans came from the watchman's lips as he writhed upon the ground like some reptile in its death agony.

Black Bess, now greatly excited, and perhaps to some extent comprehending her danger, no longer stood still, as she had done until interfered with, but walked slowly and deliberately to the door of No. 8, where she had seen her master enter.

She passed through the doorway, and, strange to relate, began to ascend the stairs, which were broad and straight.

But the noise which her feet produced upon the wood work was something terrific, more especially as the whole place was so silent.

The sound apparently alarmed her, for she paused at the angle of the staircase where she had seen Dick Turpin disappear.

These were the sounds which had come upon the ears of Dick Turpin and Mr. Lazenby, and so abruptly put an end to their conference.

And truly they were alarming enough and sufficient to arouse everybody in No. 8.

Dick soon recognised the footsteps of Black Bess, and before she had stopped he had sprung to his feet and commenced the descent of the topmost flight of stairs.

"Remember all that I have said!" he cried to the lawyer, as he descended. "Obtain her acquittal and liberation, and you shall name your own reward!"

He did not stop while speaking these words, and by the time the last had left his lips he had reached the landing on the third floor.

The uproar below had alarmed an elderly lawyer who slept in one of the rooms opening from it.

Dick just caught sight of him.

He was holding a candle in one hand, and the other was employed in holding a curious-looking dressing-gown which he had partly thrown over him.

"Good gracious!" he ejaculated. "What's that?"

"The devil!" said Dick, in a sepulchral voice, passing him while he spoke, and at the same time dashing the candle from the old man's trembling fingers with his felt hat.

What might be the result of this, Dick could not wait to see, because of the terrific tumult that was taking place below.

On the second landing, no less than three doors stood wide open, and upon the threshold of each was a member of some branch of the legal profession.

All looked scared and anxious.

Dick Turpin dashed by them at full speed.

"Who's that?" cried one. "There's robbery, or murder, or something going on! Let us follow him!"

"Follow be d—d!" said another. "It's no business of mine, and I'm not going to get my head into trouble by poking it into matters that don't concern me!"

"So say I," said another voice, and two doors were immediately closed.

The one who had proposed following the flying figure in the cloak, finding himself thus deserted by his companions, altered his mind, and very prudently entered his own room again.

On the first landing was Turpin's greatest danger.

Here everyone was aroused, and, what was more, they had discovered the cause of the terrific, because unusual, noise they had heard.

Black Bess could be seen standing just in the angle of the staircase.

"Why, shoot me if it isn't a horse!" Dick heard some one cry just as he reached this spot.

The man who spoke was near the top of the stairs.

"You're wrong!" cried Dick, as, giving a sudden bound, he alighted just behind him—"you're wrong, my friend! It isn't a horse—it's a mare!"

He accompanied these words with such a hard smack between the shoulders of the discoverer, that he fell down at once as though shot.

Dick was surprised to see Black Bess standing there, and was certain that something of a most extraordinary nature had taken place.

He was quickly by her side, however, and, taking hold of the bridle, easily led her down the stairs again.

Those above looked down curiously, but made no aggressive demonstration.

In another moment Dick reached the front door of No. 8, and was about to emerge into the square, when he heard the hasty rushing of many feet, and shouts from excited persons "Confusion!" he exclaimed. "The whole place has been alarmed! What in the world has happened?"

He looked out of the door as he spoke.

"That's him!—there he is! I see him!" cried a voice. "This way! He's caught at last!"

"Is he?" said Dick, and as he spoke, he slammed shut the door of No. 8 and turned the key in the lock in a moment.

At the same time, his hand came in contact with a chain, which he placed across it, and then he shot the bolts at the top and bottom of the door.

By the time he had done this, the footsteps paused on the outside, and some heavy blows were rained upon the door.

"Open in the King's name!" cried a loud voice. "Dick Turpin, you are known, and we call upon you to surrender! If you resist, your death will be on your own head!"

To this formula the highwayman paid no sort of attention.

He looked around him anxiously

His heart fluttered strangely within his breast.

Had he been alone, the case would have been desperate; still, he would have stood a better chance of making his escape.

Now that he was hampered with Black Bess, however, his capture seemed certain, without he chose to abandon her, and that was what Dick would not be likely to do under any circumstances.

But, imprisoned in that narrow space, and with many persons in the house besides, what was he to do?

A little oil lamp placed upon a bracket near the foot of the staircase gave forth a slight amount of illumination—sufficient, however, to show Dick that there were two doors close at hand.

By the time he had made this discovery, the officers, finding no notice was taken of their summons to surrender, sent a couple of bullets crashing through the front door.

Both whistled close by Turpin's head, but he was lucky enough to escape injury from either.

They buried themselves in the woodwork of the staircase, and made a couple of lawyers' clerks, who had partially descended, run up the staircase again, with more activity than they had ever used in their lives before.

It was clearly certain death to remain for another moment where he now stood, and Turpin knew it.

The next bullet might put an end to his career; or if a volley was fired, he could not escape.

With a feeling of greater desperation in his mind than he had ever before experienced, he dashed open one of the inner doors of which we have spoken.

He led Black Bess in quickly after him, and closed it.

With nimble fingers, he secured it in every way he was able.

He could only guess what kind of place he was in, for he was surrounded now by the profoundest darkness.

This lasted, however, but a second.

A door was suddenly flung open.

A brilliant light—for such, by comparison with the darkness, it seemed to be—streamed in, and Turpin beheld the figure of a man within a few paces of him.

He was rather stout in the body, but his legs were ridiculously thin.

His face was so puffed out with fat that it seemed an almost flat surface.

His mouth was wide open, and as he gazed upon the extraordinary apparition of a man and a horse so close to him, his eyes goggled in a manner that was fearful to behold.

A tremendous crash making Turpin aware that the outer door had been broken in, reminded him that he had not an instant to lose, and that his life and liberty hung upon the events of the next five minutes.

CHAPTER DCIV.

DICK TURPIN GROWS APPREHENSIVE CONCERNING THE FATE OF HIS THREE COMRADES.

STRIDING forward, and leading Black Bess by the bridle, Dick Turpin advanced towards the inner room.

The fat lawyer, who somehow with his thin arms and thin legs looked like some huge spider, gradually retreated.

Entering this inner room, Turpin, with the rapidity of lightning, closed the door and secured it.

"Sit still," he exclaimed, addressing the lawyer, "and you are safe—no harm shall come to you! But I am a desperate man, and if you interfere in the least degree with my movements, the consequences will be serious, for, rather than be taken, I would blow your brains out on the spot!"

Alarmed by this threatening speech, which was uttered with menacing tones and gestures, the lawyer staggered back till he came to the chair, which he sank into with such suddenness that it almost knocked the breath out of his body, and made the chair creak ominously.

"Sit there," cried Dick, "and you will be unhurt."

The uproar outside was now perfectly prodigious.

Heavy blows were struck upon the second door, which, being only of an ordinary character, was quickly demolished.

The dense throng intent upon the capture of the bold highwayman pressed on, and, flushed with the success they had already met with in overcoming the various obstacles in their way, they commenced an attack upon the door opening into the room in which Dick Turpin then was.

With great rapidity, and yet without an exhibition of any great agitation, the highwayman, after having satisfied himself by one glance that there was no door leading out of the chamber he had now entered, made his way towards the window, which was protected on the inside by wooden shutters.

He removed the fastenings with as much ease as he would have done had he been accustomed to the task.

Flinging them open, the window was disclosed.

A cry of joy then came from Turpin's lips.

As he had hoped, and yet hardly dared to expect, the window was one of those which looked into Chancery Lane.

The street was before him, and he was divided from it only by a few panes of glass.

The window was one of a kind that was common enough in those days, though seldom seen now.

It did not slide up and down in a groove as windows now generally do, nor open like folding doors, but one half could be pushed back.

This was a favourable event indeed.

Without the slightest hesitation, Dick pushed open the window in the manner we have described.

Then, to the astonishment of the lawyer, Dick gave one bound, and seated himself in the saddle.

He backed Black Bess as close against the wall opposite the window as he possibly could, and then uttered that low, chirping cry which the noble creature knew so well.

It was while that sound was issuing from Turpin's lips that the door was dashed down by the police officers.

They heard a clatter and a terrific rush; but before they could recover themselves sufficiently to look round them and make out what it was, Black Bess, at one bound, had leaped through the window, and alighted in the street.

She stumbled slightly as she descended, but did not fall.

With cries of rage and anger, the police officers clustered round the open window.

All those who happened to have firearms in their hands fired at the dusky forms of the highwayman and his steed.

But the movements of Black Bess were too quick for any danger to result from these.

Dick now flattered himself that all was well.

But a clattering sound in the rear made him aware that he should have some trouble yet.

Looking back, he saw another party of police officers, all mounted, coming at a rapid pace round the corner of Carey Street.

They were not more than two hundred yards behind him.

The loud shout they all set up let him know at once that he was seen.

But Black Bess, who had been much excited, and, indeed, terrified by the strange nature of the events which had lately taken place, required no urging to make good speed.

No sooner did she feel that she was in the open street, and that the reins were hanging loosely upon her neck, than she sped onwards at a speed that would have terrified a less desperate rider than was on her back.

Shooting across Holborn, Dick quickly gained the open country.

He made his way in a straight line for the little eminence upon which he had left his three comrades with such strict injunctions to wait there until his return.

He was not long in reaching this place; and when he gained it, so extraordinary had been the speed put forth by Black Bess on this occasion, that the police officers were completely out of sight.

Dick reined her in with some difficulty

Having brought her to a standstill, he looked round anxiously, but he failed to catch a glimpse of his three friends.

He whistled shrilly, but no response came to the signal.

"What can be the meaning of this?" muttered Turpin. "What can have occurred? Although so much has taken place, I have not been away so long as I expected; and the country seems quiet enough all round. Surely they cannot have been disturbed! Where are they?"

He whistled again, but with no better result than before.

"They must have considered it best to return to the Chase," he said, at length; but the tone in which he spoke showed how doubtful he felt about the matter.

"We have had one more escape, Bess!" he exclaimed, patting his mare upon the neck. "You have saved me on this occasion, for without you I should by this time have been a prisoner."

He paused.

Very faintly there came upon his ears a far-off sound, which he knew well enough foretold the approach of his enemies.

"They come, my lass!" he cried, "but they will not overtake us! There is a long gallop before you, old girl, but it must be taken. No doubt I shall find them all in Enfield Chase."

So saying, Dick once more allowed Black Bess to proceed.

She seemed glad enough to avail herself of the permission, and galloped on as rapidly as before.

Very soon that faint sound which Dick had heard became inaudible.

At such a pace, the distance intervening between there and his destination was quickly passed over.

As nearly as he could recollect, he went back by the same route that Tom King had taken.

He met no one in his furious gallop—saw no one—nor was he able to find any trace of his three companions.

It was strange. But although he had made the arrangement with them to retire if needful, and although there was every probability that they were safely beneath the trees, he nevertheless experienced a great amount of uneasiness.

At last the borders were reached.

But all was silent. There was not one of them here on the watch for his return.

"If they are in the Chase at all," he muttered, "they will be in the little dell where we stayed last, but my mind misgives me."

It was not possible to proceed to the place he had mentioned while seated in the saddle, in consequence of the low, straggling branches that extended horizontally from some of the trees.

Therefore he dismounted, and led Black Bess after him.

A little more than a quarter of an hour's walk brought him to the brink of the little excavation.

All was dark and silent here as well.

He whistled again, but, as before, there was no response to his friendly call.

Finding his forebodings realised so far, he became filled with apprehension.

Still, he resolved to satisfy himself whether they were there or not, and so rapidly descended.

He reached the bottom, and though the place was so dark, yet he could see about with tolerable distinctness.

It was quite certain that his three companions were not there.

"What can have happened?" he asked. "Where can they be? After such strict injunctions as I gave, surely they would not remove without good cause! This is worst of all. Not only am I filled with apprehension, but valuable time is being lost, when we ought to be occupied in arranging our proceedings for the future."

He remained for a few moments in deep thought, and then bent his steps towards the border of the Chase.

To attempt any kind of search among the trees for his companions would, he knew, be perfectly useless; and, moreover, he was tolerably certain that, unless compelled, they would not take up their quarters anywhere save in the little dell.

What to do now, in order to rejoin them, he knew not.

He fancied that something of a most disastrous character had taken place. Perhaps they had all been captured.

"I didn't think to look," he muttered, "when I was on the hill, or I might have satisfied myself as to whether an encounter had taken place upon that spot. I will return there. Perhaps their absence was only temporary. I may find them waiting for me if I go back."

This was certainly what might be considered a forlorn hope, yet it was the only one that suggested itself to the highwayman's mind, and so he seized upon it with the avidity with which a drowning man would clutch at a straw.

Once more springing into the saddle, he directed his mare's steps toward the meeting place.

These rides were attended with no trifling amount of risk, and he knew it.

Some prying eye might perceive him going backwards and forwards, and their retreat would be discovered.

But for the fact of all the officers being concentrated around the prison of Newgate, it is quite certain he would not have met with so little interruption.

Once more, then, he was fortunate in reaching the little hill.

He was disappointed in his hope of seeing his companions there awaiting him.

The place was quite deserted.

He dismounted, and searched all around upon the ground in order to ascertain whether a struggle had taken place there, and after some time he was forced to the conclusion that a struggle had taken place.

There were evident marks of it upon the ground, for the turf was torn up, particularly in one spot, as though by the hoofs of horses.

"I fear one has been captured," said Dick, with a sigh. "I will try to hope not all. One surely has escaped! What shall I do?"

No answer to this question presented itself to his mind.

"Deprived of their assistance," he continued, "what shall I do? This is a misfortune I did not apprehend. It would have been better if the original arrangement had been carried out."

He paced up and down with uneasy strides.

"If my enemies will let me," he said at length, "I will stay here for some time longer yet, for there may be some slight chance of their return. They will rejoin me if possible. Yes, I will wait!"

Finding that all round him was perfectly still, and that there were no signs of his foes in the vicinity, Dick loosened the saddle girths, and removed the bit from Black Bess's mouth.

Then he flung himself down at full length upon the grass to wait.

He did not seat himself in the saddle, because he did not wish to fatigue his mare needlessly.

Slowly and drearily the night passed away.

The colour of the sky gradually changed to a dull, leaden tint, and then at last morning broke.

By slow and almost imperceptible degrees the different objects all around were brought into view.

Anxiously did Dick Turpin turn his eyes in every direction, but they were not gladdened by perceiving the approach of those he so wished to see.

He remained thus until the manifest danger of staying longer in that spot compelled him to remove, and again he galloped in the direction of Enfield Chase, this time without daring to indulge in the hope that he should meet his companions there.

CHAPTER DCV.

ELUCIDATES THE MYSTERY OF THE DISAPPEARANCE OF DICK TURPIN'S THREE COMPANIONS.

LEAVING Dick Turpin to make his way to Enfield Chase, we will return to the little eminence upon which it had been arranged Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack should remain until the return of their captain.

All three remained quite immovable, and watched Dick until the darkness hid him from their view.

Some moments were passed in silence, and then, with a slight shiver, Claude Duval said:

"It's confoundedly cold here, comrades! If we have to stop here very long, we shall be frozen to death."

"You may depend you will have to remain here some time," replied Tom King. "A journey from here to London and back will not be performed in five minutes."

"True enough!" said Sixteen-String Jack, with a laugh.

"Now," said Claude, "let us try whether we can reckon how long Dick will be away. Supposing he should meet with no interruption, how long do you think it would take him to get to Lincoln's Inn?"

"Quite half an hour."

"So I should say; and then we must allow another half hour to obtain a cloak, then an hour for his interview with the lawyer, and half an hour back, making altogether two hours and a half."

"It is not a very pleasant prospect to look forward to."

"By no means! It is certain that we must remain here for two hours and a half, at the very least—most likely more."

"It is cold," remarked Tom King. "Quite a sharp frost seems to have set in."

"That's it!" exclaimed Claude. "Now, I suppose you can guess tolerably well to what point my remarks are tending?"

"I can give a guess," replied Tom.

"And so could Jack. What I propose is, that we ride off to a little distance, and try to fall in with an adventure."

"But that is direct disobedience to orders."

"I know that."

"Then let us stay here."

"To what good?" asked Claude. "We are not mere machines, are we? We have some discretion allowed us!"

"Certainly."

"Then no harm can result from the carrying out of my suggestion. You admit that at least two hours and a half must elapse before Dick can possibly return. Wherever we go, we will take care to be here before that time has expired."

"If we could make sure of doing that, I would not mind giving my consent to the expedition," said Tom King, "for I can assure you I relish the idea of remaining here no better that you do yourself."

"We will make up our minds to that effect," said Claude. "We can do it if we like."

"I should not like Dick to return first."

"Nor I. It would be very disagreeable."

"Very."

"But that is a needless apprehension."

"There is the danger to be considered," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"It is no more than remaining here, that I can see," returned Claude, "and perhaps not quite so much! But come, it is no good wasting time by standing here talking the matter over! In a word—will you go or not?"

"I will go, for one!" answered Tom.

"And so will I!" added Jack.

"Hurrah, then! We shall be able to pass the time in a much more pleasant manner than I expected. An adventure will be useful as well, for I suppose the affair of Maud's will run away with some of the money we had agreed to use for our original purpose."

"You may depend upon that!"

"Then there is all the more reason why we should look out for something extra."

"There is."

"Come, then—forward! We will agree to be back here in precisely two hours' time, and then all will be well!"

The three highwaymen, having first taken a long look about them, left the little eminence, and struck off across the country in a north-easterly direction.

In a little while they came to one of the principal roads leading from the metropolis.

Here they did not doubt they should be successful in meeting with a good booty, because travellers are always entering and leaving London at all points.

Having gained the high-road, the three highwaymen proceeded along it at a walk, in order to be in readiness as soon as they appeared, and also in order that the sounds made by their own horses' steps should not interfere with the faint clatter on the highway which would indicate the approach of a traveller.

[THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN SUSPEND THE LANDLORD AND THE JEW FROM THE CEILING.]

All their weapons were in good order and perfect readiness.

They had looked to them while on the little eminence so often mentioned.

Now, however, to make assurance doubly sure, they examined them.

By the time this was done, Tom King cried out;

"Halt! Listen! I thought I heard a horse!"

He was instantly obeyed, and then it was found that the well-practiced ears of the highwayman had not deceived him.

"A single traveller is coming!" exclaimed Claude Duval—"there can be no doubt about that!"

"None," said Sixteen-String Jack; "nor can there be any doubt that all he carries with him will be ours. He would be mad to resist such an overwhelming force!"

No. 129.—Black Bess.

Our friends waited patiently for the traveller to draw nearer.

Whoever it was that was coming, he appeared to be in no hurry.

Sometimes his horse would go for a few moments at a trot, then the pace would subside into a walk, but only to break out into a trot again.

This was strange and out of the usual way, so, as a matter of course, our friends became doubly attentive.

A few more minutes elapsed, and then, by straining their eyes, they were able to make out a dusky-looking mass, which presently resolved itself into a horse and rider.

"Claude," said Tom, in a whisper, "just look at him! Is not that very odd?"

"Very."

"What can be the cause or meaning of it?"

"I am quite at a loss to say. Ha, by Jove, he's off!"

"No he isn't!" said Jack. "He's all right once more!"

These remarks were made in allusion to the movements of the traveller, which were certainly very eccentric and dangerous too.

He swayed about in the saddle from side to side and backwards and forwards in such a manner, that it seemed for a moment as though he must fall to the ground.

On each occasion, however, he recovered his balance.

As he came still closer, the highwaymen noticed that the traveller's horse looked angry and impatient.

At every opportunity he would break into a trot, and then his rider would sink suddenly backwards, thus drawing the reins tight, and reducing the horse's speed to a walk.

This was so extraordinary a sight, that in the curiosity they felt in gazing upon it, the highwaymen well-nigh forgot their original intention, and almost allowed the traveller to pass by.

"Now," said Tom—"forward! We will cry 'Stand and deliver!' to him, at any rate."

With these words, Tom King touched his horse slightly with the spur, so that he gave a sudden bound forward.

"Halt!" he cried. "Pull up at once! Your money or your life!"

Either by accident or design, the eccentric traveller leaned back in the saddle, and his horse, feeling the sudden check, stopped at once.

At the same instant Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack placed themselves on either side of him.

"Now," they cried, presenting their pistols to him, "hand over to us every article of value you possess! Make haste, for we have no time to lose!"

"Yes, make haste!" repeated Sixteen-String Jack.

The traveller looked at his assailants with a vacant, puzzled expression.

"Hic!" he said—"take it easy! We're all right, you know—here's one more cup before we part, my friends—one last bumper!"

"Why, he's drunk!" said Tom King.

"Drunk!" repeated the traveller, with another hiccup as he caught the word. "I'm not drunk—I'm sober enough! Who says I'm drunk? Show me the man that says it, and I'll call him a liar!"

Claude Duval replaced his pistol in his belt, and drew his sword.

He flourished the glittering blade in a threatening manner before the traveller's eyes.

Then he presented the point to his neck, and pressed with just sufficient force upon the hilt to cause the weapon to pierce the skin.

"Do you feel that?" asked Claude. "It's a sword, and if you don't hand over everything you've got at once, you're a dead man!"

These words produced an effect quite different to what the highwayman expected.

With a gurgling kind of cry, the traveller, jerking himself back to escape the point of his sword, lost his balance, and fell with a crash into the roadway.

Luckily, Tom King had taken hold of the horse by the bridle, so that he kept him quite still.

With a light laugh, Claude sheathed his sword and dismounted.

Stooping down over the now insensible traveller, he quickly transferred to his own pockets every article of value he carried about with him.

Then, taking hold of the body, he dragged it across the highway, and placed it in a half-sitting posture against the bank upon which the hedge was planted.

"Tie his horse up, Tom!" he cried. "We don't want that!"

"No; it would be an incumbrance rather than otherwise at the present moment. I will fasten the rein to a branch of this tree, and leave the animal to take his luck."

"That will be decidedly the best. Make haste! This adventure has been so easy, and at the same time so profitable, that it makes me exceedingly anxious to have another."

In a few minutes they had all remounted, and were trotting along the road again, still keeping in the direction of the country.

No more sounds came upon their ears, but, after having gone a considerable distance, they suddenly caught sight of something dim and dusky on the high-road before them.

It almost looked like some dense, black cloud.

"What's that?" said Tom King, slackening his speed.

Neither of his comrades could form any idea; but, as if by a kind of instinct, they slackened their pace also.

While speculating upon what this strange object on the highway before them could be, a slight jingling sound struck upon their ears.

"Dragoons!" exclaimed Tom King. "I am sure of it!"

"Yes," said Sixteen-String Jack, "there can be no doubt about it! Shall we turn and fly?"

"Yes."

"Be quick! it will be madness to linger here or to advance! Quick—quick, I say! they are already in motion!"

It was indeed a troop of dragoons, drawn up in the road a little way beyond.

The night being cold, they had enveloped themselves as closely as possible in thick cloaks they carried, and this is the reason the highwaymen failed to perceive the glitter of their accoutrements.

But for the accidental jingling sound caused by one of the horses moving, they would probably have remained ignorant of their danger until too late.

As for the dragoons, they had, of course, heard the three horsemen approaching.

Of this they took no very particular notice, for the probability was, that they were ordinary travellers, in which case they would simply have challenged them, and allowed them to ride on.

But when they found that the approaching riders, instead of continuing their pace, gradually slackened it, and finally came to a standstill altogether, their suspicions began to be aroused.

They were quite confirmed when, immediately afterwards, they heard our friends turn round and fly.

"There's some one afraid to meet us—that's certain," cried the officer in command. "Forward, my lads! we will give chase! It will be an agreeable diversion after our lonely watch; it will warm our blood a little too. Forward! I doubt whether they are better mounted than ourselves. Push on! whip and spur! we shall overtake them!"

At a furious gallop, the troop of dragoons flew along the highway after our friends.

They found in a little while that it would be necessary for them to urge their horses to make their best speed; the dragoons were much too close to be pleasant.

"On—on!" cried Tom King; "they are well mounted, and they are frightfully close behind!"

Just as he spoke, the discharge of a number of firearms reached their ears.

The volley had been fired by the order of the captain of dragoons, not that he thought any particular effects would follow it, except that the highwaymen might be intimidated.

In spite of the difficulty of taking aim, and although our friends were almost out of range, yet Tom King, who happened to be a little in the rear of his two friends, felt a bullet whistle past him in most unpleasant proximity.

A few bounds of his horse, however, took him out of danger.

By voice and spur, the highwaymen urged their horses to the utmost, and they flew onwards with terrific speed.

But it would not do to continue their present course for any great length of time, for they were going direct for London.

Suddenly, to their astonishment, the sounds which came from their pursuers ceased.

They wondered what could be the cause of it, but were unable to form any idea.

That from some cause or other the dragoons had stopped was, however, quite certain, and they resolved to make the most they could of the opportunity of increasing still more the distance there was between them.

Coming to a cross-road, they turned down it, and then took every lane or road they met with on their left hand; so that, by the time they had gone some little distance, their course had been so erratic, that it would be a matter of the utmost difficulty for their pursuers to follow them.

Just as they were congratulating themselves upon having got out of reach of their enemies, Tom King felt his horse trembling under him, and with so much violence that he seemed in danger of sinking to the ground.

CHAPTER DCVI.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN BECOME SPECTATORS OF A SINGULAR SCENE.

BEFORE we go any further, it will be best to explain how and why it was the troop of dragoons so suddenly abandoned the chase.

It was caused by a serious yet simple accident.

Anxious in the extreme to overtake the highwaymen, the officer in command kept some few yards in advance of his men, not only because he was anxious to be the first to come up with the fugitives, but because he knew very well his presence in front would be an incentive to his men to try their best to endeavour to keep up with him.

But his horse, in consequence of some obstruction or other in the road, suddenly stumbled, and then fell to the ground with a terrific crash, carrying his rider with him.

For a moment, the captain lay stunned upon the ground, and then, recovering himself, he attempted to rise.

His horse made an effort at the same time.

Then the dragoons, who were only a few yards behind their commander, perceiving the accident which had taken place, endeavoured to rein-in their horses.

But the animals had got their speed up to such a pitch, that they could not stop themselves instantaneously, although their riders tried their best.

The consequence of this was, that the captain was struck down by the foremost horse's hoofs, just as he was rising from the ground.

With a heavy groan, he fell at full length, and lay in a bruised and mangled mass at the feet of the horses.

The greatest consternation and dismay of course took place, and all thoughts of continuing the pursuit were abandoned.

The condition of their leader required the whole of their attention.

Hastily dismounting, his men crowded eagerly around him, anxious to render all the assistance that lay in their power.

The captain was not dead; but the injuries he had received about the head were of such a frightful character that it was not possible he could survive more than a few minutes longer.

He groaned heavily.

One of his men raised him up a little, and this change of position apparently eased him somewhat.

"Now—now, my lads!" he gasped, catching his breath painfully between every word—"don't stop here looking after me. Follow the rascals! Don't let them escape! Oh, mercy, my head!—my poor head! This pain is more than I can bear!"

With these words the captain lapsed into a state of insensibility, which really was a mercy, for it made him oblivious of his frightful agony.

His men at first thought he was dead.

"This is a sad affair!" said one. "What had we better do?"

"It is not much good our thinking of pursuing those rascals now. This interruption, trifling as it is, will enable them to get far away, and they would take so many turnings and windings in their course, that it would be next to impossibility for us to get upon their track."

"Well, then, it is agreed that we abandon the chase altogether, and turn the whole of our attention to the captain?"

"Yes; I think we shall be more applauded if we do that."

We have mentioned this incident simply that the reader should understand how and why it was the chase came so abruptly to a conclusion.

With the dragoons and their dying captain we have, of course, no more to do; our duty is to follow the highwaymen.

Tom King noticed the trembling of his steed with much alarm.

"I fear my horse has been wounded," he exclaimed. "Wait a moment; I will see."

Tom King sprang from the saddle as he uttered these words, and anxiously commenced an examination of his steed.

He passed his hand rapidly over the whole of his coat, and presently felt something wet and sticky.

"It is as I feared!" he exclaimed; "he is wounded! Perhaps it was that shot that I heard whistle past me that did the mischief."

"Is the hurt serious?" asked Claude Duval.

"I can't tell yet."

"I should think it cannot be," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack, "or we should not have come so far without discovering it. You may depend it's a mere scratch, and nothing more."

"I hope it will prove so."

A closer examination showed that Sixteen-String Jack's supposition was perfectly correct.

The wound was a slight one.

The bullet had done little more than graze the skin, and yet it had penetrated deeply enough into the flesh to cause the blood to flow freely.

"It is quite insignificant," said Claude—"a little cold water and a small bandage is all that we require."

"But how shall we get them?"

"That we must consider. Look around. What can you see?"

"There appears to be no habitation in sight," said Sixteen-String Jack; "but doubtless, if we went a little further along the road, we should come to some cottage where they will gladly give us the things we need."

"That seems to me to be our only course," said Tom King, "and I see no difficulties in the way of adopting it; for we may safely say that the dragoons have abandoned the pursuit."

"It is certain we can hear nothing of them."

"Come, then, my friends, mount, and I will lead my steed by the bridle until we come to a suitable habitation."

"Nay—nay!" exclaimed Claude and Jack, "we will give our cattle a rest as well; we will all three walk together."

To this Tom King made no kind of opposition.

In this manner they walked along the highway—or, rather, the broad country road—until, presently, passing round a bend in it, they came in sight of a small cottage.

It was one of those pretty little dwellings scattered all over England, and which are mostly to be met with on the outskirts of some small town or village.

It was situated in a very lonely spot, for no other dwelling-place appeared in sight.

"This will suit us nicely!" exclaimed Tom King, as they drew near. "We need not fear any interruption; and surely no one would refuse to give us the simple articles we require."

"We will ask them, at any rate."

The little cottage stood several paces back from the road, and was surrounded by a pretty little garden that was divided from the roadside by a picturesque wooden paling.

There was a little gate in this paling, and a narrow path leading up to the cottage door.

Our friends opened the gate, and led their horses through it.

Their impression was, from the silence that had reigned all around, that this cottage was the abode of peace and happiness.

But, as they drew near, they found they were deceived in their expectation.

Loud and angry voices reached their ears.

"Halt!" said Tom King, in a whisper. "We had better creep forward and reconnoitre a little, I think."

"The horses may remain where they are," said Claude; "they won't move. All three of us then will be able to approach, and find out what is going on. My curiosity is thoroughly roused."

"And mine."

With stealthy steps, the three highwaymen took their way along the remainder of the path, and at length paused at the cottage window.

The caution they had made use of was superfluous, for, had they led their horses to the door, the sounds would have been unheeded by the inmates of the cottage, so intently were they occupied.

Peeping through, the first thing that presented itself to their view was the form of a tall, stout, burly man, with a harsh, forbidding countenance.

He was speaking in loud tones.

"Once more," he cried, "I ask you what you will do? Give me your answer, and quickly, for I can't stay dallying here!"

These words were addressed to a woman, who looked about sixty years of age; but the probability was she was much younger, for grief and privation had wrought the effects which time produces.

She had on a widow's cap, and her plain black dress, though old and patched, nevertheless preserved an air of neatness and cleanness.

She was weeping bitterly.

"A little more time!" she exclaimed, in reply to the man who had addressed her,—"only give me a little more time, and I will pay you all I owe!"

"Time!" responded the other, angrily. "I have already been too forbearing! I have listened to your entreaties times out of number! What has been the result? Every week you have got deeper and deeper into my debt, and I can't afford to let you live in a house of mine rent-free!"

"I don't wish any such favour at your hands, Mr. Grimes; but you know as well as I do all the circumstances of the past, and understand quite well my unfortunate position. Still, I repeat, if you will only give me time, you shall have all!"

"But I will wait no longer! You see, in anticipation of your inability to pay the rent, I have brought the broker with me. Come forward, Samuels!"

In obedience to these words, a third person presented himself to the view of the highwaymen.

He had been either standing or sitting near the door, and in consequence of his having occupied this position, they had been unable to see him earlier.

Now, with a crouching, submissive air, he crept behind the landlord.

By his name he was evidently a Jew, though in personal appearance he presented little of the peculiar features generally possessed by his race.

But his voice as well as his name proclaimed his nationality.

"Yesh, Mishter Grimes—I'sh here!"

"Very good! Make an inventory of this furniture, and put down what you consider to be its value."

"Yesh, sir, I will."

There was a momentary silence after the issue of this mandate, which was only broken by the sobs and tears of the poor widow.

"You see, Mrs. Russell," said the landlord, Mr. Grimes, —"you see, I am quite in earnest this time. I have let you off before, but I can do so no longer. The various things you have in this house will, if I take them all and sell them, produce just about enough to pay the amount of rent you owe me, but not the expenses. They will have to be defrayed by me."

'Surely you will not be so hard?" moaned the widow. "If you take from us what few things I have, let me ask you what can I do?"

"The fault is all your own," said the landlord, with a peculiar glance. "You understand me?"

The widow shuddered.

"Where is Mary?"

"Thank Heaven, she is away," was the reply—"she has gone over to the village."

"Indeed! Rather a late hour for her to be out, I should think! But that is no business of mine. Now, still to show I meant what I said, I will renew my offer. Consent to it, and you shall be troubled for rent no more!"

"Never!" cried the widow, firmly—"never! Not if I knew that the immediate consequence of my refusal would be my being driven forth into the streets!"

"And that will be the consequence!" replied Mr. Grimes, angrily. "But I have threatened you so long, and have not carried out my threats, that you don't believe I am in earnest. You will discover your error very quickly. Samuels!"

"Yesh, sir?"

"Go on with your inventory, and come in the morning with your cart to take the things away."

"I am, Mishter Grimes; but, s'help me, Moses, the tings are hardly worth a penny."

"Go on. When you have put them all down, let me know the amount."

The widow still wept and wrung her hands.

Mr. Grimes, with his hands clasped behind him, paced up and down the little room.

Pausing suddenly before the widow, he bent forward, and said something in such a low tone that it did not reach the ears of the highwaymen outside.

But the widow shrunk back in evident disgust.

"Never!" she exclaimed. "You may take my answer—I shall give no other! I would rather starve by the wayside than live by my daughter's shame!"

The landlord turned away with anger gleaming from his eyes.

"Enough, woman—enough!" he exclaimed. "You shall know no mercy now! I have put up with you so long, you despise my threats, but I will show I am in earnest! Samuels, curse you, have you made that inventory yet?"

"Very nearly, Mishter Grimes—very nearly. I have jusht got to take a peep into this little back room."

There were no upstairs rooms in the cottage, but only two on the ground floor.

One was where the scene we have just described took place; the other was rudely and scantily furnished as a bed-room.

It did not take Mr. Samuels more than a moment to make an inventory of all the bed-room contained.

"Now, then, what's the amount?" asked the landlord, sharply.

"Oh! s'help me, Moses! such a lot of tings I never did see: they are worth just noting at all: howshumever, I will reckon 'em up."

The Jew made his calculation, and then said:

"Three poundsh five ish the utmosht, Mishter Grimes; that'sh putting everyting down at the utmosht value."

"Three pounds five!" repeated the landlord. "And you," he continued, addressing the widow, "owe me three pounds ten. I am almost too late, it seems, Mr Samuels."

"Yesh, Mishter Grimes."

"I intended, first of all, to let these things remain here till morning; indeed, I did not know that she would carry her obstinacy so far; but since she has defied me, I will show no mercy. Bundle the things out into the garden at once. I'll watch them while they are there, and you can go and fetch a horse and cart to take them away."

"Certingly, Mishter Grimes; I will do sho at once."

The Jew shuffled about, and quickly gathered several of the articles of furniture close together.

Oh! how the poor widow wept when she saw every household requisite thus relentlessly swept away.

Surely her sufferings were enough to have made an impression on a heart of stone.

Mr. Grimes stood by unmoved.

"Now, Samuels," he cried, "open the door, and bundle them out! Stay a minute, I'll give her one more chance."

"Yesh, Mishter Grimes. You ish too good, you ish—mush too good; you vill get imposhed on."

"Now, then," cried the landlord, addressing the widow, "for the last time I repeat the offer I made you some time back, and which you have since so foolishly refused. You don't deserve such a chance, still I give it. Will you consent to my terms? If so, this debt shall be cancelled. You shall live in this cottage rent free. I will even go further—I will allow you something towards your support."

Although reduced to this last extremity, the widow never wavered or hesitated in the least.

In the same firm tones that she had hitherto empolyed, and with scorn and abhorrence perceptible in her voice, she cried:

"No!—again, ten thousand times no! Not if I had to suffer more than any human being has suffered yet!"

"Very good!" said Mr. Grimes, as he turned upon his heels. "Bundle the things out, Samuels!"

"Yesh, Mishter Grimes."

As he spoke, the Jew caught up a couple of chairs and went towards the door.

He was saved the trouble of opening it.

It was dashed back upon its hinges with considerable violence, and the three highwaymen appeared on the threshold.

"Put those chairs down, Samuels!" cried Tom King, "or you will be better acquainted with Moses in one minute than you have been all your life!"

CHAPTER DCVII.

IN WHICH THE LANDLORD AND THE JEW MEET WITH THEIR DESERTS.

The Jew uttered a loud cry, and, staggering back several paces, dropped the chairs to the ground.

It was only natural that he should be alarmed.

There could be no mistaking the meaning of what Tom King had said, and, moreover, he was terrified by the sight of their pistols, which were presented full in his face.

He did not cease his retreat until he had managed to get behind Mr. Grimes, the landlord.

That individual, however, was no less terrified than the Jew, and a struggle took place between them as to who should face the highwaymen.

Our friends entered the cottage without hesitation, and closed the door behind them.

By an effort, Mr. Grimes summoned up courage enough to speak.

"Who are you?" he cried. "What do you want? Be off—this house is mine, and you have no right in it!"

"Never mind about rights!" said Claude Duval. "We are here! We have overheard the whole of your conversation, and are aware of your business!"

"Business?"

"Yes; it is no good for you to attempt to put on a bold demeanour, or to deny anything! I tell you again we have heard all!"

"And if you have, what business is it of yours? Begone, I say, or I will call for assistance!"

"You had better not speak any louder than I am speaking now!" said Tom King. "If you do, you will find the consequences most unpleasant!"

"But why should you interfere?" asked Mr. Grimes. "I am here doing that which the law allows me! This woman owes me my rent and cannot pay, so, of course, I take her things!"

"I am determined that you shall do nothing of the sort! You shall go down on your knees before her, and ask her pardon for the insult you have offered her!"

"Me?" said Mr. Grimes—"me kneel down? It is not likely!"

"You will alter your opinion before long, and you will write out a receipt in full discharge of all the rent owing to you up to the present moment!"

"I will do that, provided I get the money, but not without!"

"You will do it without!"

Mr. Grimes buttoned up his pockets as he said:

"I'll see you and all the rest of the world d—d first!"

While this angry dialogue was taking place, Sixteen-String Jack approached the widow and spoke to her.

"My good woman," he said, "is it true that you owe this man the amount of rent he says you do?"

"Yes," was the reply. "But who are you? Why do you interest yourself in the matter?"

"Never mind! We will befriend you from those two men! Let that be sufficient! What prospects have you of paying the money you owe?"

"Alas—none!"

"And have you any friends who will assist you?"

"None, sir, in this part of the country! They are many miles off! If I could rejoin them, perhaps all would be well!"

"Then, why not do so?"

"Why, being in his debt, Mr. Grimes would not allow me to leave the place?"

"I see—I see! And you have a daughter?"

"Yes—Mary."

"Just so! I have heard all about it, and quite comprehend! If you had a sum of money given to you, could you not make your way to the friends you have mentioned?"

"If Mr. Grimes was satisfied."

"You leave him to me. Dry your tears—be no longer under any alarm respecting yourself or your daughter either. I will consult with my companions as to what shall be done."

Wonderingly and half terrified, the widow looked at the three new comers, and marvelled why they should interest themselves so much in her affairs.

Going up to his two comrades, Sixteen-String Jack heard Mr. Grimes say:

"Curse you all! I don't care a fig for any one of you! The rent belongs to me, and, d—n me, I'll have it too! Or if I can't have the money, I'll take the goods! Samuels!"

"Y—y—yesh, Mishter Grimes!"

"Why the devil don't you obey my orders? Bundle all the things out into the garden at once!"

"Samuels," said Tom King, "without you are in a particular hurry to join your friend Moses, you had better stand quite still where you are now and say nothing!"

The Jew nodded his head, and did not offer to move.

Neither the landlord nor his agent possessed courage enough to attack the three well-armed men who stood before them.

They had a wholesome dread of firearms, and with their pistols, the highwaymen easily kept them in check.

In a rapid whisper, Sixteen-String Jack communicated the particulars he had learned from the widow, and added, in so low a tone that neither Grimes nor Samuels could hear what he said:

"I have thought of a plan by which we can serve these two rascals as they ought to be served, and by which we can render this widow and her daughter a very great service."

"How—how?"

Jack communicated his plan, but what it was need not be specified here;—it will be seen as the events take place.

"Excellent!" exclaimed both of his companions, as soon as he had done—"most excellent! That's what we will do to them!"

The alarm of the two men rapidly increased upon seeing the highwaymen in whispered consultation.

Sixteen-String Jack, turning to the widow, said:

"Have you any strong rope close at hand?"

"I have some rope, sir," was the reply, "but it is not particularly strong."

"Never mind! Bring it—let us see what it is like!"

The rope was brought, and the highwaymen found that it was neither thick nor strong—in fact, it was that kind generally used for domestic purposes.

But it was of considerable length—much longer indeed than they required, so that they were able to twist four pieces of rope together.

It was then quite as strong as they desired.

Mr. Grimes and Samuels, the Jew, grew more and more alarmed when a rope was mentioned and produced.

They did not know what the highwaymen intended to do, but apprehended the worst.

The rope was divided into necessary quantities, and then Tom King and Claude Duval, both with pistols in their hands, went up to the two trembling men.

Tom posted himself in front of the Jew, and Claude in front of the landlord.

"If you move or resist in the least, we will fire, so that your lives depend entirely upon your own actions!"

"But this is outrageous!" cried the landlord. "What is it you intend to do? By what right, I ask again, do you interfere in this matter at all?"

"Never mind troubling your head about such matters! Place your back against that of your friend the Jew! Do you hear? Jack, place them in the position you desire! We shall know what to do if they attempt to be unmanageable!"

Samuels, the Jew, was in such a terrible state of fright, that he scarcely knew what he was about.

The landlord was scarcely less terrified, though he endeavoured to assume the appearance of a courage that he had not.

Sixteen-String Jack placed both back to back, and then, with a piece of rope which he had provided and prepared expressly for that purpose, he bound their elbows tightly together.

So skilfully was this done, that no amount of wriggling or twisting would have enabled either men thus bound to set themselves at liberty.

They were so well joined together that a third party alone could separate them.

"You shall suffer for this!" cried the landlord. "Luckily, there is a law in the land, and I will have the law upon you!"

"You are quite welcome to do so," said Jack. "But we have not done with you yet!"

This speech excited fresh apprehensions in the breast of the two men, and they looked with the greatest anxiety, in order to see what it was that Jack intended to do next.

In the ceiling of the cottage were fixed several strong hooks, as is the custom in many country places.

One was near the centre, and upon this hook Sixteen-String Jack fixed his eye.

Taking up the other piece of rope, he swung it in his hands once or twice, and then threw it upwards.

The middle part fell just over the hook, and the two ends then reached almost to the floor.

Having found by trial that the rope would run over this hook almost as easily as it would over a pulley, Jack proceeded to carry out the latter part of his design.

At a word from him, his two comrades forced the landlord and the Jew to leave the spot where they had been standing, and place themselves immediately beneath the hook.

"Is it murder you intend to commit?" asked the landlord. "Help—murder!"

"Silence!" cried Claude. "Another such cry as that, and you are a dead man!"

Taking hold of one end of the rope which was hanging down from the ceiling, Sixteen-String Jack nimbly and firmly lashed it round and round the arms of the two men, and also round the rope by which they were tied together.

He finished by making a very strong knot, which he was quite sure would not give way, even if it had to support double the weight of the two men.

"Now," said Tom King, "you infernal rascals, we mean to let you off a great deal easier than you deserve; but yet, you will not like it very well after all. Now then, comrades, lay hold, and up they go!"

The three friends took hold of the end of the rope, and, with one sudden and united pull, drew the landlord and the Jew close up to the hook in the ceiling.

The manner in which the two villains kicked about and struggled was laughable in the extreme to witness.

The highwaymen burst out into a hearty roar, to the great danger of the objects of their mirth, for the rope slipped through their fingers, and they only caught it just in time to prevent Grimes and Samuels reaching the floor again.

The sudden jerk with which they were stopped made both utter a howl of pain.

Once more they were pulled up, until they reached their former elevation.

"Let me down!" cried the landlord—"let me down! I will go on my knees and ask her pardon, and write out a receipt, or do anything else you wish!"

"You speak too late!" said Tom King; "the chance we offered you has gone by. You must now take the consequences of your barbarity!"

Finding this appeal unheeded, Mr. Grimes broke out into a series of yells, in which he was ably seconded by the Jew.

It was in vain the highwaymen threatened to shoot them if they did not desist.

The next thing our friends had to do was to secure the rope in such a manner that the two rascals would be suspended with their heads about a foot from the ceiling.

They managed this very ingeniously by twisting the end of the rope they had got hold of round the arms of their two prisoners.

The knot was drawn tight, and then the highwaymen drew back several paces, in order to contemplate the strange spectacle before them.

Howling, kicking, and screaming, fruitlessly endeavouring to free themselves from their position, and inflicting upon each other really serious injuries, Messrs. Grimes and Samuels presented to our friends a sight which they enjoyed immensely.

The only effect which their violent struggles seemed to produce was that of tightening their bonds.

The poor widow gazed upon this extraordinary scene with the utmost amazement.

She was also rather terrified.

Then suddenly the door was thrown open, and a young girl, panting, and breathless, and exhausted, made her appearance on the threshold.

The widow sprang forward, and clasped her in her arms.

It was her daughter Mary, about whose safety she had begun to grow terribly apprehensive.

Having amused themselves sufficiently by watching the curious struggles of the landlord and his agent, the highwaymen went towards the widow.

"Oh! gentlemen," she exclaimed, "I am terrified to death!"

"Why?"

"Mr. Grimes is such a revengeful man, and when you are gone I tremble to think what will become of me!"

"Have no fears upon that head," said Tom King, in an assuring voice; "I will see to all that, provided you will attend to my instructions."

Mary looked from one to the other with the greatest surprise.

She could not comprehend the meaning of the scene at all.

"You said," exclaimed Jack, "that you were desirous of joining your friends. Look, here is money that will enable you to perform the journey. Take it: it is given freely. Set out at once. Leave this place for ever. We will take care that Mr. Grimes does not pursue you."

"And the furniture in the cottage?" said the widow.

"That you must leave, except such portable articles that you may be able to carry away with you. Let Mr. Grimes have the rest in discharge of the rent you owe him."

"I understand you, sir," said the widow, bursting into tears. "I am grateful—deeply grateful! Without some such means as you have given me, I could never have left this place, and the consequences of remaining while such a man as that had so much power over me are terrible to think of!"

"You will escape all that," said Tom King. "With the money you now have you can rejoin your friends easily. This is all the advice I have to give you. Get away from this place as soon as ever you possibly can."

"I cannot thank you as I should do!" said the widow.

"Nor do we wish to hear the expression of your gratitude. You have not a moment to spare. Leave this place, I say again, as quickly as you can, and do not pause to rest until you are far away."

"I will not—I will not! Farewell, gentlemen! the thanks and blessings of a poor widow and her helpless daughter are yours."

Sixteen-String Jack almost had to push the widow out of the cottage door, for she still continued her protestations of gratitude.

At last she departed.

By this time Grimes and the Jew had to some extent come to their senses, inasmuch as they no longer kicked and plunged in the manner they had done to their own personal discomfort.

The landlord burst forth into a torrent of curses.

"Let me down!" he cried—"let me down! if you don't, you shall suffer for this!"

"We defy you!" said Tom King. "You cannot get down without some one helps you, and we will take care that no one comes near to interfere!"

Another volley of curses.

"What do you mean to do with us, then?" he asked, at length.

"I will tell you. With my own ears I heard you say that your claim upon the widow amounted to three pounds ten. The Jew told you the value of the goods was three pounds five, from which, of course, it follows, as a matter of necessity, that the things are worth at least six pounds ten."

"Oh, s'help me Moses——" began the Jew.

"Silence!" cried Tom King. "Your turn will come presently."

"I don't agree with you," said Claude Duval, "about the value of these articles."

"Why not?"

"I shall make an inventory of them myself, and a valuation—I can judge very well what they are worth."

"What foolery is this?" asked the landlord.

"I fancy you will call it by another name in a little while," replied Tom King. "Our intentions can be summed up in a very few words, and I see no particular reason why you should not know them, so, if you will just pay attention for a minute or two, I will explain."

CHAPTER DCVIII

MOSES THE JEW FINDS LITTLE PROFIT IN TRADING ON THE PROPHETS.

Both the landlord and the Jew were exceedingly anxious to know what it was that Tom King had to say.

They could only conjecture their fate, and consequently they strongly desired to be relieved from their suspense.

"In the first place," said Tom King, "you must not think for a moment that I wish to interfere with you or trespass upon your rights. You are a landlord, and of course you ought to have your rent; but it seems to me you have allowed the widow to fall into arrears with her payments in order to obtain power over her which you would turn to the basest of uses!"

"And you see," said Sixteen-String Jack, chiming in, "we have given her the means of getting out of your reach; and in order that your anger may cool and your resentment also, we are going to leave you both tied up as you now are!"

Another volley of curses came from the landlord, and supplications for mercy from the Jew.

"It seems to me," said Claude, "that this cottage is situated in a very lonely spot. So far as I can see, there are no other habitations within sight of it, and the road does not seem to be at all a well-frequented one. You are therefore at liberty to make as much noise as you like, and call for assistance as loudly as you can bawl. I don't think anyone will be passing by during the night, and if so, they would be scared away by hearing such a terrible noise. In daylight, however, no doubt some one will approach, and you will then be cut down and set at liberty."

"But, curses!" cried the landlord, "am I to remain here strung up for nobody knows how many hours? My arms are almost off already!"

"Serve you right!" said Tom King. "You will get no pity from us, I can assure you. We most heartily detest you!"

"And," cried Claude Duval, "I intend, as I told you, to make a valuation of all the articles contained in this cottage! You will be at liberty to sell them, and whatever balance there is over and above the three pounds ten, which is owing to you, you must pay to the widow!"

The landlord muttered something which Claude could not catch.

"However, upon second thoughts, in order to put it out of your power to cheat the widow after we have gone, we will arrange matters thus:—I will estimate the value of the furniture—I will deduct from the amount three pounds ten, and the balance you must hand over to me."

"I call on Moses to witness," exclaimed the Jew, "that all the lot ish not worth more than three poundsh five!"

"We shall see!" said Claude. "I have a notebook somewhere! Ah, that will do!"

He produced a pocket-book as he spoke, and commenced making an inventory in due form.

If ever a valuer favoured a client by putting a high price upon all the articles, Claude Duval did.

We do not intend to specify all the items; but one or two will suffice.

"One deal table!" he cried, pretending to write down the words. "How much for that, comrades? That must be worth at least ten pounds!"

"Ten pounds!" cried Tom King—"that's the lowest penny of course! It would fetch that at any auction, I am certain!"

"Oh, Moses, hark at that!" exclaimed the Jew. "S'help me, Abraham, it wouldn't fesh five shillingsh!"

"Hold your row," said Claude, "and don't interfere with my business! Two chairs—two pounds ten!"

"Oh, holy Moses!" cried the Jew; "the manish mad!"

"This is a fine amusement for you, no doubt," cried Mr. Grimes, "but I don't see the fun of it!"

"I hardly expected you would!" said Claude Duval; "but you will in a little while, when I have done!"

In this way he went on enumerating every article there was in the place, and putting against it an amount that represented at least ten times its actual value.

Not a single article, however trifling and worthless, escaped his notice, and he came at last to two things which the Jew would never have thought of putting down.

"One iron hook fixed in ceiling," he cried—"ten shillings! Sundry yards of rope to ditto—one pound!"

Claude's two companions laughed lustily, but neither the landlord nor the Jew could see the joke.

"Now for the total amount," exclaimed Claude, who thereupon made a great show of adding up the various items.

"Sixty-five pounds ten shillings and sixpence!" he cried, at last; "that's the amount of my valuation, and I declare the articles to be thoroughly worth it."

"S'help me, Moses!" cried the Jew, "if ever I heard the like! Shixty-five poundsh ten shillingsh and shixpence! Oh, murder!"

"I suppose you will get to the end of your foolery in time!" said the landlord. "Let me warn you, however, that after the sweet comes the sour; and I will make you suffer severely for the manner in which you have treated me."

"All right!" said Tom King; "you can do just what you like."

"First of all, however," interrupted Claude Duval, "I shall require your attention to what I am going to say. I hope you clearly understand that you are left in full possession of all the goods and chattels in this cottage to sell the same, in order to realise the amount of your debt? We detain you in that pleasant and comfortable manner in order that you may not interfere with the motions of your late tenant and her daughter."

The landlord gnashed his teeth savagely.

"By your own showing," continued Claude Duval, "the amount owing to you is three pounds ten shillings, which is all that you can legally claim. That amount you will have; but, according to my valuation, the sale of all these things will produce sixty-five pounds ten shillings and sixpence. From this, deduct three pounds ten, and sixpence for expenses and costs, and you will find that the sum of sixty-two pounds remains, which you will be good enough to hand over to me at once."

"Oh, Jacob!" exclaimed the Jew. "Did anybody hear the like?"

"D—n your jokes!" said the landlord, "I have had enough of them! I have listened patiently to your rubbish because I could not help it. Now I hope you have reached the end of your foolery!"

"Not a bit of it!" said Claude. "It is no joke, as you will quickly find out! The balance of sixty-two pounds I must and will have! I collect it on behalf of the widow, to whom an advance has already been made."

"Take it, Claude—take it!" cried his two companions. "Get one of those five-and-twenty-shilling chairs! If you stand on one, you will be able to reach his pockets. Don't you see, the gentleman can't conveniently put his hands in his pockets himself, and so you will kindly save him the trouble!"

Claude laughed, for he enjoyed this scene, if anything, more heartily than his companions.

Placing the chair close to the suspended men, he sprang on to it, and with nimble fingers commenced an examination of the landlord's pockets.

In vain Mr. Grimes shouted, and screamed, and swore, and kicked—Claude was unmoved by all.

He discovered at last a pocket-book and a leathern bag, and in the same pocket from which he took the latter, he also found some loose silver.

"Here we are," he said. "I knew when it was represented to Mr. Grimes in a proper manner he would not object to pay the money, so here it is!"

The leathern bag contained a few guineas, and the pocket-book some bank-notes.

Claude counted all up, and said:

"Here is not sufficient; I must have the remainder. Here is only forty-two pounds; I want just twenty more."

"Thank goodness," said Mr. Grimes, "I have no more money about me to be plundered of!"

"Plundered, do you call it?" cried Claude, with an indignant air. "You don't wish to make me believe that you would retain possession of money to which you are not entitled? By no means! Just be good enough to tell me where I am to obtain the twenty pounds from!"

The Jew began by this time to realise that his life was in no particular danger, and consequently he enjoyed to some extent the mortification felt by Mr. Grimes at having to part with his money.

It would almost seem that the landlord was aware of this improper exhibition of feeling on the part of his agent, for he said:

"I have no more money, and I don't know how you are to get the balance, without you persuade Samuels to advance you the twenty pounds on the remainder of the goods."

"Twenty poundsh!" said the Jew, in a shrill, screaming voice, and commencing to kick and plunge most violently. "Oh, by the mother of Moses, what shall I do? Twenty poundsh! Why, Mishter Grimes, you knows' all the tings wouldn't fesh a five-pound note!"

"A very good thought," said Claude Duval. "The idea did not occur to me. Of course, an upright and conscientious Israelite like Mr. Samuels would not object a moment to do justice to a widow, nor to advance the money upon good security. Now, then, Samuels, hand over twenty pounds!"

"I call all the prophetsh to witnessh that I have not twenty ha'pence about me!" screamed the Jew, despairingly. "I haven't—I'll go down on my kneesh and swear it!"

"All right, Samuels! I make it a rule never to take a Jew's word, so I will just feel in your pockets."

Contrary to his expectations, Samuels allowed Claude Duval to feel in his pockets without offering the least resistance to his doing so.

Sure enough, a few coppers was all the highwayman was able to find.

"There you are, shentlemen—I hope you are shatishfied. How could a poor wretch like me have twenty poundsh? Whoever heard of sush a ting?"

"I have not done yet, my hook-nosed friend," said Claude. "All Jews are cunning, and I don't suppose you would keep your money in your pocket. Let me feel—it must be hidden somewhere."

"Oh! I call Aaron and all the rest of the prophetsh to witnessh that you have taken all my monish!"

"What's this, then?" exclaimed Claude, as he passed his hand over the Jew's waistcoat. "I feel something here. Oh yes, they are guineas, sure enough!"

The Jew uttered a horrible howl when he found his treasure was discovered, and began to kick and struggle at a great rate.

He gave the landlord a sharp kick, who, furious with pain, kicked back again, and a savage struggle took place between them, and continued until both were compelled to stop through absolute exhaustion.

In the meanwhile, Claude took a sharp knife from his pocket and approached the Jew with it, very much to that individual's alarm.

"Help!—help!—murder!" he shrieked. "What ish it you're going to do?"

He was soon enlightened, for with a few rapid strokes of the blade, Claude cut away all the front part of his waistcoat.

The lining was then ripped off, and a number of guineas was then disclosed.

The highwayman counted them up, and found them to be no less than twenty-seven.

"Ah, Samuels!" said Claude, "what a terrible liar you must be, to be sure! Only twenty pounds of this money is my due, but I shall take the remainder, and apply it to a useful purpose—to a purpose that will be of immense benefit to you. I shall give it to some parson to pray for you for telling such lies. You will be d—d else—take my word for it!"

The Jew howled and screamed with rage, but all to no purpose.

Claude Duval consigned the money to his pockets.

"Now, then," he cried, "we're off, and we will leave you to yourselves! I hope you will enjoy each other's company!"

"Oh, curses!" cried the landlord. "After robbing and ill-treating us, surely you would not leave us here!"

"Sha'n't we though!" cried Tom King. "You will see that! I see there is a good lock on the door! I shall fasten you in, and I hope no one will come within a mile of the place for the next thirty-six hours!"

The Jew and the landlord uttered dolorous cries, but the highwaymen heeded them not in the least.

They closed the door behind them, and, not content with that, securely locked it.

Tom threw out the key, and wondered for a moment where he should conceal it.

His eyes happened to fall upon a large water-butt.

This, he thought, would suit him admirably, provided there was plenty of water in it, so he picked up a stone and threw it in to try.

The splash which followed was quite enough to convince him, so, without the least hesitation, he threw the key in also.

"There," he cried, "I doubt very much whether that key will be found in a hurry."

"Oh, it's a good joke!" cried Claude Duval, laughing. "I shall never forget it to the longest day I live!"

"A most excellent joke!" cried Sixteen-String Jack. "I never heard of a neater or better plan to make anybody give up their money! Oh, it is too good, that it is—too good!"

"We have done some good," said Claude, "and had no little amusement as well; we are not losers by the transaction either."

"I hope the widow will have the prudence to get out of Grimes's way," replied Sixteen-String Jack. "If ever he comes across her again, you may depend he will vent upon her all the anger which, as a matter of course, he must feel."

"Let us hope they will never meet," said Tom King. "And, now, do you know that the time has already expired; we ought to be back on the spot where we promised to meet Dick, and we shall have a long gallop to reach it."

"And your horse?" cried Claude Duval. "I had forgotten all about that!"

"So had I," said Jack.

"And I too," replied Tom King, in a changed voice; "but from the first moment when I looked in at the window my attention has been so much enchained, and so many curious things have taken place that the remembrance of all else has been quite driven out of my head."

"The same here," said Claude. "But we must not waste any more time in conversation. First of all, we must ascertain to what extent your horse is injured."

CHAPTER DCIX.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS THREE COMRADES DETERMINE TO BE PRESENT AT MAUD'S TRIAL AT THE OLD BAILEY.

Tom King bitterly reproached himself for his thoughtlessness and negligence with respect to his steed, though there was certainly some excuse for it.

Anxiously, all three made their way to the spot where the animals had been left.

They were standing perfectly still.

After such a gallop as they had had, it was scarcely likely that they would feel much inclination to stray.

An examination was hastily made as to the state of Tom's steed.

The result of it was more satisfactory than they had imagined possible.

They found the wound was of a very superficial character.

A great deal of blood had flowed from it, but this was owing to the exertion it had been compelled to make.

While standing in the garden it had cooled, and the blood had coagulated over the surface of the wound.

Consequently, the hemorrhage had entirely ceased.

"It's all right!" said Claude Duval, after a careful inspection of the hurt,—"it's all right! You have no cause for apprehension whatever."

"Are you sure?" asked Tom.

"Yes, quite! It is a mere scratch—nothing more, and not worthy to be called a wound. I should recommend you to look now and then, in order to see whether the bleeding has recommenced. I don't think there is much fear of it."

"Still, the exercise may bring it on."

"Just so; and we shall be compelled to make tolerable speed."

"True, for the time has already gone by when we promised to be upon the eminence to meet the captain."

"I should not like to keep him waiting, for fear he should gallop off."

"He will allow us a few minutes' grace, and when he learns the profitable return we have met with, I am sure will not regret our trifling disobedience."

While this conversation was in progress, the highwaymen were engaged in mounting their steeds, and without further delay they set off in the direction of the spot appointed for the meeting.

"DICK TURPIN, DISGUISED, SPEAKS TO THE OFFICER ON THE STAIRS IN THE OLD BAILEY."

Of course, as our readers are already aware, they failed to find Dick Turpin waiting for them.

They grew uneasy and alarmed.

They all regretted that they had been tempted to disobey his injunctions.

Of course they could not tell whether Dick Turpin had returned or not.

For a long time, then, they were in doubt as to what they should do, and the more they pondered over the subject the greater did their perplexity become.

It was considered quite possible that Dick Turpin had already returned, and made his way to Enfield Chase.

But, then, he might not have done so, and if they took their departure he might arrive shortly afterwards, and be full of apprehensions on their account.

Quite half an hour was consumed in fruitless deliberations, and at the end of that time Tom King said:

"All things considered, I am sure our best plan is to return to the Chase, and wait there until Dick comes."

"I think so, too," said Claude. "If Turpin is in danger we cannot help him, because we have no idea where he is."

"And you must remember," said Sixteen-String Jack, "that it was agreed upon if he came and found we had left this spot that he was to ride off to the Chase."

"Perhaps he is already there!" exclaimed Tom King.

"I hope he may be," said Claude.

"Don't let us stay here any longer," said Sixteen-String Jack, "but depart at once."

This was agreed to.

Tom King inspected the wound which his horse had received, and found that it was still in the same condition.

That is to say, the bleeding had entirely ceased.

There was now no reason why they should not make good speed, and they flew along the level country in the direction of the Chase as swiftly as spectres

It so happened that just when they arrived upon the little eminence, Dick Turpin plunged among the trees composing Enfield Chase.

It will be remembered that, failing to find his companions here, he galloped back again to the appointed spot.

From this it follows that they must have passed each other on the journey.

This would be done easily enough, for they did not keep to the high-road but took their own course across the meadows.

Tom King and his two friends arrived at the Chase without accident, in something less than half an hour after Turpin had quitted it.

As they did not find their captain here as they expected their alarm speedily augmented, and more than ever they repented having left the eminence in search of adventures.

After much conversation, it was agreed that it would be unwise in the extreme to leave the Chase again, at any rate, for some time to come.

A prey to a thousand terrors, they remained standing beneath the trees, keeping a keen look-out in the direction of London.

As the night slowly passed away and morning dawned, their fears began to take a definite shape.

They could scarcely doubt that Dick Turpin had fallen into the hands of his enemies, and was by this time a prisoner.

And when the sun rose without his making his appearance, this idea strengthened until it became an absolute conviction.

Earnestly they began to discuss what steps should be taken in the present emergency, for, if the captain was a prisoner, the next step they ought to take should be to set about his rescue.

Tom King at length announced his intention of setting out for London without delay, in spite of the manifest peril to himself attendant upon such a proceeding.

Just as he was about to start, Claude Duval uttered a loud cry:

"Hurrah!" he said. "There he is! Look, he is coming at full speed! He's safe and sound! What a comfort, to be sure!"

Tom King had so fully made up his mind that his old comrade had been made prisoner that some seconds elapsed before he could believe in the reality of what he saw.

Then, with a glad shout, springing into the saddle, he galloped off.

Sixteen-String Jack seemed half inclined to follow his example, but Claude Duval restrained him.

"Stay where you are!" he said. "It was a thoughtless and incautious act upon Tom's part to dart out in that manner! We ought to take some precautions against being seen!"

That was quite enough for Jack, and indeed, by the time his companion had spoken these words, Turpin and King both arrived.

The satisfaction felt at this meeting was truly mutual.

Eagerly the three highwaymen pressed their leader to give them, without delay, a full account of all that had happened to him.

He complied, and then called upon Tom to do likewise.

"I have not much to tell you, captain," was the reply. "We left the eminence, had an adventure—a profitable one in two senses—and when we returned we failed to find you, and so came straight on to the Chase, thinking that the best thing to do."

This was all the explanation Dick Turpin could get.

At any other time than the present he would probably have pressed for more particulars, but as it was, his mind was too fully engrossed by other and more important matters.

Once more they repaired to that little dell in which they had found such comfortable quarters.

All were greatly fatigued, the horses included, and so the remainder of that day was passed for the most part in sleep, the highwaymen taking it in turns to watch.

No molestation was offered them, and just about sunset they all collected round a small fire they had kindled for the purpose of cooking some birds they had shot.

"Time is getting very short," said Dick Turpin, "and we have much to do. To-morrow morning the trial will begin."

"Have you ascertained that for certain?"

"No, I only suspect it; it may not take place until the day following; but we must not trust to that—we must be prepared at once."

"Certainly."

"And the lawyer gives you hopes of obtaining an acquittal?"

"Oh, yes—he seemed almost sure of it! Unfortunately, I was not able to stop to finish my conversation with him; he was about to say something when we heard that tremendous noise, as I told you."

"Yes—yes," said Tom King; "and now, Dick, just tell us plainly and clearly how you intend to act in this affair, and what you wish us to do."

"Do?"

"Yes. How do you intend to learn the result of the trial?"

Dick smiled as he said:

"I am determined to know the verdict as soon as anyone."

"You mean you will be present at the trial?"

"Yes."

Tom King shook his head.

"It's folly—absolute madness," he cried, "to think of any such thing!"

"Why so?"

"They will be on the look-out,—they will suspect that you will try to gain admittance to the court."

"I don't quite see that; and even if they do, why need I care? I am certain I could disguse myself so well, and assume a character so entirely different to my own with such perfection that I could safely bid defiance to detection."

"You have a talent that way, Dick, I know, and have succeeded better than either of us."

"I have succeeded," said Dick, "and I shall do again."

"And what are we to do?" asked Tom.

"You can remain here in waiting. Some time before nightfall I hope you will see me returning."

"No—no, captain, that will never do!"

"Why not?"

"Do you think we could rest here while we know that you were in so much danger, and while events of so much interest were taking place?"

"But if you attempt to accompany me, we shall make the danger so much greater for all of us."

"That might be arranged," said Tom King. "You must give way, captain, and allow us to accompany you. If you can disguise yourself we can; and surely we stand as good a chance of escaping the vigilance of the police officers as you do yourself."

"Well—well, it may be so," said Dick; "and I don't scruple to say that I would much rather have you with me than not."

"I knew it."

"Still, as the matter so particularly concerned myself, I made up my mind not to ask you to participate in the danger."

"That was wrong, captain. Where shall you obtain your disguise?"

"I have to think of that yet, and also what character I shall take."

"There's the old costumier," suggested Tom King; "he has done us good service before, and might do so again."

"I had not overlooked him," replied Dick; "but there's the disadvantage of having to go to his house, you may depend it will be closely watched."

"We might obviate that difficulty," said Tom King. "If we went to some obscure place and despatched a messenger for him, all would be well."

"So it will. Then I think we will say that our plans are so far settled."

"And now," said Claude Duval, "what are we to do with all the money we have got?"

"Do with it?"

"Yes. We are going upon an expedition, the result of which is doubtful. At any rate, it would not be wise for us to go encumbered with money, as we now are."

"Oh, I understand you!"

"I should propose," said Tom King, "that we select some suitable spot and bury it, reserving only a small amount, which we can carry about with us."

"Just sufficient in case of emergency," said Dick Turpin.

"Precisely so."

"I fancy that will be our best course."

"Let us set about the task at once," said Dick Turpin, "and get it over. The sooner we dispose of all these details the better, for this night will be a busy one."

Search was made for a spot that seemed likely to answer the purpose they had in view.

In the same little dell where they had passed so much of their time they dug a small hole, and poured into it the whole of their wealth, with the exception of a few guineas which they had agreed to retain about their persons.

Then the hole was filled up, and the ground carefully flattened down.

A large stone was rolled over the buried treasure, so as to mark its whereabouts.

The stone was one of very peculiar shape and colour, and after having had a good look at it, all four highwaymen felt sure that, even after a considerable time had elapsed, they would be able to recognise it again.

"That will do, comrades," said Dick Turpin. "And now for the rest. How shall we manage about disguising ourselves?"

CHAPTER DCX.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HITS UPON A NOVEL AND ORIGINAL IDEA.

"We will leave that for you to arrange, captain," was the reply.

"Nay, nay—on the present occasion I stand more than ever in need of your counsel and advice, for while I am suffering all this anxiety on Maud's account it is impossible for me to think clearly."

"Then, if you will leave it to me," said Tom King, "this is what I should advise:—Let us get somewhere near to London, and then despatch a messenger for the old costumier. He will disguise us, and then all will be settled."

"If you think that is the best," said Dick, "I agree. Let us start at once."

Turpin was anxious and impatient in the extreme to be gone.

"Stay a moment," said Claude. "I think your suggestion might be improved upon."

"In what manner?"

"Does it not seem to you that there would be less risk if we divided, and went two by two?"

"Do you mean to the court-house?"

"Yes, certainly. If all four of us go to the Old Bailey together, don't you think that will be likely to provoke suspicion?"

"It might so."

"It would—you can make sure of that, and therefore I say, let us separate on this spot."

"But," said Turpin, "when we are together, are we not stronger and better able to overcome any opposition that might be offered to us?"

"Yes, certainly we are; but then, when we are all four together, we should be more likely to encounter opposition."

"It may be so."

"However, captain, I wish to have no voice in the matter. If it is your desire that we should accompany you, that is sufficient."

"No," said Turpin. "This is not an ordinary affair. I have no right to drag you into it at all."

"You have—you have!"

"Well, you enter it willingly—you run the risk of danger freely, and for my sake; therefore, I shall leave you to adopt what measures and precautions you think proper."

While this conversation had been going on, Sixteen-String Jack appeared to be paying great attention to it.

But as soon as they had ceased speaking, his face lighted up with a peculiar expression, and, rubbing his hands together, he said:

"I rather think I have hit upon a good plan at last—a very good plan!"

"What is it?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, I am rather afraid."

"Why?"

"Because it is so very outrageous."

"Outrageous?"

"Yes."

"But it may be all the better on that account," said Turpin.

"I can assure you I think so!"

"Well, then, out with it—let us hear your plan!"

"It involves our separation in the manner Claude proposed."

"Then that is one thing in its favour," said Duval.

"Go on, Jack."

"And simply, my plan is neither more nor less than that you and Tom King should carry out the plan proposed, and that Claude and myself should disguise ourselves as police officers."

"Police officers?"

"Yes—why not?"

"It is an outrageous idea," said Dick Turpin, with a laugh, in which all his companions joined.

"But I like the notion uncommonly," said Claude Duval. "Ah, Jack, you've got a rare invention!"

"I am glad you like the scheme so far proposed," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"But go on," said Turpin—"tell us further."

"Well, really there is not much more to tell, nor had I arranged much more in my own mind. I thought it would be useless to do so, because, when we set out with the intention of accomplishing our purpose, we cannot tell what turn events may take, or what consequences they may produce."

"True—true!"

"And in all probability, if we laid down one particular plan it would be impracticable."

"But," said Tom King, seriously, "do you really think that you and Claude could succeed in disguising yourselves as police officers so well as to be undetected by the other members of the fraternity?"

"I do feel sure of it!"

"Well, I know you can do some wonderful things at times. Now, the way you have imposed upon the ostlers is really extraordinary."

"And he has always succeeded," said Claude. "And I have no doubt he will now. The more I think of the scheme the better I like it. It would be glorious to feel one's self transformed into a police officer!"

In spite of the cares that were about his heart, Dick Turpin could not help laughing at his comrade's plan—it was not only a bold one, but there was something very droll about it.

"Captain," said Jack, after a short pause, "I hope that you have by this time got more reconciled to my proposition. Have you?"

"I have in truth!"

"I am glad of that, and, after such an admission, I suppose you will be quite willing to give your consent?"

"Oh, certainly!"

"Then, captain, as we have a long night's work before us and an important day coming to-morrow, I think the sooner we part the better."

"And I. I don't like the separation, but I agree with you in thinking it will be much safer."

"And that's what we are to consider," said Claude Duval. "The enterprise altogether is a most perilous one."

"About that there can be no doubt," said Tom King. "But, with proper care and caution, I don't think we shall be in danger of getting into much trouble."

"I hope not. I am curious to know," cried Turpin, "where and by what means you expect to find the disguises you require!"

"And to tell you the truth," said Sixteen-String Jack, with a laugh, "I am quite as much at a loss as yourself. But still, in comparison with other things, that is a mere trifle; and I doubt not before long, when I have put my head by the side of my comrade's, that we shall overcome the obstacle."

"Then," said Turpin, "if we part here, I suppose we may look forward to meeting each other again in the court at the Old Bailey to-morrow morning?"

"We shall be there without fail."

"But," said Claude Duval, "if we are so careful in disguising ourselves, how shall we manage to recognise each other?"

"Well thought of!" said Dick Turpin. "We might not be together in the court, yet it would be a satisfaction if we could see each other."

"How can it be managed?"

"Nay, I know not."

"Jack," said Tom King, "your invention seems active to-night: can you get us out of this difficulty?"

"I think I can," was the reply, "and by a very simple means, too!"

"Bravo!"

It is by no means certain that Claude and myself will be disguised as police officers. Something may occur to render it impossible, or other circumstances may induce us to adopt some other costume. Then as to yourselves, I have no idea what dress you will assume."

"Nor I," said Dick Turpin.

"Then we cannot recognise each other by the dress, that's certain; nor by our features, because in various ways, we shall make our faces look as different as possible."

"But we know all that, Jack, very well. What's your plan?"

"This:—When you get into the court, look all around you until you see two persons sitting, each with the left eye closed."

"Good," said Turpin—"I understand. That will be an easy means of recognition."

"It will—especially if you and Tom adopt the same expedient."

"When we have thus recognised each other we can open both our eyes."

"Excellent!" said Turpin. "Such a signal as that will not be conspicuous enough to attract the attention of anyone, no matter how vigilant our foes may be!"

"Then I suppose we may consider that matter settled like the rest," continued Jack. "And, now, is there anything more for us to arrange before we part?"

"Nothing that I can think of," replied Turpin. "Farewell, my friends, for a few hours. When we meet again, it will be in the court at the Old Bailey."

"A strange spot!" said Claude.

"Very!" added Turpin. "For myself and Tom, we shall take all the care we can of each other; because, at the present time, our liberty is of unusual value."

"And we will pledge ourselves to do the same," said Sixteen-String Jack. "We will promise not to run into any unnecessary danger."

"That is enough. Now, farewell! We had better leave the Chase at different points."

"Much better."

"Then we part here."

The highwaymen shook hands, and then separated.

Dick Turpin was mounted on Black Bess, and Tom King on his own horse.

The injury the animal had sustained was but trifling, and the wound was already partially healed over.

Claude and Jack watched them until they could see them no longer.

Then they mounted, and made their way out of the Chase by a different route.

They conversed earnestly together as they went, for the expedition they were upon was one of no ordinary character.

We must, however, defer, until another opportunity, the account of their proceedings.

It is necessary that we should, first of all, follow Dick Turpin and Tom King.

For a considerable part of the distance very few words passed between them, for they allowed their horses to go at the very top of their speed.

At last, when in a particularly lonely spot, they slackened their pace, in order that they might have an opportunity of regaining their breath.

"Have you been thinking, Tom, on the way?" asked Dick Turpin.

"I have."

"And are you still of opinion that it will be best for us to carry out the arrangement we have come to?"

"Do you mean as regards communicating with the old costumier?"

"Yes."

"I don't know what else can be better."

"Nor I. But can you call to mind any particular place that will do for us to stay at?"

Tom paused a moment to consider.

"There's Tom Davis's."

"It would not do to go there," said Dick, quickly and decisively. "Above all things, we must take care to avert suspicion from that place."

"Yes; now I reflect, we shall be best away."

"Is there any little inn near to London—some place where not much trade is done, and where we could stop for a few hours?"

"Now I come to recollect, said Tom King, "I do believe I know the very house that will suit us."

"I am glad of that. Where is it?"

"It's a curious, rambling, old wooden building, which I am sure you must have noticed times out of number. The sign is the Eight Bells."

"Is it near to Kensington?"

"Yes; close to the gravel-pits."

"I know the place you speak of, but have never stopped there."

"Nor I, which is all the better, since there will be less danger of our being recognised."

"Just so."

"I thought of the house because of its lonely and retired situation. If you remember, it stands a good way back from the road."

"I know the house quite well. No doubt we shall be able to obtain there all the accommodation we require."

"Forward, then! The sooner we reach it the better."

"It is a long gallop."

"I know that; but I think our horses are equal to it. And you must remember that some time will necessarily be consumed in sending for the old costumier."

"I don't expect that we shall do more than disguise ourselves and get to London by the time the court opens."

"That is all I desire. Now, then, forward!"

Once more, at a swift gallop, the highwaymen sped towards their destination.

They altered their course slightly, and by going straight across the country, heedless of such obstructions as hedges and ditches, they saved a great deal of ground, for all the roads had a roundabout tendency.

At length, without meeting with any accident, the two friends reached the high-road.

"The inn is very close hereabouts," said Tom King. "Yonder lies London; and if we go in that direction, I think we shall come to it in the space of a few minutes."

This supposition was quickly verified.

Suddenly they came in sight of the inn.

It would certainly have been passed by in the night-time by all travellers, for it was too far back from the road to be visible in the darkness.

But just at the side of the highway was a tall wooden post, which was always kept painted white; and as its thickness was considerable, it could not fail to attract attention, let the obscurity be ever so deep.

On the top of this post was a frame of iron-work, of complicated pattern; and in this frame was hung a board, upon which eight bells were painted.

"There's the house, then," said Tom King, reining-in his steed, and pointing to the inn with his riding-whip. "It seems very quiet—does it not?"

"Yes; quite uninhabited. I can only see a light at one window."

"And yet the place may be well illuminated inside, for it is built in a most extraordinary fashion."

"Is there accommodation for horses as well as travellers?" asked Dick Turpin.

"Oh, yes. If you look up you will see a truss of straw suspended from the bottom part of the framework that supports the sign."

"Oh yes; there it is, sure enough. We're all right."

In those days it was customary to show that stabling was attached to the inn by hanging up a truss of straw in the way we have mentioned, and the same thing is done in some parts of the country to this day.

"Going to stay here, gentlemen?" said a voice, at this moment. "Every accommodation, sir, and the best eatables and drinkables you can wish for."

"I am glad to hear that," said Turpin, "for we do not want to ride any further to-night. We have come so far in safety, but we have heard how the road further on is infested by highwaymen, and we don't want to fall in with such rascals!"

"Certainly not, sir—certainly not," said the ostler, as he held the off stirrup, in order that Turpin might alight all the more easily. "This is a most howdashus road for highwaymen—it is, indeed, gentlemen, I assure you!"

"So we have heard."

"But in the house yonder," continued the ostler, waving his arm, "you will find every kind of accommodation you can wish for; and you need not feel afraid that you will be troubled by highwaymen there."

"Then we will stay," said Turpin; "that is quite decided. And if you attend well to the horses, you will find it will be nothing out of your pocket."

"All right, sir! I'll give you my word you shall have nothing to complain of. I rather fancy I have lived long enough to tell a real gentleman when I see him!"

Of this speech the two highwaymen took no notice, but having dismounted and surrendered their horses into the charge of the ostler, they followed him towards the inn.

CHAPTER DCXI.

DICK TURPIN IS INFORMED THAT ALL HIGHWAYMEN ARE COWARDS, AND THAT HE IS THE GREATEST COWARD OF THE LOT.

"THERE is the front door, gentlemen," said the ostler, pointing while he spoke. "Pass through that, and go straight on, and you will come to the bar. There you will find the landlord, who will show you every attention."

"All right!" said Turpin. "We are in no hurry. We will go with you and have a look at the stable, if you have no objection."

"Certainly not, gentlemen—certainly not. Come with me, by all means. This is the way."

The ostler was very civil and attentive; and he was fully impressed with the idea that the highwaymen were a couple of real gentlemen, and that when they left they would give him a substantial reward.

The stable was reached, and the highwaymen saw their cattle properly attended to, and then Dick Turpin said:

"I don't know whether you could be spared from your place, or not, but I want some one to deliver a letter for me in London with all possible speed."

"Very sorry to disoblige you, gentlemen, but, as you say, I can't possibly leave. Master's very strict."

"But do you know anyone who could be trusted with a letter?"

"Well, sir, there's my brother. I think he's somewhere about the premises. You see, he hasn't been quite so lucky as I have in getting into a good place; in fact, he's very bad off, and lately I have had him to help me just a little bit."

"Then he would be glad of having something to do for which he would be well paid."

"I should rather think he would, sir."

"I suppose I can get writing materials inside?" said Turpin.

"Oh, yes. How long shall you be before you have the letter ready, sir?"

"A few minutes only."

"Then, in the meantime, I will look for my brother."

"Do so—do so; and as soon as you have found him, send him indoors."

"I will, sir, you may depend upon it."

The two highwaymen, having taken as good an observation of the whole of the premises as the darkness would permit, made their way into the inn.

At the bar they found the landlord.

He was a short man, rather old, and shabbily dressed.

His face was covered with wrinkles, and of a dirty, coppery hue.

He looked as though he drank just a little too much of the good things in his cellar.

He made a very low bow as soon as he caught sight of our two friends, and, in a cringing, deferential tone of voice, he said:

"Good evening, gentlemen—good evening! I am delighted to see you! You are heartily welcome to the Eight Bells!"

"Can we have a private room?" said Turpin, abruptly, for he did not like either the landlord's looks, or his obsequious behaviour. "I am rather in a hurry."

"I ask ten thousand pardons," said the landlord, "and I offer ten thousand apologies; but, really, at the present moment I have not a private room that I can place at your disposal."

Turpin looked vexed.

"However, sir, there's the parlour, which, in a manner of speaking, is as good as a private room. There's just a few sitting down; but they won't interfere with you, sir, not by no manner of means."

Turpin hesitated a moment, and then, fearful of awakening the suspicions of the landlord, he said:

"Very well, show us into the room you speak of."

"I will, gentlemen—I will. I deeply and profoundly regret that I have no other accommodation to offer you!"

Bowing and cringing, the landlord led the highwaymen along a passage, and paused before a low oak door, upon which, near the top, was painted the word "Parlour."

The landlord opened it and ushered in his guests.

Turpin and King darted hasty glances around them.

They caught sight of several persons seated round a large table that occupied the centre of the apartment, but over the whole party there hung such a thick cloud of tobacco smoke that they could not distinguish anything with any degree of distinctness.

"Here is a side table," said the landlord, "and here are a couple of chairs. If you wish to keep yourselves select from the general company, you can make yourselves comfortable enough here."

"This will suit very well," said Turpin. "Bring us a couple of glasses of brandy-and-water, and then get us something nice to eat in the meanwhile. First of all, bring me pens, ink, and paper—I want to write a letter."

"Certainly, sir—certainly! I am your most obedient, humble servant!" said the landlord, who was quite overcome at receiving such a liberal order.

It was not every day that two such guests as these stopped at the Eight Bells.

A general silence among the guests took place when the highwaymen entered, and all present turned round and bent inquisitive glances upon them.

Turpin and King affected to be engaged in earnest conversation, and by this means they managed to keep their countenances concealed from the view of those at the table.

Finding so little attention was paid to them by the strangers, the conversation which had so suddenly ceased began again.

Turpin then took a few stealthy, observing glances, and noticed that about eight persons were present, all busily engaged in smoking, drinking, and talking.

By their appearance they seemed to be small tradesmen, probably living in the vicinity, in fact, just that class of persons who are generally to be found of an evening in the parlour of the nearest public-house.

Paper, pens, and ink were brought, and then Turpin said:

"Now, Tom, you write the letter—you will do it quicker and better than I shall."

"All right; what shall I put in it?"

"Why, merely say that we are stopping here at the Eight Bells, and shall be glad if he will come to us here, in order to disguise us."

"But it will not be safe to put our names, will it?"

"Well, hardly, but can you make him understand without?"

"I think so."

"That, then, is all that is necessary."

Tom King hastily wrote a few lines to the old costumier to the effect stated, but he was careful not to put in any names—indeed, the whole letter was most carefully worded.

Just as he had finished, the landlord entered with the brandy-and-water, and said:

"There's some one outside waiting to take your letter."

"Send him in here," said Turpin. "It's ready."

"Very good, sir."

The landlord withdrew, and the next moment the ostler's brother appeared.

"Do you know London?" said Turpin.

"Reether, sir."

"Well, then, I want you to take this letter with all speed, and leave it at a shop in Bow Street at the corner of Hart Street."

"I know the shop well, sir—unkimmon well, I might say—it's a sort of old clo'se shop, I might call it—where they sells things for the people at the theaytres."

"That's the place," said Tom King. "Deliver the letter there."

"Must I wait for an answer?"

"No, there will be no necessity."

"And now, how shall you get to London?" said Turpin. "I want you to be as quick as you possibly can."

"It's a goodish walk, sir, and no mistake about that"

"But shall you be obliged to walk?"

"Not if you likes to pay for me to ride, sir."

"I'll do that willingly."

"Well, then I expects the stage-coach to pass the door every minute."

"Here is half-a-guinea, then," said Turpin. "Jump up, and deliver the letter as soon as you possibly can. You can take your own time coming back."

"All right, sir—you may depend I'll do my best."

The ostler's brother was much surprised and delighted at the liberality of his patrons.

With a low bow he retired.

Just as he reached the front door of the inn the stage-coach rolled by.

It did not stop; but he ran across the road and sprang up while the vehicle was in motion, with an agility and ease that would have done credit to the guard himself.

Turpin and King had now nothing more to do than to sit in the room and wait for the arrival of the costumier.

Some time would necessarily have to elapse before he could come.

In the meanwhile, however, they would be able to occupy themselves with a substantial meal, and listening to the conversation of those present.

They found this rather amusing.

There was a tall, thin man, apparently about thirty years of age, who monopolized nearly all the talk.

They quickly learned that this individual was a commercial traveller, or, as they were often called, "A bagman."

"Highwaymen!" he exclaimed. "Bah—bah! I don't care that for the whole tribe!"

He snapped his fingers in a defiant and contemptuous manner as he spoke.

The company generally looked on him with admiring eyes.

"Yes, gentlemen, I've seen a little bit of the highroads of England in my short lifetime; there is not a lane or a cross-country road that I am not acquainted with!"

"And have you ever seen any highwaymen?" said a little, stout, red-faced man, in a trembling, excited voice—"did you ever see one?"

"See one?" repeated the bagman contemptuously—"I should just think I have—I have met with 'em often, but—" and here he spoke with great emphasis—"when I have met with any highwaymen they have remembered it!"

"Have they though?" said one who sat next to the stout man with the red face.

"Yes, gentlemen, I can assure you it's a fact that these highwaymen that we hear such a deal about are the rankest cowards in all creation!"

His auditors shook their heads.

"You may have heard some tales told about 'em," continued the bagman; "but they're lies, gentlemen—lies—lies got up by the people who have been robbed, and who were just a shade more cowardly than the robbers! Don't you see, they wouldn't like to confess that they had parted with their money in fright, and so, on their way home, they invent some monstrous tale or other!"

"Well, Mr. Bagman," said another, "that may or may not be true, but, for the benefit of the public generally, just let us know how you proceed when you meet with a highwayman."

"Well, I'll tell you. Now, I've met with most of the rascals at some time or other, and they're all alike—every one of them!"

"What, Dick Turpin as well?" said the red-faced man.

"Yes, Dick Turpin as well; and it's my opinion that he's the rankest coward of the whole lot!"

Upon hearing these words, Turpin felt an almost unconquerable inclination to get up and pull the bagman's nose, but prudence restrained him, and he remained still.

"But," cried another, "do you really mean to say, Mr. Bagman, that you've encountered the great Dick Turpin himself?"

"The great Dick Turpin!" cried the commercial traveller, with withering contempt, "he is no greater than anyone else! Now, I'll tell you how I dealt with him once."

The greatest attention was now manifested, and after a slight pause the bagman began as follows:—

CHAPTER DCXII.

THE BAGMAN RELATES THE PARTICULARS OF HIS ADVENTURE WITH DICK TURPIN.

"It was one night last winter, when it was bitter cold, that I was coming along the Oxford Road in the direction of London. I was mounted on a capital nag, and I had a good bit of money about me, for I had been round to collect some accounts, and with the exception of this money, my samples were the only things I had in the shape of luggage.

"Well, gentlemen, I was going along at a swiftish trot when, all of a sudden, I caught sight of a horse that was standing by the side of the road.

"On this horse a man was seated.

"He was leaning forward on to the horse's neck, and just as I passed him, he uttered a dismal groan.

"I stopped at once, for somehow, although the night was dark—I was only able to catch a little bit of a glimpse—I fancied I recognised this man as being one of the same trade as myself.

"I went towards him, and I said:

"'Is that you, Tom Newton? Why, what in the world is the matter with you?'

"A dismal groan was the only reply I got, and I said:

"'Look up, Tom! It's all right! I'm by! What's happened?—are you hurt?'

"The man on the horse raised his head a little, and I caught sight of his face.

"I knew then for certain that it was Tommy Newton, and nobody else.

"We had been great friends in years gone by.

"'Oh, dear—dear!' he said—'is that really you?'

"'Yes, it is,' said I. 'But what in the world is the matter?'

"'Oh, I have been robbed—I have been robbed!' he replied, in a mournful voice—'I have been plundered of all my money, and hurt besides!'

"'Have you, though?' I said, much interested. 'When did it happen?'

"'Only a few minutes since! If you had come up a little sooner, you might have saved me!'

"'I should have saved you,' said I, because, gentlemen, I knew very well that I should.

These words were uttered with great self-complacency and as though they were logical in the extreme.

Everyone listened with breathless interest.

"'How did it happen?' said I. 'What did he rob you of, Tommy?'

"'Three hundred and fifty odd pounds!' he replied, 'and all in gold!'

"'Good gracious!' said I, 'surely you have never allowed a cowardly highwayman to take all that money away? It will be the ruin of you!'

"'I know it—I know it!' he replied; and he groaned in the same dismal fashion as before.

"'Why didn't you make a bold stand and a vigorous resistance?' said I. 'If you'd only have showed fight the highwayman would have been off at once!'

"'I did—I did!' said Tommy. 'But he was a desperate character! It was no good! He took my money, and here I am, you see!'

"'Why, I tell you, you ought to have shown fight!'

"'So I did!'

'Well, at that I said no more, because, whenever a person is robbed, he always declares he's made a valorous resistance, and I know very well its always the reverse.

"'But,' continued I, 'Tommy, you're a friend of mine, and I don't mind doing you a service.'

"'Oh, you're a good fellow, you are!' said Tommy,—'always the same—ever ready to help a friend in distress.'

"Well, gentlemen, Tommy might have been right, and he might have been wrong; but I do try to help a friend whenever I have the opportunity."

This sentiment elicited a round of applause and some cheers, while the bagman was unanimously requested to go on.

"'Now,' said I, 'Tommy, which way did this highwayman go? By-the-bye, didn't you say it was Dick Turpin?'

"'Yes, I did,' said he

"'How did you know that?' said I.

"'Because he said so,' said he.

"'Very well,' said I, 'that's sufficient. Now just tell me which way he went.'

"'Why, on the road towards London.'

"'Come along, then, Tommy! Make good speed, and we will soon overtake him!'

"'Overtake him?' said Tommy Newton, quite aghast at the idea.

"'Yes,' said I, 'I mean to make him deliver up the money he has taken from you!'

"'But you can't!' said Tommy,—'you can't!'

"'Well, you come with me, old boy, and I'll try.'

"Then Tommy said to me:

"'I say, though, but do you happen to have any money about you? Because, if you have, I should recommend you not to go near him!'

"'Pooh—pooh!' I replied. 'I don't care for all the highwaymen breathing; and, do you know, I've got a matter of seven or eight hundred pounds with me at the present minute!'

"'Then,' said Tommy, imploringly, 'take warning by me! Don't go near him!'

"'Well, I'll run the risk, Tommy! You come along! I only hope we shall be able to see him, that's all; but I'm afraid there'll be no such luck.'

"Well, after a little more persuading, Tommy seemed to get better. Then he whipped his horse up, and so did I, and we tore along the road in capital style.

"Well, when we had gone some distance, our horses slackened their speed a little, then all of a sudden a man rode out into the centre of the road, and stopped there.

"'Hold!' he cried, in as bold a voice as he could—'hold!—stand and deliver!—your money or your life!'

"Well, of course, gentlemen, as part of my plan, I pulled up at once."

"But," said the red-faced man, "I don't quite understand."

"Sir!" said the bagman, turning towards him almost fiercely.

"Why, didn't you say there were two of you riding along the road?"

"Yes."

"And you were stopped by one man?"

"Yes."

"Well, mustn't that one man have had some courage to attempt to stop two of you?"

The commercial traveller was slightly taken aback, but very slightly.

He recovered himself, and said:

"Not at all—not at all! These highwaymen know that people ride along the road with their hearts in their mouths, and that they have only to say, 'Hand over!' and the money changes hands at once.

"As I said before, the people on the roads are cowards as a rule, and the highwaymen would never attempt what they do if they didn't know it."

This explanation was considered satisfactory, and the bagman was desired to proceed.

"Well, gentlemen, that interruption slightly put me out. However, when the man in the road told me to stop, I pulled up, and so did Tommy Newton.

"'Now,' said the highwayman, 'hand over to me all the valuables you've got at once! My name is Dick Turpin, and if you refuse I'll blow your brains out!'

"'You be d—d!' said I.

"What," cried the red-faced man again, in mingled doubts and wonder—"did you tell Dick Turpin to be d—d?"

"I did!" said the bagman, with terrific emphasis—"I did! However, these interruptions make me a long time getting over the tale, and they spoil it as well. I have not much more to tell now, than Dick Turpin seemed rather frightened when he saw me behave so bold, and I improved the opportunity by laying hold of him by the front part of his coat, and presented a pistol full in his face. Ah, gentlemen, I wish you could have seen the great Dick Turpin then!"

"When you presented the pistol at him?" said the red-faced man, interrogatively.

"Yes!"

"How did he look?"

"Why, frightened to death, to be sure! He turned as white as a sheet! His very hair stood on end, and he trembled to such a degree that I quite expected that he would fall off his horse!"

"Did he really?" said all his auditors in chorus.

"He did—it's a fact, I can assure you!"

"And what did you say to him?"

"'Why,' said I, 'you cowardly sneak; you've been robbing my friend Tommy Newton of his master's money! Give it back to me this moment, or I'll scatter your brains on the highway!'"

"That was a bold speech!" said Redface.

"It was, and it produced an impression, I can tell you!"

"What, did Dick Turpin actually give you the money back?"

"He did—every penny of it,—not only what he had taken from Tommy Newton, but ever so much more besides; and he begged so hard for his life that I let the poor devil go."

Ejaculations of wonder followed the conclusion of this extraordinary narrative.

The bagman looked around him with a triumphant air.

"And what did Dick Turpin do?" was asked by some one.

"Do? Why, he struck spurs into his horse, and was out of sight in no time. And, gentlemen, take my word for it, when you are out on the road, all you have to do is to pluck up a little spirit. If a highwayman sees you have ever so little courage, rely upon it he will let you alone."

"Well, it's the most extraordinary thing I ever heard of," said one.

"And I'm of the same opinion," said Turpin, quietly, joining in the conversation for the first time.

He had with difficulty kept calm and silent while the mendacious bagman was proceeding with his tale, which, of course, as the reader knows very well, was a lie from beginning to end.

Tom King gave a meaning glance at his companion when he spoke, as though to warn him of the danger of joining in the conversation, but Dick Turpin paid no attention to it. He was greatly enraged, which is not to be wondered at.

"Sir!" said the bagman, turning round rather fiercely—"sir!"

"Excuse me," said Dick, assuming as humble tone of voice as he could. "I hope I have not said anything to displease you. You are such a valiant individual, that anyone with sense would think twice before they interfered with you."

The bagman drew himself up in his chair, and it was evident to all that he assumed an additional importance of manner.

"No offence, sir—no offence—none in the world!" he cried, with a patronising air.

"Well, then," said Dick, "I only ventured, in a manner of speaking, to remark that your story was the most extraordinary I had ever heard."

There was a peculiar tone in Turpin's voice while he spoke these last words, which did not escape the attention of the most obtuse person present.

"Sir," said the bagman, staring him hard in the face, "do you mean to impugn my veracity?"

"Impugn your what?" said Dick, in such a comical way, that all the company laughed heartily.

The bagman began to get very red in the face.

"I don't understand you, sir!" he said. "I don't understand you at all! Do you mean to cast a doubt upon the truth of my narrative?"

"No, no—not at all! I would not for all the world!" said Dick. "Of course, I have my own opinion about it; but that's nothing to nobody!"

The tone and gesture with which these words were accompanied, were noticed and comprehended by everyone.

"Sir," cried the bagman, in a still louder voice, and getting redder in the face than ever, "you say you have a private opinion about my story?"

"I have!"

"Then, sir, I demand and insist that you tell me at once what your private opinion is!"

"W — w — well," said Turpin, affecting to stammer.

"No hesitation, sir!" thundered the bagman, hoping to intimidate our hero—"no subterfuge—out with it—speak at once! What is your opinion?"

"Well, then," said Dick, "if you insist upon it and if I must give it——"

"You must!"

Well, then, sir, and gentlemen all, I beg most respectfully to say that my private opinion is, that the whole story is a confounded lie from beginning to end!"

CHAPTER DCXIII.

DICK TURPIN FAVOURS THE COMPANY IN THE INN PARLOUR WITH AN EXTRAORDINARY NARRATIVE.

This declaration took everyone by surprise.

It would be hard indeed to conceive anything that would have astonished them more.

For the most part, the occupants of the parlour were only small tradesmen in the vicinity, as we have oefore remarked, and this bagman, from his knowledge of the country, his assurance, and his boasting ways, was looked up to with a great degree of awe and respect.

Not one of the company present would have thought of saying the words that Turpin had just uttered.

They could scarcely believe their own ears.

The little fat man with the red face opened his mouth and eyes to such a preternatural extent, and assumed an expression of so much blank amazement that he was quite ludicrous to behold.

But the greatest treat was, to notice the effect of the words upon the bagman himself.

He was so completely taken aback that for a minute good he could not articulate a single word.

At the end of that time, however, he recovered himself.

He was conscious that the eyes of the whole company were fixed upon him, and after what he had said it would never do for him to allow the real state of his feelings to be perceived.

Therefore, he started to his feet, and with a well-assured anger, and with an air of one who had been grossly insulted, he said:

"Sir—sir, I don't know who you are, nor what you mean! It's disgraceful! It's abominable! Do—do—do you mean, in the face of all these gentlemen, and in my own face, to—to call me a liar?"

"Nothing of the kind, sir!" said Dick.

"Oh, I see! But I'll make you eat your own words yet, my fine fellow! Apologise, sir, at once!"

"I will do nothing of the kind!" said Dick. "I have nothing to apologise for!"

"But I say you have, sir!" said the bagman, valiantly. "You must either apologise, or give me satisfaction!"

"What have I to apologise for?"

"For calling me a liar in public!"

"I beg to state that I never did anything of the kind!"

"But you did, sir!"

"I merely gave you my private opinion," said Dick. "You insisted upon having it, and it was to the effect that I did not believe a single word of all you have said, and that you have been abusing us all for the last half hour with a monstrous lie of your own invention!"

"Oh, this is too much!" cried the bagman, striking his breast. "Gentlemen all, I appeal to you!"

But very little notice was taken of his appeal—the gentlemen all, without exception, sat with their pipes in their hands, and their mouths and eyes struggling desperately as to which should open widest.

"Now, sir," said Dick, "I don't intend to be drawn into a quarrel with you!"

"Oh, don't you?" interrupted the bagman, taking courage immediately.

"No, I don't!" said Dick, perceiving it; "but I'll tell you what—if you are not civil, you'll find yourself in trouble!"

"But I'll have you to know, sir, that I am not a man to be insulted and intimidated by such as you!"

"I have offered neither insult nor intimidation," said Dick. "But sit down—sit down! Pray don't make a fool of yourself any more!"

"Any more!" screamed the bagman. "Do you mean to insult me still further? Do you mean to imply by that that I have been making a fool of myself?"

"Oh, just as you like!" said Dick. "It doesn't matter to me in the least; but I have got something to tell you that's of very great importance, and which I should advise you to hear!"

"Ha—what?" said the bagman, glad enough to take advantage of this loophole of escape.

"I have something to tell you of the greatest importance, and which intimately concerns yourself!"

"Indeed, sir! Then I am very sorry I have treated you so rudely, and I hope there will be an end of the matter!"

"Just so," said Dick. "I don't want to cause any differences; I should never have ventured upon giving my opinion unasked for, and it is but an opinion after all!"

"Nothing else!" murmured the guests.

"But what have you to tell me?" asked the bagman, anxiously.

"Something highly important!"

"Is it private?"

"No—no, not at all, because I am not quite certain—but almost—that the matter I am going to speak about concerns you; I should like to state it before all the company!"

"Hear—hear!" said everybody, and the tables were rapped in approval.

"But as talking and listening are both hard work, I propose that the landlord shall be called."

The bell was rung, and the landlord appeared.

"Here," said Turpin, "let the gentlemen all round have just what they like to drink, and I will pay for it!"

The applause which followed this announcement was prodigious.

Somehow, they all seemed to like Turpin a little from the first, but now he had risen to such a height of popularity, as none else in that parlour had ever attained.

The guests all round were served with just what they thought proper to order, and then Dick Turpin, taking a guinea from his pocket, said:

"Here, landlord, this coin will settle it; don't bother yourself to give me any change. Put a couple of pounds of the best tobacco you have in your house on the table for the benefit of the company."

Another tremendous round of applause followed this command, in which the commercial traveller himself joined.

As a matter of course, all this produced a very great impression, and all the company present prepared themselves to listen with the most profound interest to ever word that Turpin might utter.

Dick had a design in this, as will quickly be seen.

As soon as all had comfortably seated themselves, stirred their glasses, and lighted their pipes, Dick Turpin began:

"Well, gentlemen all, and you sir," indicating the bagman in particular; "what I have to do is to give you the particulars of an adventure that I once had with Dick Turpin himself."

"Hear, hear—bravo!" cried everybody.

"And," continued Dick indicating the bagman again, "I have also to convey a serious warning to yourself."

"Go on, sir—pray go on!" said the bagman, nervously

"With all the pleasure in life," replied Turpin. "Now to begin."

There was a profound silence at once, and Dick Turpin, very much to the amazement of Tom King, then spoke as follows:

"You must understand, gentlemen, that I am now on my way to London, where I have a little business to transact. I did not finish my journey to-night because I was afraid of the highwaymen."

[SIXTEEN-STRING JACK BAMBOOZLES THE OFFICERS.]

"Pooh—pooh!" said the bagman.

"Order!" cried a voice.

"It is about two months ago since I paid my last visit. On that occasion I had no friend with me as I have now, but was alone.

"Well, I stopped at a public-house in a not very good part of London, but yet a part that suited me very well for the business I had to do. It was a public-house where I had stopped many a time. I sha'n't mention the name of it, nor the name of the landlord, nor the street, because what I have to say compromises the landlord; and it is not my intention to get him or anybody else into trouble, if I can help it."

This sentiment was received with universal applause.

"Well, that night I had been asleep about an hour, or perhaps not quite so much, and then I awoke. I don't know what it was that aroused me; but I found my eyes wide open, and then the sound of voices came upon my ears. Two persons were evidently talking, as I quickly found by the tones of their voices; and so close did the sound appear to be, that, for a time, I could hardly believe the speakers were not in the same room as I was myself.

"However, after listening for a moment or two, and recovering my senses properly, I discovered that the head of my bedstead was placed against a wooden partition.

"It was from the other side of this partition that the sound of voices came.

"Even if I had wished, I could not have helped listening to every word; but the conversation was of so extraordinary a character, that I stretched my ears to the utmost.

"One voice I recognised as being that of the landlord, but the other was quite strange to me.

"'Don't be alarmed, my boy—don't be alarmed!' I heard the landlord say; 'the runners have not been here for ever so long, and can't suspect your presence!'

"'Well, be that as it may,' said the strange voice in reply, 'I don't intend to stay here. I'm off to-night!'

"'Ah, Dick, my lad!' said the landlord, 'you will never rest in safety! You are always ready for the road, and so is your mare!'

"'Right!' said the stranger, 'Black Bess, like her rider, is always ready for the road!'"

"Did you hear that, though?" said the little fat man with the red face.

"Order—order!" cried a chorus of voices. "Pray proceed!"

Everyone listened for the continuation of the story with redoubled interest.

"Here was a revelation! I was astounded! The strange voice I had heard belonged to no other than the redoubtable highwayman, Dick Turpin!

"The landlord, I saw plain enough, had been hiding the daring offender in his house.

"Perhaps you can imagine, gentlemen, how I stretched my ears to listen to every word."

"After Dick Turpin, then, had spoken, the landlord said:

"'But where are you going to-night?'

"'Well, that I scarcely know,' was the reply. 'Wherever chance may take me, I suppose. Have you heard any particular news lately?'

"'No—nothing particular,' said the landlord; 'only the other night there was a bagman here—a commercial traveller, you know—that was talking a great deal about you!'"

At these words everyone present started.

All directed their eyes upon the bagman, who could not control himself sufficiently to prevent the blood from leaving his face and turning it deathly white, nor from keeping his limbs from trembling. He was evidently greatly agitated.

"A—a—a commercial traveller?" he gasped.

"Yes," said Dick—and there was something ominous in the tone with which he pronounced the simple word "Yes—that's what the landlord said!"

"Wh—wh—what? Go on—pray go on!"

"'And what had this bagman to say about me?' Dick Turpin asked, and rather fiercely, too, I thought."

"Rather fiercely?" repeated the little fat man with the red face.

"Yes," said Dick, solemnly, "rather fiercely, and then the landlord replied:

"'Well, he said some very extraordinary things, Dick, lad—whether they're true or not I won't go for to say. However, I'll tell you what he did say, and he was ready to lie down on his back and swear every word was the truth.'

"'Go on,' I heard Dick Turpin say, as fiercely as before.

"'Well, this bagman began by saying how he didn't care a snap of his fingers for all the highwaymen on the road between London and York, and that he'd never been robbed by any of 'em, though they had often tried, but he always gave them better than they sent, and that once upon a time he was stopped by you, Dick!'

"'Stopped by me?' I heard Dick Turpin say. 'What account did he give of the meeting?'

"'Why, a most extraordinary one. He said that you stopped him and told him to hand over; but so far from obeying, the bagman declared he pulled out a pistol and held it in your face!'

"'Held a pistol in my face?' said Dick Turpin.

"'Yes,' continued the landlord, 'and that you were almost frightened out of your life!'

"'Oh, monstrous!' exclaimed Dick Turpin—'it seems monstrous!'

"'However, the bagman declared that you humbly begged his pardon—was very sorry you stopped him, and offered to give him all the money you had, if he would only let you off!'

"Well, gentlemen, Dick Turpin seemed rather astonished when he heard that, for he jumped up all of a sudden, and I heard him walking up and down the room—oh, such a peculiar walk it was—his boots seemed to make all the house shake again! Gentlemen, I only heard Dick Turpin walk on that one occasion, but I can solemnly declare, that if ever I heard him walk again I should know his footsteps in an instant!"

The announcement was received with ejaculations of wonder.

As for the bagman, he sat like one confounded.

Dick drank a little to moisten his throat, and resumed:

"Well, gentlemen, I don't want to occupy too much of your time, and go over the same ground twice. Perhaps it will do, if I say at once, that the account the landlord gave to Dick Turpin of what the bagman had said was just the very same tale, almost word for word, as that gentleman over there told you a little while ago!"

"Was it though?" said the man with the red face.

"It was!" said Dick, solemnly.

A cold perspiration started out all over the body of the commercial traveller.

He had told the same tale about his own prowess and the way he had dealt with Dick Turpin on such a many occasions, and with such a many variations, that he could not then and there take upon himself to say that he had not related the story in the inn that was alluded to.

"Yes, gentlemen," said Dick; "the substance of the bagman's story, as told by the landlord, was, that he made Dick Turpin hand over all the money he had got; beg humbly for his pardon, and then, afterwards, he let him go, and was never troubled with Dick Turpin or any of his gang any more!"

"And what did Dick Turpin say to that?" asked several voices in a breath.

"Ah!" said Dick, speaking more impressively than ever, "now comes the most wonderful and the most terrible part of all my story!"

CHAPTER DCXIV.

TURPIN FRIGHTENS THE BAGMAN UP THE CHIMNEY.

Upon hearing this announcement, every person present drew a long breath and fixed his eyes on the countenance of the highwayman.

All were eager and anxious to know what was coming next.

Dick finished his glass at one draught, and then he exclaimed;

"Tale-telling is dry work—very dry work indeed. I must have my glass filled again before I can go any further."

The landlord was summoned, and every one wished to have the honour of treating Dick with a glass, but he would not permit it; he insisted upon paying for glasses round once more.

This produced a trifling delay.

Few cared much about it, except the bagman, and he was burning with anxiety to know what Dick Turpin had been overheard to say concerning himself.

He really was as uneasy as though he had been sitting on thorns.

At last all was arranged, and Dick continued:

"Gentlemen," he said; "partly by the words he uttered, partly by the tones of his voice, and partly from the manner in which Dick Turpin paced up and down the room, I could tell as well as if I had seen him, that he was in a terrible passion about something."

The bagman's heart began to beat faster than ever.

"'Curses on it!' I heard Dick Turpin say at length, 'that cowardly soap-and-sugar selling rascal is for ever telling the same tale! It has come to my ears once or twice before, and I can tell, by the description I have had on each occasion, that it is the same man, and moreover, he has been so carefully described, that I should recognise him in a minute if I saw him."

These words caused the eyes of all present to be removed from Dick's countenance, and to be fixed upon the bagman's, whose uneasiness increased every moment.

"Well, gentlemen, the landlord finding Dick Turpin was in such a furious rage, got rather alarmed about the consequences, and tried to soothe him down, and make him quiet, but it was all to no purpose.

"'I'll be revenged upon him!' I heard Dick Turpin say, more fiercely than ever—'I'll be revenged upon him! He will not tell the tale many times more! For all his boasting and lying, I know he's the rankest coward that ever drank ale from a cup!'"

The bagman endeavoured to raise some protest against these remarks, but his voice was drowned by the remainder of those who were in the room, who insisted upon hearing all.

"'But, Dick,' I heard the landlord say, 'it's all false, isn't it?'

"'Of course it is!' was the reply.

"'Very well, then, why trouble yourself at all about it?'

"'Trouble be d—d!' said Dick Turpin—'it's no trouble; it'll be a pleasure! Wait till I once catch sight of the rascal, that's all; I only want to see him once, and then, I wager my head to a tenpenny nail, that he'd always remember me afterwards!'

"'But what shall you do, Dick?' asked the landlord.

"'I don't know!' was the savage rejoinder—'the most horrible thing I can think of! I should like to boil him in oil!'

"Did Dick Turpin say that?" asked the little red-faced man, in tones of the greatest wonder.

"Do you presume to impugn my veracity?" said Dick, imitating the bagman's manner to such a nicety, that all burst out into a roar of laughter, except the bagman himself, who, of course, failed to see the joke, though, as he was in a decided minority, that did not much matter.

"Oh, no—no—no!" said the red-faced man, with great rapidity—"nothing of the kind, sir, only it seemed such an extraordinary speech!"

"Well, it did, I admit, but it's true all the same, and from what I have heard of Dick Turpin, I should not feel at all surprised if he was to carry that particular threat into execution!"

"What, boil a man in oil?"

"Yes, that he certainly would if he had the opportunity!"

It was a great temptation to proceed in this strain, because, as he sat there speaking, he was able to note how much the agitation of the unfortunate commercial traveller increased.

It was only natural that Dick should feel a great deal of resentment, and quite as natural that he should avail himself of this easy means of making the bagman uncomfortable.

The intense terror under which he was evidently labouring was a tolerably good punishment, though not so severe a one as he deserved, but Dick hoped to make his alarm still greater.

Voices on all sides called upon him to continue, and, nothing loath, he resumed.

"Well, gentlemen, the landlord, finding that Dick Turpin had firmly made up his mind to have revenge in some way or other, said no more, and did not attempt to turn him from his purpose, but began to ask him how and by what means he hoped to find out the object of his rage.

"'I don't know,' he said. 'I have not thought about that yet; but, stop a minute, wouldn't a man like this be likely to stop at a good many inns on the roadside?'

"'Oh yes,' replied the landlord.

"'Very well, then, all is easy enough. Do you know which roads he travels?'

"'Sometimes the York Road, and sometimes the Oxford Road.'

"'I sha'n't forget,' said Dick Turpin; 'and now I think of it, I have laid hold of a plan. I shall be able to describe the sort of man I am on the look-out for, and at every public-house I stop at, I'll ask whether such a person has been seen or is in the house.'

The bagman's chair now fairly creaked, he trembled to such a degree.

"'But,' said the landlord to Dick Turpin, 'such a course will be dangerous; and, after all, what does it matter? Such a paltry wretch is surely quite beneath your notice!'

"'D—n the danger!' Dick Turpin replied in a minute. 'I have said I'll make him remember it, and I'll be as good as my word!'

"Well, gentlemen, that's the sum and substance of what I overheard, for, though they went on talking for some time longer, nothing fresh was mentioned. This, however, is quite certain: when they parted, Dick Turpin repeated his threats of vengeance, and declared that if it took him the rest of his life, he would call at public-houses by the roadside until he found the rascal who had been telling such infernal lies about him.

"That's all, gentlemen. And now, sir," Dick added, indicating the bagman, "you see that I had some grounds for my private opinion, and I was also right in saying that I had something to relate that concerned you very seriously!"

The bagman was not only in a most horrible state of fright, but he also found himself in the very uncomfortable position of having been proved to be no more than an idle boaster and unblushing liar—at least, that would be it if he remained silent and allowed things to take their course.

The most timid animal will often fight desperately when forced at bay, and so, being thus, in a manner of speaking, driven up in a corner, the bagman summoned up what courage he could, and resolved to make a bold stand.

"Sir," he exclaimed, fixing his eyes upon Dick, "I don't know who you are, and damme if I care, but I'll let you know that if you were the king himself you should not come here and tell your cock-and-bull stories about highwaymen! You've told your tale, sir, and, d—n it, you shall have my opinion of it! I say it is a lie, sir—a confounded lie from beginning to end!"

Dick Turpin started to his feet as though in a furious passion.

The guests rubbed their hands cheerfully, for they anticipated some kind of personal contest between the two strangers, and this they were quite willing should take place, so long as they were not hurt by any of the blows exchanged.

"Then," said Dick Turpin, in tones of assumed anger, "do you mean to say, Mr. Brown-paper-parcel, that you call me a liar?"

"Yes, I do, sir, and you shall either confess that all you have told is untrue, or else you shall prove it, sir—yes, prove it!"

"But how am I to prove it?" said Dick. 'The only way I could do that would be to call in Dick Turpin, which is impossible!"

"Ha, ha, my fine fellow!—very good!" said the traveller, growing more and more valorous as he went on, and assuming quite a swaggering air. "I know how to deal with such as you are! I believe that you're no better than a highwayman yourself!"

"The same to you," said Dick. "But hark! oh, what can I hear?"

Dick changed his voice very suddenly, and assumed an attitude of intense listening.

"What—what?" cried everybody, while the bagman looked rather alarmed.

"Luck favours me," said Dick, "I shall be able to prove my words—to prove them beyond all doubt!"

"How—how?" asked a chorus of voices.

"Listen! Do you hear that footstep? I can hear him coming!"

The bagman sprang to his feet.

"Who—who?" asked the guests.

"Dick Turpin! He's coming—he's in the passage—he's coming to the door,—can't you hear his footstep? I told you, gentlemen, before, that I only heard his footstep on that occasion, and that I should always be able to recognise it afterwards. He's coming! Now, Mr. Bagman, it will soon be known which of us has told the lie."

The sound of a heavy footstep in the passage could be distinctly heard by everyone present.

Fully believing that Dick's tale was true, and that the footstep outside announced the coming of the highwayman, about whom he had told so many lies, the bagman, with a yell of fear, made a frantic dash across the room.

His courage evaporated in an instant.

With his teeth chattering, and his knees knocking together, he looked round him for some place of concealment—some place where he could hide himself from the view of the notorious highwayman.

He saw the chimney, and the insane idea at once occurred to him that he would climb up it.

He rushed in that direction, making a terrific rattle among the fireirons.

Before he had time to recollect himself or remember what would be the consequences of what he was doing, the bagman got his head and shoulders up the chimney, but, as there happened to be a large fire roaring in the grate, the heat to his knees was by far too great to be pleasant—in fact, more than he could bear, so he had no alternative but to quit his place of concealment, or stop there and be roasted.

He was not so terrified as to be ignorant that the first was the best course for him to pursue, and so, with yells and shrieks and groans, caused partly by terror and partly by the pain of the burns he had received, he got down into the fender again.

Then, indeed, did he present a truly ludicrous but pitiable spectacle to all the guests.

His head, and face, and hands, and the upper part of his clothing were completely covered with soot, and he brought with him a very disagreeable odour of burnt clothes and singed flesh.

Just as he reached the fender, and attempted to dash the soot from his eyes so as to get them open, the door was flung back upon its hinges.

He half saw it—half heard it.

Maddened with terror, rage, and pain—blinded by the soot—and with the horrible idea that the notorious highwayman, Dick Turpin, was at hand, ready to wreak his vengeance upon him—the unfortunate bagman made a terrific rush for the third time.

A scene of the utmost confusion and dismay immediately ensued.

CHAPTER DCXV.

THE POLICE OFFICER OPENS THE DOOR IN THE CLOCK-CASE, AND MEETS WITH A SURPRISE.

THE mere fact of the bagman having attempted to perform the impracticable feat of hiding himself in the chimney is quite sufficient to prove that he had altogether lost control over his senses.

Therefore, failing in this first endeavour to escape, he looked around him for some other hiding-place, and then made a rush in the way we have already mentioned.

He made a frantic and ridiculous attempt to conceal himself underneath a chair.

This chair was the one in which the little red-faced man was sitting, who had interrupted Dick Turpin in his narrative so often by his ejaculations of wonder.

So violently and desperately did the bagman endeavour to crawl underneath the front rail of the heavy oaken chair that he overturned it.

The crash was prodigious.

The little man with the red face was so astonished that he believed an earthquake had certainly taken place.

He struggled desperately—so did the bagman; and the pair rolled underneath the table.

Here their struggles became fiercer than ever, and then, with a crash, that made the overturning of the chair insignificant, the table was suddenly raised in the air and upset.

Down it came on its side, carrying with it the lights, and all the glasses, and jugs of hot water that were on the table.

Scarcely one in the company escaped a scald or a contusion of some kind or other, and the noise and racket which ensued, together with the terrified cries uttered by the bagman, and the oaths and curses that came from those who had been scalded or bruised, altogether defies description.

It is quite certain that such a confusion had never been known before in the parlour of the Eight Bells Inn.

Of course, Dick Turpin and Tom King were highly amused by this scene, and the former was quite content with the vengeance he had had upon the man who had so misrepresented his character.

The room was plunged in darkness, for the bagman had caused at least a bushel of soot to fall down the chimney into the grate.

This had the effect of deadening the flame, so that a dull red glare was all that came from between the bars.

The scuffling and struggles to get up were at their highest, when Turpin, taking hold of his companion by the arm, drew him out of the parlour and shut the door.

In taking hold of the knob outside, in order to do this, his hand encountered the key, and almost without a thought he turned it, so that all within were prisoners.

"I think," said Dick, "that after this little breeze, the sooner we are off the better."

"Yes, decidedly. It was altogether rash on your part. But how are we to leave until the costumier comes?"

"Ah, I had forgotten that. Well, we will not remain in the house at any rate. Let's go out to the back, and find the ostler."

"Which is the way?"

"I'll be hanged if I can tell you!—the place is so confoundedly dark!"

What might be termed the entrance-hall of the inn, which was, in fact, a narrow passage running from front to back, was in a state of great obscurity.

There was one miserable oil lamp depending from the ceiling.

The light it gave forth was never very brilliant, even when all circumstances were favourable; but now, from the flickering nature of the flame that played around the long wick, it seemed as though it had remained a long while without being attended to.

Almost at random, then—for they were not certain whether they were going towards the front or the back of the inn—the two highwaymen groped their way along the passage; but before they had gone many paces Tom King cried:

"Hush—hark! I hear some one coming!"

Dick paused at once, and then the sound of footsteps smote upon his ear.

It so happened that they halted very near to the oil lamp of which we have spoken, and, of course, in the lightest part of the passage.

Directly afterwards, they saw some one advancing.

Not believing that they were in any particular danger, our friends stood close to the wall, in order to ascertain who this new-comer was.

To their surprise and satisfaction, they found that it was the old costumier.

"We are here, and waiting for you," said Dick, immediately.

The old costumier bowed low, as he always did, and in a low tone of voice he replied:

"Munificent sir, I am glad we have met here."

"That's right!" said Turpin. "Where are the disguises?"

"I have them outside in the hackney-coach; but I fear they will be of no service. Hark!—do you hear that?"

Turpin and Tom King both listened intently.

Then, very faintly but yet very distinctly, they heard horses' feet upon the road, though not coming at a rapid pace.

"Who are they?" said Dick.

"Your foes, munificent sir!"

"Are you sure of it?"

"Quite. Since our meeting with each other, they have been suspicious of me, and have placed a close watch around my house, particularly during the last two or three days. Wherever I have gone I have been followed, and to-night, when I set out from my house in a hackney-coach, I was followed by a troop of officers."

"Can this be possible?"

"It is true. They have suspected me for a long time."

"Hark!" said Tom King. "We must be speedy—they have just arrived."

With a sudden dash, a troop of horsemen pulled up in the open space in front of the inn.

"We must be off at once!" said Turpin, "The way you came was from the front, was it not?"

"It was," replied the costumier.

"Then our way lies in the opposite direction."

"Can I do anything to serve you, munificent sir?"

"I fear not. On this occasion the police have defeated my plans. Good night?"

Turpin and King, feeling sure that they had not a second to lose, turned round and made their way with all possible speed to the back door of the inn.

They dashed through it and got into the yard at the back just as the police officers entered the front.

Before following the highwaymen any further, we will just say a word or two about the latter.

As the costumier had correctly stated, the officers were suspicious of him, and maintained a vigilant guard around his house.

Although they had never been able to prove, yet they had good grounds for believing, that he was acquainted with the highwaymen and in the habit of communicating with them; therefore they not unreasonably judged, by following him wherever he went, they should eventually make a discovery which would repay them well for all their trouble.

The costumier was aware of this, and shook his head when he received Dick Turpin's note.

Nevertheless, he resolved to comply with his wishes as far as he was able.

At any rate, he hoped it would be in his power to warn the highwaymen of their danger, and make them aware of the extreme danger they would be in if they ventured to approach his house.

When the costumier had got a little way on his journey, he heard the trampling of horses' feet in the rear, and, putting his head out of the coach window, he saw that a large troop of officers was following, but they continued to keep some few yards in the rear.

When they suddenly halted in front of the Eight Bells, all sprang as quickly as possible from their saddles, and with the exception of one who remained to take care of the horses, they made their way into the inn.

In the passage they found the old costumier.

They pretended to take no notice of him, but quickly spread themselves all over the passage.

Then they heard a furious noise going on in one of the rooms.

This was the parlour.

Heavy blows were rained upon the door, and there were cries for help and cries of pain, as well as shouts and swearing.

A struggle, too, was evidently going on.

The police officers were on the alert immediately, and, with their usual acuteness, jumped to the conclusion that the highwaymen they wanted were in the room, and that some one was then making an attempt to capture them; hence all the riot.

Collecting themselves in one body, they opened the door and walked in.

The place was still in profound darkness.

No soner was the door opened than of course all the guests made a terrific rush to escape, but as they did so they were, in spite of all resistance and protestations on their part, made prisoners by the police officers.

Then one of the most active and enterprising of them went to the fireplace, and, taking up the poker, stirred the fire.

A bright blaze immediately shot up into the chimney, and then the interior of that apartment was fully revealed.

Such a scene of havoc and confusion as met their gaze could hardly be imagined.

But as the officers mustered about a dozen in number altogether, they managed to take prisoners all the people in the parlour, the landlord himself included.

A rapid examination was then made of each in succession.

The officers were well acquainted with the appearance of the highwaymen, and these tradespeople and the landlord differed so from the description, that they had no hesitation in liberating them at once.

But when we said they made all the people in the parlour prisoners we were not quite right.

There was one exception.

This was the bagman.

His fright had not subsided yet, and, in the same delirious state as before, he had got inside a large clock that stood opposite the fireplace.

The clock was one of that old-fashioned make with a large case coming right down to the floor, and with a large door in front.

The space inside was quite sufficient to enable the bagman to stand upright in it.

He would have crouched down to the very bottom had such a thing been possible.

But there was not space enough for this, and so, trembling all over like a jelly, he stood bolt upright in the clock-case.

One of the police officers went round the room, prying into all the nooks and corners, and presently he came to the clock.

It did not occur to him for a moment that anyone might be concealed in so unlikely a place, but he opened the door just as a mere matter of duty.

As the clock stood just opposite the blazing fire, it was of course brought out into very vivid relief.

The officer was not at all prepared for the extraordinary sight which met his eyes so soon as ever he opened the door.

There stood the bagman, with his face, and hair, and hands completely covered with soot.

He was as black as a negro, and here and there his face and clothes were streaked with blood.

"The devil!" shouted the officer, in the utmost alarm, as he slammed the door shut and locked it in a moment.

CHAPTER DCXVI.

THE CHIEF POLICE OFFICER FINDS HE HAS MADE A DEPLORABLE MISTAKE.

THE loud shout given by the officer, upon making this astounding and horrible discovery, had of course the immediate effect of attracting universal attention to him.

"The what?" said the one who had the command. "What is it, Jenkins?"

Jenkins looked very white, his teeth chattered, and his eyes rolled wildly.

"The devil!" he replied, solemnly.

"You're drunk, I think," said his chief.

"No, I'm not, sir—no, I'm not. There's the devil inside the clock!"

"Inside the clock? Pooh—nonsense! It's no devil, I know. I'll soon show you what it is!"

With these words, the commanding-officer, in a very valorous way, strode across the room to the clock.

His finger was on the key, when suddenly such a horrible, dismal, groaning shriek, from the inside of the clock-case reached his ears, that he stood still as though changed to stone.

All the other officers looked alarmed and half inclined to bolt out of the room.

The poor bagman inside was now beginning to recover his composure.

He understood that those outside were police officers, and he concluded from that fact that they would be friends of his, not enemies, and would make any attempt that Dick Turpin might make upon him quite abortive.

So, after the door of the clock was slammed shut, he made up his mind to get out.

The door was fast, as he found by putting his hand against it, and then he cried out to be released.

Of course his voice had a very strange and muffled sound in that confined space.

His mouth, too, was filled with soot, so that it was no articulate sound which reached the ears of the officer outside.

Then suddenly the bagman, growing desperate again, resolved to open the door of the clock-case.

Like everything else that was done in the good old times, the lock was a substantial one.

He pushed against it with all his might, and in doing so, caused the clock to lean forward in a very remarkable and highly dangerous manner.

All present looked upon it with amazement and alarm.

The oscillations of the clock backwards and forwards grew greater every time, until all at once with a tremendous crash the clock fell forward on its face.

The smash was tremendous.

Jenkins' assertion that the devil was in the clock was now considered to be confirmed, and there was not one who did not think it high time to quit the parlour.

They ran as far as the passage, and then the costumier said to the officers:

"I should not wonder now if that is not Dick Turpin who has hidden himself in the clock."

This was a suggestion that the officers grasped at at once, and they all thought what fools they were not to have come to that conclusion from the first.

Their courage returned instantly, and the one in command, muttering something about Jenkins being a d—d fool, led the way into the room.

He and his men soon made a circle round the clock, inside of which some very active movements were being made.

The clock was not furnished with any bottom, since it was unnecessary, for the clock-case stood on the floor, which formed all the bottom that was required.

It was towards this extremity, then, that the police officers directed their attention, and there they saw two feet kicking up and down in a frantic manner.

"Oh, it's Dick Turpin, sure enough!" said the one in command. "Talk about the devil! Lay hold of his feet, Jenkins, and don't make a d—d fool of yourself!"

The kicking feet were seized by a couple of police officers, who, exerting their strength, pulled and pulled until at last the body of a man was disclosed.

They pounced upon him like so many tigers, and held him up to the light.

The poor commercial traveller was now more bewildered than ever, and such was the condition he was in, that it would have been hard indeed for anyone to say that he was not Dick Turpin.

The interior of the clock-case had not been cleaned out for many a day, and consequently it was thickly lined with dust and cobwebs, which had transferred themselves to his apparel.

The bagman received some rather severe injuries by the fall of the clock, and his nose was bleeding at an alarming rate.

The officers had no pity.

The prisoner tried to speak.

At last, by dint of spitting out some soot and swallowing the remainde , he managed to gasp out:

"Oh, Mr. Officers—oh, gentlemen, help me—save me—protect me from Dick Turpin He has sworn to be the death of me!"

"Ha, ha!—very good that—a good joke too, Mr. Dick! Your end is come: you've played your jokes upon a good many, but it's all up now!"

The bagman groaned.

"Ah, give up," said the officer—"give up! A pretty figure you cut, to be sure. Why, Jenkins, I'm not at all surprised that you should take him for the devil. I'm sure he's quite as black!"

The landlord and the other guests having now recovered themselves from their excitement, ventured to enter the parlour again, and candles were brought and placed upon the mantelpiece, so that once more the apartment was tolerably well illuminated.

The landlord was like a man in a dream.

"Bless me!" he said, regarding the prisoner. "Do you mean to say that's Dick Turpin?"

"Of course it is, and you'll have to answer for harbouring him in your house!"

"Well, I could never have believed it! I have known him for a matter of ten years off and on, but I always thought his name was Keating, and that he was a bagman."

"Yes—yes," cried the unfortunate prisoner, speaking with more distinctness than before, "my name is Keating, and I am a bagman, and I call upon all here present to prove my identity!"

"It won't do!" said the chief officer. "You've been let off a great many times by your tricks; but you'll have to try a cunning one before I lose you! I happened to learn that you were at this inn, so, you see, I have caught you!"

The bagman groaned again in despair.

"Ah, groan away!" continued the chief officer. "I hope it'll do you good! You're safe now, at any rate."

"But, I say," exclaimed the little red-faced man, trying to stanch the blood that was flowing from his nose—"I say, what's gone with those two gentlemen that were sitting over there?"

The landlord looked around.

"Oh, they've gone," he said, "somehow or other!"

"Two gentlemen?" exclaimed the officer, pricking up his ears. "Who were they?"

As well as they could, those present described the appearance of the two highwaymen.

The chief officer let out an oath.

"I'll de d—d," he said, "if I don't believe we've been sold, after all! Here, somebody fetch a bucket of water! We'll soon have this mystery cleared up; but as I said before, I believe we've been sold—I do! D—n it!"

The bucket of water was quickly procured.

"Hold him tight!" said the one in command, referring to the bagman, who was in the grasp of a couple of police officers—"hold him tight! I'll soon settle it!"

With these words, he picked up the bucket, and discharged its contents full in the face of the unfortunate bagman.

On that night probably he met with more misfortunes in a couple of hours than he had done in all his life before.

This vigorous application of a quantity of water was very effectual so far as the removal of the soot was concerned, and that was all the officers cared about.

The black covering disappeared from the bagman's face as if by magic.

"D—n it all!" cried the chief officer, as he dashed the bucket violently on the ground. "Just as I expected—we're sold, after all! Let the fool go! He's no more Dick Turpin than he's the Lord Mayor of London!"

The officers looked from one to the other in surprise, and obeyed.

"Now, then, Mr. Landlord," said the chief officer "your conduct is suspicious—I might go so far as to say damnably suspicious! Where are the two gentlemen that have been spoken of? D—d odd to me if they don't turn out to be the two highwaymen!"

"I know nothing at all about them," said the landlord; "no more than anyone else here present."

"Well, we shall see about that. Jenkins, you stop here in charge. Come on, my boys, we will try what we can find out at the back!"

The police officers sallied out into the inn yard.

They saw the stables before them, and entered them at once.

"What is it, gentlemen?" said the ostler, coming forward.

"Have you seen two highwaymen lately?"

"Lor, sir, no, not as I knowes on!"

"Have you seen anyone leave the inn lately?"

"Yes," said the ostler, with great emphasis, "I have."

"Who?"

"Well, that, Mr. Hofficer, I can't go so far as to say. Howsomever, they're not highwaymen. I'm certain."

"How do you know that?"

"I'm quite certain of it!"

"What were they, then?"

"Two gentlemen!"

"Two devils!"

"No," said the ostler, very positively, "not two devils, two real gentlemen, and I rather think that I've lived quite long enough in this 'ere world to know a gentleman as is a gentleman when I sees him!"

"Oh, do you? And where are these two gentlemen you speak of? Which way did they go? Tell us, and if you attempt any deceit, you'll be transported for aiding and abetting criminals! Think of that!"

The ostler scratched his head, and looked puzzled.

"I don't want no deceit," he said, "but them two real gentlemen, they mounted their horses, and they remembered me—real gentlemen allis does remember the ostler, and that's how I tells 'em—and then they rode off!"

"And which way did they go?"

"Why, out into the high-road, of course!"

"And which way then?"

"Don't know no more than you, Mr. Hofficer, for I went back into the stables at once."

"Oh, did you? Well, you'll consider yourself in custody!"

"What for?"

"That you'll find out by-and-by! Phillpot!"

"Yes, sir!"

"Just take charge of the ostler here, and see he don't escape."

The officer who rejoiced in the name of Phillpot obeyed.

The chief officer, followed by his men, then made his way round to the front of the inn.

Here the one officer still remained who had charge of the horses.

"Have you seen anyone go by on horseback?" he asked.

"No," was the reply; "and yet, as I stood here sometime back, I fancied I saw two shadowy-looking objects out there creeping along, and presently afterwards I heard the clatter of horses' feet."

"Oh, d—n all highwaymen, I say, if they're such trouble as this! We must make one more effort! Mount, my lads! We will try whether any good can be done by a long gallop! When we do catch them, the reward will pay us for all our trouble!"

CHAPTER DCXVII.

DICK TURPIN, WITHOUT KNOWING IT, FINDS HIMSELF IN A FAIR WAY OF OBTAINING THE MUCH-WISHED FOR DISGUISES.

The reader must, of course, be aware that the delay on the part of the officers, in consequence of their entering the parlour and making such a mistake, was highly favourable to the highwaymen.

When they reached the inn yard, they ran towards the stables as quickly as they could.

The ostler was hard at work inside.

Dick shut the door, and went up to him, saying:

"We are in a particular hurry! Make haste, and put the saddles and bridles on!"

"All right!" said the ostler, with the deepest respect.

And he instantly left what he was about, in order to comply with the highwayman's command.

As he brought the trappings for the horses, Dick and Tom put them on, so that they were ready for the road in an inconceivably short space of time.

There was no need for so much hurry on their part; but then they did not know it, and, after all, it was best that they should get far away from the inn as quickly as they could.

Dick Turpin gave the ostler a five-shilling piece, which confirmed that individual in his opinion that he had been attending to two gentlemen who were gentlemen.

Turpin and King mounted just outside the stable-door, and walked their horses quietly across the yard in the direction of the highway.

"What a confounded nuisance it is," said Tom King, in a suppressed voice, "that the officers should have made their appearance here just at this moment!"

"It is vexatious!"

"It's more than that, Dick—it's more than that!—it's d—d annoying!"

"I quite agree with you. But be cautious—no doubt some of the police-officers are lurking about."

It was now close upon morning, and in half an hour or so the new day would certainly dawn.

Proverbially, the darkest hour is said to be that before the dawn, and if this is not always the case, it certainly was on that occasion.

The obscurity was very great indeed, and, accustomed as the highwaymen were to use their eyes in the darkness, they found a difficulty in looking around them, in order to ascertain whether any police-officers were skulking about.

So far as they could tell, however, none were at hand, and they pushed on towards the archway under which they would have to pass.

"What vexes me most," said Dick Turpin, "is that we have actually and truly lost the whole night!"

"We have," said Tom King. "It will be daylight soon, and we are no nearer obtaining our disguises now than we were three hours ago."

"Not so near, for then there was a chance, and now there is not."

"Stop a minute," said Tom King. "We are under the archway, and cannot be seen, and our foes don't appear to be on the alert. Let us consider a moment."

Dick stopped by his companion's request, and then Tom King went on:

"Did not the costumier say that he had brought some disguises with him, and that he had left them in the hackney-coach?"

"Yes, he did, and that the hackney-coach was in front of the inn."

"Ah, I thought so! Well, it appears to me that we must manage to get possession of the bundle somehow, and then all will be well."

Dick shook his head.

"I'm afraid that won't do, Tom!"

"Why not?"

"The risk is too great. We must look for our disguises in some other quarter."

"Where?"

"That I cannot tell at present, but I am of opinion that the best thing we can do is to show our enemies a clean pair of heels. Perhaps while we are lingering here they are concocting some plan against us, which we shall defeat if we hasten off."

"I agree in all that you say," said Tom King, "and am most anxious to be gone; but how we are to get our disguises without we take the bundle out of the hackney coach is more than I can tell."

"We must trust to chance and good luck," said Dick Turpin.

"I would sooner trust to making the attempt to get the bundle out of the coach. Come forward a little and let us reconnoitre."

Turpin willingly obeyed, and then, when they reached the front part of the archway, where they could command a view of the open space in front of the inn, Tom King was induced, after one glance, to give up his idea.

There was the hackney-coach sure enough, but round it stood the horses belonging to the police-officers, and near these stood the one man who had been left on guard.

"It won't do, Tom," said Dick; "give up the idea. If you attempt to creep forward you will be seen—the alarm will be raised, and it will be all over! The thing is quite impossible!"

"I fear so."

"Come along, then, we will go as noiselessly as we can for a little way, and then make what speed we think proper."

"I wonder what on earth has happened to keep them inside the inn so long?"

"Never mind, so long as they're there," said Turpin, "I can see some chance of our getting far away without having them at our heels for an hour or two; but if we attempt to approach the hackney-coach we shall have them all at our backs."

Tom King said no more, for he fully coincided with his companion's remarks.

The police-officer outside was quite right when he fancied he saw two dim, shadowy objects in the distance.

They were the two highwaymen.

When they imagined they were almost out of hearing, they put spure to their horses' sides and set off at a gallop; but before they had gone far, Dick Turpin pulled up.

"What is it now?" said Tom King.

"Why, it's no good for us to continue to gallop along the road away from London. Look over there! Do you see that long streak of grey light?"

"I do."

"And I suppose you know what it means?"

"Yes; I know that before long it will be broad daylight; but I don't know which way you're going, or what you intend to do."

"Nor I myself at present. We will leave the highroad, and take our course across the country, so as to approach London in another direction."

"Very well, as you will. All I hope is, that Maud won't be called up to take her trial to-day."

"Why?"

"Because I think there is but slight prospect of our being there to witness it."

"We shall see," said Turpin; and as he spoke he turned Black Bess's head towards a low hedge which divided the high-road from the meadows.

She leaped over gallantly, and Tom followed in capital style.

As is often the case just before sunrise, a dense white mist was floating about over the meadows.

Sometimes the vapour would collect in one spot, and leave a large open space; and sometimes it would lie only a few inches above the ground, and sometimes extend many feet above their heads.

As it grew lighter, however, the mist began to dissipate.

The highwaymen galloped across the country for some time, until, at length, just as the first beams of the sun were gilding the tree-tops, they paused, and in a rather peculiar place.

They were close to a low, prickly hedge, which was planted on the top of an embankment.

About twelve or fifteen feet below they saw a cross-country road.

By the appearance of the place, it would seem that there had originally been a very steep hill in this part, and that, in order to obviate the difficulty of drawing heavy loads up to the summit of it, a level road had been cut.

Just where the highwaymen had halted there was an embankment on the other side, of a precisely similar character.

But the appearance of this spot will be best understood when we say that it resembled a railway cutting.

"That will be a steep place to get down, Dick," said Tom King. "What a lucky thing it was we stopped!"

"True," was the reply. "We should have looked awkward if we had tried to take a leap!"

"We should, indeed! However, I knew there was some such place hereabouts, and that's why I paused."

"But you are not going to stay here?"

"Oh, no; only for a moment."

"Then we will descend. But hark! I fancy I can hear a footstep on the road below."

"I don't suppose it concerns us."

"Well, never mind. Let us look and see who it is; at any rate, there can be no harm in that," said Dick. "Slip off your horse, Tom—we don't want to be seen."

"Not by any means," said Tom, as he complied with his comrade's suggestion.

Leaving the horses to themselves, our two friends crept on foot closer to the edge of the embankment, and, concealing themselves from the view of whoever might be below by the thick hedge, they peeped down.

Looking down they saw, walking along the road, a man—or rather a gentleman, for his attire entitled him to this designation.

He appeared to be a young man, though the early rays of the sun shining upon his countenance showed that it had a worn, dissipated, and aged look.

His cheeks were puffed and swollen, and, in a word, he presented the appearance of one accustomed to live freely.

He was attired in sportsman's costume, and in his hand he carried a small gun.

A slight rustling in the hedge at the top of the embankment reached his ears, and, without pausing a moment, he placed his gun to his shoulder, and, taking aim at the exact spot where our friends were concealed, pulled the trigger.

A sharp report followed.

Dick had only just time to save himself by sinking down and dragging his companion with him.

A storm of small shot then went crashing through the branches above them.

"Nothing there, it seems," they heard the sportsman below say. "I thought I heard something, too."

The two highwaymen remained profoundly quiet, and then they distinctly heard another footstep in the road below.

Then some words were exchanged, and their curiosity rose to such a degree that, in spite of the risk, they crept nearer to the edge of the embankment in order to peep down.

They then saw the sportsman, with his discharged gun resting negligently on the ground, addressing a man, who, in all outward appearance, differed greatly from himself.

This man, who was attired as a well-to-do farmer, was probably about fifty years of age, though he looked many years younger.

He was a stout, florid, hale, and hearty-looking man, with broad shoulders and broad palms, and with the hue of health upon his cheeks.

His countenance usually wore a smiling, jovial expression, but now a frown had settled upon it as he spoke angrily yet respectfully to the sportsman.

CHAPTER DCXVIII.

DICK TURPIN UNEXPECTEDLY OBTAINS A DISGUISE, AND FINDS A MEANS TO REACH LONDON WITHOUT EXCITING SUSPICION.

THERE was something in the attitude of these two men that proclaimed their relation to each other to be master and dependant.

In the sportsman there was a degree of supercilious-ness and haughtiness visible; while the farmer, though firm and manly, like one who would stand up for his own rights, yet preserved towards the other a deference both in his deeds and gestures.

"Now, John Adams," the highwaymen heard the sportsman say, "you had better think twice before you make an enemy of me."

"I should be very sorry, my lord," replied the farmer, John Adams, "to gain the ill-will of anyone, much less my landlord's son."

"Well, then, why persist in your obstinate and ridiculous refusal of my wishes? Consider the matter again. I am willing to give you time for reflection."

"I want no reflection," was the farmer's reply—"the subject does not need it. Reflect yourself. You are the only son of the Lord of the Manor, and I am certainly not the richest of your father's dependants."

"Very true," said the young man, playing carelessly with his gun. "That is all quite correct, and I know it as well as you do. Some day I shall in all probability be the Lord of the Manor, and your master myself."

"I hope you may be," said the farmer, still respectfully; "but, for your father's sake, I hope it will be long first."

"Such speeches as these are all very fine, John Adams—all very fine—they are very good! But we have had enough of a good thing! Now let us turn to this question once more! I tell you you have acted foolishly in removing your daughter, and placing her I know not where!"

The farmer shook his head.

"I tell you you have!" said the young lord, with increasing impatience and anger—"I tell you you have—you have gone far towards incurring my resentment."

"I hope not," said John Adams; "or, if I have, I hope the feeling will soon wear away. Upon reflection, you will come to the conclusion that I have acted wisely and well. You will rejoice both for your sake and for hers too."

"Bah!"

"I still hold to my opinion—it will be for the best!"

"Hark ye, Farmer Adams! I am in earnest now! Tell me at once where you have secreted your daughter or you will make me your enemy for life."

"Never!"

"Beware, I say! Tell me at once!"

"Never!" said the farmer again, and with increased firmness; "and now that I have given you your answer, allow me to pass on!"

"Nay, stand where you are!"

"Do not tempt me too far," said the farmer, clenching his hands. "If you will let me pass, I will promise you to say no more about this matter—not a soul shall know of it!"

"I care not what you may say! Who will be credited most readily think you, the farmer, or the Lord of the Manor?"

"No one can accuse me of lying!"

"Bah!—be silent! You will find it to your interest to do what I require! Where is she?"

"My lord, tempt me no further! I tell you, once for all, you have your answer!"

"Stand, I say! Do not presume to stir from this spot until I give you permission to do so!"

"This high-road is as much my property as it is yours, my lord, and you have no power over my actions! I am going!"

"Stand still, I say!"

"I will not!"

"Do you dare to refuse?"

"I do, my lord, most firmly and respectfully refuse to remain here any longer!"

"I tell you to stay!" said the young lord, fiercely.

The farmer made no reply, but walked on.

"Stay!" cried the young lord—"stay, or I will make you!"

The farmer still walked on, determined to put an end to the interview.

A storm of rage arose in the young man's breast upon perceiving this disregard of his orders.

He was evidently beside himself with anger.

He held the gun by the barrel, and then, whirling it round his head, brought it down with full force upon the farmer's head, who little anticipated such an act of treachery.

The angry cry which came from the nobleman's lips made him turn half round.

He saw the butt of the gun descending, and put up his hands to save himself from the effects of the blow.

But he was too late.

There was a crashing sound, and then he laid insensible in the roadway.

The young nobleman was insane with anger.

[MAUD TAKES HER TRIAL AT THE OLD BAILEY.]

"Dog!" he cried. "Things have come to a pretty pass indeed, if a lord is to be braved thus by a peasant, and with impunity. Take that, you scoundrel!—and mind how you behave to your superiors in future!"

He raised the gun as he spoke, and evidently intended to deal the prostrate farmer another blow.

But his intention was frustrated in a remarkable and unexpected manner.

"Hold!" a voice cried, in loud and startling tones—"hold, you coward, or I fire!"

These words rang out with great effect in the silent early morning air.

The young nobleman—by courtesy, not nature—could not stop the gun from descending, but allowed it to fall gently to the earth.

In the utmost surprise he looked up—for he fancied the voice came from above—and then he saw the figures of two men standing on the brink of the embankment above.

They were no others than our old friends Dick Turpin and Tom King.

Both had listened with the deepest interest to the strange conversation which had passed between the farmer and the Lord of the Manor's son.

The allusions to the past were somewhat vague, and yet they were sufficient to enable our two friends to draw tolerably correct conclusions from them.

While feeling the greatest disgust at the manner in which the young nobleman behaved and spoke, they could not, on the other hand, help admiring the firm and respectful demeanour of the farmer, which showed out all the more conspicuously by the contrast.

The highwaymen fully sympathised with all he said, but, bad as they believed the young nobleman to be, yet they did not for one moment imagine he would be so base as to act in the treacherous manner he had done.

When he raised his gun and brought it down upon the farmer's head, which he did with lightning-like rapidity, our friends were so astonished that they were incapable of speech or motion.

They recovered themselves, however, just as the gun was raised a second time, and then they cried out in the manner we have described.

Nor did they remain standing still, but commenced at once to descend the embankment.

The young nobleman saw that both carried pistols in their hands, and as they came nearer, and he could see their faces with more distinctness, he could tell by their determined expression that they would bear no trifling.

Yet his eyes absolutely sparkled with rage, and, in a hoarse voice, he cried:

"Begone, fellows—begone! What business have you to interfere?"

"That you will soon see!" cried Turpin, increasing his rate of descent.

With an angry cry, the young nobleman placed his gun to his shoulder, forgetting at the moment that he had discharged it and not loaded it again.

He flung it down upon the ground impatiently, and then, probably from fear and from a dislike to face the two new-comers, he turned round, and ran off at full speed along the road.

"Stop!" cried Dick, as he reached the bottom of the embankment—"stop—stop I say! If you refuse, I will fire!"

Of this threat the young nobleman took not the slightest notice, for, such was the deference with which he was always treated by all persons on his father's estate, that he did not for a moment believe it possible that anyone would have the presumption to fire at him.

He was quickly undeceived, however, for Dick Turpin, finding his injunction disobeyed, took aim hastily, and pulled the trigger.

This was done upon the mere impulse of the moment, and directly he had pulled the trigger he repented of what he had done.

But his indignation at the conduct of the young man was so great that he could not control himself.

A loud scream mingled with the report of the pistol, and the young nobleman, clapping both his hands to the hind part of his person, ran on with redoubled speed.

Both highwaymen laughed when they observed the action, and Tom King said:

"You've hit him, Dick."

"I suppose I have; and yet he may be only frightened, for the fellow is evidently a rank coward at heart."

"If he is wounded there, it won't much matter," said Tom King. "The place is tender, but a bullet there would not be likely to prove fatal."

A deep groan at this moment struck upon their ears, and, looking in the direction from which the sound came, they saw the honest old farmer endeavouring to raise himself on one arm.

The young nobleman was by this time out of sight, and, as our friends did not feel inclined to pursue him, they immediately turned their attention to a more worthy object.

The blood was trickling down the farmer's countenance, for the skin on the top of his head had been broken.

It was evident he was fast recovering his consciousness.

It seemed strange that his skull should have withstood so well such a heavy blow, but then the thickness of an English farmer's skull is proverbial.

Turpin and King at once stooped down over him, and Dick said:

"Are you much hurt?"

"I don't know, gentlemen, I am sure. My head feels very queer, and spins round like a top."

"I am glad to find you are not so severely injured as I thought you would be. I feared the blow would be mortal."

The farmer was every moment recovering his composure.

He sat up in the road, and, though his face wore a rueful expression, he nevertheless said, in a cheerful voice:

"It was a hardish crack, I admit. Confound him! I should never have believed him capable of such conduct! He has tried me sorely, and I have had to struggle hard to retain my forbearance."

"He was going to repeat the blow," said Tom King.

"Yes, I know it. I saw him raise the gun, and I heard you say something in a loud tone. Gentlemen," he added, "I don't know who you are, but it seems to me pretty certain that I owe my life to you."

"I am glad," said Turpin, "that chance brought us to this spot in time to render you this service. Can you rise, think you?"

"With your assistance, no doubt I can."

"Then you shall have it freely."

Between them, Turpin and King raised the farmer to his feet.

A feeling of faintness and giddiness then came over him, and he would have fallen, but for the support his two new friends afforded him; but he was a remarkably strong man, and this feeling quickly passed away.

"My head is bad," he said. "That was a harder blow than I thought. I think I had better get home at once."

"By all means," said Turpin. "Have you far to go?"

"No, not far. The ground on either side of you I hold from the Lord of the Manor, the father of that young scapegrace."

"And is your home close by?"

"About half a mile off—no more. If you will assist me along the road a little way, I shall feel deeply grateful. In a few minutes, I have no doubt, I shall be stronger."

"I will see you to your own door with the greatest pleasure," said Turpin, who saw at once that he might be able to turn this accidental encounter to great advantage.

"No; that would be troubling you too much."

"Not at all—not at all! Do you think you can manage to walk by leaning upon my arm alone?"

"Oh, yes! I am quite sure of it."

"Then my friend will follow us with the horses."

"Horses?" said the farmer. "I can see none."

"No, they are at the top of the embankment. We left them there to come to your assistance."

"Gentlemen, I shall be grateful—always deeply grateful to you for the service you have rendered me to-day. You have saved my life, and, though I value it myself, yet there are others who prize it still more, and who would grieve deeply if I was to die."

"I don't doubt that," said Turpin, "for I say in perfect sincerity that, although I have known you for so short a time, I have learned to respect you. You are an honest, true-hearted Englishman!"

CHAPTER DCXIX.

DICK TURPIN FINDS HIS MEETING WITH THE FARMER LEADS TO VERY IMPORTANT RESULTS.

THE honest heart of John Adams, the farmer, swelled with pride and joy as Dick Turpin spoke, for the tone in which the words were uttered proved conclusively that Turpin was sincere.

"I try to do my duty to the best of my ability," said the farmer, "and I can safely say that I never made an enemy wilfully in the whole course of my life."

"But you have a foe now."

"Yes," said the farmer—"one who has a bad heart, and who would not scruple to commit any wickedness. All my doubts concerning him have been confirmed to-day."

"He is a treacherous rascal," said Dick, "and it will be a thousand pities if such a one ever becomes the Lord of the Manor."

"He does not deserve it—he does not deserve it! And yet his father is as good and as just a man as ever lived."

While this conversation was proceeding, Tom King scrambled up the side of the embankment, and secured the two horses.

He then led them gradually down the hill, and joined his comrade and the farmer after they had gone about a couple of hundred yards.

"I was deeply interested in the strange conversation that took place between you and this young man" continued Turpin.

"No doubt you were, sir; and there is much you could not understand, though you might be able to hazard a tolerably good guess. However, I will tell you in a few words what it is all about, and then you shall judge whether I have acted right or not."

"I already know sufficient to decide that," said Turpin. "Still, I am curious."

"Then I will tell you. I have held Riverside Farm ever since the death of my father, who had held possession just in the same way as myself. In fact, the farm has been rented by our family for many generations."

"I know that often happens," said Dick.

"It does. But that has little to do with my story. I have two children—a boy and a girl. They are all that have been spared to me out of a large family; and so, you see, I love them with something more than an ordinary love—I dote upon them!"

The farmer's voice trembled slightly, but he proceeded:

"My son now is about twenty years of age. He is my right hand in all matters connected with the farm. My daughter is three years younger, or nearly so, for she has just commenced her seventeenth year.

"Although I am her father, I say, candidly, that she possesses more than an ordinary share of beauty. She is too beautiful, I fear, and her beauty has already been the cause of bringing trouble to our house."

"I guessed it from your conversation."

"Very likely. This young spark, the lord's son, came home from college a few months back. We had seen little of him for several years, for his vacations were usually spent abroad.

"One day, however, not long since, he unfortunately caught sight of my dear daughter, and was smitten with her loveliness; but she shrank back from him with a dread which she could not comprehend.

"Of this he took no notice, and seized every opportunity he could to declare his affection for her."

The farmer ground his teeth.

"I surprised him one day talking to my daughter. He turned angrily upon me.

"'John Adams!' he said, 'you had better not thwart me or stand in my path! I love your daughter, for she is beautiful! I have no evil intentions; I am willing to marry her!'

"Then I spoke out at once, and told him it was impossible—that I would never consent to the match; and foaming with rage, he left me.

"But I could not rid myself of his importunities; and at length, I found that my daughter's safety, and my own peace of mind, demanded her removal to some place far away, where he would be unable to discover her.

"The separation was bitter, and cost me many a pang. It was the first time we had ever been parted.

"However, I nerved my heart for the trial; and I left her in charge of a relation of mine, who lives some fifty miles from here."

"Then I can understand all the rest," said Turpin. "His conversation now is perfectly intelligible. He was angry with you because you refused to let him know what had become of your daughter!"

"Just so—just so!" said the farmer, sadly. "I fear that, in my old age, I am going to learn trouble. I have been a happy man up to the present time, but I fear my happiness is over!"

"You will have but little peace when the time comes for him to succeed to the estates," said Turpin.

"I fear it!"

"Why not leave the farm at once, and remove to some other part of the country?"

"It is hard that I should be forced to do that from such a cause, without reference to the affection which I feel for every inch of ground, and for the old house itself. There is yet another consideration. While I hold the farm at my present rent, I am a prosperous, well-to-do man; but should I leave it, then my worldly condition would be very much reduced."

"Is that the house yonder?" said Turpin, pointing straight before him to a mass of white buildings covered with thatch.

"Yes, that's the place," said John Adams. "We shall soon be there. Perhaps you would not mind accepting some trifling hospitality, as a recognition of the service you have done me? I wish it was in my power to repay the obligation I am under to you."

Turpin looked the farmer full in the face.

He bore the scrutiny unflinchingly.

Truth, candour, and sincerity were expressed in every lineament.

Sinking his voice slightly, Turpin said:

"It lies in your power to render me a service which will far outweigh the one that I have done for you."

"Is it possible?" said the farmer, his face beaming with joy. "Let me know what it is, and I will do it gladly!"

Turpin paused a moment before he spoke.

He was considering with himself to what extent it would be advisable to trust the farmer.

He fully and truly believed that at last he had discovered an honest man—one to whom he could confide everything in confidence, and who would not object to grant his request.

After a momentary hesitation, Dick resolved to tell him all.

"John Adams!" he cried, at length, "I believe you are a man in whom implicit trust might be placed; and in proof of my belief, I am going to make a revelation to you which will take you by surprise."

The farmer looked into his face inquiringly.

"I suppose," Dick began, "that you have not the remotest idea of who I am—I mean, you have never seen me before?"

"Not that I can remember," said the farmer.

"Well, then," continued Dick, "before I declare myself, I will just make you acquainted with a few facts. In the first place, then, I am an offender against the law. I might plead something in extenuation of myself; but this is not the time to do it, nor is it necessary. Let it be sufficient to say that many things are laid to my charge, to some of which I plead guilty, but of the majority I am innocent. The officers of justice are in pursuit of me!"

"Go on," said the farmer, quietly.

Dick paused for a moment.

"John Adams," he continued, "you have an affectionate heart. I know it—it has manifested itself in the few words you have spoken to me. You are married, of course? You love your wife next to your own life?"

"I did love her," said the farmer, tears springing into his eyes—"I did love her, but she was not spared to me for long!"

"She is dead, then?"

"Yes."

"But still you can remember what your own feelings were towards her, and what you would have done for her sake?"

"I can; but I am at a loss to think——"

"Wait a moment, and all will be explained. Although a fugitive from justice, I have a wife—one whom I love as you loved yours, and whose affection for me equals mine. I have proof of it day by day, for she has clung to me through all my varying fortunes."

"As a true woman should do," said the farmer.

"Well, then," said Dick, "in one word, she has been made a prisoner."

"For what?—what crime has she committed?"

"She has performed a wife's duty to me," said Dick. "That is the crime. She has succoured, aided, and abetted me, as the lawyers term it, and for doing so they made her prisoner, and lodged her in Newgate."

"But!" exclaimed the farmer, "such a thing is impossible! A wife cannot be punished for screening her husband from the officers of justice, or assisting him to escape."

"I know that."

"Then how comes it she is a prisoner?"

"Because, for purposes of their own, the officers refuse to believe that she is my wife."

"Ah, I see!" said the farmer. "That makes all the difference."

"As you say, it makes all the difference. But she is my wife, and the reason they have made her a prisoner is because they calculated that, as soon as the intelligence reached my ears, I should endeavour to rescue her—to assist her to escape. They fancied she would be a kind of decoy that would lure me to destruction. They would keep such a close watch round the prison that it would be impossible for me to gain it at any point unseen."

"Well," said the farmer, "and what else? Why have you told this to me?"

"That you shall know presently. To-day my wife will be placed in the dock to answer the charge brought against her. I have every hope that she will be acquitted, but I could not bear the suspense of waiting outside the court until I heard the verdict. I have made up my mind, let the risk be what it may, I will enter the court, and be a spectator of the whole trial."

"That will be running a dreadful risk."

"It will; but I hope to elude my enemies by disguising myself carefully. And now I come to the point I wished to reach. In return for the service I rendered you—though, understand me, I did it freely, and without a thought of receiving any return—still, I should feel deeply grateful if you would furnish my companion and myself with disguises. For instance, I think if we dressed as your farm labourers do, we should be likely to escape recognition by the officers."

"It is a strange thing that you ask me to do," said the farmer.

"It is. I acknowledge that, and do not wish to press the point. If you have any objection—if you would rather not grant my request, say so at once—my opinion of you will remain unchanged."

"But," said the farmer, in a peculiar and significant tone, "you have not told me who you are."

"True, but then you should understand that my identity is a secret, and if it was known who I really am, I should be in extreme peril."

"But," said the farmer, "if I lend you the disguises, you will at least let me know who you are?"

"I will if you wish it, and yet——"

"I suppose you would rather not? Well, I will press the subject no further. You shall retain your secret, but I have a particular reason for asking you this question. Don't be afraid to reply in the affirmative."

"Speak," said Dick. "I will answer you at all risks."

"Well, then," said the farmer, in a strange and hesitating voice, "tell me whether your name is not Dick Turpin? If it is, I am under another and still greater obligation to you than you may know of, and I will do all that you may ask me, and more too. Tell me, then, whether you are Dick Turpin."

CHAPTER DCXX.

THE FARMER FURNISHES DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING WITH DISGUISES, AND PROMISES TO TAKE CHARGE OF BLACK BESS.

THE highwaymen looked inquisitively and wonderingly into the countenance of the old farmer.

His speech took him so entirely by surprise, that for some moments he found himself unable to reply in any way.

He wanted to decide in his own mind whether it would be advisable for him to disclose his identity or not.

John Adams perceived his hesitation, and did not wonder at it, though he attributed it to another cause.

Wishing to reassure his companion, he said:

"Don't be afraid to make the disclosure to me. I don't ask it in order that I may have the opportunity of delivering you to your foes. I have, indeed, a reason of quite another kind. It is gratitude that prompts me to ask this question."

"Gratitude for what?"

"That I will tell you as soon as I receive your reply. I merely wish you to say whether you are Dick Turpin or not. If not, I care not who you are—you may keep the secret to yourself."

"I am Dick Turpin, then," was the reply, for the highwayman's curiosity was raised to the highest pitch, so peculiar was the farmer's manner.

"Give me your hand, then!" said John Adams. "I am glad to do so! I wish I could express my thanks!"

"For what?"

"Not for a service done to me, but to one whom I hold dear. Do you remember, a long while ago, that, when pursued by your foes, you took refuge in a house near Smithfield Market?"

Dick passed his hand over his brow, as if trying to recollect.

"You must give me some further clue," he said. "In my lifetime, I have taken shelter in so many houses, that it is necessary some particular fact should be mentioned to call it before my mind."

"Well, then," said the farmer, "I can do that, and, at the same time, make you sensible of the nature of the obligation I am under to you."

"I am all attention."

"Then do you recollect entering a room where there was a poor woman in great poverty? She concealed you in a cupboard, and you narrowly escaped being wounded by the cutlasses of the police officers."

"I remember all now," said Turpin, "clearly and plainly enough—indeed, as though the events had only happened yesterday. The name of the man was Robert, and his wife's Mary."

"Yes, Mary—God bless her!" said the farmer, fervently—"that was her name. Oh, what had been her sufferings up to that night!"

"I pressed him to accept the sum of forty pounds for what he had done; but he refused the gift and took the money as a loan instead. But I have no doubt you know all this."

"Yes; I have been made acquainted with every particular."

"But," said Turpin, "how is it?—what are they to you?—why should you feel interested in this matter?"

"Mary is my sister."

"Your sister?"

"Yes, my youngest sister. Years ago she married without the consent or approval of her parents or relations. I, for one, was strongly against the match."

"Indeed!"

"But when they were married the mischief was done and so we contented ourselves as well as we could. But Mary had a high and independent spirit, and so had her husband. They went to London, and, from the time of their departure, we heard nothing of them for a long, long time."

"Then in all their poverty," said Turpin, "they made no application to you?"

"No, nor to anyone," said the farmer. "I know Mary would be too proud to do it. She would think that she had chosen her own path in life, and would boldly and cheerfully put up with all its disagreeables and inconveniences."

"I can easily believe that," said Turpin, "from what little I saw of her."

"After a time," continued the farmer, "we did hear from them. It was about six months ago. They were then in highly-prosperous circumstances, having taken a shop, which quickly gained a good custom, and at the present time their position and prospects in life are all that they could expect."

"I rejoice to hear it," said Dick, "for I was deeply interested in them both."

"No doubt you rejoice," said the farmer, "for had it not been for you, they would at the present moment be sunk in the lowest depths of degradation. It was the loan of that money at that particular moment that did them the benefit. Had it been one day later, they would have been the inmates of a workhouse."

"And so," said Turpin, who felt strangely uncomfortable on witnessing the farmer's grateful behaviour towards him—"and so, I suppose, when Robert and Mary came to see you about six months ago, they told you all the particulars?"

"They did—every word. I can assure you that not a day passes without their thinking of you with kindness and respect. Robert is anxious in the extreme to do you a service. The money you lent him he has paid with interest in the manner you directed, yet he feels that he is still under an obligation to you."

"Nothing of the kind—nothing of the kind! I would have given him the money, if he would have accepted it. The service they rendered me was worth ten times the amount."

"Well," said the farmer, "when I heard what Mary had suffered, my heart smote me, for I knew that I had behaved unkindly towards her, and that, had it not been for my unkindness, she would never have endured those privations, but would have applied to me for aid."

"Things happen strangely sometimes," said Turpin. "Who would have thought that I should have become acquainted with Mary's brother?"

"And to think that you should have saved my life too!"

"I don't think so much of that," said Turpin. "I should have acted in precisely the same manner, no matter who had been in your position."

"You are a brave, generous man! And now, see, we are already at the farmhouse. You are welcome to it, and all that it contains—welcome to stay as long as you think proper. You need not fear that we shall betray you."

"I never dreamed of such a thing!" said Dick, who was deeply affected. "But now remember the request I made to you. Will you furnish me with the disguises I require?"

"Certainly, and everything else that I have! I will share all with you, and I trust you will be successful in escaping the detection of your enemies."

"I have but little fear of that," said Dick. "My chief concern is that I shall not be able to reach London in time."

"You have not very far to go," said the farmer, "and I will not detain you, though I should have been glad if you would have accepted my hospitality for a short time."

Just as these words were uttered, the door of the farm-house was reached.

A young man came forward.

It was the farmer's son.

With a cry of alarm, he sprang forward when he observed the blood upon his father's face.

"It's nothing," said John Adams—"it's nothing I have quite recovered from the effects of the blow. When I have had a good wash, I shall be all right. Thomas, attend to me—this is Dick Turpin."

The farmer's son, who knew all the particulars of Dick's kindness to Mary, shook hands with him cordially.

During the conversation, Tom King had kept in the rear.

He was leading the two horses by their bridles, and he wondered much what it was that Turpin and the farmer were in such close conversation about.

He did not press forward to satisfy his curiosity, for he knew his comrade well enough to be aware that it was a subject of uncommon importance that occupied his attention so exclusively.

At a word from John Adams, his son took charge of the two steeds, and led them into the stables, while the two highwaymen entered the farm-house, along with the farmer himself.

He insisted that they should seat themselves and partake of a light meal, and he brought up a huge flagon of home-brewed ale.

"My son will be back directly," he said, "and then I will tell him just what articles of clothing you require. He will fetch them in a few moments."

"A thousand thanks!"

"Don't mention it! I would do ten times as much willingly and gladly!"

"It is only necessary," said Dick, "to procure the outer garments. We will put them on over our own so that, if necessary, we can strip them off at a moment's notice."

Just then the farmer's son returned, and he was instructed to fetch the articles of clothing required.

As John Adams had said, he returned in a few moments.

"Come this way," said the farmer, addressing his two guests. "There's a room that you can have to yourselves, and while you are engaged in disguising yourselves, I will set to work to make myself look a little more presentable."

The two highwaymen took very great pains to disguise themselves effectually, and, while they were doing so, Dick Turpin hastily explained to Tom King the whole of the peculiar circumstances that had occurred.

"You see," he said at last, "that there is some good to be obtained by trusting to luck."

"There has been on this occasion, I admit," said Tom King. "How lucky it is, however, that we should at such a moment have fallen in with such a friend!"

"It is most fortunate. I think, Tom, that you will be able to sustain your part. Do you think you could act the rustic?"

"Oh, don't doubt it!"

"Pray be careful, for you may depend the officers will closely scrutinise the persons who enter the court. Mr. Wriggles may fancy that we shall be present in disguise."

The highwaymen cut their hair close to the head, and shaved their faces clean; and these two operations, simple as they may seem, altered their personal appearance in a wonderful manner.

Then the huge smock-frock which they each put on, and the huge boots—which fitted easily over those they already wore—and the large slouched hats with broad brims and high crowns, completely metamorphosed them.

"I think," said Turpin, looking at himself in the glass, "that if we are only careful to act and speak like country clowns, we shall be proof against all the vigilance of the police officers."

"I am of the same opinion."

As soon as their disguises were complete, the two highwaymen entered the large kitchen in the farm-house, where John Adams was waiting for them to make their appearance.

The farmer looked all the better for the good washing he had had; but the blow on his head produced more effect than he imagined, so that now he found it necessary to wear a bandage round it, which gave him an odd enough aspect.

"You will excuse me," he said; "but I can't help feeling a deep interest in what you are going to do; and while you have been in that room yonder I have been thinking over the whole matter."

"What is the result of your reflections?"

"Well, if you would not take it amiss, I should like to mention something."

"Speak freely, then—speak out by all means. What is it you wish to say?"

"Well, I was wondering how you were going to manage with your horses. It won't do for you, dressed as you are, to ride up to London on two such beautiful creatures as those—that's quite certain."

"Perfectly so," said Turpin, "It's strange, but I had altogether overlooked our horses, and until you mentioned it I never gave it a thought what we were to do with them."

"Well, that will be no difficulty," said the farmer, "provided you like to trust them with me. I will put them in a stable, and will take care that every attention is paid to them. When you want them, you will find them here."

"I am exceedingly obliged to you!" said Dick. "This is indeed a service!"

"No—no. As I told you before, if there is anything I can do for you, I will; but I beg you will think nothing of such a trifling favour as that."

"Still, we must thank you," said Turpin, "and especially myself, for without Black Bess I should be nothing. It is to her that I owe my life upon a hundred different occasions; and I would not for the world that any harm should happen to her, or that she should fall into the hands of my foes!"

"She shall not while she's in my stable," said the farmer. "You can make your mind easy about that."

CHAPTER DCXXI.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN ARRIVE IN LONDON, AND DICK TURPIN HAS A SHORT CONVERSATION WITH JIM LICKFOLD AT THE CORNER OF CHANCERY LANE.

"I shall go to London with a lighter heart," said Dick Turpin, "than I had dared to hope for. It will indeed be a great relief to know that Black Bess is in perfect safety!"

"And she will be, in my stables," said the farmer. "for who would expect to find her here? But I have not done yet — there's something else that I have thought of besides."

"I am anxious in the extreme to hear it," said Turpin. "I hope it will be as good as the last."

"You shall judge," said the farmer, pointing to a large eight-day clock in the chimney corner. "Do you see the time? It now wants ten minutes to seven, and I'll wager my life that's the correct time!"

"It is very late," said Turpin. "We must be off!"

"Of course you must. What time will the court open?"

"At about ten o'clock. But, then, it will be necessary for us to be there some time before that—there is always a crowd waiting round the doors anxious to get in."

"Then it seems that there's three hours good," said the farmer. "But there's your journey to London. It is not very many miles, to be sure, but it would be a long and tiresome walk if you leave your horses behind you as you have agreed. How do you intend to get to London?"

"That I had not thought about," said Turpin.

"Well," continued the farmer, "I don't want to make any more words about it than's necessary, because time's precious, though I shall be sorry when you have gone. However, what I have to say amounts to this: I have a waggon going to Covent Garden Market, loaded with vegetables of one kind or another. It won't travel very fast, but yet, if you like to ride on that, you are quite welcome."

"Excellent," said Dick—"excellent! This is indeed a lucky thought! By going into London, as it would appear, in charge of a waggon of vegetables, no one could possibly have the least suspicion."

"Just what I thought," said the farmer. "It would look so natural-like; and Covent Garden, as you know very well, is not such a long way from Newgate."

"No, it is not; and we will ride on the top of your waggon with the greatest pleasure in the world!"

"Well, then, gentlemen, that's all, and you may safely reckon upon being in London by nine o'clock, at the latest."

"I wish it was earlier," said Dick. "But no matter—we cannot do any better."

"Decidedly not."

"Well, then, farmer, we are sorry to leave you; but if you will excuse us, we shall be glad to start immediately."

"I know you would; and the waggon is waiting in the fold-yard. Come with me!"

John Adams rose, and the two highwaymen followed him.

In the fold-yard they found a huge waggon, piled up to a terrific height with various vegetables.

Harnessed to it was a team of strong horses, though not swift ones.

"Now, then," said the farmer, "up you get!"

"But," said Dick, looking about him, "how shall we climb to the top of that?"

"Well, I'll put a ladder for you if you wish it, and then it will be easy enough, but I should recommend you to climb up in the regular way, and then you will know how to get down, by which means you will avoid suspicion."

"Certainly,—that's well thought of!"

The farmer then pointed out to the two highwaymen the means by which they could climb up to the top of the waggon.

They shook hands with him, wished him good-bye, promising to return as early as they could, and then, with considerable dexterity, considering that they performed the feat for the first time, they climbed up by the aid of the ropes.

As soon as ever they were seated on the top, the waggoner also mounted, and, cracking his whip, the team immediately set itself in motion.

The bells on the horses' heads jingled pleasantly.

The two highwaymen lay down on the top of some cabbages, just in the same way as they had seen men do many a time when they had met such waggons as they were now upon coming into London.

In this situation it was all but an impossibllity for anyone to detect them, or even to catch a glimpse of their countenances.

During the ride, the two friends had, of course, plenty to talk about; but most of the conversation was mere speculation, and so it is not worth while to place it at full before the reader.

Without the occurrence of any more important incidents than the stoppage of the waggon at several roadside inns, in order to allow the waggoner to refresh himself, they reached London.

For some time our two friends had been debating whether it would be best to walk together to Newgate, or whether it would be wisest to separate.

Dick was in favour of the latter course, for, as he truly said:

"The officers will be upon the alert, and will look for us not singly but in couples, and I am inclined to think that one would be passed unnoticed where a couple would be challenged and questioned."

"Well, let it be so," said Tom King, at length—"I only wish for the best."

"So do I. Therefore, as soon as we arrive at Covent Garden we will alight and separate."

"And meet at the court-house?"

"Yes. You'll easily be able to see me. If possible, get by my side."

By the time they had made this and a few other minor arrangements, the waggon reached its destination.

Less time had been occupied by the journey than the farmer had led them to expect, for it was only just turned half-past eight.

The two highwaymen got down from their elevated position somewhat clumsily.

As soon as their feet touched the ground, Tom King said:

"Wait a minute, Dick! Look over there—under the piazza. Don't appear to be observing. Do you see that police officer standing there?"

"Yes, I see him, and—and——"

"What?"

"It's Wriggles!"

Tom gave a hasty glance, and then he said:

"How attentively he seems to be observing us!"

"Yes," said Turpin. "Let us separate at once. After all, it may be nothing more than our own fancy. Surely he cannot have guessed our proceedings?"

"No—no—that's too much to be expected! Rely upon it, it is mere chance!"

"Well, then, if I was inclined to be superstitious, I should look upon our seeing him at the instant of our arrival as an evil omen."

"You had better not give way to any such gloomy thoughts! Farewell! I'll make my way to the Old Bailey in one direction, you take another. Above all, remember what you are, and be careful to act your part well."

With these words the highwaymen separated.

Dick Turpin walked straight up James Street into Long Acre, and from thence he made his way into Holborn.

No one who saw him would doubt for a moment that he was other than he seemed to be.

He performed his part to great admiration, staring about him with that vacant, wondering expression which is often visible upon the countenance of a rustic when in London.

With a lounging, shuffling gait, as though he was walking over a ploughed field, instead of along a level street, Dick Turpin walked along Holborn.

"I have a great mind," he thought, "to test the excellence of my disguise. There could be no harm in it, and, if there is any danger, I may as well be made aware of it at once as not. If I succeed, then I shall have all the more confidence in myself."

Just as these words were passing through his mind, Dick saw a police officer standing at the corner of Chancery Lane.

He knew the man by sight exceedingly well, though he could not, of course, remember his name.

It was, however, no other than that rather extraordinary and acute individual, Jim Lickfold.

Had Dick been as well acquainted with the character of this police officer as the reader is, the probability is that he would have passed him by, and selected some other member of the fraternity to try his experiment upon. Still, if Jim Lickfold was deceived and had no suspicions, Dick would stand a very fair chance of escaping the notice of all the rest.

From having been reared in Essex during his youth, Dick was able to assume the peculiar dialect of that county with great ease and perfection.

Lounging up to Jim Lickfold, he said:

"I say, measter, can yow tell me the way to Noogate?"

Jim looked at Dick for a moment, coolly surveying him from top to toe, then, with great deliberation he replied:

"Yes, Mr. Clodhopping Chawbacon, I can show you the way to Newgate."

"I be much obleeged!" said Dick. "Which be the way?"

"I'll take you and show you, if you like," said Jim.

"Yow be very koind! I wish yow would."

"Well, then," said Jim, "do you see that old gentleman standing there with the silk handkerchief hanging half out of his pocket?"

"Yaas, I do."

"Then go and pull it out," said Jim, "and I'll d—n soon show you the way to Newgate, and charge you nothing for my trouble!"

"Naay—naay!" said Dick, shaking his head, and grinning from ear to ear. "I be not so green! Yow doan't kitch me so easy! I 'ouldn't do it! Doan't yow play yowr jokes on me! I'm oaf!"

With these words upon his lips, and with well assumed indignation, Dick turned round, and continued on his way.

Jim Lickfold continued to chuckle for several minutes at having made a fool of the yokel, for such he considered the disguised highwayman to be.

Little did he dream that he had been so egregiously duped.

It was really amusing to see the comical expression on his face as he stood watching the countryman's retreating form.

"I shall do," said Dick Turpin, to himself. "There's no fear now! That little adventure has done me good. I would not have missed it for a trifle. If that police officer does not recognise me, I need not fear even Mr. Wriggles himself!"

Dick Turpin walked on steadily enough, gaping about him all the while, until at length he arrived at the prison of Newgate.

It required no small amount of nerve to walk up to that gloomy dismal building in the way he did; and, to have observed his motions, no one would have believed that the place had such terrors for him.

With the same vacant look, his eyes wandered over every part of it, and while thus appearing to satisfy nothing more than a listless curiosity, he was in reality taking particular notice of all that was going on, and calculating within his mind his chances of success.

Loitering on, he came at length to the Sessions House, as that part of the prison was called where the trials were held.

Round the wide door and on the steps, rather a dense crowd had assembled.

Dick mingled with them, jostling against their shoulders in the most unconcerned manner possible.

Just as some country bumpkin would do, he mounted the steps, and entered the vestibule of the Session House, his nose all the while elevated in the air.

Just on his left hand was a flight of stone steps which he knew well enough led to the court where the trials would take place.

After gazing around, he ascended these steps as though he neither knew nor cared where they led, and as though his object was nothing in particular.

On the staircase were several other persons.

Dick went blundering on until he came to a little wooden gate, which had been placed across the stairs in order to bar the way.

On the other side of this little gate stood a police officer on guard.

"What do you want?" said this official, as Dick put his head on the top of the woodwork, as though to push his way through at any rate.

Upon hearing himself thus addressed by so imposing a person as a police officer, Dick Turpin took off his hat with great respect, and made a half bow, while he seemed to be greatly confused.

"What do you want?" said the officer again.

"Beg yowr pardon, sir," said Dick, "but be this the way to the coort?"

"Yes," said the officer, with a grin.

"What, through this gaate, and up them steps yander?"

"Yes," said the officer, pointing over his shoulder with his thumb.

"Then," said Dick, "axin' yowr pardon, ... can't yow let me goo by? I wants to goo to the coort, I do."

"Oh, do you?" said the officer, who judged that Dick might probably be a witness in some turnip-stealing case.

"Where do you come from? What case is it that you are to appear in?"

"Dang me if I know. I've got to appear in any caase," replied Dick. "But, Mr. Officer, I heerd saay as how Dick Tarpin's wife had been kitched, and were agooin' to take her trial. Now, I woundily want to see her, I do, so I'se walked up to Lunnun this mornin' o' purpose; so, axin yowr pardon, Mr. Officer, I'd be glad if yow'd open that little gaate, and let me goo through."

CHAPTER DCXXII.

RETURNS TO SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL AND DESCRIBES HOW THEY SET ABOUT DISGUISING THEMSELVES AS POLICE OFFICERS.

It is now necessary that we should return to Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

It will be recollected that they were about setting out from the Chase, in order to obtain such disguise as would enable them to assume the part of police officers.

As Jack had truly said, at present he had no idea where the disguises were to be procured, and so he rode out into the highway along with his companion quite at random.

Claude Duval liked the plan exceedingly, and just as they got clear of the trees, he said:

"Yes, it's all very well, Jack—very well indeed, but just tell me which way you think of going!"

"What's your idea?"

"I confess I have none. I would rather trust this matter to you altogether."

"In the first place, then," said Jack, "I think we may safely conclude that it will be useless to look for the disguises in the direction of London."

"Yes, that's quite evident."

"Then, it follows that we must make our way into the country. We must pitch upon some quiet little town as the scene of operations. There I have no doubt we shall succeed in deluding two officers, but with Bow Street runners we should not stand the ghost of a chance!"

"What is the nearest town that you think likely to suit our purpose?"

"I can only think of Hertford."

"That's a long way off."

"I know that, and yet I think you will find it the nearest. As you are aware, most of these little towns are only furnished with one parish constable, who would be no use at all."

"None."

"At Hertford, however, I happen to know very well there's a regular police-station, with officers belonging to it."

"And do you think you will be able to impose upon them?"

"Yes, they are a good way off London, and can only have heard of us by report, for you must remember that we have never visited that quarter."

"Very true."

"A little more than half an hour's gallop along the highway will take us there, and then we must do the best we can."

"But stay a moment," said Claude. "Would it be safe, do you think, to keep to the high-road?"

"Well, that's a question; it would be much the best if we could, because we should make better speed, and our horses would not be so exhausted as they would be if we went across the country. The only risk is the dragoons."

"Just so, and yet I think we shall be too far from London—the patrols would not reach so far."

"Then, if you are agreeable, we will try it."

"I am willing! Forward!"

The two highwaymen just touched the flanks of their horses with their spurs, and away they went at a gallop, which, if continued, would take them to Hertford in considerably less than half an hour.

The cattle were fresh and in excellent condition.

On their way Claude and Jack kept as keen a look-out as they possibly could, listening too, in order that they might ascertain at the earliest moment whether any of their enemies were on the road.

But it seemed that the supposition that the troop of dragoons did not extend so far into the country was a correct one.

Certain is it, however, that they met with no opposition on their way.

The road was well-nigh deserted, though they met with a few travellers.

In fact, the roads became less used after dark than ever, in consequence of the great risk there was in travelling.

At last Sixteen-String Jack raised his riding-whip, and pointing forwards, said:

"Look there: do you see those small twinkling lights yonder?"

"Yes, quite plainly."

"Well, that's Hertford. A few minutes will take us there; and now how shall we proceed?"

"That requires some consideration. What do you propose?"

"Let us trot along the road gently for the remainder of the distance, and then we can talk the matter over; besides, if we enter the town at a steady, quiet pace, we shall not be so likely to attract the attention of the inhabitants."

"Very good! And now, Jack, I am waiting to hear what you have to say. Do you know anything of the town?"

"Yes; though it is many years since I visited it."

"Then you have the advantage of me, for I have never been in it at all to my knowledge."

"Well, then, the police-station is in the High Street."

"Then, I fancy it will be a little too daring for the pair of us to ride up to the door of it."

"Now I come to recollect," said Jack, "there used to be a public-house called the King's Arms very nearly opposite the station, and I dare say it is there at the present moment. Years ago the police officers used to be very fond of visiting it whenever they were off duty."

"Then that's the place for us, Jack. We will go to that inn and put up there, and watch our opportunity."

"We can do nothing better, I'm sure."

This point being settled, the two highwaymen rode leisurely along the High Street, until at length they came to a large straggling building in front of which was a huge sign, upon which the words King's Arms were painted.

"That's the place!" said Jack.

"Which is the way to the stables?"

"Down that side street yonder."

"Capital! Why, the place suits us admirably—as well as if it had been built for our especial accommodation."

"Now then, this way."

Although the hour was by no means a late one, but few of the inhabitants of the town were abroad.

Lights were shining, however, from many windows.

Going round the corner, the highwaymen came presently to some large folding gates leading into the yard at the rear of the inn.

The gates were closed; but a vigorous pull at the bell quickly caused the ostler to make his appearance.

"Can we put up here for an hour or so?" asked Jack.

"Certainly, gentlemen—all night if you wish it; there's plenty of accommodation for your horses, and for yourselves as well."

"That's right. I don't know how long we shall stay."

The gates were opened, and the horses placed in the stable, and then Sixteen-String Jack called Claude aside, and said:

"I fancy it will be best for you to remain in the yard or the stable while I enter the house."

"Is it necessary? said Claude. "I should prefer being indoors."

"No doubt; but the fact is, I have thought of a scheme which is more likely to succeed if I enter the inn alone; besides, if you remain here there will be less danger of detection, and there's another thing far more important to be borne in mind."

"What's that?"

"Why, as you know, it is running no trifling amount of risk to get face to face with a couple of police officers who, for aught I know, might be acquainted with my personal appearance. In that case my only chance would be immediate escape, and how could I do that without you were here ready with the horses?"

"That's quite enough," said Claude; "say not another word upon the subject; I'll wait here with all the pleasure imaginable, and if the emergency does arise, depend upon it I shall be here with both horses in perfect readiness."

Matters being thus settled, Sixteen-String Jack entered the public-house.

The hall or passage was very dark, for, as gas was unknown to our forefathers, they had to rely entirely upon oil lamps, and those of the most miserable and insufficient description. There was a light burning, to be sure, but its illumination was so feeble, and it cast so many flickering shadows, that it was little better than useless.

Jack went up to the bar window, where he saw the landlady.

She wore a widow's cap, so from that fact he concluded she was the sole mistress of the place.

"Can I have a private room for a little while?" he said.

"Oh yes, sir, certainly! Please to step this way."

With the greatest imaginable respect, Sixteen-String Jack was ushered into a large and somewhat comfortably furnished room. No doubt it was the best in the inn.

It was in profound darkness, save the light which came from the fire.

"I will light the lamp, sir, in one minute," said the landlady, who at once set about doing so.

"And when you have done that," said Jack, "bring me a bottle of wine. I want a few minutes' reflection."

The landlady stared in surprise, and placed the lamp down on the table and retired.

By the side of the lamp there was a screw, by turning which the wick could be either raised or lowered, and the amount of light regulated.

Jack turned it down until the light was only just sufficient to dispel the darkness over the table.

The landlady now appeared, bringing with her a bottle of wine.

"Shall I draw the cork for you, sir?" she asked.

"Oh, you are too kind," said Jack—"much too kind! If there's one thing in the world more delightful than another, it is to be waited upon and attended to by charming woman!"

The widow simpered and looked quite pleased.

Evidently she considered Jack was rather a nice man than otherwise.

"My dear madam," he continued, "I love—I adore the sex! I would do anything in the world for them; and often I say to myself: 'Jack Narn, how in the world is it that you, loving the charming fair sex as you do, don't get married?'"

"Lor, sir," said the widow, becoming deeply interested, "you don't mean to say that you are not married?"

"I do though," said Jack, with a sigh; "but I hope the happy day will come at last. I don't know how it is, but I can't make up my mind. The fact is, I am rather hard to please. For a long while I always paid attention to young unmarried girls, till I got disgusted with their silly ways, so I said to myself: 'If ever I do wed, I'll marry a widow!'"

After this declaration, the landlady was ready to do anything that her guest might require. She would also maintain that he was a gentleman with common sense.

Jack's motive was to blind her eyes to what he really was, and he succeeded admirably, for had anyone whispered to the landlady that her pleasant guest was a highwayman, she would have laughed the idea to scorn.

"And," continued Jack, "I have a little affair on hand; and if I can only carry it to a successful termination, as I hope I shall be able—I am determined to get married!"

"Might I make so bold," asked the widow, "as to enquire what your plan is?"

"Well, it is a secret," said Jack. "But as I see you are a woman of discretion, I don't mind confiding it to you."

"Oh, sir," said the widow, giving herself a thousand airs, "I'm much obliged to you for your good opinion of poor me!"

"Tut—tut!" said Jack. "If I began to pay you compliments I don't know to what extent I should go. However, to return to what I was saying. I dare say you have heard of that celebrated highwayman Dick Turpin, and the three other rascals he has with him?"

"Oh, yes!" said the landlady. "And whenever I hear their names mentioned I feel just as if a stream of cold water was running all the way down my back!"

"Quite a remarkable sensation," said Jack. "However, it so happens that myself and a friend of mine discovered a secret place where these highwaymen hid themselves, and we resolved to capture them."

"Ah, sir!" sighed the widow. "If you could only do that you would render society at large a service."

"I trust we shall succeed. The reward is something great for the capture of all of them. I have no doubt I shall succeed, and if so, why, my share of the reward will be at least six hundred pounds!"

"That's a power of money!" said the landlady.

"It is," said Jack; "and when I have got it I shall look round me for some snug little business in which I can invest it, and where I can live jolly and happy for the rest of my days, and I do think that if there could be one calling more delightful than another, it is that of being the landlord of a country inn!"

[MR. WRIGGLES MAKES AN IMPORTANT COMMUNICATION TO THE JUDGE.]

The widow was delighted.

"It has its disagreeables of course," she said; "but to a comfortable couple it's a very pleasant life indeed. I find it very lonely here," she concluded, with a sigh.

"No doubt!" said Jack. "I can easily believe that no one can be happy alone!"

"That's just what I think, sir."

"However," said Jack, pretending to recollect himself, "I am counting all my chickens before they're hatched. You must understand that this must be kept a profound secret, at any rate, until to-morrow! Don't you mention it to a soul, for I have very good reasons for believing that these highwaymen have spies all over the country; and if you mention it, it may get to their ears, and then, of course, it would be all up with the reward!"

"Do you think that Dick Turpin has spies about?"

"I do," said Jack—"I firmly believe it; and it is more likely than not that he has an agent in this very house at this very moment!"

CHAPTER DCXXIII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK BAMBOOZLES THE POLICE OFFICERS, AND THE LANDLADY OF THE KING'S ARMS AS WELL.

"Oh, sir!—oh dear me!—oh—oh!" cried the landlady. "Do hold me!—I'm sure I shall faint! Oh yes, I'm going—I feel myself going!"

"Oh, d—n it!" muttered Jack. "I didn't bargain for this!"

Nevertheless, he sprang to his feet, and placed his arms round the landlady's rotund figure.

She seemed in a very bad faint indeed, for her head rested quite lovingly upon Jack's shoulder.

He knew very well it was only a sham; but, with great care, he placed her in a chair and took steps to restore her to consciousness.

She was a plump, good-looking woman, just in the prime of life, and so, as she was shamming, Jack thought he might as well have a little fun as not.

Accordingly, he pretended to hesitate, and then, with great suddenness, he planted a kiss upon her lips.

The landlady showed not the least sign of consciousness.

Then Jack pretended to get alarmed, and said:

"I must ring the bell for assistance!"

He left the chair as he spoke, and went towards the bell-rope, but before he could take hold of it the landlady heaved a deep sigh and opened her eyes.

Jack then poured out a glass of wine, which, after much pressing, she at length ventured to sip.

"Oh!" she said, with a shudder—"the bare idea of such a thing! Oh, it's dreadful! Do you really think it's true?"

"I am sorry to find I have alarmed you so much, madam," said Jack; "and as I always make it a rule never to depart from the truth, I am obliged to repeat that I think it very likely that there is some agent of Dick Turpin's in the inn at this moment."

"Oh, it's dreadful! I shall faint again—I know I shall!"

"D—n it! I hope not!" muttered Jack.

"What did you say, sir?"

"I said, I trusted you would not."

"Oh, sir, it's dreadful to faint! You don't know what it is, sir; it makes you feel so very languid afterwards!"

"My dear madam," said Jack, "do let me persuade you to drink one glass of this wine; it is really capital stuff. It will do you a world of good."

"And there's about a hundred dozen down in the cellar," sighed the widow. "My poor defunct husband was such a man for wine, and the last thing he did almost was to stock the cellars with wine."

"Very kind of him," said Jack.

"Oh yes," said the widow, pretending to wipe away a tear; "he was the kindest man that ever breathed—he was indeed!"

"Well," said Jack, "I must have some conversation with you, I hope, to-morrow. However, valuable time is now slipping away. You are somewhere near the police-station, are you not?"

"Oh yes, sir, it's just across the way."

"How fortunate! Well, as I told you, my friend and myself thought it would be running too great a risk if we should attempt to capture four highwaymen ourselves. It would be two to one; so we thought the best plan would be to take two active and intelligent police officers into our confidence, and, by their assistance, effect our purpose."

"I understand, sir."

"Of course, our share of the reward would be less; but, then, the risk would be much less, and the chance of capturing the outlaws much greater."

"So it would, sir—so it would!"

"Well, then, do you happen to know two intelligent, enterprising police officers who would like to join us in this undertaking? It would be six hundred pounds a-piece for them, and that's a sum not to be sneezed at. And think of the renown they would gain! Why, they would be made inspectors on the spot!"

"Ah, sir!" sighed the widow, "I do know two police officers that will just suit you—in fact, I might say I know half a dozen."

"But I only want two," said Jack.

"Of course, sir! I understand—only two. I am acquainted with a couple of highly respectable police officers, and I should not be at all surprised if they were in the house at this very moment."

"If that is the case," said Jack, "why, so much the better. I should be glad if you would see whether they are here or not!"

"If they are, shall I send them in?"

"Yes, by all means, Mrs. ——. I have not the pleasure of knowing your name."

"Lamb, sir, if you please," said the widow, with a simper and a half-curtsey—"Lamb, sir, if you please!"

"It pleases me very well indeed, Mrs. Lamb; but I suppose there are other names that would please you quite as well?"

"For, sir, what a man you are!"

"Well, the fact is," said Jack, "when I once get into the company of charming woman, I never know when to stop talking! But it is necessary to turn to business now! Above all, do not breathe a single word of what I have said to you to-night to a living soul; if you do, you will be the means of depriving me of my six hundred pounds!"

"I wouldn't speak about it for all the wide world! I'll go now and see whether Mr. Gubbins and Mr. Kibble are in the house."

"Who are they?"

"The two very respectable police officers I spoke to you about."

"Oh, yes! If they are here, show them in at once!"

"Well, leastways, it won't be long before you see them," said the landlady; "for if they are not here they are at the station across, and I can send over with a message."

"You are placing me under a deal of obligation, my dear madam," said Jack. "Will you add to it by sending the officers to me at once, for I am afraid the night will be gone before we start."

The landlady withdrew, and then Jack, glancing up at the old-fashioned clock in the corner, said, in very different tones to those which he had recently employed:

"Confound the old twattler, what a while she has kept me chatting here! However, I hope it will prove time well spent, though Claude must be getting impatient."

Just then, there was a knocking at the door of the room.

"Come in!" cried Jack.

The door was then opened cautiously, and, as it seemed, timidly.

Then a couple of men made their appearance, dressed as police officers.

"Walk in, gentlemen—pray walk in," cried Jack, "and sit down! We have important things to talk about, I can assure you!"

While speaking, Jack looked keenly at the new-comers, and saw they were a couple of tall, ungainly, ignorant-looking fellows, and after he had given one glance into their countenances he felt tolerably certain that he should be able to succeed in his design.

The two police officers, although they had been asked to sit down, fidgeted about in a very awkward manner, and Jack was obliged to repeat his invitation before they thought fit to comply with it.

Jack poured out some wine, and invited them to partake of it.

After this, a good deal of their clownishness wore off.

"Of course, two enterprising police officers like yourselves," began Jack, "must have heard of those four highwaymen, who, by banding together, have become the terror of all the roads in and about the metropolis?"

"You alludes, I suppose, to Dick Turpin and his gang?" said the police officer who rejoiced in the name of Gubbins.

"Yes, I do; and you must be aware that all attempts that have been made to capture them have signally failed."

"Very true!" said the officers in chorus.

"Now," said Jack, "has it ever fallen to your lot to have any thing to do with them? Have you ever pursued them, or tried to capture them?"

"No, never; we've not had a chance."

"Then I suppose you have never seen them?"

"No, not exactly seen them," said Mr. Kibble, "but we've as good as seen 'em, if you know what that means."

He fumbled in the breast pocket of his coat as he spoke.

"Oh yes, I know!" said Jack, hastily, for he wished to proceed with the conversation, having learned the important fact that these two officers had never seen himself or his comrades.

But Mr. Kibble, probably with a view to display his own efficiency, took from his pocket a folded paper.

"You see, 'ere is an accurate description of them in every particular, sent down from Bow Street." So saying, he unfolded the document.

"Is there indeed!" said Jack. "Just lend it me for a moment; that's the very thing I wanted!"

The bill was immediately and unsuspiciously handed to Jack, who gave a sigh of relief as he took hold of it, for although the two police officers were unquestionably blundering fellows, yet, by reading the description over again, they might detect some point of resemblance.

Jack pretended to peruse the bill with very great attention, and while he was doing so he said:

"The reason why I have sent for you is because myself and a friend of mine have ascertained for certain where these highwaymen conceal themselves."

"Have you, indeed?" said the two officers, starting from their chairs.

"Yes, I have; but pray sit down and let me explain the matter to you more thoroughly from first to last; it will be a great deal the best, because all misunderstanding in the future will be prevented!"

The officers sat down again, and prepared themselves to listen with the greatest attention to what Jack had to say.

He went on as follows:

"You must understand that, during the day, I happened to be along with a friend quite by accident in Enfield Chase. You know the place?"

"Oh, yes, of course we do—as well as we know Hertford."

"Just so! You will also recollect that some time back these very highwaymen were known for certain to be in the Chase, but they were rooted out. Now, it seems, they've gone there again, and I'll tell you how it was we found out all about it."

"Pray do, sir! Why, have you any idea what the reward amounts to for capturing these four villains?"

"I have," said Jack. "Here it is on this very bill. Why, altogether, it is two thousand five hundred pounds."

"Yes, that's the figger," said Gubbins, gaspingly.

"A nice round sum, is it not?" said Jack. "And when there are only four for it to be divided among, it's a decent thing."

"Yes, I should rather think so! Why, it's how much apiece?"

"Six hundred and twenty-five pounds," said Jack.

"Good gracious.

"And gentlemen," continued Jack, in a very impressive voice, and folding up the bill and putting it in his pocket while he spoke, "I can assure you that we stand the best possible chance of gaining the sum I have mentioned, for myself and a friend having found out their hiding-place, can take you two there, and then we shall secure them all four beyond a doubt."

"It almost takes my breath away to think about it!" exclaimed Gubbins.

"And mine too!" cried Kibble. "Only think—six hundred and twenty-five pounds!"

CHAPTER DCXXIV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL RIDE OFF TO ENFIELD CHASE WITH THE TWO POLICE OFFICERS.

"And well it might," said Jack, "for six hundred and twenty-five pounds is a large sum of money. It is enough to make us all independent for the rest of our lives, if we turn the money to good use. Why, you might be a farmer with it, or buy a public-house, or a row of houses—I don't know what?"

"Go on, sir—pray go on!" said the two police-officers. "We're anxious to hear all the rest!"

"Well, then, of course you will let this go no further? As I said, I was in the Chase along with a friend of mine, when all of a sudden we heard a strange noise. Not knowing what it might mean, we crouched down behind a bush, and kept as quiet as death. Then we heard the noise again, and, looking up, we saw a man standing close to the trunk of a large tree. Where he came from, we could not exactly tell; but presently he was joined by another, and another, and another, until four men were standing together. We looked well at them, I can assure you, and they, never dreaming we were hid so close at hand, spoke freely to one another, and, even if we had not recognised their persons, their conversation would at once have let us know who they actually were!"

"And they were really Dick Turpin and his companions?"

"Yes," said Jack—"there could not be the shadow of a doubt about it. I won't stop now to tell you all I heard them say—it was nothing very important; but, after a time, they walked off among the trees, while we thought we stood a good chance of being discovered, and knew if we were, we should be either put to death or imprisoned, so we moved off, but not until we had marked the spot well. Then after a time we returned, and, going up to the tree, found there was a trap-door close to the roots of it, and this was where the highwaymen had come from, and the opening and shutting of this trap-door caused the noise we had heard."

"Good gracious!" cried Gubbins. "Why, we shall have them like mice in a trap, and be able to catch them one by one as they come out."

"That's a capital thought!" cried Jack, enthusiastically. "To be sure we should! Now, I wonder how it was I did not think of that excellent plan myself?"

"Ah, sir," said Gubbins, with a complacent air, "the fact is, business is business! Now, you're not in the profession, so I don't wonder at your not thinking of it, because it isn't your business. Now, I have been in the profession for a great many years, though I think of leaving it."

"How's that?"

"Why, I'm getting tired of remaining a common police officer, and of seeing younger and less qualified men than myself made sergeants and inspectors of, and such like."

"It's disgusting!" said Kibble. "I feels the same thing myself!"

"Hold your row!" said Gubbins. "You know you haven't half the claim that I have, nor half the ability."

"Well, gentlemen," said Jack, "we will leave that part of the subject, because, let me tell you this, if we capture these four highwaymen—and, mind you, I have no doubt about it—you will not only receive your six hundred and twenty-five pounds apiece, but be made inspectors there and then."

"If we weren't," said Gubbins, "I'd leave the service that minute!"

"Have no fear," said Jack. "They would not part with so valuable a member as you are. And now, what I have to say is just this: In a case of this sort, the fewer there are in it the better."

"Decidedly!"

"Still, it is necessary to have a sufficient number, and that's why, after a long consultation, my friend and myself determined to engage two police officers to assist us, because our numbers would then be equal."

"A very wise determination indeed," said Gubbins—"very wise!"

"So I thought. My friend is outside along with the horses."

"Why didn't he come in?" asked Gubbins, as Jack thought, half suspiciously.

"There's a reason for most things," he replied, hastily, "and there happens to be a good reason for that. My friend is all very well, but he's got a weakness, and that weakness is, that when he goes into a public-house he doesn't think it right to come out again until everything he sees looks double."

The officers laughed.

"Well, on this occasion he was afraid to trust himself inside the house for fear of the consequences. He knew the necessity of being sober, and that's the reason why he's stopping outside."

The officers seemed to think this quite a plausible excuse.

"Now, then," cried Jack, "are you willing to join with us and run the risk?"

"I rather think we are!" said Gubbins; "and if isn't every day that such a chance comes in our road!"

"Scarcely," said Jack. "Have you horses?"

"Yes, we can get a couple in a minute or two."

"Then do so at once. I will go to my friend, and we will join you in the street. But not a word more about our expedition to a soul. You understand me, I don't intend to have the reward divided among five."

"Nor do we!" said Gubbins, rising and putting his finger by the side of his nose, and shaking his head slowly backwards and forwards.

"Rather not!" said Kibble following his companion's example.

"Six hundred and twenty-five pounds!" said Jack, also putting his finger to his nose, and shaking his head with a profoundly sagacious air. "That's the little amount a-piece for us, and no less!"

"I'm mum," said Gubbins—"not a word passes these 'ere lips!"

"Nor these," said Kibble; "and won't all the other fellows stare when they hear all about it and see us again!"

"I rather think they will," said Jack, in a peculiar voice, for he was wondering how these two very clever officers would look when stripped of their habiliments.

"But," said Mr. Gubbins, impressively, "let us tell you, sir, that you have done a very wise thing in taking two experienced officers into your confidence in this matter. Without us, you may depend, you would have done nothing—perhaps got your brains knocked out for your pains; but with us—ah, you'll see—you'll see!"

"So we shall," said Jack, again putting his finger to his nose, and wagging his head to and fro.

"I feel myself an independent man," cried Gubbins; "and when I come back I shall be able to say that I don't care a d—n for the whole force, and they can either make an inspector of me or not, just as they please—it will be perfectly indifferent to me!"

"Of course it will!" said Jack. "It's a glorious prospect! Come, let us start at once, or else, perhaps, when we get there we shall find that the birds have flown!"

This was a terrible thought to the two police officers, and the expression of their countenances changed immediately.

"We're off, sir—we're off, and in less than five minutes we will join you outside the inn!"

With these words, Gubbins and Kibble, highly delighted with themselves and the world in general, went to the stables attached to the police station and saddled their horses with their own hands.

Both looked upon the reward as already their own.

As soon as the door of the parlour had closed behind them, Jack summoned the landlady and paid her liberally for all he had had.

"My dear Mrs. Lamb, I deeply regret having to leave you so soon! I can hardly tear myself away, although I go to obtain six hundred pounds. Never mind, I shall be back with that amount in my pocket before many hours are over, and I am sure you will be no less pleased to see me then than now. Farewell!"

"Oh, you dear, delightful man!" exclaimed the widow as Jack passed through the door. "Don't you fail to return! But," she added, with a sigh, "I fear you are a gay deceiver!"

Sixteen-String Jack considered her fears were very well grounded, but he did not say so, for of course it would never do for him to show his face in that inn again after he had carried out his intentions.

He made his way to the stables, and found Claude walking impatiently up and down the yard.

"What a confoundedly long time you have been, Jack!" he cried. "What ever have you been about? I'm afraid you've been coming it too strong!"

"No, no—not a bit; it's all right—as right as a bank! Jump on your horse—we must start at once."

"Have they fallen into the trap?"

"Yes, blindly, and yet they had their eyes wide open all the while. Oh, Claude, they are a couple of uncommon fools, and the two officers I have met with could not suit us better if we had searched all England over. It will be a joke—a rare joke!"

"Where are they, then?"

"I'm going to meet them in the road. They are in a state of great excitement, and fully believe every word I have said."

Claude and Jack mounted their steeds, and having given a liberal gratuity to the ostler, trotted off to meet the two police officers.

They went past the inn a little way, and pulled the High Street.

Before they had occupied this position a moment, they heard the clatter of horses' feet, and directly afterwards they were joined by Gubbins and Kibble.

"Allow me to introduce you to my friend, Mr. Jones!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "Jones, old boy," he continued, "these are the two police officers I spoke of—Mr. Gubbins and Mr. Kibble."

Claude and the two police officers took off their hats, and bowed after the fashion of the times, and then Sixteen-String Jack exclaimed.

"Let us make the most of the time we have before us. Forward—forward! Our horses are in good condition and the road is firm and level."

"Yes, forward!" cried Gubbins. "We go to cover ourselves with renown!"

"We do," said Jack, "and to fill our pockets with good bank-notes, which, to my way of thinking, is a great deal better."

"So I say," exclaimed Gubbins. "Give me the cash and I don't care a d—n whether they make me an inspector, or whether I leave the service. There now!"

With these words, Gubbins dug his spurs rather viciously into his horse's flanks, and away the whole party went along the road at a smart gallop.

Presently Jack perceived in the distance the swinging sign of a public-house; so, reining-in his steed, he said:

"Bravely done—bravely done! Another such a gallop as that will take us to our journey's end; but I propose now that we give our horses a rest by stopping a minute or two in front of that inn yonder, and have a drop of something good to drink."

This was unanimously agreed to; and the moment afterwards the whole party stopped in the large open space in front of the roadside inn.

CHAPTER DCXXV.

THE TWO POLICE OFFICERS CONTINUE UNSUSPICIOUS OF THE FATE IN STORE FOR THEM.

THE halt did not last many minutes; for the officers, as well as the highwaymen, were extremely anxious that the journey should be continued.

A little hay and water was given to the horses, while their riders partook of a more stimulating kind of refreshment, in the shape of hot brandy-and-water.

This draught was far from unacceptable, for the night was a very cold one.

Away they went, at a rattling speed, and very soon the inn was left behind.

No more was said, until at length Sixteen-String Jack slightly slackened the speed of his horse, and cried out:

"There—look! Yonder is Enfield Chase!"

"Yes—there it is!" said Gubbins. "I've seen it from this road many and many a time; but I've never been under its trees in the whole course of my life."

"Then you'll gain some advantage to-night by doing so. Come, let us get on, for fear that we should arrive and find we have had all our trouble for nothing."

"That would be vexatious."

"Vexatious to a degree!" said Sixteen-String Jack.

"But," asked Gubbins, "are you sure that you noted the spot so well that you could make your way through the forest until you came to one particular tree, and then say, 'Down among the roots you will find the trap-door?'"

"I can," said Jack; "for I took particular notice, and so did my friend; and by trusting to each other, we shall be sure to go right."

"Well, you will excuse me for asking you, gentlemen; only I feel so very anxious about the matter."

"No doubt you do; any man may be very reasonably expected to feel anxious about six hundred and twenty-five pounds."

"Rather!"

"Well, here we are at last," said Jack; "a few more steps will take us to the trees."

The little party had now gained that piece of waste shrubby ground which is generally found encircling woods and forests like a belt.

As Jack had truly said, another moment took them under the trees, and then indeed they were fairly in Enfield Chase.

Sixteen-String Jack led the way for some distance with great confidence.

From time to time, however, he looked from right to left, and then he would nod his head, and consult Claude, and then keep on in the same direction as before, all of which movements fully impressed the police officers with the idea that they had very carefully noted the situation of the trap-door.

Of course this was all a farce upon Jack's part, for it was a matter of perfect indifference to him which way he went so long as it led to the centre of the Chase.

He was desirous of getting to some quiet and secluded spot.

As they penetrated still deeper into the recesses of the Chase, the trees grew closer and closer together, and their branches shooting out in all directions, in many places interlaced each other so that progress on horseback became very difficult.

But the two highwaymen were used to this sort of thing, and managed to bend their heads so low down as to escape any obstructions.

But the two police officers were by no means so fortunate, and every now and then one or the other of them would get a formidable crack on his headpiece from some low-lying branch.

They stood this for some time to the infinite amusement of the highwaymen; but at last they could stand it no longer.

"We had better dismount, I think!" said Gubbins, rubbing his head ruefully.

"Just as you please, gentlemen!" said Jack. "We are very close indeed to the place I spoke of, and so we must advance with the greatest caution!"

"Perhaps we had better leave our horses behind us here," suggested Gubbins.

"No, not yet. We can push on some distance further without any fear that we shall be overheard I will tell you when to stop."

The darkness of the Chase now became very profound, and it required not a little skill to proceed even on foot, for there were many projections from the ground quite large enough to be stumbled over.

The two officers did not notice the manner in which the two friends disposed themselves, or if they did observe it, they evidently suspected nothing.

Claude, while leading his horse, managed to walk by the side of Mr. Kibble, and in the same way Sixteen-String Jack managed to walk by the side of Mr. Gubbins.

While they were thus walking along under the shadow of the trees, Sixteen-String Jack made the first step towards the accomplishment of his purpose.

"This is a very strange adventure that we are on—do you know that?"

"What do you mean?" asked Gubbins.

"Why, to think we should be about to accomplish that which so many have attempted and failed to do."

"It is strange, of course," said Gubbins

"Decidedly!" added Kibble. "And I sha'n't care how soon it's all over!"

"No, nor I," said Sixteen-String Jack, "though the reward would not be half so sweet if there was not a little difficulty in obtaining it. By the way, this Dick Turpin is quite a wonderful fellow!"

"I've heard some strange stories of him," said Gubbins. "Who is there that has not?"

"Now, I remember a very singular circumstance, which our expedition to-night brings quite vividly before my mind"

"What is it—what is it?" asked Gubbins, eagerly

"I can tell you in a few minutes if you don't mind listening," said Jack, "and I may as well do that as we are walking along in silence, for we are some hundreds of yards distant from the trap-door yet."

"Oh, go on—go on!" said Gubbins. "I always do like to hear all about Dick Turpin and such-like chaps, because, you see, it very often happens that you learn something that turns to your own advantage."

"Very likely," said Jack, "and I should not be surprised if you learn something to your advantage from the story I am going to tell

"Well, begin at once," said Claude—"that's quite enough preface!"

"Well, then, the tale I have to tell is this: Some time back Dick Turpin was staying at an old deserted mansion, not far from Finchley, where he had taken up his quarters."

"Yes—I heard some particulars of that," interrupted Gubbins "Mr. Wriggles and his officers rooted the rascals out—didn't they?"

"You're quite right," said Jack, "they did. Well, Dick Turpin thought he was living very snugly and unsuspected in this deserted mansion, but presently he had his suspicions aroused."

"How was that?" asked Gubbins.

"Why, one day, as he was standing at one of the upper windows of the mansion, he saw a couple of men skulking about in the grounds, peeping and prying here and there, and at last off they went."

"Two officers, I suppose?"

"A good guess, Mr. Gubbins—they were officers! Well, then, Dick Turpin imagined that danger was at hand, so he took particular notice which way these two officers went, and, having done so, left the window. In this deserted mansion, you must know, he had several capital disguises, so he put one of them on, and saying to his three companions that there was game afloat, and they were to keep a sharp look-out, he made his way across the grounds, reading pretty nearly in the footsteps of the two officers he had seen.

"That was a bold course for him to adopt.

"Very. But if you will listen, you will hear that he did something much bolder than that."

"Oh! I shouldn't wonder! Go on!"

"Well, Dick Turpin went at a much more rapid rate than the two police officers, and after a time he managed to get them in view. He then hung back, and particularly watched which way they were going; he crept after them slowly and cautiously."

"And didn't the officers see him?" asked Gubbins.

"No, that they certainly did not!" replied Sixteen-String Jack.

"Ah! then, gentlemen, it is pretty clear that I was not one of the police officers! But there it is—there's some members of the force that I do believe go walking about with their eyes in their pockets, while, as for those like myself—active, and enterprising, and vigilant, and all that sort of thing, keeping an eye upon everything—are taken no notice of, and are snubbed by sergeants and inspectors that ain't fit to hold a candle to us!"

"That's just so!" said Kibble.

"I can easily believe it!" said Jack. "But, now, to go on with my tale about Dick Turpin; I have only a word or two more to say."

"Ah! yes, let us hear the rest!"

"Well, then, without being seen by the two officers, Dick Turpin tracked them to a public-house somewhere on the Finchley Road. He saw them go in, and then, after waiting for some time, Dick Turpin went in too."

"What, while two officers were there?"

"Yes—while two officers were there!"

"Then don't I wish I had been one of them!"

"No doubt you do," said Jack; "and yet, if you had, you might have been deprived of the glorious opportunity you have to-night."

"But I never heard of such a thing!" exclaimed Gubbins. "To have the audacity to walk into a public-house where two representatives of his Majesty were!"

"Well, anyhow, Dick Turpin did it; but then you must remember he was disguised."

"Oh, yes—that makes a difference, of course!"

"You must not overlook that fact. I don't suppose, with all his daring, that Dick Turpin would have been bold enough to enter the public-house if he had not been disguised!"

"Well, what took place then?" asked Gubbins, whose curiosity was greatly increased.

"Dick Turpin went up to the bar where the landlord was standing, and asked him which was the nearest town where he could find any police officers, for he had important information to give."

"Well, I've never heard that tale before;" said Gubbins, "and I rather think the world is coming to something if highwaymen are to go into public-houses and talk to the landlords about giving information to police officers!"

"I give you the facts," said Jack, "precisely as they were given to me, and you can draw from them just what conclusions you think proper—so now to go on. The landlord told Dick Turpin—who, being dressed like any ordinary traveller, he didn't suspect for a moment—that the nearest place would be London, and that it was a matter of ten or eleven miles to Bow Street."

"What then?"

"Why, the landlord added that it so happened that there were two London police officers in the inn at that moment, and suggested that they might do as well."

"And what did Dick Turpin say to that?"

"Why, he declared that nothing could be better, since it would save him a great deal of trouble and time, which he could ill afford to spare, and requested the landlord to show him to the room where the two officers were."

"Oh, that's too much!" said Gubbins—"that's too much!—that's too audacious by far!"

"Oh, yes, certingly; it's too howdashus!" cried Kibble.

"I can only say," exclaimed Claude, "that I happened to hear the tale myself, and I can assure you that my friend is telling it you word for word just as I heard it."

"Oh, no doubt—no doubt," said Mr. Gubbins. "I wouldn't think for a moment that he was trying to deceive me—I know he would be incapable of such a thing!"

"I should indeed!" said Jack. "In fact, it would be madness upon my part, or anyone else's, to attempt to deceive so active, enterprising, and vigilant a police officer as yourself!"

CHAPTER DCXXVI.

THE TWO POLICE OFFICERS ARE INDUCED BY THE FORCE OF CIRCUMSTANCES TO ACT IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE DICTATES OF PRUDENCE.

"I DON'T like to say too much of myself!" exclaimed Gubbins, "but perhaps you will allow me to remark that I quite agree with what you just said."

"Then that's settled," said Jack. "And now to go on, for we are getting very close to the spot now."

"Make haste, then, by all means," said Gubbins, "though I confess I'm curious to know how far Turpin's impudence took him."

"Why, right into the room where the two officers were sitting drinking their grog!" replied Jack.

"Impossible!"

"I can assure you I heard it. And when he got in he introduced himself as a gentleman from Oxford, and he said he had very important intelligence to give to the police officers."

"And what did the police officers say to that? Didn't they recognise him?"

"No; they never dreamt who he was for a moment! They asked him what the intelligence was about, and he told them that it was concerning Dick Turpin."

"Worse and worse!"

"More daring, I admit—but he did it! The officers then told him it was fortunate he had come to them, for they happened to be on the look-out for Dick Turpin and his companions."

"And what did Dick Turpin say to that?"

"He informed them that as he happened to be in the neighbourhood of a place which he described, and which the officers recognised as the deserted mansion, he had seen a man pass through the gates, mounted on a splendid black mare."

"But I can't understand," said Mr. Gubbins, "why Dick Turpin should have done such an absurd thing as that!"

"Wait a little while, and you will comprehend his drift. He was leading the officers into a trap, though they little thought it at the time."

"I should like to see 'em try to lead me into a trap!" exclaimed Gubbins, with a confident air.

"He would be a lost mutton," said Jack, "if he tried anything of the sort; and the officers were sorry afterwards that they had not been more wide-awake!"

"I am full of curiosity," said Gubbins, "for I can't make out why Dick Turpin should tell the officers where he was, and lead them on to the scent at once."

"Well, you will soon hear it now—and your wondering will cease. He told the officers that he had watched this man on the black horse go up the avenue to a certain place, where he disappeared through a concealed door, and offered to take the police officers to this very concealed door through which the horse and rider had passed."

"Ha—what?" said Kibble. "Secret door?—that sounds odd, don't it?"

"Hold your row!" said Gubbins, "and don't interfere! Pray go on, sir."

"Well, the officers rushed headlong into the trap in a moment, and agreed to accompany this traveller from Oxford to the deserted mansion, for he promised to show them just where the concealed door was."

"Concealed door?" muttered Kibble—"blest if that don't sound very odd!"

"Don't make a fool of yourself!" said Gubbins. "Pay attention to what the gentleman is saying. No doubt we shall learn a wise lesson of practical experience from him."

"Very likely!" said Claude, drily.

"Well, these two officers," continued Jack, "never said a word to anybody, for they believed that, with the assistance of the traveller from Oxford, they should be able to capture all the highwaymen without any extra aid, and then they would have all the more money to divide amongst them. You understand that?"

"Oh, yes—quite plainly!" said Gubbins.

Kibble was about to make some remark, but Sixteen-String Jack rapidly continued.

Evidently Kibble was getting suspicious.

"Well, they all three went to the deserted mansion, and Dick Turpin showed the officers the secret door, and took them inside the building; and when he had got them there, what do you think he did?"

"I don't know!" gasped Gubbins.

"What should you think?"

"Oh, I feel too excited to think! Pray tell me at once!"

"Well, then, Dick Turpin closed the door, and uttered a whistle, and three more persons immediately came into the room. Perhaps you can guess who these persons were? if not, I will tell you. They were Dick Turpin's companions!"

"Oh, lawks!" said Mr. Gubbins. "It almost takes my breath away to think of it! What did the two officers do?"

"What, when they found themselves face to face with Dick Turpin and his companions?"

"Yes."

"Well, now, before I answer you that question," said Sixteen-String Jack, "suppose you answer me another."

"Very well; what is it?"

"If you had been in the position of these two officers, or supposing these two officers that I have been telling you about had been yourself and Mr. Kibble, now, what do you think you should have done under the circumstances?"

"I am sure I don't know," replied Gubbins, "and I can't give you any better answer."

"Well, then," said Jack, "I'll tell you what these two officers did, and then you can form your own opinion as to whether they acted wisely or not."

"What was it they did, then?"

"Why, when they found they were trapped—when they found the highwaymen had got them completely in their power, and that they were in a place far away from all other habitations, and where no cries for succour could possibly avail them, they acted with common sense."

"How—how?"

"Instead of struggling and fighting with the highwaymen, and getting killed or hurt, they gave in quietly at once, and confessed themselves beaten. In return for that, the highwaymen faithfully promised not to injure them in any way, and they faithfully kept their word."

Sixteen-String Jack now paused, and so did Claude.

The two police officers by this time comprehended that something was wrong.

A horrible foreboding sprang up in their minds, and very quickly gathered force.

The dismal conviction seized upon them that they too had suffered themselves to be led into a trap with their eyes wide open.

"Now," said Jack, "if you found yourselves by chance in such an awkward position, don't you think it would be much wiser to submit and put up with a little inconvenience than to stand still and have your brains knocked out?"

"I—I—I don't much like your story, Mr. Whoever-you-are!" cried Gubbins—"I tell you I don't much like it; and the more I think about it, the less I do like it! What do you mean?"

"I'll tell you," said Sixteen-String Jack, releasing his hold upon the bridle of his horse, while Claude did the same—"I'll tell you, if you will just bend your head this way!"

It was rather dark, and Mr. Gubbins could not see exactly what Jack was about.

He did not bend his head, but remained standing still.

In one hand, Sixteen-String Jack held a pistol, and with the other he seized hold of Gubbins by the collar of his coat.

Claude Duval served Kibble in a precisely similar manner.

Neither of the officers attempted the least resistance—they were too much astounded at the strange turn events were taking.

As quick as thought, Jack thrust his pistol into Gubbins's ear, and cried:

"It means just this: You and your companion have been trapped, just like the two officers I have been telling you about! If you raise your hand—struggle in the least, or resist in any way, I will as surely blow your brains out as I now threaten to do it! You understand me; I am fully in earnest! I had an object in getting you here to this place away from all other human beings, and, so far, I have succeeded! Now, then, do you submit?"

During this dreadful address, the eyes of the active, intelligent, and enterprising police officer glared wildly around him, but the long, leafless trees seemed to point threateningly at him.

"Your answer!" said Jack—"be quick about it!"

"What has Kibble done?" asked Gubbins, in a subdued voice.

"He has acted like a sensible man!" cried Jack. "Finding resistance useless, he has submitted! Behold, he is now a prisoner!"

Jack was right.

Kibble had given in quietly enough, and suffered his arms to be bound.

"Well, it is no good for me to think of resisting two like you," said Gubbins, making a great show of valour. "As Kibble has thought proper to show the white feather and give in, I am of necessity obliged to surrender."

"Certainly!" said Jack. "Here, Claude," he added, "just oblige Mr. Gubbins with a little bit of that strong cord."

Claude obeyed willingly enough, and so far the two police officers found themselves prisoners.

Claude Duval then left Sixteen-String Jack to keep guard over the pair, while he produced a large quantity of strong rope, which the police officers had brought with them, thinking it would be required to secure the four highwaymen they were so sure of capturing.

"We will deal with you one at a time," said Jack; "and we will begin, Mr. Gubbins, with you. I am going to release your hands, but for a purpose of my own. Of course I shall disarm you first, and if you attempt to run away, we will both fire after you. We don't threaten in vain; and you had better let us do as we like without forcing us to extremes. We don't mean to take your lives, but you may compel us to do it."

While Jack was uttering these words, Claude Duval rapidly deprived Mr. Gubbins of every offensive and defensive weapon he had about him, and when he had done that, he severed the bonds by which his arms were confined.

Then the highwaymen took up their positions close to him, with a pistol in each hand.

Mr. Gubbins was very angry, and his lips were quivering with rage, but at the same time he was very frightened too.

"Now attend to me!" cried Sixteen-String Jack. "We want your clothes, and must have them!"

"My—my clothes?" stammered Gubbins.

"Yes—every garment you wear, and we not only want, but will have! You can take your choice—you either pull them off your live body, or we will strip them from your dead carcass—so which will you do? There is no time to spare—be quick with your decision!"

Mr. Gubbins reflected for a few moments, and then came to the conclusion that one evil was greater than the other.

It would, he thought—although very disagreeable—be much better to take off his own clothes, than be killed and allow the highwaymen to take them off him.

One way or the other, he saw his clothes must be had.

"What's your decision?" asked Jack, in an impatient voice.

Gubbins did not reply in words.

He gave one despairing glance right and left of him, and then, with a deeply-muttered curse at his own folly and blindness in allowing himself to be led into this snare, he unbuttoned his coat, and slipping it off, flung it on to the ground.

CHAPTER DXXVII.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK RE ACCOSTED BY MR. WRIGGLES IN THE OLD BAILEY, AND EVENTS ROUND NEWGATE BEGIN TO ASSUME A VERY COMPLICATED ASPECT.

"VERY good!" said Jack. "I am glad you have come to such a sensible determination! Thank you!"

He took up the coat as he spoke.

"Now, off with your vest," he said, "and those wrappers you wear round your neck, and your hat!"

These articles were one by one handed to the highwayman, who said "Thank you," as he took each with ironical politeness.

"Ah!" cried Jack, "I see you wear a wig! I must trouble you for that also."

Off came the article named.

Gubbins looked very rueful and very angry, and when sometimes he thought of resisting and declaring that he would not pull off another article of his apparel, his purpose would change, for his eyes would rest upon the pistols which the two highwaymen continued to level at him.

"Now then," said Jack, "be quick!"

"What do you want next?"

"Your breeches."

"M-m-my breeches?"

"Yes—don't hesitate, or you know the consequences! Off with them, and your boots as well!"

"But consider, gentlemen!" expostulated the police officer.

"I can consider nothing!" shouted Jack. "Off with them!"

"But it's a windy night!" said Gubbins, "and freezing like the very devil! Surely you would not make me take my breeches off on such a night as this!"

"Surely I would!" replied Jack. "Dead or alive, I must have them! So take your choice between standing the cold, and being sent to a place where you'll complain of the heat!"

With a hideous groan, Gubbins divested himself of his boots and breeches, and then stood with the tails of his shirt fluttering in the icy wind, and looking a very ludicrous and miserable object indeed.

Claude and Jack both laughed immoderately.

They could not help it.

Gubbins was inclined to be desperate.

"It's all d—d fine for you to laugh!" he said. "But I can't see the joke! What is it you mean to do? What do you intend to do with us?"

"Wait a little while, and you will see!" said Jack. "It won't do to tell you too much at once!"

Mr. Gubbins shivered and shook, while his teeth chattered together in quite an alarming way.

"This way!" said Claude. "Be good enough to stand against that tree! And now for a rope!"

He placed the pistols in his pocket, and picked up the piece of strong rope.

This he threw over the body of the police officer, and, almost before that individual could comprehend what he was about, bound him tightly to the tree close to which he was standing.

The feelings of the other officer at this, seeing the fate that was intended to be his, may perhaps be imagined.

As soon as ever Gubbins was done with, the highwaymen turned to him, and he was served in precisely the same manner.

He did not submit quite so readily, and made one or two efforts to escape, but they were frustrated.

He might just as well have given in quietly, for the only good he got by his struggles were some sharp knocks from the highwaymen's fists, and from the barrels of their pistols.

When he stood in his shirt, he knew that the next thing to be done was for him to be tied to a tree.

There was no taking him by surprise, so that in this case the highwaymen had a more difficult task to perform.

But they accomplished it by sheer force

They tied him tightly to a tree that stood very near to the one to which Gubbins was secured.

Upon finding themselves perfectly helpless—for our friends had taken care to secure their hands so that they could not possibly release themselves—they broke forth into a succession of the most awful oaths and execrations.

"Bravo!" said Claude—"go it! I should advise you to keep up that sort of fun, because it will tend to circulate your blood a little, and keep you from getting cold. It's the only exercise you will have for some time, I promise you!"

"Yes," said Sixteen-String Jack, as he gathered up all the clothes—"yes, I should certainly advise you to continue your efforts. Take a parting word from me—keep up your shouts—scream well—the sounds may reach the ears of somebody or other, and you will be liberated! If you stay here very long you will stand a very good chance of being frozen to death!"

With this very consoling remark, the two highwaymen departed, taking all the clothes and all four horses with them.

They laughed immoderately at the trick they had played their foes.

At length they paused in the dell we have so often mentioned, and when they gained this spot their laughter somewhat subsided.

It was then that Claude said to his companion:

"This is a capital joke, Jack, and no mistake; but yet for all that it's an awfully cold night!"

"Yes—it freezes!"

"Well, tell me what you intend to do with these two wretches?"

"Why, leave them where they are, of course!"

"But in that part of the Chase the chances are a thousand to one if they are found before they are starved to death!"

"Oh—I don't mean to keep them there so long as that," said Jack. "You must remember now that it is nearly morning, and I hope to be back here under the trees in good time to-night. Then we will set those fellows at liberty—it will not be safe to do so before!"

"No, that it decidedly would not! We should have a lot of their companions after us in no time!"

"They must put up with the inconvenience of remaining in the cold! I daresay they will resign themselves to their fate in time; but come, Claude, we must not waste any more time in talking about them; begin your disguise!"

Claude obeyed

Both Gubbins and Kibble were much bigger men than our two friends.

But this was a convenience rather than otherwise, for the two highwaymen put on their clothes over those which they already wore.

Then, by the aid of a little dry grass, they managed to pad themselves out as occasion required, and by the time they had donned the whole of the officers' apparel they were completely metamorphosed.

They laboured under the disadvantage of having no looking-glass, by which to arrange themselves, and they had to put up with a little brook as a substitute.

This answered their purpose tolerably well.

Then the new day came, and the sun rose.

It was yet full early for them to start, so they agreed to remain in their present position for some time longer yet.

The sun quickly mounted, and as soon as the darkness was dispelled by his cheering rays they were able to make several important improvements in their disguises.

"You will do now, Claude," said Sixteen-String Jack. "I should scarcely know you myself, you are so much changed. To be sure, if I had the least suspicion that you were not a police officer, I should recognise you at once."

"Of course, and so would anybody, let them be disguised as well as they could. In a case of this sort, what you have to do is to guard against the possibility of anyone suspecting you to be other than you seem to be."

"Just so. And now, about reaching London? Which will be the best way to do it?"

"I have been thinking of that; and as we have assumed their clothes, I see no reason why we should not make use of their horses."

"Very good! And as our own?"

"We will leave them in the Chase. They will be safe enough, no doubt, and as we are disguised in this way, supposing that for the future you address me as Gibbs and I will call you Gubbins."

"Agreed!"

"And we shall be able to say with perfect truth that we come from Hertford; and if we are questioned by anyone, and it is known that there are two officers bearing those names in the town, why, we shall be quite free from all suspicion."

"That is certain."

It was shortly after this that our two friends mounted the horses belonging to the police officers, and rode leisurely out of the Chase.

It was very wise of them to decide to go to London on horseback, because the steeds wore a kind of uniform, so that they could be recognised at once as belonging to the police force.

"Which way shall we go, Jack?" asked Claude, as they emerged from the trees.

"Oh, we must take the high-road, and ride boldly along it. We had better not go too fast, either."

"It's a ticklish adventure," said Claude, "and I wish I could see to the end of it. However, it doesn't matter—we have begun, and there's no retreating."

"True enough. Forward!"

At a rapid trot, the highwaymen took their way along the high-road in the direction of London.

Before they had gone very far, they perceived before them, in the distance, a troop of dragoons.

The soldiers were drawn up in a straggling kind of line across the road, and it became evident that our friends would have to ride through them.

As Claude truly said, let the difficulties of the enterprise be what they might, there was no turning back.

"Don't hesitate," said Jack, to his companion—"ride on at just the same pace as before. The chances are a thousand to one against our being spoken to."

Both pressed their hats very hard upon their heads.

A few minutes soon decreased the distance between them and the dragoons.

At last they reached them, and then a loud, clear voice cried out:

"Halt!"

The two highwaymen pulled up instantly, and, perceiving the individual who had uttered the order, they touched their hats respectfully.

"Oh, police officers, I see!" said the captain of the troop coming forward. "What the devil is the reason you did not pull up as soon as you saw us, as you were ordered to do?"

Our friends were in perfect ignorance of this little arrangement, but Sixteen-String Jack did not lose his presence of mind.

"Beg pardon, sir," he said, "but we are behind, and I said to Kibble a moment ago, 'We must stop,' but he said, 'Oh, no, just salute as you pass—that will do, because our time is precious.'"

"Where are you from?" asked the captain, who never for an instant imagined that the police officers were other than they seemed to be. He would just as soon thought of wondering whether the sun, which was then shining upon them, was the same that he had seen set the night before.

"We are from Hertford," said Jack, in reply, "and are on our way to Newgate, as it is expected that the trial of the woman who calls herself Dick Turpin's wife will come off to-day!"

"Oh, yes, to be sure—of course! Well, pass on, and when you come to the next troop of dragoons, don't attempt to pass them by without stopping!"

Sixteen-String Jack readily promised that he would not, and rode off.

They were fortunate enough to escape detection during the whole of their journey, and this fact may be attributed to the boldness of their plan more than to anything else.

The outrageous idea that two highwaymen would have the audacity to disguise themselves as police officers, and ride along the high-road by broad daylight never once entered the minds of those they passed, and no wonder.

In perfect safety, then, our two friends reached the

[DICK TURPIN ANNOUNCES HIS DETERMINATION TO HIS COMRADES.]

Old Bailey just as the clock of St. Sepulchre's Church was chiming the half-hour past nine.

The success which had attended them so far inspired both with a great amount of confidence, which, in itself, would go a long way towards keeping up the deception.

"We will put up at the stables opposite the Governor's house," said Jack. "You know the place I mean?"

"Yes, yes—quite well."

"Our horses will be handy there in case we shall want them."

"Right! You had better say no more, for fear we should be overheard."

In another moment they reached the archway leading to the stables, which we have already had occasion to describe.

Several police officers had come up from various country towns that were not many miles distant from the metropolis, and had even put up their horses in these very stables, so that the arrival of our two friends was taken quite as a matter of course.

Some time would yet elapse before the court would open, and how to spend that time they scarcely knew.

With an assumption of great carelessness, however, they both strolled out into the Old Bailey.

Just as they emerged from the archway, however, they caught sight of a man in the uniform of a Bow Street runner.

He was short and stout, and his face was of a strange, purple colour.

The two highwaymen recognised him at once, and their hearts began to beat strangely.

"Hallo, mates!" he cried—for Mr. Wriggles happened to be uncommonly good-tempered that morning—"hallo, mates, where are you from? I know your faces quite well! What town do you come from?"

CHAPTER DCXXVIII.

MR. WRIGGLES TAKES SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL TO NEWGATE.

SPEAKING these words, Mr. Wriggles looked inquisitively into the countenances of the two disguised highwaymen.

They bore the scrutiny unflinchingly, and Sixteen-String Jack, taking a constable's staff from his pocket, with a little gilt crown at the top of it, as a testimony of his authority, he replied:

"Hertford we comes from. My name is Gubbins, and my mate here is Kibble."

"Oh! indeed!" said Wriggles, stroking his chin. "Hertford—Gubbins—Kibble! Well, I don't recollect you at all, except by your faces! I suppose I must have seen you, some time or other!"

"Very likely," said Claude, carefully speaking in a disguised voice. "I seem to remember your face very well; but I can't think of your name."

"Indeed!" said the chief officer, buttoning up his coat. "You don't recollect my name—ha! Well, it's Wriggles! Perhaps you know me now!"

He said this with a very pompous and imposing air.

As for Sixteen-String Jack and Claude, they pretended to be quite overcome with awe as soon as the announcement was made.

They retreated a step or two, and both bowed very low.

"Excuse us, sir!" said Sixteen-String Jack humbly; "pray excuse us! It was decidedly wrong upon our part to forget so active and enterprising an officer as yourself. Pray excuse us!"

"Oh, all right—all right!" said Wriggles, who was always delighted by any great show of respect. "There is no harm done that I see. But what brings you from Hertford this morning?"

"We have come to see the trial!" said Jack.

"Yes!" said Claude, "that's it; but I'm most awfully dry, riding so far. It would not be presuming too much to ask the great Mr. Wriggles if he would be kind enough to join us in a glass?"

"Oh, certainly—certainly!" said Mr. Wriggles. "There's a capital place just at the corner; and there's twenty minutes good before the court opens."

"You do us too much honour!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "I should not have dreamt of daring to ask you; but then Kibble, he always was darin', and that's why I makes a kind of pal of him."

Quite delighted with these two police officers, whom he set down as being capital fellows, Mr. Wriggles led the way to a public-house close at hand.

He was so blinded by his vanity, and the deference with which they had treated him, that he never suspected them for a moment, as surely he ought to have done.

Rum was called for, and while they were imbibing it, Wriggles said:

"Now, look here, my lads. If you pay attention to what I have to say, there will probably be money earned by the pair of you."

"Mr. Wriggles," said Jack, with great emphasis, "you may depend that I shall pay the greatest possible attention to every word you say. I don't look for reward, no more does Kibble, I know. Do you, Kibble?"

"Not a bit of it! We only look, Mr. Wriggles, to you; and we're delighted to be honoured by your confidence."

Thereupon, the glasses were emptied, and when they were filled again, Mr. Wriggles said:

"Well, now to business! I want as many men as I can conveniently get hold of, both inside the court and out."

Jack nodded.

"You see," continued Wriggles, sinking his voice to an impressive whisper, "I've got the idea in my head that we shall see those four highwaymen attempt to enter the court to-day. If they appear, I shall let them go in right enough, but quietly nab them as they're coming out."

"Good—good!" said Jack, pretending to be excessively delighted, and yet not feeling very comfortable. "Good — good! that's a capital idea, and one well worthy of you, Mr. Wriggles!"

"Well, that's my notion. I thought, however, that that girl being a prisoner would have drawn better."

"What do you mean, Mr. Wriggles?"

"My words are rather mysterious to you, no doubt; but there's nothing like making you understand just how things are. I captured Maud, and put her into Newgate, because I thought Dick Turpin and his gang would attempt to get her out again; but they have not come yet—they have not made the least attempt. I have watched round Newgate, night and day, ever since she has been a prisoner, and have had lots of men to assist me, but not a sign of them have we seen."

"I understand now," said Sixteen-String Jack, "what you meant by saying she did not draw as well as you expected."

"I begin to think sometimes that I have made a mistake, and that Dick Turpin doesn't care so much for her after all, and is rather glad than otherwise, and that I have taken a trouble off his hands."

"It may be so," said Jack—"it may be so, or it may not!"

"Very true. Still, as matters have gone so far, she will take her trial, and I can't help thinking that these four highwaymen will steal into the court somehow or other."

"But what did you want us to do?" asked Jack.

"Why, you must go in and stand among the people during the trial. I can take you through a private door, and you can mingle with the crowd and move about, and all the while you are doing so keep your eyes wide open; scrutinize everybody's face; observe everybody's motions. If you see anything suspicious, take care!"

"Mr. Wriggles," said Jack, "I am delighted to think you should honour me so far; I am truly delighted—I am more than delighted, Mr. Wriggles; ain't you, Kibble?"

"Oh, I am—I am!" said Claude, placing his hand on his stomach and making a bow.

"Very good, then!" said Mr. Wriggles. "Now come along with me."

The two highwaymen dared not refuse; but yet, in their hearts they felt very uncomfortable indeed, and wished Mr. Wriggles had been at the devil before he had chanced to address them.

It would have been a great satisfaction to our friends if they could have exchanged a whisper with each other, but that course would have been a very imprudent one to adopt, for, to a certainty, it would excite Mr. Wriggles's suspicions.

Nor could they with any safety exchange meaning glances with each other.

Reluctantly, then, they followed him into the street.

For the life of them, they could not decide whether he suspected them or whether he did not.

They knew full well that he was exceedingly artful and clever, and that he would play any trick in order to get them into his power.

The breasts of Claude and Jack were filled with very similar thoughts and misgivings; indeed, as they crossed the road they asked themselves:

"Suppose, now, that old Wriggles has recognised us, and pretended not to do so, how shall we do then? Is this an elaborate little scheme of his to throw us off our guard, and decoy us into Newgate? If he does suspect us—if he has recognised us, how easy it will be as soon as we get inside for him to shut the door and cry: 'Now I have you both!'"

They had not time to ask themselves any more questions, for the street—by no means a wide one—by this time was crossed, and Mr. Wriggles ascended the steps leading to the vestibule of the prison.

The two highwaymen followed closely behind him; but when they reached those steps, and fairly stood beneath the shadow of the dismal prison, their hearts sank lower and lower. They were now in a truly desperate fix.

It is true they were not yet inside the prison; but then, if they had turned and fled, such close pursuit would have been made after them that capture would have been certain.

The only chance they had—and that seemed slighter and slighter the more they thought of it—was that Mr. Wriggles had not recognised them, and was acting in perfect good faith.

In answer to the furious summons upon the knocker, the little wicket in the door was opened, and as soon as the janitor caught sight of Mr. Wriggles, he opened the door with magical celerity.

And now at this last moment the disguised highwaymen lingered.

"Come on!" cried Mr. Wriggles—"come on; you'll find we shall only be just in time after all!"

Our friends did not dare refuse obedience, and so slowly and reluctantly they ascended the steps.

In another moment they stood within the vaulted roof of the vestibule.

A loud clang came upon their ears.

They turned round.

The door was shut, and the man on the look had consigned the key to his pocket.

Now was the crisis of their fate.

They did not dare to look at each other, or to glance at Mr. Wriggles.

That individual, however, had addressed one of the turnkeys who was sitting on a bench.

"Winch," he cried, "where's Mr. Cawthorn? Has he gone into the court yet?"

"I believe he has, sir," replied the turnkey. "He went through awhile back; but whether he's preparing his book, or whether he's in the court I can't exactly tell."

"Well, never mind, get your keys."

"Yes, sir; but which do you want?"

"Those," said Mr. Wriggles, pointing to a small bunch, hanging up against the wall.

The turnkey took them down without hesitation. Selecting one, he applied it to the lock of a strong door.

With a squeak, the door receded upon its hinges, and then a long vaulted passage was presented to view.

"Follow me!" cried Mr. Wriggles; "this is the way!"

Our friends liked their situation less and less, and were fast resigning themselves to their fate.

They really believed that Mr. Wriggles had got the best of them.

To attempt to retreat would have been ridiculous.

They had no resource but to walk straight on.

Other doors were opened, corridors traversed, flights of steps ascended and descended.

"We're on the high road to the cells, that's quite clear!" thought Jack to himself. "We've brought our pigs to a nice market at last! I could never have believed that I should have been such a d—d fool to be drawn into Newgate in this way!"

Just as this thought passed through his mind he turned his eyes towards his companion.

Claude's face wore a peculiar expression; but it was one that Sixteen-String Jack was quite able to comprehend.

"He's thinking the same as I am," was Jack's reflection; "but no matter, we're in—and let the affair end how it may, we can't be worse off than we are now."

"Here we are at last!" cried Wriggles, as Winch paused before a door. "It's rather a roundabout way, isn't it? but it avoids the crush."

How the highwaymen strained their eyes and fixed them upon that door.

No words could convey the least idea of the revulsion of feeling which came over them when, upon the door being opened, a loud murmuring sound reached their ears, and they saw in front of them the heads of the lawyers, and the dock on the opposite side.

Mr. Wriggles, then, had kept good faith.

He had not suspected them, and they had suffered all that torturing suspense for nothing.

"Now, my lads," he said, "you know what you have to do. I have business elsewhere. Without seeming to do so, look carefully at everybody, and make yourselves acquainted—so far as you can—with the features of every one in the court."

"Mr. Wriggles," said Jack, "you may depend upon us. If these highwaymen are here, depend upon it we'll find 'em out."

"If you do, the reward will be glorious," said Wriggles.

Winch closed the door, and Mr. Wriggles crossed over to the opposite side of the court.

"What an escape!" whispered Jack faintly, into his companion's ear—"what an escape!"

"Rather," said Claude; "but pray don't speak of it until we are safely outside this confounded place. I don't feel as if I could breathe in it; besides, we had better not whisper too much, for fear Wriggles should see us and suspect something."

"All right," said Jack; "we'll carry out his orders."

So saying, both looked about them with curiosity and interest.

The proceedings had not commenced, and so they were able to observe everything accurately.

Of course their principal object was to discover their two companions, Dick Turpin and Tom King.

CHAPTER DCXXIX.

TOM KING IS SUSPECTED AND FOLLOWED BY A POLICE OFFICER.

It will be remembered that we left Tom King in Covent Garden Market, where he parted with his comrade Dick Turpin.

He loitered about the waggon for a minute or two, in order to appear quite at his ease, and then entering the market, strolled on, gaping about him until he reached Lincoln's Inn Fields.

By observing the direction he was taking he knew quite well that he should get to Newgate in a straight line.

Just as he was passing under the archway at the top of Duke Street, he saw a police officer leaning idly against a stone post at the corner.

Tom strolled on, pretending to take no particular notice, and without he chose to cross over, he would have to pass very close to this idle police officer.

He hesitated as to which would be the most polite course, and finally determined to keep straight on.

The officer stared him very hard in the face as he passed, and Tom fancied that his suspicions were aroused.

Nevertheless he walked on along the south side of the open space, and then entered Lincoln's Inn.

Once, and only once, Tom ventured to glance behind him, and then he saw the police officer following in his footsteps.

"I was right," he murmured. "The fellow suspects me. Now what is to be done?"

This was a troublesome question.

It was quite clear, however, that it would never answer to continue on his way to Newgate with a police officer at his heels, and so Tom was obliged to tax his inventive powers to the utmost, in order to find a means of getting out of his present difficulty.

He looked all around him, glancing in turn at every object; but he saw nothing suggestive of a new idea.

A few steps would take him into Chancery Lane; but Tom determined not to enter that busy thoroughfare until by some means or other he had put an end to the officer's meddlesome interference.

Accordingly he walked about, looking up at the tall houses with their dirt-begrimed windows, and finally leaning against the wall in the Old Square, looked up at the clock, which was just then striking the hour.

The police officer in the most vexatious manner possible stopped also, and he also glanced up at the clock.

"He's got his eye on me!" said Tom, "that's certain. Confound the fellow—how am I to elude him?"

The Old Square, Lincoln's Inn, presented a very busy appearance that morning.

Thin, hungry-looking lawyers were bustling about with blue bags under their arms, and barristers with their long gowns and wigs were flitting hither and thither.

"I'd better not stop here any longer," thought Tom. "I'll take another walk round."

He did so; and passing under a kind of archway, turned the corner.

For a moment he was out of sight of the inquisitive police officer.

Close by a number of doors stood invitingly open.

Tom looked at them, and then, growing desperate, he bolted quickly into one of the houses.

He was so fortunate as to cross the threshold and commence the ascent of the stairs before the police officer had time to emerge from the archway and notice which way he had gone.

He would have to unravel the mystery of Tom's disappearance by his own acuteness.

Leaving him to that difficult task, we will follow the highwayman, who, when he entered that house had really no idea whatever as to the next step he ought to take.

Fearful lest the officer should enter that house, Tom continued to ascend the stairs.

He went up as quietly as foot could fall, and upon reaching the third-floor landing he stopped.

"I am out of his sight!" he muttered to himself, "and that's not much after all. He will know very well that I have disappeared somewhere close at hand, and consequently will keep a watch on all the houses. How can I emerge without being seen?—he may stop there for hours!"

Tom's position was embarrassing.

It was particularly necessary that he should avoid detection, and that he should reach Newgate in a short space of time.

It seemed doubtful whether he would accomplish either of these objects.

"I have it!" he said at length. "There's only that way. Aha, Mr. Officer, with all your 'outeness, I think you're done for now!"

Tom was in high spirits again, for he believed that the plan he had thought of would be effectual in baffling his foe.

What his scheme was his acts will quickly show.

Just before him was a small, dirty door, on the upper portion of which was painted in white letters, "MR. LAWSON."

Who Mr. Lawson was Tom had not the remotest idea.

Nevertheless, he knocked boldly with his knuckles upon the panel of the door.

The summons was answered by an individual clothed in a barrister's robe and with a white powdered wig on his head.

It seemed as though he was about going out when Tom knocked.

"Beg pardon, zur," said Tom, assuming a behaviour and mode of speech suitable to his attire. "Be you Mr. Lawson?"

"No," was the reply. "You will find Mr. Lawson inside."

With these words, the barrister walked out and descended the stairs, while Tom King passed through the door and entered a small room fitted up like an office.

At a table near the window a man was sitting with a pile of papers before him.

He was thin and pale, and had a nervous, irritable look.

When Tom entered, he glanced up from his writing, and jerked out:

"Well—well, who are you? What do you want?"

Tom adroitly closed the door, and, observing a little brass bolt close to the handle, he shot it in an instant into its socket.

Had there been the least colour in his face, Mr. Lawson would have turned pale, but his countenance was habitually so white that no emotion could make it whiter.

Nevertheless, his fingers shook to such an extent that the pen fell from them.

"What do you want?" he ventured to ask again, as Tom King, with one stride, reached the table.

"First," cried the highwayman in a stern tone, and producing a pistol as he spoke—"first, I require profound silence; and, second, that you at once obey my commands!"

Mr. Lawson was a timid, nervous man, and he had, above all things, the greatest dread of firearms.

He shrank back in his chair, and, holding his hands before his face, as though they would be a shield, he cried:

"Don't—don't! Oh! murder! Turn it the other way—it might go off, or something!"

"It will go off, you may make sure," said Tom, "without you are silent!"

"I am silent—I will do anything if you won't point that pistol at me—I can't bear firearms!"

"All right!" said Tom, lowering the point of his weapon. "Are you open to listen to reason?"

The lawyer smiled feebly.

"If you are," continued Tom, just listen to what I say: I want assistance of a certain kind of you, and I will have it! If you consent I will make you a present of ten guineas; if you refuse, I shall shoot you first, and help myself to what I require afterwards!"

"State your wishes," said Mr. Lawson, holding out his hand; "if possible I will comply with them!"

"I was not mistaken," said Tom. "I thought when I first glanced into your countenance that you would be open to conviction. Am I to understand that all is comfortably settled?"

"Yes," said the lawyer, holding out his hand, and moving the fingers as though anxious to clutch the ten guineas Tom had offered. "Any professional assistance I can render shall be yours; there is no need of any violent demonstration!"

"The assistance I require is strictly professional!" said Tom. "There's a case coming on at the Old Bailey to-day in which I feel deeply interested; I want a lawyer to accompany me in order to watch the case."

"My dear sir, is that all?" said Mr. Lawson, who had sat in the office for many a day longing for a client, and he was overjoyed to think he had found one at last—"is that all you require?"

"Very nearly."

"Then why threaten me with a pistol, or behave in the violent, eccentric manner you did?"

"Oh! think nothing of it," said Tom, "it's only an eccentric, pleasant way I've got—that's all!"

"I grant it's eccentric," said the lawyer, pretending to take it as a joke; "but I can't say it's very pleasant. However, let us attend to business. What's the nature of the case you want me to watch?"

"I'll explain all the particulars to you as we walk along," said Tom King.

"Very well, my dear sir. I am delighted, of course, to attend to any of your suggestions. Pray command me!"

"I intend to do so. Have you a barrister's gown and wig?"

"Yes, I have!" said the lawyer, looking much surprised at the strangeness of the request.

"Well, produce them, now, at once!"

Mr. Lawson was in such a state of nervous excitement that he scarcely knew what he was doing.

Nevertheless, he retained sufficient self-possession to enable him to rise from his seat, and go to a box upon which had been painted: "Sir John Scott's estate."

He raised the lid of this box, and Tom then perceived that instead of containing any papers relative to an estate it held nothing but a black silk gown and a horsehair wig.

"There they are, sir," said Mr. Lawson. "I suppose you wish me to put them on?"

"Oh, not at all," said Tom—"not at all; quite the reverse! I intend to put them on myself!"

"You?"

"Yes!"

"For what reason?"

"I don't like my present attire; it's inconvenient—doesn't suit me at all! So look—off it comes, and I mean to turn lawyer!"

Mr. Lawson glared in amazement at his eccentric visitor.

Tom King rapidly threw off the clothes he had obtained from the farmer, and commenced wrapping the voluminous black silk gown around him.

"But, sir—sir," cried the lawyer, "this cannot be permitted—it must not be—it is most irregular!"

"Not in the least," said Tom—"it fits me to a T, and it comes quite down to my toes! The robe must be rather long for you, Mr. Lawson."

"Sir, I tell you I cannot permit this—I will not permit it—I will shout for help!"

"No you won't," said Tom, quietly taking the pistol from his pocket again, and cocking it—"no, you won't; you will think better of your intention! Take a second thought!"

The lawyer did, and remained silent.

"Now," cried Tom, "I will give you a few words of explanation! Pay attention! I am a desperate man, reduced to desperate straits! I am in danger, but don't intend to remain so if I can help it; I will tell you what I require, and you can take your choice! That dress which I have just cast off is a mere disguise; I have been suspected and followed! You understand it was necessary I should obtain a change of apparel, and I have done so!"

Tom settled the wig on his head as he spoke, and then looked very much like a barrister indeed.

"I have no doubt," continued Tom, "that the person who suspects me is watching down below in the square. He will expect to see someone dressed in those clothes. Being attired thus, I shall escape his notice. If I could trust you, I would leave you here; but as I can't, you must come with me! Put on your hat; I will take hold of your arm, and we will go to Newgate together."

"I won't!" said Mr. Lawson, assuming as much determination as he could. "I won't—I refuse, and there's an end of it."

"Very good," said Tom. "If you won't go with me I shall be forced to leave you here! Only one kind of men keep secrets—you're not one of them; but I intend to make you."

The lawyer looked at the highwayman with unfeigned dismay.

"The only kind of men who keep a secret," continued Tom, "are dead men; so, if I leave you behind, I shall leave you a dead man; I shall shut your body up in that cupboard; I shall lock the door and put the key in my pocket; I shall stick a piece of paper on one of the panels, and write on it: 'Return next week.' By that time I shall be far enough off and safe, so that when they find your body it won't signify to me in the least!"

CHAPTER DCXXX.

RELATES HOW TOM KING AND DICK TURPIN GAINED ADMISSION TO THE COURT.

The perspiration of intense fear started out in large beads upon the countenance of Mr. Lawson.

It made him feel cold and clammy all over to hear Tom speak in the awful manner he did about the concealment or discovery of his body.

His knees shook under him, and he would certainly have lost the power of supporting himself had he not sank down in an undignified manner upon the top of one of the boxes.

"You see," said Tom, "I am generous—I give you the opportunity of making your choice—it is quite indifferent to me which way you decide, though, to be precise, I would rather not have the trouble of putting you out of the world!"

Mr. Lawson groaned.

"Now, then," said Tom, "I have no time to spare! Will you accompany me to Newgate, keep my secret, and receive ten guineas for your trouble? Or will you refuse, and be shot through the head, and locked up in that cupboard?"

"I—I consent!" gasped the lawyer—"I consent! I have the law on my side! I consent through bodily fear!"

"Very good," said Tom; "I don't want to irritate your nerves by the sight of this pistol, so I shall hold it under the gown, just so. Now arise, put on your hat, and follow me!"

Mr. Lawson rose, and going to another box which professed to contain the documents pertaining to some one else's estate, he produced a hat and a coat.

He threw off the jacket he had been wearing, and put these articles on.

"That's right," said Tom. "As an earnest, take these five guineas—you shall have the remainder before the day is over."

Mr. Lawson was very poor.

He had sat in his chamber waiting for clients for many a long weary day, and how it was he continued to exist without any visible means of support would have been a mystery in any other place than Lincoln's Inn.

His thin, wasted form, however, clearly showed that he took but little nourishment, and it was this that had reduced him to his present pitiable state of nervousness and terror.

Tom King put his hand under the lawyer's arm in quite a loving way.

"Now, Mr. Lawson, the case is very plain; here's the pistol handy in my grasp—I could raise it in an instant. You understand that?"

Mr. Lawson nodded.

"Now, I want you to descend the stairs with me, with my hand on your arm, just as it is now. In the same way I want you to walk through the square out into Chancery Lane; then we will get a hackney-coach and drive to Newgate. I sha'n't let you quit my side during the whole of the day; but, above all things, bear this in mind: You may think that you will be able to find some opportunity of crying out that I am some desperate character in disguise, and that I am holding you in thrall. I grant that such an opportunity may occur, and that you would be able to avail yourself of it; but do you know what would be the consequences?"

Mr. Lawson made no reply.

"I will tell you," said Tom—"you might ensure my detection—you might get me into serious trouble; but mark this: Before you could finish your speech, or before anyone could lay hands on me, I should have time to raise this pistol and blow your head off—so you see that although you may draw attention to me and get me captured, still it will be at the price of your life. Do you understand that?"

"I—I do!" gasped Mr. Lawson. "Your words freeze my blood. However, I've got the five guineas; I am a poor and needy man and shall be glad of the five guineas more, so you may put up your pistol and treat me with perfect confidence!"

Tom shook his head.

"No," he cried, "I sha'n't do anything of the kind—I shall trust you just as far as I am obliged, but not a bit further. As collateral security, I shall hold this pistol as you see it now. Observe it's on full-cock, and carefully primed. Now, then, are you ready to descend the stairs?"

"Quite!" gasped Mr. Lawson—"quite!"

The door was opened, and the strangely-assorted pair emerged on to the landing.

Then the lawyer closed the door again, locked it, and placed the key in his pocket.

Arm-in-arm they descended the old wooden staircase, and in a few minutes found themselves at the top of the place leading from the front door into the square.

Tom gave a rapid glance around him, and, there, sure enough, a few paces off, stood the suspicious police-officer.

He just gave a glance at the two figures and no more.

He was on the look-out for someone in the dress of a farm labourer, and it never entered his active and intelligent brain that the suspected person might obtain a change of apparel.

Accordingly Tom King turned the corner, and walked under the archway unsuspected, while the police-officer still remained in the old position, keeping a preternaturally sharp look-out.

Either Mr. Lawson was anxious to obtain the ten guineas, or else Tom King had obtained a complete ascendancy over him, for he never ventured to make the least resistance, or to behave in a manner calculated to attract the attention of passers-by.

True to his promise, Tom hailed a hackney-coach as soon as they reached Chancery Lane.

In this they seated themselves, and Mr. Lawson gave the order to the coachman to drive to Newgate.

Believing all lawyers to be treacherous by disposition, Tom King kept a wary eye upon his new companion.

In a few moments the coach stopped in front of that door down the court-yard attached to the Sessions House through which the lawyers gain admittance to the court.

How much Tom gave the coachman Mr. Lawson did not know, but conjectured that it must have been a liberal sum, for the driver touched his hat, and said: "Thank you, sir!" in quite a respectful tone of voice.

Mr. Lawson appeared to be known to the officials, and the dress which Tom King had on was quite sufficient to ensure his admission.

Arm-in-arm as before, they walked along the corridor, up a staircase, and then through a door into the court.

Business had not commenced, and Tom King, after glancing round him for a moment, said:

"We'll sit down here, Mr. Lawson—this is a place that will suit me admirably."

"But it will look strange," said the lawyer, "for you to stay here—you ought to go and take your seat at the table."

"No," said Tom; "I would rather stop where I am. I fancy I am in less danger of discovery. Now then, all you have got to do is to sit here quietly, and as soon as the trial is over you shall have your other five guineas."

This point being settled, the lawyer and the highwayman sat down side by side upon a wooden bench.

Tom King leaned back, crossed his legs, and then, with an air of easy assurance, allowed his eyes to travel all over the court.

Having thus brought Tom King into the court, we will leave him there.

How Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval gained admittance we have already described, and nothing more remains for us to do than to take up the thread of the narrative at that point when Dick Turpin was stopped half-way up the staircase by the police officer at the little wicket gate.

Dick played his part to perfection, and no one suspected for a single moment that he was other than he seemed to be.

His awkward, clumsy movements, and his broad country dialect amused the little group standing round him amazingly.

"Then you're not a witness?" said the police officer.

"Oh, hain't I!" said Dick. "Well—here's of course axin' yer pardon, for it isn't for the loiks of me to know better nor you, sir,—but I ha' witnessed many things in my time, I have."

The officer and people laughed, and the one at the gate said:

"But have you come here as a witness?—that's what I want to know."

"In coorse I have."

"Then, why didn't you say so at first?" said the officer. "Now, tell me what you are going to witness?"

"Why, I be agoin' to witness the trial o' Dick Tarpin's wife—that be, sir, of coorse, if you'll let me through this here little wooden gaate."

There was another laugh at this, and then the police officer, who was quite in a good humour, said:

"Well, I understand what you mean; and as you have walked such a many miles, it would be a pity to disappoint you. Go on up the steps—you'll find another officer above, but you will have to tickle his ear, or he won't let you go any further."

"Here's many thanks to yow, sir," said Dick, bowing and scraping—"many thanks; I do woundily want to hear this trial."

"Go on, then," said the officer, who had opened the gate to allow Dick to pass through, "and mind, when you get to the top, that you tickle his ear."

"Oh, all right!" said Dick. "I know very well what that means. I'll tickle him when I get up!"

Thereupon, with an awkward, clumsy movement of all his limbs, and with his hobnail boots clattering on the stone steps, Dick made his way up to the landing above.

Upon gaining it he saw an officer before him, standing as a kind of sentinel at the door.

The officer had heard the conversation that had gone on down below, and had communicated with the officer at the wicket by means of dumb motions.

"Here's axin' yer pardon, sir," said Dick, taking off his hat and bowing after every word—"here's axin' yer pardon, sir, and I hopes as how yow'll let a poor body goo in."

The officer shook his head.

"Oh, t'other chap below told me as how yow'd let me goo in if I'd tickle yer ear. Now, how would yer like yer ear tickling, sir."

The police-officer looked right up at the ceiling.

Turpin followed the direction of his eyes and gazed upwards also.

The officer extended his hand in a peculiar way, and moved his fingers rapidly up and down.

But Dick pretended not to see him for a moment or two, and then, happening to look down, he pretended to catch sight for the first time of the officer's outstretched hand.

Dick placed both his hands on his thighs and laughed.

"He, he! that be a good joke now. Tickle yer ear! Oh, I'll tickle him! Now, if yow'd ha' said, 'Tickle yer mouth,' I should ha' known what yow meant."

Dick fumbled in his pockets for a long while, and at last produced a shilling.

"There," he said, "taake tha that be a whole day's earnin's, that be. Howsumiver, taake it, for I do woundily want to hear the trial."

"Go on, then," said the officer, pocketing the shilling, "through that door, and mind you don't make a noise when you get inside, or else they'll turn you out."

"Oh, I'll be as dumb as th' parson's pig," said Dick.

"How dumb is that?"

"Why, just bein' as dumb as dumb can be, and never openin' yer mouth."

The officer laughed, and Dick, turning round, passed through the door into the court.

He found himself in a kind of semi-darkness, and then, with a suddenness which was magical, a most remarkable change swept over his countenance.

It became grave and sad, and full of care and anxiety.

His heart beat, and his eyes were dim, as he endeavoured to take a good look at the scene that was spread out before him.

CHAPTER DCXXXI.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN RECOGNIZE EACH OTHER, AND THE COUNSEL FOR THE PROSECUTION DELIVERS HIS OPENING SPEECH.

THE interior of the court-house in the Old Bailey was familiar enough to Dick Turpin, and so, with a kind of instinct, he turned his head in the direction of the felon's dock.

A sigh of relief came from his lips.

Mand was not there, though doubtless she would soon make her appearance, for there was that bustle in the place which is always noticeable just before the commencement of the proceedings.

Dick's eyes were dim, and he dashed his hand impatiently across them.

Now that he fairly stood within the court a deep shadow seemed to have fallen upon his soul, and strive as he would he could not dissipate it.

A heavy gloom—a kind of presentiment that something of a dreadful character was about to happen—oppressed his spirits.

He was anxious, too, with respect to his companions, and he began to look around him in the hope of finding them.

For a long time he was unsuccessful.

In the darkness caused by the shadow of a projecting gallery, Dick determined to seat himself.

He had the advantage of being near the door, and also of being able to command a view of every part of the court.

As an occupation for his thoughts, he allowed his eyes to rest upon the countenance of every person visible.

Just as he had finished this task, and come to the conclusion that his comrades had not arrived, he perceived a door open, and then Mr. Wriggles and two other police officers appeared upon the threshold.

He never for a moment dreamt that these two officers were his disguised companions.

Presently, however, Mr. Wriggles moved away, and then Dick saw them each close one eye.

His heart gave one sudden bound.

"How rash!" he muttered. "But no matter, it seems all is well!"

He closed his own eye, according to arrangement, and soon had the satisfaction of perceiving that he had been recognized.

It was only necessary to discover Tom King, and then his anxieties upon that score would be at an end.

Looking round, he at length perceived a barrister who had one eye closed.

This, he thought at first, could not be his companion, because he had left him in another disguise.

But, upon looking more closely into his features, Dick at last found that the supposed barrister was indeed Tom King.

He tried in vain to account for the metamorphosis.

Then, turning his head, he saw the two police officers standing near him.

They were only able to exchange a few words.

He pointed out Tom King.

In return they told him that Mr. Wriggles was under the impression that they would all visit the court, and that he had announced his intention of subjitting everyone to a close scrutiny as they departed.

They were now silent, and moved away.

Further conversation would have been dangerous and provocative of suspicion.

At this moment the court was opened in due and imposing form by the chief usher.

The judge was seated in his accustomed place.

The jury were packed into the jury-box.

The usual preliminaries were then gone through.

Dick's heart beat loud and fast.

At length, after such a long separation, his eyes were about to be gladdened with the sight of the being he loved a thousand times better than his own life.

But under what circumstances was the meeting about to take place?

He was going to see her standing in the felon's dock, overcome by confusion and shame.

And this was his own doing—his own fault.

He had much to reproach himself with.

He longed to get nearer to the bar—he wished to stand near her in the hour of trial.

But he feared to move.

He knew full well that the eyes of true love are not easily blinded.

Maud would recognize him where a thousand others would fail to do so.

Upon gaining the bar, her eyes would undoubtedly wander around her.

If she caught sight of Dick, some change would surely sweep over her features.

It might be trifling, but Mr. Wriggles, with his lynx eyes, would be watching her.

Not the movement of a muscle would escape his notice, and if her countenance changed ever so little, he would look upon it as confirmatory of his suspicions—he would jump to the conclusion that the highwaymen were present among the crowd.

Wisely, therefore, Dick retained his position, and watched for her coming.

His suspense was soon ended.

There was an uneasy movement among the persons in the court.

Then was heard the rustle of female garments, and the next moment Maud made her appearance in the court.

The judge carefully adjusted his spring spectacles.

The counsel and barristers fixed their eye-glasses.

The jury stared, nudged each other, and made remarks. All saw her but Turpin.

From his gaze she was hidden by a haze of tears.

Soon, however, his eyes cleared, and then he saw her looking more beautiful than ever he had seen her in his life before.

He could scarcely control the inclination to hold out his arms towards her.

At first her face was pale.

Then finding so many eyes riveted upon her, she turned scarlet, and hung down her head in confusion.

Mastering her emotions, and endeavouring to prepare herself for the ordeal through which she was about to pass, Maud raised her head once more.

She was now as pale as death.

We must pause here for a moment to describe the interior of the court-house, which was different to the one in use at the present time.

It was then the custom to strew the front of the dock with various kinds of herbs.

In order, too, that the prisoner's face might be seen with the greatest possible amount of distinctness, a large mirror or reflector was fixed upon two supports, and inclined to a certain angle, so as to cause the light to fall upon the person at the bar.

Every change of countenance—every expression of the features or movement of the muscles could be seen with a plainness absolutely astounding, and by this means the judge and jury were often able to come to a tolerably correct conclusion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner.

This pale, white, spectral light caused Maud to appear to the greatest possible advantage, and a murmur of admiration arose from the lips of the persons present in the court

Her delicately-chiselled features looked lovely in the extreme, though at the same time the mirror displayed to the eyes of Turpin the change in her appearance which her imprisonment had caused.

She was much thinner—her cheeks had lost their roundness, and her hands looked thin and wasted.

Her eyes glittered with unnatural brightness, and under them were dark, livid marks, caused by suffering and tears.

She looked around at the many faces, but failed to see one that she recognized.

Sadly, she bent her head.

The Clerk of the Arraigns then rose.

He read over the indictment rapidly.

All that Maud could comprehend was that she was charged with aiding, abetting, and succouring a desperate offender against the laws, to wit, Dick Turpin, the highwayman.

Then, turning over the documents, the clerk said, in a business-like tone:

"Maud Gouldman, do you plead guilty or not guilty to this indictment?"

The poor girl gasped painfully for breath.

Her colour came and went.

At last, with great difficulty, she managed to articulate the words:

"Not guilty!"

The plea was duly recorded, and the trial commenced.

Had the four highwaymen been standing up to take their trial, they could not have listened with greater suspense or eagerness to all that was said.

The counsel for the prosecution then rose.

There was an immediate silence.

Even the officials of the prison prepared to attend to every syllable.

The counsel for the prosecution settled his gown, and began:—

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—

"You will admit that to-day I am called upon by duty to perform a somewhat unpleasant task. But I will not shrink from it. It is hard to see youth and beauty arraigned at the bar of this criminal court; but these personal advantages must be no excuse for guilt.

"The prisoner at the bar stands charged with a very serious offence. It is that of aiding and abetting a felon—a felon, too, of no ordinary character—no other, indeed, than that desperate villain, Dick Turpin, the highwayman."

A slight hiss arose from the spectators.

The crier bawled for silence until he was quite red in the face.

At length order was restored, and the counsel continued:

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—I conceive it is scarcely necessary that I should expatiate upon the many depredations committed by this notorious highwayman. With his gang, they set the law at defiance, and have almost put a stop to travelling after dark. Not a single road round the metropolis is safe. Considering all that has been done—the measures taken—the precautions adopted—this does, indeed, seem most extraordinary? It seems impossible—incredible!—yet, nevertheless, it is the case, as almost every person in this court at the present moment can testify.

"Now, does it not strike you, gentlemen of the jury, that it is very singular that these highwaymen are able to set his Majesty's officers at defiance? It brings the whole police force into disgrace, and well it might—but the officers are powerless to help themselves.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—It may not strike you what is the cause of this deplorable state of things. The explanation, however, is most simple. The fact is, the highwaymen have numerous confederates, aiders, abettors, people who are wholly devoted to them, and whose special duty is to screen them from the officers of justice.

"This is the actual state of things, and now you will be at no loss to comprehend the inefficiency of the measures which have been taken.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—As administrators of the law, and as private, peaceful, hard-working citizens I ask you whether this state of things can be allowed to continue? You will say 'certainly not—this state of things must be altered'—but how, gentlemen—how?

"It seems to me that there is but one course, and that is a simple one. I have no doubt as to its efficacy. Let the officers of justice busy themselves by looking around and apprehending every person who has been known to assist this gang of highwaymen. Let them be brought before this court—let them receive the full penalty which the law allows in such a case.

"Not only will the highwaymen be deprived of their assistants by the adoption of this course, but their other confederates—with the fate of their companions before their eyes—will refuse to aid them any longer. When once this state of affairs is brought about, rely upon it, gentlemen of the jury, the reign of these highwaymen will be over and at an end.

"I have made these explanatory remarks because I consider it my duty to press for a conviction in this case, in spite of the youth and beauty of the prisoner which might lead your judgments astray. These qualifications must not be admitted as indemnificatory. Justice should be blind. I shall call witnesses before you, gentlemen of the jury, who will prove most incontestably that on many occasions the prisoner at the bar has screened Dick Turpin and his companions from justice.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—Before I conclude I ought to mention that the defence set up by the prisoner, when brought up before the magistrate at Bow Street, was that she was wedded to Dick Turpin.

"If this can be proved, the case, so far as he is concerned, will fall to the ground; but I think I shall be in a position to prove that she extended the same succour and assistance to the other members of the gang as she did to Dick Turpin himself.

"If so, you will see at once that she still continues obnoxious to the charge. This, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, is all that I intend to trouble you with.

"I now propose to call witnesses before you, who will depose to the facts I have laid before you. My last words being an earnest entreaty that you will not allow the youth, the beauty — the feminine beauty—or the tears of the prisoner at the bar to operate unduly upon your minds to the subversion of justice!"

With these words, the counsel for the prosecution sat down.

His face wore an expression which seemed to say, "I rather think I have said something decidedly clever; let the counsel for the defence get over that if he can!"

There was a slight pause in the proceedings. Maud wiped away the tears that thronged into her eyes.

She was growing terrified; and well she might, for the speech made by the counsel for the prosecution was in every way calculated to alarm her.

CHAPTER DCXXXII.

IN WHICH MR. WRIGGLES IS EXAMINED AND CROSS-EXAMINED, AND IN WHICH THE COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENCE MAKES AN ABLE SPEECH ON BEHALF OF THE PRISONER AT THE BAR.

The junior counsel, to whom was entrusted the task of questioning the witnesses, now rose.

He was evidently impressed with the importance of the duties he had to perform.

"Call Mr. Wriggles!" he cried.

There was a slight bustle near the door of the court, and then the chief officer made his appearance.

He walked rapidly towards the witness-box, deposited his hat on the table, shut the little door in front of him, and took the oath to speak the whole truth and nothing but the truth, in a very matter-of-fact, business-like way indeed.

"Your name is Wriggles, I presume?" said the junior counsel.

"It is?"

"What are you?"

"Chief of police, at Bow Street."

"Very good. Now look at the prisoner at the bar!"

Mr. Wriggles did so.

"Do you know her?"

"Yes."

"What is her name?"

"Maud, I believe; though I could not swear to it.'

"Why not?"

"Because I have only a recollection of having heard her called by that name, and shouldn't like to swear to anything I was not quite certain of!"

"Very good, Mr. Wriggles; your caution does you great credit."

Mr. Wriggles made a low bow, and waited for the next question to be put.

"Will you be good enough," said the junior counsel, "to give us all the information you can respecting the prisoner at the bar?"

"Perhaps if I tell all," said Mr. Wriggles, "I should take up too much valuable time."

"You have had some experience," said the junior counsel; "we will leave it to you. Do not say anything you consider superfluous."

"Very good, sir. Then I will just say that I happened to become acquainted with the prisoner a long time ago. The circumstances I will not mention. After Dick Turpin's daring escape from Newgate, he went to a house where the prisoner then resided, and galloped off with her. Since then they have nearly always been in company with each other, and the prisoner on many occasions has enabled Dick Turpin to escape, either by giving him information of the approach of the police-officers, or by concealing him."

"Very well, Mr. Wriggles—that's explicit enough, I suppose you are prepared to swear to the truth of what you have said?"

"I have just sworn to it," said Wriggles. "It's perfectly true, and, if necessary, I might enter much deeper into the details."

"And so you thought yourself justified in applying for a warrant for the apprehension of the prisoner?"

"I did. It was granted to me, and I captured her at a farm-house some distance from London, since which time she has been a prisoner in Newgate!"

"That will do, Mr. Wriggles—I have no more questions to ask you!"

Mr. Wriggles did not attempt to descend from the witness-box, for he guessed he would be submitted to a cross-examination.

He was not deceived.

A barrister rose who had been retained for the defence by Mr. Lazenby, who intended to act honestly by the highwaymen, and to procure the acquittal of Maud if it was possible.

"Now, Mr. Wriggles," said the counsel for the defence, "I wish to ask you a few questions in connection with this matter. Do you speak according to your own personal knowledge, when you say that the prisoner has aided and abetted Dick Turpin?"

"I do."

"Then, such being the case, I shall require you to give me the particulars. Can you mention any one occasion on which she committed the offence laid to her charge?"

"I can," said Mr. Wriggles; "I can mention a very palpable case indeed, which was witnessed not only by myself but by several men who were with me."

"Describe it to the court, then!"

"From information I received, I went to an old, deserted mansion on the Finchley Road, where I believed the highwaymen had taken up their quarters. I found there only Dick Turpin and the prisoner at the bar. Several of my men were slain, but we failed to capture either. Both rode off upon Dick Turpin's horse, better known as Black Bess."

"And what did you do then, Mr. Wriggles?"

"As quickly as I could I set forward in pursuit, and at length, after going many miles, discovered them, not long after sunrise, on the high-road."

"Pray go on, and put your narrative into as few words as you can."

"Very well, then. Well, I saw Dick Turpin—who, refusing to surrender, had been fired at—I say I saw Dick Turpin lying on the ground in the middle of the highway. Near him stood Black Bess and the prisoner at the bar."

"You saw all this yourself, I presume?"

"I did, and there were several police officers with me who saw it too. We plied both whip and spur, and made the best speed we possibly could, for we believed that the capture of Dick Turpin was now quite certain."

"Well, well—go on!"

"To our astonishment, however, the prisoner at the bar raised up the body of Dick Turpin, and, somehow or other, managed to place him on to the back of his steed. She then mounted afterwards; and although we made every exertion, they set off at such a furious gallop as to outdistance us, for our horses were jaded. Still, if she had not achieved this feat we should certainly have made Dick Turpin prisoner, for he was unconscious owing to the quantity of blood he had lost."

"So that's your case, is it, Mr. Wriggles? You're quite sure you would have captured him had not the prisoner at the bar performed the very easy feat of lifting an insensible man on to the back of a horse?"

[MAUD'S DESPAIR AND GRIEF.]

"You speak doubtfully," said Mr. Wriggles, "and I don't wonder at it—it seems very strange. Luckily, however, at least half a dozen police-officers saw it as well as myself!"

"And I suppose that will be the best authenticated case you can call to your recollection?" said the counsel for the defence.

"I could recollect more if necessary—but I hope that will be sufficient for the Court. Half a dozen men will at once step into this witness-box and swear to the truth of all I have just said!"

"Very good—that will do! You may stand down so far as I am concerned. I don't want to trouble you any further."

The counsel for the defence resumed his seat, and Mr. Wriggles stepped out of the witness-box.

Six other police-officers were then called who had been in company with Mr. Wriggles on the morning in question.

They all corroborated every particular of his evidence.

The account they gave of the transaction was unvarying.

The counsel for the defence thought it needless to ask them any questions, so they were one by one by the prosecutor's counsel allowed to stand down.

"Have you any more witnesses to call?" asked the judge.

"None, my lord! I imagine that is quite sufficient. To my mind, the case is clearly proved. Here is the prisoner. They swear to her identity, and, if seven men are to be believed, I think she certainly conspired to effect the escape of Dick Turpin."

The counsel for the prosecution then sat down and arranged his papers.

He leaned back in his seat with a satisfied air, as though he thought it was quite impossible to shake the evidence which had just been given.

The counsel for the defence, however, now rose, and there was not one present in the court who did not prepare to listen with redoubled attention to every word he said.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury," he commenced, in a deep and earnest voice, "I can assure you it gives me unfeigned pleasure to stand here as I do to-day, the champion of beauty, youth, and innocence. Yes, innocence, for I shall be able to prove in a very few minutes that the prisoner at the bar is quite guiltless of the crime laid to her charge.

"First of all, however, I wish to call your attention to the case as it stands against her.

"Here you have seven police officers, who stand up in the witness-box one after the other and repeat exactly the same tale without any variations whatever. They tell you that when Dick Turpin lay insensible upon the roadway, she lifted him up in her arms and placed him on the back of his steed.

"Now, gentlemen of the jury, I should consider I was offering you an insult if I attempted to prove by any other means than a glance at the prisoner at the bar that the act with which she is charged is a physical impossibility. You will observe, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, that the prisoner at the bar is neither more nor less than a delicate girl. It is impossible for anyone to find there the least indications of uncommon strength but even of that average amount of it which is found in females generally. There is nothing masculine in her appearance.

"Now, then, with regard to Dick Turpin. We have him not here to-day to ascertain his weight, or to look upon him to see his size; but I have no doubt many present have, at some period or other, beheld him. Let us suppose, however, that no one has done so, in which case, as he is a man, we will assume that he is only of the average height and weight. This would not be correct, I know, because from the accounts given of personal conflicts by the officers, it is evident that he must be possessed of an uncommon amount of strength, from which it is only fair to infer that he must be of rather large proportions and of considerable weight.

"So much for the rider. Now we come to the horse. Who is Black Bess? Who has seen her? Not I, certainly; perhaps, gentlemen of the jury, none of you. For argument's sake, however, let us suppose that this horse is of an average height. I believe this to be about fifteen hands. Do you know the height of fifteen hands? As I stand erect, it is about level with my shoulder; but I am many inches taller than the prisoner at the bar, therefore we will assume the height of the prisoner is fifteen hands—it certainly is not much more.

"You perceive, gentlemen of the jury, the point to which my remarks are tending. Taking the prisoner at the bar as you see her, taking Dick Turpin to be a man of average height and weight, taking his horse to be of average height also, let me ask you whether it is physically possible for a weak, frail woman to do that which nine men out of ten would fail to do if they tried?

"The probability is that Dick Turpin would weigh a hundredweight and a half, I should like to know whether you consider the prisoner at the bar strong enough to lift half a hundredweight from the floor on to the front of the dock? That, gentlemen of the jury, is only one-third of the weight, and it would be a very much easier task to lift a mass of iron provided with a handle than it would be to raise the body of a man, which, it is evident, must be a difficult thing to do.

"So much, gentlemen, for the case that has been brought before you.

"The police officers have, one after another, taken an oath that they have seen done what they described; but, gentlemen of the jury, surely you would not take the oath of those police officers in defiance of your own reason and common sense? Had they sworn they had seen two suns shining in the sky at one time, you would not have credited their evidence, because you know full well that what they stated was impossible; but no more impossible, gentlemen of the jury, to my thinking, than it would be for a girl to place the insensible body of a man upon a horse's back."

CHAPTER DOXXXIII.

MAUD'S TRIAL CONTINUES, AND SOME FRESH AND INTERESTING FACTS ARE BROUGHT OUT.

THE counsel for the defence quite warmed with his subject. He had uttered the last few sentences with great excitement and volubility, so that he was compelled to pause a moment to regain breath in order to proceed.

This opportunity was seized upon by nearly all the spectators to give vent to their own feelings in the matter, and to use a theatrical phrase, there was quite a "round of applause."

It was in vain the usher waved his hand and roared "Silence!" until he was black in the face; not the least notice was taken of him, and his cries only seemed to increase the general clamour.

It was not until the judge rose to his feet, and declared that he would immediately clear the court if the interruption continued, that silence was obtained.

The counsel's logic had come upon all with irresistible force, and the jury looked at each other, and whispered, and nodded, as though they were quite convinced that what the officers had sworn to was untrue.

And Dick. How his eyes glistened, and his breath came short and thick, as he listened to this powerful speech!

He was indeed delighted to think that Mr. Lazenby had chosen so fit a person to defend the prisoner at the bar.

Such was the impression produced upon his own mind, and upon the minds of his companions also, that they felt quite certain Maud would be decreed not guilty, even if the defence of her marriage was not put forward.

And Maud herself listened with wonder and interest to every word that fell from her defender's lips.

During the confusion, the young counsellor had rapidly turned his papers over, and by the time the applause had subsided he was standing calm and erect, ready to continue the subject he had shown himself so competent of handling.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury," he resumed, "believe me, I consider that what I have already said and proved is sufficient to ensure the acquittal of the prisoner at the bar.

"That which I have just said, however, is not the defence I have to offer in her behalf. I merely wished to show you that there was evidently an animus against the prisoner, the cause of which concerns neither you nor me. But it was too monstrous to suppose that, because seven police officers choose to swear to it, all the world must of necessity believe that my client performed the impossible feat of lifting the body of a man on to a horse.

"Gentlemen of the jury,—I presume that this was the best and the only case which they could bring before you of the prisoner's guilt. That was the only time when they saw her aidin and abetting the notorious highwayman, Dick Turpin.

"Well, gentlemen of the jury, it would make no difference in my case if she really did do what these officers swear to having seen. It would not matter if she had aided and abetted or assisted Dick Turpin a thousand times to make his escape from justice; it would not matter if a thousand witnesses could come forward and swear that she had done so, simply because, gentlemen of the jury, the prisoner at the bar happens to be the lawful wedded wife of Dick Turpin!"

Another hum of applause arose in the court, but it was soon stifled, partly because they wished to hear what more was said, and partly because all had anticipated that this announcement would be made.

The judge expected it, and the jury too, because, it will be remembered, Maud, when brought before the magistrate at Bow Street, had made her defence by declaring that she was legally married.

"Yes, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, I can conclusively prove that the prisoner at the bar is the wife of the notorious Dick Turpin.

"It may be urged that the ceremony was performed in an irregular manner. I am ready to admit that the banns were never openly asked in any church; still, they were married, and by a clergyman of the Church of England, whose certificate I now hold in my hand."

The counsel held a slip of paper in the air and waved it in a triumphant manner.

The judge bent forward and signified, by a slight gesture, that he wished to inspect the document.

It was accordingly handed to him.

"This seems a very strange, irregular certificate!" he exclaimed, as he turned it over. "This should be on a printed form and properly witnessed. It is nothing but a few words scrawled by some one, and signed."

He held out the paper and passed it to the jurymen, who examined it one after the other with looks of profound wisdom, and at last it was handed back to the counsel for the defence, and then he said:

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury,—I told you that the ceremony, though perfectly legal, was performed irregularly, and, such being the case, it is no more than reasonable to look for an irregular certificate.

"This paper I now hold was written by Mr. Martext, the clergyman who performed the ceremony. Had everything been strictly in accordance with the regulations of the Church, he would, of course, have furnished a proper certificate; but he could not do this, and, rather than my client should suffer for that of which she is innocent, he wrote this paper, believing that his simple declaration of the marriage would be held sufficient for the purpose of obtaining an acquittal.

"That, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, remains for you to decide.

"In conclusion, I have only to say that I have demonstrated clearly enough that what the officers have sworn they saw is an absolute impossibility, and I now declare that the prisoner at the bar had a right to aid and abet Dick Turpin, for he is her husband, in proof of which I bring forward the declaration of a clergyman of the Church of England to that effect.

"On these grounds, then, I confidently ask you, gentlemen of the jury, to return a verdict of not guilty. On no occasion has my client performed more than the duty which every wife owes to her husband. She has suffered a long and painful imprisonment in Newgate. If, then, you consider she deserved some slight punishment, let that answer for it.

"Gentlemen of the jury, weigh over all that I have said, and if your consciences will permit you to do so, return a verdict in favour of my client."

The counsel for the defence sat down, and again loud applause broke forth in the court; but silence was soon regained, for there was not one present who wished to run the risk of being deprived of hearing the remainder of the trial.

The counsel for the prosecution now rose.

It was evident he intended to exercise his right of reply—a right which was more often enforced than at the present day.

During the earlier part of the speech made by the counsel for the defence, Mr. Wriggles had been busily engaged in writing something upon a slip of paper.

As soon as he had finished it, he folded the paper up, and handed it to the counsel for the prosecution, who read it, and nodded.

Very few observed this little transaction, but those who did felt that it meant something.

There was an ease and confidence visible in the bearing of the counsel for the prosecution when he rose to reply.

He glanced round the court, at the prisoner, at the jury, at the judge, at the witnesses with an expression on his face that said, plainly enough: "Just mark how easily, by a few words, I shall be able to put down the tale that has been told by the counsel for the defence."

Dick's suspense was extreme, and he waited breathlessly for the counsel to commence.

Maud, too, with a beating heart, clutched the front of the dock tightly, and fixed her eyes upon his countenance; but in this direction she found nothing to inspire confidence or hope.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury," he began—"Probably you have heard with the same feelings as myself the extraordinary defence offered by my learned friend. I will admit that what he has said seems upon the face of it to be logical and conclusive; but I need scarcely remind you how often appearances are deceptive, and surely they were never more so than they are in the present instance. His deductions will not bear the least criticism or examination, as I will shortly prove to you.

"All that my learned friend said with respect to the possibility or impossibility of the prisoner at the bar lifting a man on to the back of a horse, and the comparisons and estimates of weight and strength, I admit to be very ingenious, but in a case like this something more than ingenuity is required.

"You must not overlook the fact, gentlemen of the jury—though my learned friend appears to attach but little importance to it—that the feat described was witnessed by seven police officers, who have deposed on oath to what they have seen. One fact well testified to is, in my opinion, worth a thousand suppositions or hypotheses.

"It seems incredible that such a thing could be done, but, as we are all aware, under certain conditions, and when there is an extraordinary degree of excitement, things are performed by persons, of which they would be totally incapable in their calmer moments.

"That there is an attachment or connection between the prisoner at the bar and that desperate offender, Dick Turpin, I do not pretend to dispute.

"According to the account given by the police officers, Dick Turpin was wounded, yet he had sufficient strength to mount his steed, taking the prisoner on to the saddle before him, and to gallop off. But when he had gone some distance, the weakness produced by loss of blood caused him to lose his balance, and he fell down into the roadway. At this time the police officers were within sight. They were coming on at full gallop. The prisoner at the bar must have seen them—must have been aware of their approach. She must also have been conscious that her companion was in imminent danger. He was lying insensible on the roadway, and, in such a state, would fall easily into the hands of the police, in spite of the resistance which she might offer. Under these circumstances, then, it is only reasonable to suppose that a feeling of desperation must have entered into her heart. She must have been powerfully—tremendously excited, and, under the influence of that excitement, finding herself endowed with thrice her usual amount of strength, she performed the apparently impossible feat, which was witnessed by the seven police officers. In connection with this, there is another thing which must not be overlooked. We have no evidence to prove that Dick Turpin was totally insensible. He might have been incapable of keeping his balance on the back of his steed, but for all that he may have been able, with the assistance of the prisoner, to rise to his feet, and then the task of placing him on the horse's back would become much easier.

"But there is another and by far more important circumstance that I have to bring under your notice. It is a detail—a particular which should have been stated by the police officers at the time they gave their evidence, but from some cause or other—forgetfulness, most probably—it was not mentioned.

"Now, I hold in my hand a piece of paper, upon which certain words have been written and signed by Mr. Wriggles, the chief police officer, who, you will remember, witnessed the whole transaction. Some degree of confidence ought to be placed in any statements he may make. He now occupies, and has occupied for a long series of years, a high official capacity; but in this instance there is another reason why extra importance should be attached to what he says.

"In his zeal to capture the notorious highwayman, Mr. Wriggles declared that he whipped and spurred his steed continually, and by this means he managed to shoot ahead of his men to the extent of between one and two hundred yards. Therefore, it follows that he must have beheld all that took place with more distinctness than any of the rest.

"On this paper Mr. Wriggles states that he saw Dick Turpin lying helpless on the roadway. He saw the prisoner at the bar attempt to restore him to consciousness, and so he redoubled his efforts in order to reach the spot in the shortest space of time; but before he could accomplish this, he saw the prisoner at the bar place the insensible or nearly insensible body of the highwayman upon the back of the steed. She was assisted in doing this by the horse itself. We have all heard marvellous stories recounted of the sagacity and docility of the highwayman's steed, Black Bess. By her rightful owner she had no doubt been carefully trained, and a visit to any circus or equestrian performance will show to what an extent the training and teaching of horses may be carried, since in these places they are frequently seen to perform many tricks by word of command. It might be that this Black Bess had undergone a similar course of treatment to the horses to which I am now referring. At any rate, Mr. Wriggles positively swears that the horse knelt down, and thus the prisoner at the bar was enabled to perform that feat which my learned brother for the defence has been so careful to prove to you was an impossibility."

The rules of the court forbade the counsel for the defence to take any notice of this remark.

He could not in any way interrupt the proceedings.

Nevertheless, he managed to let the counsel for the prosecution and the judge and jury see what he thought of this statement.

As soon as the opposing counsel had finished, he threw down his quill pen on the table with a gesture of disgust and incredulity; then, leaning back in his chair, he said, quite audibly: "Pish!"

The counsel for the prosecution must have heard this, but he took no notice of it.

"That, gentlemen of the jury, is the statement made by Mr. Wriggles. It clears up the whole mystery at once, and makes the impossible feat comparatively easy.

"We have no evidence, as I before remarked, to show that Turpin was quite insensible, and if he had a little use of his limbs, and if the horse had knelt down in the way Mr. Wriggles swears he did kneel down, why, then, it would be very easy for the prisoner at the bar to place the highwayman's body on the back of Black Bess."

CHAPTER DCXXXIV.

MR. WRIGGLES MAKES AN IMPORTANT COMMUNICATION TO THE JUDGE.

"AND now, my lord and gentlemen of the jury," continued the counsel for the prosecution, "I have another and far different point to touch upon.

"This concerns the question—is the prisoner at the bar the wife of Dick Turpin or not?

"If that question can be answered in the affirmative, why, then, my case immediately falls to the ground. But, gentlemen of the jury, I think you will be inclined to feel doubtful whether the question can be answered in the affirmative.

"My learned friend for the defence produces a certificate, it is true. That certificate you have all of you seen. What is your opinion of it? I need not ask it. About such a certificate there can be but one opinion; indeed, I am not right in applying such a term to it, for it is not a certificate at all. Gentlemen of the jury, it's impossible that such a document as that can be accepted as evidence, and I marvel greatly that my learned brother should have presumed to waste valuable time by bringing it forward at all. What is it? A mere scrap of dirty, crumpled paper which may have been written upon by anybody. Who is Mr. Martext? Where is he? To what church does he belong? How is it that those entrusted with the defence have not secured this person, and brought him forward to swear that he performed this marriage ceremony?

"These are questions, gentlemen of the jury, which I shall not pretend to answer. I leave them to my learned brother.

"If such a document as this can be produced in a court of justice, and accepted as evidence, and a verdict given in accordance with it, why, then there would be an end to justice altogether. We should have everybody coming into court with a certificate of some kind or other.

"No, gentlemen, that piece of paper is not sufficient; it requires to be substantiated by the clergyman and by the persons who witnessed the solemnization of the marriage. I believe I am justified in stating that none of the parties I have just referred to are in attendance, therefore that certificate must be disregarded altogether—it is of no value, no weight; and what you have to decide between, gentlemen of the jury, are the facts sworn to by seven witnesses and the logical inferences of my learned friend; indeed, you have to decide between facts and hypotheses.

"This, gentlemen of the jury, concludes the case.

"Both sides of the question have been heard; witnesses have been called. I now leave the whole of the facts in your hands for your impartial consideration and just decision, but I trust that all of you have minds sufficiently well balanced to prevent the subversion of justice by feelings elicited by the sex, by the youth, by the personal attractions of the prisoner at the bar."

The counsel for the prosecution sat down in his seat with a bang, and pushed his papers away from him.

There was now a slight bustle and stir all over the court.

The jurymen were whispering; the barristers, according to their wont, were laughing over feeble jokes; the judge was turning over the pages of his note-book; and the spectators were busily asking themselves which way the case would be decided.

Then the usher called for silence, and for once in his life he was instantly attended to.

As if by magic, everyone became still, for all were anxious to know what the judge had to say upon this subject.

"Gentlemen of the jury," he began, in a low mumbling tone, which increased in loudness and distinctness as he proceeded,—"I cannot refrain from making the remark that this is the most extraordinary case that has ever been brought before me since I have occupied my seat upon this bench. It is in every way a most exceptional affair, and I trust we shall be able to arrive at a proper and just decision.

"In my judgment, the whole case turns upon one point, and that point is, whether the prisoner at the bar is the wife of the person she is accused of aiding and abetting or not. If she is the wife, gentlemen of the jury, it is almost unnecessary for me to say you will be compelled to return a verdict of not guilty, even if you should feel satisfied in your own minds that she had assisted in the escape of a desperate character from the hands of the police, because the English law holds it to be the duty of a wife to succour her husband in every way she can, and that such is a wife's duty, few would, I fancy, venture to dispute.

"And now, gentlemen of the jury, how are we to decide this point? We are handed a paper which purports to be a clergyman's certificate, but which it clearly is not—that is, not in the ordinary acceptation of the term. But it was stated by the counsel for the defence that the ceremony was performed in an irregular manner. That I can credit easily, for I think it would be difficult indeed to find a clergyman who would be willing to perform the marriage ceremony for a desperate highwayman; yet, if we are to believe the counsel for the defence, the ceremony has been performed, and this document is a proof of it.

"To my thinking, supposing the prisoner at the bar to be married, the only means by which a clergyman could be induced to give his consent would be by placing him in extreme bodily fear. From what I have heard of this Dick Turpin, one can easily imagine that he would not scruple to terrify a minister of the Church of England. But suppose, through fear of his life, a clergyman did read the marriage service over them, the ceremony would then be valid enough to ensure the acquittal of the prisoner. Then, through the ceremony being thus performed, the clergyman would not dare to write a proper certificate, but he might, in order to escape ill-usage, write such a document as has been produced, and which would to all intents and purposes prove the marriage.

"This is a serious matter for our consideration, and I regret that we have not more evidence to enable us to come to a decision.

"If we search out this Mr. Martext and place him in the witness-box, it would be doing him an irreparable injury; in fact, I question whether it would be possible to find him after the occurrences of this trial have been brought to light. As a measure of safety he would take to flight, and so the case would remain just where it is now. Therefore, gentlemen of the jury, I must ask you to take the statements made by the counsel for the defence, and to take the certificate, produced, for just what they are worth, and no more, and I trust you will not refuse to listen to the pleadings of mercy which should always be tempered with justice."

The judge stopped suddenly and looked down.

Standing close to him, holding a folded paper in his hand, was the chief police officer, Mr. Wriggles.

The judge frowned slightly, and said, in a sharp voice:

"Eh—what—a paper? What do you want?"

"Would you be good enough to take it and look at it, my lord?" said Mr. Wriggles, with a bow.

The judge took the paper as requested, and then all noticed that when his eye ran over its contents his brows knit angrily together, and that he bit his upper lip.

Curiosity to know what that paper was about now rose to the highest pitch.

Dick Turpin was beginning to feel more at ease, and Maud's heart began to grow lighter, for from the manner in which the judge had represented the case to the jury, it was evident he was inclined in her favour.

The most obtuse-minded juryman must have been aware that the judge desired that a verdict of not guilty should be returned against the prisoner.

What was in the paper?

That was just what everybody wished to know.

They could only guess at its contents by the appearance of the judge's countenance.

Mr. Wriggles having delivered it, returned on tiptoe to his seat, smiling and nodding, and looking very self-satisfied indeed.

His looks seemed to express: "I rather think I've settled that business now!"

Except the judge and Mr. Wriggles, no one in the court knew what the paper was about, and the secret was confined to them, for the judge folded it in half, tore it up into tiny pieces, and threw the fragments beneath his desk.

But there is no reason why this should be kept a secret from the reader.

It was simply a note from the magistrate who had colluded with Mr. Wriggles in his scheme for placing Maud in Newgate as a means of getting the highwaymen into their power.

It simply stated that the ends of justice would be furthered by causing her to be kept a prisoner in Newgate for some time longer, because they had every hope, if this was done, of capturing the gang who had made all travellers afraid to venture on the high-road after dark.

The magistrate concluded by saying that he had communicated with the Secretary of State on the subject, who fully approved of the course suggested, and recommended its adoption.

After receiving such a letter as this, the judge could not refuse to recommend the postponement of the trial.

He was very sorry—very reluctant to do this, for Maud had made a favourable impression upon his heart; but he had no resource, however; and so he concluded his address to the jury in a very different manner to what he had intended, and to what everybody in the court expected.

"At first, gentlemen of the jury, I had intended to recommend the acquittal of the prisoner; but upon second thoughts on the matter I have resolved, in order that the ends of justice may be fully met, to postpone this trial until the next sessions. The whole matter will then be cleared up. Mr. Martext shall be sought for and brought up to give his evidence. By this means, and this means alone, we shall be able to decide whether the prisoner is married or not. If it should prove that she is, she will be set at liberty; and if not, I shall be compelled to pass upon her the sentence decreed to those who abet and assist felons. Therefore, gentlemen of the jury, you will understand that the case stands adjourned until the next sessions, when I hope we shall have the opportunity of fully investigating it."

With these words, the judge rose from his seat and abruptly left the bench by drawing aside the curtain which covered the entrance of the refreshment-room.

The jury looked in surprise at each other, and exchanged remarks.

After the judge had spoken, there was for a moment, or, perhaps, less, a profound silence all over the court.

This was caused by absolute amazement.

No one could credit that he had heard aright; but as the conviction gradually settled upon them that the prisoner was indeed to remain in custody until the next sessions, the indignation they felt expressed itself in loud hisses and groans.

Then there was such a tumult and uproar as probably had never before taken place within those walls.

As for our friends, they were stunned—bewildered—overwhelmed!

They had not failed to perceive the partiality the judge showed to the prisoner, and felt certain that he would act as leniently as possible; and unquestionably, had it not been for the note produced by Mr. Wriggles, Maud would have received a triumphant acquittal.

The rage, vexation, and disappointment which filled their breasts we cannot possibly describe.

At first Dick Turpin felt heart-broken to think that Maud was again to be consigned to a clammy cell in the prison of Newgate; but directly afterwards he clenched his hands and pressed his teeth closely together with determination.

"Not for long," he murmured to himself—"not for long! Before the next sessions she shall be at liberty!"

As for Maud, she covered her face with her hands and burst forth into a passion of sobs and tears.

Up to that moment she had retained her calmness and self-possession in a really wonderful manner; and as the case proceeded, hope had grown stronger and stronger in her heart.

Her face had been very pale, but her eyes were bright; her breast heaved with suspenseful excitement, for she, too, shared in the belief that a verdict of not guilty would be returned against her.

But when she saw the dark form of Mr. Wriggles creeping towards the judge, a kind of shadow crept over her heart.

She knew him to be no friend of hers, and she observed with pain the change which took place in the judge's countenance.

But when he announced, contrary to the tenor of the preceding portion of his speech, that he had determined to postpone the trial until the next sessions, she could maintain her composure no longer.

Her heart swelled—the tears sprang to her eyes, and she wept loudly and bitterly.

Then she felt a hand upon her shoulder, and a voice in her ear said:

"Come!"

She recoiled and shuddered at the contact.

Dashing aside the tears that continually filled her eyes, she looked painfully all round the court.

But owing to the position Dick occupied, she could not see him; and this, perhaps, was fortunate in the extreme.

Again the hand was placed upon her shoulder.

Again the stern monosyllable was spoken in her ear.

The next moment she found herself descending the winding staircase which leads from the floor of the dock into the strong chamber beneath.

CHAPTER DCXXXV.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS TWO COMRADES PLAY THE VERY DEVIL WITH THE POLICE OFFICERS.

The tumult and uproar in the court still continued; indeed, each moment it seemed to increase in violence rather than to abate, and this, too, in spite of all the efforts made by the officers to restore silence.

Then the judge, looking stern and white, and with his lips closely compressed together, drew aside the curtain and appeared.

He was saluted instantly by a chorus of groans.

Of these apparently he took no notice.

He held up his hand, as if to implore a moment's silence.

The uproar ceased as if by magic.

"If this disorder continues," he cried, "I will have the court cleared, no matter at what risk! Did you hear? I say I will have the court cleared, no matter what it may cost to accomplish it!"

Again the assemblage burst out into howls and cries.

"Clear the court!" cried the judge, in a voice that could be heard above every other sound. "Mr. Cawthorn, instruct your officers to clear the court!"

With these words he again retired.

Mr. Cawthorn quickly marshalled a body of police officers, who were headed by Mr. Wriggles.

They drew their cutlasses and prepared to force the people out by the points of their weapons.

This was a state of things that was highly advantageous to our friends.

They paused a moment, in order to think in what way they could best avail themselves of it.

Sixteen-string Jack and Claude stood close together, and the former whispered:

"Remember what we seem to be! We are police officers. Let us perform our duty!"

"What do your mean?" asked Claude.

"You see Dick, over there?"

"Yes, but don't mention his name, even in a whisper."

"Right—we must be cautious. Do you see he's hissing and groaning and clapping his hands together like the rest? Let us seize him—let us pretend to make him prisoner, as one of the ringleaders in the riot; by this means we may drift out into the Old Bailey, and if so, when we once get among the crowd all will be well."

"That's a bold scheme, Jack, and rather dangerous."

"Not at all—not at all! I feel convinced that it will answer!"

"Well, then, let us try it. I can propose nothing better myself."

Vigorous efforts at this moment were made by the police-officers to clear the court.

Those under the direction of Mr. Wriggles continued to press steadily onwards, with their cutlasses before them, and the people, naturally enough, shrank back as soon as they found the steel in contact with their bodies.

Then the other police officers who were about the court assisted their comrades by dragging the people out into the corridors, while others made prisoners here and there of those persons who had been most active in creating the disturbance.

Suddenly, then, to his surprise and to his alarm as well, Dick Turpin found himself seized roughly by a couple of police officers.

He made a furious struggle to get free, and no doubt would have released himself from their hold—for, in the excitement of his feelings, he forgot all about his two comrades being so disguised—but a whispered word from Claude set him right.

He continued his struggles, but not so violently as before.

He comprehended their plan in a moment, and though he struggled, and they endeavoured to hold him, he worked his way gradually towards the door.

He had only a yard or two to go, for the reader will remember he had seated himself close to the door, and before any of the others could notice or understand what they were about, Dick Turpin and his two comrades were standing on the stone landing at the top of the staircase.

Dick continued his struggles, and his two comrades made a great show of dragging him down the steps.

Below them was the little wicket-gate, and there stood the police officer on guard at it.

"Now, Dick," said Claude, "when we get a little lower down, give a sudden struggle to get loose; we will let you go. Jump over that wicket, and make your way into the street. We will follow you with all speed. Mingle with the mob, and we will run in the opposite direction to that which you may take."

Dick nodded, and immediately afterwards they came near enough to the wicket on the stairs to execute their purpose.

The police officer on guard there looked very much surprised at what he saw, though he was aware that a commotion of no ordinary character was going on above.

He knew that Dick had been made prisoner for something, and was endeavouring to get free.

He determined to resist his further progress, so he fastened the wicket-gate, and stood there to keep guard at it.

Then, with a sudden effort, Dick broke loose.

He hurried down three or four steps, with his companions following at his heels.

"Hallo, Chawbacon!" said the officer, as soon as he saw Dick. "Whatever have you been up to! Come, not so fast, my fine fellow—I have you! What do you think of that?"

"What do you think of it?" said Dick, clenching his fist and giving the officer such a blow on the head that it incapacitated him from thinking altogether.

With extraordinary agility, considering the clumsiness of his appearance, the seeming countryman leaped over the little gate.

Another police officer, who was standing down below in that portion of the Sessions House set apart for the convenience of witnesses, perceiving what was going on above, very imprudently ran up three or four steps and extended his arms, intending to catch Dick as he came down. And so he did catch him, but regretted it afterwards.

On came Dick at full speed.

He could not stop, and he tried to dodge past this meddlesome officer.

But to no purpose.

Perceiving that a meeting was inevitable, Dick slightly increased his speed, and struck against the officer with such force that he lost his balance instantly.

He clasped his arms round Dick, and the pair rolled with astonishing celerity to the bottom of the staircase, where they stopped with a bump that sounded distinctly all over the place.

The officer was undermost, and as his very hard head happened to come in contact with the edge of the bottom step, he very naturally let go his hold of Dick, for his muscles relaxed, and he was unable to hold him any longer.

In another second Dick made a dash into the street.

Here quite a large crowd of people had assembled, and he mingled with them in an instant.

Then, looking breathless and excited, Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval appeared upon the steps of the Sessions House.

"Which way did he go?" roared Claude—"which way did he go?"

A chorus of voices replied, and some one asked:

"What's he done?"

"Insulted the judge and knocked down a police officer from the top of the stairs to the bottom!" roared Claude, as though it were some very dreadful crime indeed.

The idea of a judge having been insulted and an officer knocked downstairs was such a gratifying one to the mob outside that they immediately set up a loud shout of laughter, clapped their hands, and cried "Bravo!"

The countryman in the smock-frock became at once in their minds a great hero.

"Where is he?" roared Claude and Jack together, and pretending to be in a desperate state of excitement—"which way did he go?"

No one spoke.

"It must be that way," cried Jack. "Come on, mate—we'll have him yet!"

He ran in the direction of Newgate Street, and his companion followed close at his heels.

The mob saluted them with jeers and cries of disdain, encouraging them to proceed by crying:

"Go it—go it, red weskits! That's the way! Jump over the churchyard wall, and then you'll have him!"

Claude and Jack continued to run, to the immense delight of the mob, who were aware that the countryman had run in the opposite direction.

Then they began to look round for him, but he was nowhere to be seen.

In the meanwhile, Claude and Jack ran to the top of the Old Bailey and turned round the corner into Skinner Street.

Their existence was quickly forgotten by the crowd in consequence of the scene of excitement that ensued consequent upon turning out all the people who had been seated in the court.

"That's what I call well done!" cried Jack, laughing till the tears ran down his cheeks—"that's what I call well done! This has been a day of rare adventures!"

"And it isn't over yet, Jack!" replied Claude.

"No, it isn't; but you may depend the best fun is. I only hope Dick will get off all right."

"What's the next move?"

"We will take the first narrow turning to the left, and manage to work our way round to the inn-yard in the Old Bailey where we left our horses. We will mount them and then ride off."

"Where?"

"To the Chase, and wait until Dick and Tom arrive!"

"Very good. Will you take this turning?"

"Yes, this one will do."

The disguised highwaymen abruptly plunged down a narrow passage branching off from the south side of Skinner Street, which conducted by a devious route to the very yard at the back of the public-house where they had stabled their horses.

As soon as they entered it they looked under the archway, and saw that there was an unusual commotion in the Old Bailey.

The ostler was there, and quickly brought out their horses.

As soon as they were saddled, the two highwaymen mounted.

They rather astonished the ostler by presenting him with a crown-piece.

"Now, Claude," cried Jack, "turn your horse's head round and we'll be off!"

Claude was about to obey, for he fully believed that all the difficulties of their dangerous enterprise had been overcome, and that it would be the easiest matter in the world to trot back in the direction of Hertford and enter Enfield Chase.

But he was doomed to disappointment.

Before he could obey his companion's injunction, the nasty trampling of feet reached their ears.

"Stop—stop!" cried a voice, in loud, authoritative accents. "Stop—stop, I say! Curse you both, where are you going?"

The voice proceeded from the direction of the archway.

Both highwaymen recognized it.

They turned their heads, and found themselves face to face with their old and pertinacious foe, Mr. Wriggles, the chief police officer.

CHAPTER DCXXXVI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL RIDE OFF WITH MR. WRIGGLES IN PURSUIT OF DICK TURPIN.

THE first and most natural impulse of the two highwaymen upon making this discovery was to turn and fly.

Fortunately, however, they preserved sufficient of their presence of mind to control this impulse.

Flight they knew would be worse than useless.

A chase through the crowded streets of London in the afternoon, with a troop of police officers at their back, would be no pleasant thing.

They preferred standing still and facing the matter out.

Mr. Wriggles was really a sight to see.

He had lost his hat, and in his struggles with the mob the whole of his apparel had been more or less torn and disarranged.

He had almost lost his wig once—it had been knocked off his head.

Fortunately he had seized it before it fell.

He clapped it on again, and in his excitement did not notice that he turned the hind-part foremost, so that he presented quite a ludicrous appearance about the headpiece.

His coat was torn right up the back, and streamed behind him in two gigantic tails.

Perspiration was pouring in streams down his purple face, and after having called on our friends to stop, he was so breathless and exhausted that for nearly a moment he could not gasp out a single syllable.

But he seized hold of the bridle of Jack's horse and made furious and energetic gestures, which, however, our friends were unable to comprehend.

At length he found his voice.

"Are—are," he gasped—"are you the two officers who seized that countryman in the smock-frock and dragged him out of the court?"

"We are—we are!" cried Claude and Jack, together. "You remember us—from Hertford, you know—Gubbins and Kibble!"

"Yes—yes, I took you into the court and told you to watch."

"You did, and we obeyed."

"Then you know who that countryman was, or? You penetrated his disguise?"

"Yes, yes—did you?"

"I did," roared Mr. Wriggles, with an oath—"I did."

"And who did you make him out to be?"

"Why, Dick Turpin—Dick Turpin, of course! I knew he would be there, disguised somehow or other, and I know d—d well his three companions have been in the court with him!"

"That may be," said Sixteen-String Jack, "but we haven't seen 'em. We kept an eye on that countryman. We suspected him, and I said to Kibble, says I——"

"Stop—stop!" screamed Mr. Wriggles, "Never mind telling me that! We're wasting valuable time! He's off! I tell you he's running clear away!"

"We know that," said Jack; "and if you hadn't stopped us as you did, we should have been a good way on our road after him."

"Then you were going off in pursuit?"

"Of course we were! We ran as far as we could on foot, but we had lost sight of him; and we were puffing and blowing, so I says to Kibble, says I——"

"Oh! d—n what you said!" cried Wriggles. "Be off after him!"

"Do you know which way he went?" asked Jack. "The crowd told us he jumped over the wall of St. Sepulchre's Churchyard."

"No—no! He ran across the street, and down Fleet Lane—that's where he's gone! After him!—be quick! If you capture him, this will be the best day's work you have done in your lives!"

"I know that, Mr. Wriggles," said Jack—"I know that! We're off, and many thanks to you for the information you have given us."

Claud and Jack had hoped to get off, for they considered the sooner they left their present dangerous situation the better, but, as before, just when they believed they were about to start, Mr. Wriggles cried:

"Stop—stop! I'll go with you!"

This proposal was by no means relished by the highwaymen, for they foresaw that it would lead to all sorts of complications.

Accordingly, Jack said:

"No, no—Mr. Wriggles—you had better not! You are not ready. We shall have to lose valuable time while waiting for you."

"Stop—stop!" screamed the chief officer, quite blue with rage. "Do you dare to dispute my orders? Stop! I will go with you. Something tells me that I am at last about to accomplish the great object of my life. I feel that I shall capture Dick Turpin to-day! Ostler, bring out my horse!"

He was promptly obeyed, and in a marvellously short space of time indeed Mr. Wriggles was mounted on a capital steed.

When seated in the saddle, his torn and disordered habiliments—his reversed wig—made him appear a more ludicrous object than ever.

"You, then—you, Gubble and Kibbins, follow me. Keep close at my heels! We shall have him yet!"

Mr. Wriggles dashed his spurs into his horse's flanks, and away he went down the inn yard with the two highwaymen at his heels.

It was a most extraordinary combination of circumstances; and although they were quite at a loss to tell how it would end Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval could not forbear from glancing at each other and shaking with suppressed laughter.

The idea that they should be riding along in company with Mr. Wriggles in pursuit of Dick Turpin was really too rich, and it was a wonder they did not shake themselves out of their saddles in their efforts to suppress their laughter.

Sixteen-String Jack had truly said that this had been a day of adventures, but the most remarkable seemed about to come.

Mr. Wriggles was evidently well acquainted with the locality, for he turned down various narrow places, where no one had ever been seen on horseback before.

In a very short space of time all three emerged into Fleet Market, very close to the old Fleet Prison, and just where Farringdon Street now is.

At the corner of the turning from which Mr. Wriggles and our friends emerged, and which to this day is known as Fleet Lane, there was an old woman, the keeper of a stall, on which some peculiar-looking fried fish was exposed for sale.

To this woman Mr. Wriggles addressed himself:

"Have you seen a man with a smock-frock and heavy boots come down this turning lately?"

"Yes, I have," said the old woman, "and if you will tip me a bob I'll tell you which way he went."

Mr. Wriggles threw a shilling on to the stall immediately, and then the old woman said:

"When I first saw him, he was running very fast down the lane, but he stopped at the corner and looked back, and then he didn't run any more."

"What did he do?"

"He walked straight across the market, and, as I believe, went right up the court opposite."

"Then I'm afraid it's a case," said Mr. Wriggles. "Never mind, we'll see."

Not without difficulty, they picked their way across the market, having to thread in and out between the various stalls.

In a moment or two, however, they came to the corner of the court on the opposite side, and here again an old woman was seated—a vendor of apples.

Again Mr. Wriggles stopped, and inquired whether she had seen the country man he had described, and whether he had turned up the court.

"I have seen the man you speak of," replied the old woman. "He seemed all of a fluster like, and I wondered what he had been doing, but he didn't go up the court."

"Which way did he go, then?"

"Why, straight up the market towards Holborn Hill."

This was enough for Mr. Wriggles, who at once proceeded in the direction named.

While he had stopped to exchange these few words with the old woman, Sixteen-String Jack embraced the opportunity to speak to each other.

"It's no good for us to think of getting away, Claude," said Jack—"not a bit! And what this is to come to and how it is to end is more than I know."

"We must be careful," said Claude. "It won't do for us to be running about in and out London at the heels of Mr. Wriggles, searching for Dick. So sure as we try it, we shall be nabbed. Mark that!"

"It will be no good. But what are we to do? What a fix we're in!"

"Confound him!" cried Claude. "I wish I could think of some plan by which we could get rid of him. It's too bad! If he had not made his appearance just when he did, we should have been clear off."

There was no time to say any more, for Mr Wriggles pushed off towards Holborn Hill.

"There's but one chance," said Sixteen-String Jack, in a suppressed voice.

"What's that?"

"We must endeavour to draw him out into the open country, and when once we get him there, and we're all by ourselves, why, as we're two to one, I fancy we can do what we like with him."

Just so," said Claude. "That's the thing, provided you can only manage it."

"If we once do get him out into the open country, I'll not part with him till I've settled off a few old scores."

The foot of Holborn Hill was now reached, and Mr. Wriggles paused in doubt as to which way he should go.

Three ways lay open before him.

He made his inquiries here, but failed to obtain any accurate or important information, and so, for a wonder, he turned round, and asked the opinion of the two police officers.

"Which way should you think he has gone?" he asked.

"Well, Mr. Wriggles," said Jack, "I would rather leave that for you to decide. You ought to be able to judge better than me or Kibble either."

Mr. Wriggles smiled, for he appreciated the compliment.

So he said, with a patronising air:

"No, no—I want your opinion!"

"Well," said Jack, "such as it is, you shall have it. Now, I looks at the case in this wise: Here's three roads—or I might say four roads, counting the one we've just come."

"Well, never mind all that," said Wriggles—"come to the point."

"I am coming to it at a gallop, Mr. Wriggles," replied Jack. "Well, now, I think we can safely say that he didn't go back the way we've just come."

"I should think not."

"And we may safely say that he's not gone up Snow Hill, because that would take him back to Newgate again, and he wouldn't fancy venturing close to that."

"No, he would not. That's very good, Gibbins—very good! That reduces the roads to two!"

"It do, Mr. Wriggles—it do!" said Jack, emphatically. "And now the question is, which way shall we decide upon?"

"Ah, that's it!"

"Suppose," said Claude, "that we were to divide, and me and Gubbins to take one road, and you, Mr. Wriggles, take the other?"

"No, no—I won't have that! We will all stick together. I am resolved upon that point. However, not to stop here too long, I will say at once that it is my belief and opinion that he's pushed straight, because that's the nearest and most direct road to the open country."

"It's a singular thing," said Jack, "and I hope you'll excuse me for saying it, but that was just what I thought—humbly thought—myself."

"Did you?"

"Yes, I did."

"And which way do you think, Gubbins?" asked Wriggles.

"I think straight on, sir, for the reason you name—it's the high-road to the country."

"Come on, then. Forward! We shall soon know, before we have gone very far, whether we're on the right track or not."

All three touched their horses with their spurs, and away they went clattering over the Fleet Bridge at a tremendous rate.

London then was very different to what it is now, and Islington and Pentonville were two outlying villages separated from the metropolis and from each other by a large space of open country, consequently it took but a few minutes for the party to get clear of the houses.

They galloped on until, suddenly, being unable to discover any trace of the fugitive, Mr. Wriggles came to a halt.

"I don't believe he's gone this way," he cried: "if he had we should have heard or seen something. We've made a mistake."

"I hope not, Mr. Wriggles," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"But I'm afraid we have."

"What's to be done, Mr. Wriggles?"

"I'll be d—d if I know," was the angry reply, for the chief police officer was fast losing his temper. "Curse Dick Turpin, I say! What trouble I've had with him, to be sure."

"It's an aggravating thing!" said Jack. "How perverse of him! Now I could have declared that he would have made the best of his way out into the country."

"And I believe he has," said Wriggles! "He may be miles off by this time."

"Mr. Wriggles!" said Jack.

"Well!" was the fierce rejoinder.

"Would you excuse me——"

"What are you going to say. If you've got anything to propose, out with it."

"Well, Mr. Wriggles, I was only goin' to suggest that we hold a sort of a consultation, and endeavour to make out which is the likeliest place Dick Turpin would go to."

"Very well—very well; but I say."

"What?"

"Why, it strikes me you're two uncommonly sharp chaps to be country police officers—two uncommonly sharp chaps. I can't make it out at all," and Mr. Wriggles, as he spoke, glanced inquisitively, and not to say suspiciously into the countenances of the two disguised highwaymen.

The hearts of Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval gave quite a sudden bound as Mr. Wriggles thus spoke.

He was evidently getting suspicious, or at all events in such a state of mind that the least thing in the world would make him so.

As usual, Sixteen-String Jack was the first to speak, because he was the first to recover his presence of mind.

"Mr. Wriggles," he said, "I hope now that you have found how efficient we are, you will try what you can do to have us removed to Bow Street. I often say to Kibble what a burnin' shame it is that we should be in a place like Hertford."

"Ah! that he does," said Claude; "but it's the way of the world—some is lucky and some's t'other!"

"Humph!—ah!" said Wriggles. "Well, you are sharp—uncommonly sharp, that's certain!"

"It gives me great pleasure to hear you say as much, Mr. Wriggles," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and if so be we could manage to capture Dick Turpin, I suppose you'll see your interest to get us removed to London. We should be very grateful to you, Mr. Wriggles, we should indeed; and if ever you wanted two persons to perform any little private business, why, you'd only look out for us, and you'd be all right."

It seemed that Mr. Wriggles paid very little attention to what the two seeming police officers said.

He was stroking his chin, and his eyes were fixed steadfastly upon his horse's mane, as though he was taxing his memory and endeavouring to find out where he had seen those familiar countenances before.

Our friends perceived this, and felt that a crisis had now arrived.

CHAPTER DCXXXVII

TOM KING FINDS MANY OBSTACLES IN THE WAY OF HIS RETURN TO THE FARM-HOUSE.

We now return to Tom King, the only one of the highwaymen we have left in the court.

It will have been observed that no words were exchanged between him and his comrades.

Had he been free to speak, to attempt would have excited suspicion; but happening to be seated in that portion of the court set aside for the use of the lawyers, he was unable to mingle with the spectators.

It was highly necessary for his own safety that he should keep close by the side of Mr. Lawson, for by the restlessness of that individual it seemed as though he was more than half inclined to declare who his companion was.

It is hardly necessary to say that Tom King listened to all the proceedings with quite as great a degree of interest as either of his three friends.

When the uproar commenced, after the judge had concluded his summing up, he felt strongly tempted to join in it.

Prudence, however, counselled him to remain where he was.

Mr. Lawson turned to him and said:

"Well, now the case is over, do you want to stay here any longer?"

"A little while."

"Then I shall have to leave you, for I don't intend to run the risk of getting my head broke!"

Tom King merely tightened his hold upon the lawyer's arm, and continued gazing upon the scene of confusion around him.

"What do you want to stay here for?" asked Mr. Lawson. "What are you looking at? Can't you see all the other lawyers and barristers have quitted the court by that little door? If we don't make haste and pass through it, it will be closed upon us, and then we shall be mixed up with these rioters!"

"All right," said Tom—"I am ready."

He accompanied Mr. Lawson to the little door just mentioned; but not until he had seen Sixteen-String Jack, Claude Duval, and Dick Turpin quit the court together, in the manner we have already described.

He understood the whole plan instantly.

The boldness of the idea pleased him, and he had every hope that it would turn out successful.

As soon as ever they had quitted the court-house, all anxiety with respect to the people who were making such a disturbance was at an end, and Mr. Lawson turning to Tom, said:

"Now perform your promise."

"Eh—what?"

"Perform your promise!"

"What do you mean?"

"Mean?—why, give me that other five guineas you promised."

"In a little while," said Tom. "Don't be impatient—I have not quite done with you yet."

The lawyer uttered a suppressed groan.

"What do you want more?" he inquired.

"To ride back to Lincoln's Inn. Come on—we shall get a hackney-coach outside, and we shall not be very long."

"I don't mind that," said Mr. Lawson; "though why you wish to go with me I can't imagine."

"Never mind that."

"But," continued the lawyer, "did you notice that police officer standing watching there? Very likely he's looking out for you."

"Very likely indeed!"

"Then why be so foolish as to go anywhere near the spot?"

"You leave me alone to arrange my own affairs!" returned Tom. "As for that police officer, I'll settle with him if I find him in the way!"

Mr. Lawson said no more, but led Tom to the court-yard, where they obtained a hackney-coach.

They had a good deal of difficulty in forcing their way through the crowd, but at length succeeded in doing so, and then the vehicle rolled on at a rate of at least four miles an hour towards Lincoln's Inn.

While on his way to the lawyer's chambers, Tom King had an opportunity of thinking over his position, and considering what was the best thing he could do.

His immediate purpose was to proceed to the farm-house where they had found so stanch a friend, and wait there until Dick Turpin arrived.

But the question was, how should he get there?

To make the attempt while attired in a barrister's gown and wig was absurd, and that was why he had decided to return to Lincoln's Inn, in order that he might divest himself of this apparel.

He had not forgotten the police officer who had remained on watch; but he concluded that, as so many hours had elapsed, the man's patience must have been exhausted.

The hackney-coach at length passed beneath the ancient gateway in Chancery Lane, and presently stopped in front of the house in which the lawyer's chambers were situated.

Tom King gave a hasty glance around, and breathed a sigh of relief.

The police officer was nowhere in sight.

He paid the driver a liberal fare, and then the strange couple ascended the stairs.

"Now, Mr. Lawson," cried Tom King, as soon as they entered the room, "you have acted fairly and kept your word to me, and I will do the same by you—you shall have the five guineas I promised."

"And I think they are well earned," said the lawyer.

"Well, perhaps you may; and yet it strikes me that if you could obtain the same amount every day you would be quite willing to work quite as hard as you have for the last few hours from week's end to week's end."

The prospect of obtaining sixty pounds in one week was too much for the lawyer to bear, so he held out his hand and said:

"Give me the five guineas, and I will be content."

"All right! Reach me those clothes that I stripped off, and take this gown and wig of yours—here they are."

So saying, Tom flung the articles he had mentioned on the floor.

The lawyer produced the suit of farm labourer's clothes in which Tom had disguised himself.

These garments were soon put on.

"Now, Mr. Lawson," said Tom, "we are going to part. You know how I am disguised, and could easily raise a hue and cry after me if you liked. I don't believe you would do such a thing. Here, take the money, and let me advise you to sit down quietly and attend to any business you may have to do for the next hour or two, while I make my way out of London."

"I will," said the lawyer, pocketing the five guineas. "I am quite content with what I have received—quite content! So you are really going now?"

"Yes, I'm off! Good-bye!"

Tom left the chambers as he spoke.

He perceived, as he closed the door, that the lawyer had left the key sticking in the lock on the outside.

As a measure of precaution, he immediately turned the key, making Mr. Lawson a prisoner.

He then ran hastily down the stairs and out into the square, with the determination in his own mind, to get as far away from Lincoln's Inn as he possibly could.

Before he had gone ten paces, however, he saw, to his infinite annoyance, the same police officer standing close by, who had given him so much trouble in the morning.

"Aha!" cried that functionary. "So you've come out at last, have you? What on earth have you been doing all day here? Come this way, Mr. What's-yer-name, I want to speak to you."

To this speech Tom King paid no sort of notice, but walked on, pretending to be unconscious that the words were intended for him.

Then the noise of an opening window came upon his ears.

He turned his head round quickly and looked up.

He caught sight of the countenance of Mr. Lawson.

"Stop him—stop him!" he cried. "Hold him fast! He's a highwayman! Stop him, I say!"

It was really too bad of Mr. Lawson to behave in such a treacherous manner to our friend.

He had been well treated, and had received all that he had been promised.

After Tom King descended the staircase, however, he pulled out the ten guineas and counted them one by one

Then he began to think that he had given his services by far too cheaply, and regretted that he had not demanded more.

"I'll run after him!" he exclaimed, starting to his feet—"I'll run after him and catch him; then I shall get a share of the reward—fifty pounds at least, no doubt."

So saying, he rushed to the door, and found it fast.

This exasperated him greatly, and fearing that Tom would get out of sight altogether before he could force the door, the lawyer rushed to the window and flung it open.

It was then that he called out in the manner we have described.

The police officer, hearing the outcry, immediately placed a whistle to his lips and blew it shrilly.

It was a signal for those of his companions who were within hearing to hasten to his assistance.

We have only to explain how it happened that this police officer remained so long upon the same spot.

After Tom's departure in the morning, he waited for a long time, of course without seeing the farm-labourer emerge.

Then the time came for him to be relieved from his duty, and his place was filled by another.

He returned to duty again about two minutes before Tom King descended the staircase, and when our friend appeared the officer had just walked to the spot, wondering what had become of the man he was suspicious of, and whether he should see him again.

How his speculations were interrupted we already know.

When Tom King heard the lawyer cry out, a feeling of great indignation took possession of his mind.

He felt an irresistible desire to get level with the lawyer, but at the present moment this was not to be thought of.

He must bend all his energies to the difficult task of making his own escape.

His first impulse was flight.

He did not stay a moment to reflect, but bounded on at full speed, and rapidly turned round a couple of corners.

Although the day was on the wane, yet it was still quite light, and Tom King by no means relished the idea of being chased through the streets of London on foot

After running another hundred yards, he passed under an archway which led him into Lincoln's Inn Fields.

A tremendous hubbub behind him reached his ears, showing that many people had joined in the chase and were hastening to capture him.

Turning the angle of the archway, he found himself for a moment at least out of the sight of those who were in the rear.

This, then, was the opportunity to seize upon to get clear altogether, and so he gave a hasty glance around him in the hope of making a discovery.

But he saw nothing that was calculated to aid him in his flight except a hackney-coach.

This was drawn up close to the footpath, and the driver appeared to be asleep.

Hackney-coachmen generally stopped here for a length of time in the hope of picking up a fare, for then, as now, people were continually passing in and out of the lawyers' domain.

"I'll try it," muttered Tom between his teeth "It's my only chance. I must either do that or run for it. I'll try this first; I can but run afterwards if it fails."

He sprang quickly into the hackney-coach as he spoke, and cried to the coachman:

"Drive me down Portsmouth Street and Sheffield Street into Clare Market. Be quick, and you shall have a crown-piece for your trouble!"

It was astonishing to notice how quickly these words enabled the coachman to shake off his slumber

He gave his horses a couple of sharp cuts with his whip, and away they went at a perfectly reckless pace

Tom thought he had gained the interior of this vehicle unperceived by any of his foes; but in this expectation he was disappointed.

A police officer, who had heard the shrill whistle of his companion, was hastening along Serle Street when he saw the country-looking clown jump into the hackney-coach.

Before the ponderous vehicle had got half-way along the south side of Lincoln's Inn Fields, quite a crowd of persons emerged from the gateway, meeting the officer we have mentioned as having seen Tom King get into the coach.

"Where is he?" they cried—"where is he? Which way has he gone?"

"Who—who?"

"The highwayman!"

"How was he dressed?"

"Like a farm-labourer!"

"All right!" cried the officer. "I seed him—he's in that hackney-coach yonder. Make haste,—don't let it get out of your sight!"

The whole party set up a terrific shout.

It was composed of several police officers and a great number of lawyers' clerks who had eagerly seized upon this pretext for deserting their usual business.

The excitement of hunting a fellow-creature through the streets was something delightful, as a variety to the general run of their monotonous existence.

They shouted and screamed, and ran with all their might, encouraging the police officers to the utmost.

They bawled aloud to the driver to stop, but no notice was taken of their commands, and to their infinite chagrin they saw the vehicle vanish from their sight round the corner of Portsmouth Street.

CHAPTER DCXXXVIII.

TOM KING FINDS HIMSELF IN A VERY PECULIAR AND CRITICAL POSITION.

Tom King had a plan of operations already arranged in his mind, and as soon as ever the hackney-coach started he set to work to carry it out.

He commenced by rapidly divesting himself of his disguise.

This occupied but a moment, and very soon he had all the garments rolled up into a small compact bundle.

This he placed underneath the seat in such a way that it could not be seen without it was searched for.

By this time the coach had turned the corner, and although he could hear his pursuers in the rear, he could no longer see them.

He took out of his pocket a five-shilling-piece and laid it upon the front seat.

Then going to the door, he placed his hand upon the handle, and turned it so that he could push the door open in an instant.

Having made these preparations, he looked out for some narrow court or turning.

There happened to be one close by, and just as he was opposite the entrance to it he pushed open the door and jumped out.

In sublime ignorance of what had happened, the coachman drove on, and then turned another corner.

Having leaped into the street in the manner just described, Tom King did not pause a second, but darted down the narrow turning.

Loud shouts and the trampling of footsteps came upon his ears, and told him how necessary it was that he should seek some hiding-place immediately.

A few yards down this narrow turning was a house considerably larger than those surrounding it.

It had a curious, old-fashioned, projecting doorway; and no sooner did he catch sight of it than Tom King concealed himself there.

He began to breathe more freely, but he was by no means out of danger yet.

The hackney-coachman did not go far before he observed the people he passed were shouting to him and pointing to his vehicle.

Turning his eyes round, he then saw that one door was swinging open, and a suspicion of the truth at once entered his mind.

He pulled up, with a jerk, scarcely fifty yards from the spot where Tom King had leaped out.

"Bilked!" he cried, with an angry oath. "Well, it's only this once, and they won't catch me so again!"

He got down off his seat with the intention of closing the door.

As he was in the act of doing this he perceived, lying on the seat, the bright silver coin which the highwayman had deposited there.

"It's all right after all!" he exclaimed, as he picked it up and placed it in his pocket. "I thought I was done for, but it seems it's all right!"

Just then, the foremost of the crowd in pursuit of Tom King reached the hackney-coach.

A police officer seized the coachman by the throat, and asked him where the man was that had got in.

The coachman then explained, and, having told the truth, the officer cried:

"He's hiding somewhere about here! Disperse in search of him! He's jumped out between this spot and the corner of Lincoln's Inn Fields!"

This was a considerable distance, however, and in that locality the houses are built closely together, and intersected by numberless courts and alleys.

To think of looking for the highwayman there forcibly reminded one of the proverb about searching for a needle in a bottle of hay.

But they were all very anxious to capture the highwayman if they possibly could.

Away, then, they ran, retracing their footsteps.

Tom King was just thinking of quitting his temporary hiding-place when he heard his enemies returning.

The chance of slipping out from under the shadow of that old doorway was past, and he had now to devise something else.

Danger quickened and stimulated his invention.

Turning round, he looked at the door of the house itself.

There was a huge brass knob at one side, just over the keyhole.

He seized it and turned it round.

He had scarcely dared to expect that the door would yield so easily, but it did.

Without a moment's hesitation, he slipped into the passage beyond, and closed the door behind him.

He was only just in time, for many of the crowd ran down this narrow turning.

Tom heard their voices and footsteps.

They swept past, however, and all became comparatively silent.

Then, for the first time, he endeavoured to look around him and ascertain what kind of a place he was in.

This was difficult, for the passage was very dark, and although he strained his eyes to the utmost, all that he could make out was that several paces off was a flight of stairs.

Just as he had made this discovery he was startled by hearing the clear, sharp tinkling of a bell.

Then he heard a footstep just outside the front door.

Evidently, some one was desirous of gaining admittance to the house.

It might or might not be some of his enemies.

In either case he was in great danger, for even if the person ringing for admittance was an inmate of the house he would recognise Tom King as an intruder.

An alarm would then be raised, and beyond a doubt it would reach the ears of those officers who had so recently passed by.

To remain where he was was simply impossible; but then the question was, what place of safety could he seek?

If he ascended the stairs he would be in danger of meeting some one who might be descending in order to answer the door.

Then, on the other hand, if he ventured to open any of the doors on the ground floor there would be a strong probability of his being seen by some one.

To ascend the stairs seemed the least dangerous mode of proceeding, and so, after a brief hesitation, this was the course he determined upon pursuing.

With light and nimble steps he sprang up, nor did he pause until he reached the first landing.

Here he believed he was tolerably safe.

But he was destined not to retain this belief for any length of time.

He heard a door opening in the passage below, and he heard the sound of footsteps going towards the front door, and he congratulated himself upon having been so fortunate as to decide in the way he had done.

But just then, to his consternation, a slight rustling sound reached his ears from above.

For a second he could not think what it was, and then the conviction burst suddenly upon him that some one was descending from the upper portion of the house.

It was a female, evidently.

He could tell that by the lightness of the tread and the rustle of the garments.

Now Tom found himself in a peculiar predicament.

If he remained standing where he was, he could not fail to be discovered by the person coming down the stairs.

To descend to the ground floor was out of the question, for he could hear voices in conversation.

The only resource left to him was to choose at random one of the three doors opening from the landing.

Into what rooms they might lead he could not possibly conjecture; nor was there anything to enable him to decide whether those apartments were occupied or no.

He could not have decided had he debated within himself for half an hour; but it so happened that he was not allowed the opportunity of debating half a minute.

The female, whoever she might be, was coming down the stairs at a rapid speed, and, with a feeling of desperation about his heart, Tom King hastily opened the door nearest to him, and slipped with equal haste into the room beyond

He closed the door behind him, and placed himself in an attitude of defence, for he could not possibly tell what would happen next.

A sigh of infinite relief came from his lips when he discovered that the room was vacant.

There were many traces, however, of its having recently been occupied.

A chair was drawn up near the fire, and close to the chair was a small table, on which was heaped a quantity of sewing materials.

This was about all Tom was able to take notice of.

He had hastily crossed from the door in the direction of the window.

Now a slight noise attracted his attention.

As if by instinct, his eyes fixed themselves upon the door through which he had so lately passed.

Then, to his horror, he saw the knob was turning round.

Evidently some one was on the point of entering.

He glanced wildly around him for some place of concealment.

With joy he noted that the window was furnished with dingy, faded curtains, and with a rapidity of motion that was truly marvellous, he managed to hide himself behind one of them before the door was fairly open.

He was not quite sure that the whole of his body was properly concealed by the folds of the drapery, but he did not dare to make the attempt to adjust them in any way, for the movement would have been perceived by the person who had just entered the room.

It was some relief to the highwayman—but not much—when he heard the door close.

He had only one to deal with, he thought, and this was better than two or three.

The new-comer moved uneasily about the room, but finally all became still—so still that Tom could scarcely believe there was another person in the room besides himself.

As this remarkable silence continued, his curiosity became more and more inflamed.

At present, he had no idea what the new-comer was like, or whether it was a male or a female who had entered.

Reassured by the stillness, and moreover impelled by a powerful curiosity, Tom very slightly moved the curtain in such a manner that he could take a peep into the room without much danger of being seen himself.

At the first glance, he saw that he had not much need for apprehension.

Seated in the chair near the fire, which he had noticed, and with her back turned towards him, was a girl.

He could tell that she was young, although her face was turned away from him; the outlines of her figure were quite sufficient to show that.

She was very busily engaged in sewing, and sat upon the chair in a perfectly motionless attitude.

Tom looked all round the room, and saw that, although every article it contained was very plain, yet there was over the whole a comfortable aspect.

The young girl seemed happy enough, and to be engaged upon her sewing more as an amusement than as a labour.

Tom wondered very much who she could be.

He came to the conclusion, certainly, that this was the female he had heard descending the stairs, and congratulated himself upon having been so fortunate as to choose the room he had.

It was evident that the girl did not for a moment suspect that the apartment was invaded by any other person save herself, for she continued at her work placidly and calmly.

Then, in a low, sweet voice, she began to hum some portion of a ballad.

Tom listened in rapture, for her voice sounded like the notes of a bird.

"Surely," the highwayman murmured to himself, "this girl is kind-hearted, for she is young. She would have compassion upon me if I disclosed myself. Shall I speak, or shall I remain here?"

This was a serious question, and Tom was a good while making up his mind; for, of course, he could not fail to be aware that while he remained concealed behind the curtain he was in no danger.

Suddenly, however, the sound of a tremendous uproar in the street below reached his ears, and he felt a strong, nay, an almost invincible, desire to look from the casement and endeavour to ascertain what was the cause of it.

Fortunately, he had the prudence to draw the curtain around him in such a manner as to conceal him completely.

The noise reached the ears of the young girl, and, with a cry, she threw down her work, and, springing to her feet, ran to the window and looked out.

She was then very close to the hidden highwayman—so close, that her garments touched against the curtain

Tom King absolutely held his breath.

"What a crowd of people!" exclaimed the girl. "And police officers, too! What can have happened? Why, I declare they are coming to this house! Yes, they have all stopped round the front door! What can it mean?"

There was a tone of alarm perceptible in the young girl's voice, as she spoke these words, half aloud, half to herself.

Then she gave a start of alarm.

A loud knocking and ringing at the door below came with painful and unpleasant distinctness to her ears.

Clasping her hands together, she left the window, and seating herself in the chair, fixed her eyes upon the door of the apartment.

She was evidently much agitated about something, but why the knocking at the door should alarm her or have any effect upon her mind, Tom King was unable to determine.

Nor was he exactly in a condition to speculate upon the subject, for he was wondering in what manner it would be possible for him to secure his own safety.

CHAPTER DCXXXIX.

TOM KING FINDS A REAL FRIEND IN THE HOUR OF NEED.

SHOUTS and cries, and a perfect Babel of sounds came from the entrance-hall of the house. Tom King strained his ears in a vain attempt to make out some of the words that were uttered.

But in this he failed.

Presently there came a lull, and then some words were spoken by a voice which rose clear and distinct above every other sound.

After that comparative silence ensued.

What to make of this Tom King scarcely knew, yet he remained concealed by the curtain in a state of very great excitement and suspense.

After the lapse of a few moments, he heard heavy footsteps ascending the staircase.

He heard them pause at the top of the landing, and he heard some one knock at one of the doors.

A few minutes' delay took place, and then a knock was given at another door.

There was again a delay, which was succeeded by a sharp succession of knocks upon the door of the room in which he was concealed.

The young girl seemed greatly terrified, and in a faint, tremulous tone of voice she cried out:

"Come in!"

In obedience to this permission the door was slowly opened, and a party of four police officers appeared upon the threshold.

They strode into the room, and one, touching his hat, said:

"Beg pardon, miss, but you neeedn't look so scared. We mean you no harm—no, not the least in the world!"

"What do you want?" asked the girl, pressing her hands upon her heart. "Why do you come here?"

"We're in search of a supposed highwayman," replied the officer.

"But why do you seek him here?" said the girl in tones of great surprise.

"We're seekin' him everywhere, for we can't make out where he has gone to. We took this room along with the rest, though it appears to me pretty certain he isn't here!"

"No, that I am sure he is not!" said the girl, earnestly and truthfully. "For ever since this morning I have been seated in this room, and have scarcely left it for a moment!"

"Well, it dosen't look as if he was here—that's true enough," said the officer, "and there's been no alarm in the house, though one man will have it that he saw a suspicious-looking character hide himself in the doorway, and so, miss, you see that's the reason why we're searching here."

The girl inclined her head, and answered:

"You are welcome to search this room as much as ever you like, though I will give you my word there is no stranger here, nor have I seen one."

"Well, we can easily believe you, my lass," said the police officer, "for there's nowhere here for him to hide."

With these words, the police officers, very much to Tom King's surprise, withdrew from the room and closed the door after them.

He could scarcely believe that he had had such a narrow escape.

He imagined that they would not be content with taking the girl's word alone, but that they would have satisfied themselves by a hurried search in the room.

If they had done this, his discovery would have been inevitable.

He was rejoiced at his escape, not only for his own sake but for the sake of the young girl, who, had he been found after what she had said, would have found herself in serious trouble.

The noise made by the police officers ascending the next flight of stairs somewhat reassured him.

Then he heard their heavy footsteps in the rooms overhead, where they appeared to be searching for him.

The young girl sat silent for a moment or two, and then she exclaimed:

"How very strange! I wonder who it is they are in search of, and whether he has really made his way into this house? Now I recollect, I was absent from my room for a few minutes while I went upstairs; perhaps he availed himself of the opportunity to slip in when my back was turned? Dear me, how strange I feel! I do wish the police officers had looked all round—I should feel so much better satisfied, and I am sure I dare not look myself!"

The young girl was working herself up into a state of nervous alarm.

This threatened to be a serious matter for Tom, who had prematurely congratulated himself upon having made his escape.

"I feel very uneasy and frightened," said the girl, glancing timidly around the room as she spoke, "and it's getting blind-man's holiday, too! I will light the lamp; but I'm sure I dare not stop in the room while I am in this state of doubt! Never mind, I will light the lamp and wait till the officers come downstairs again; then, if they have not found him, I will ask them to step in here and ease my mind by having a thorough search!"

Evening was now beginning to close in, and strange shadows were creeping about the room.

The girl stirred the fire, and, going to a shelf, took up a lamp and placed it on the table.

This lamp she lighted with a trembling hand.

All the time she was thus engaged she continued to talk to herself, as though by that means she should be able to keep up her courage better.

"There," she said, "that's better—a great deal better! I feel ever so much braver now! What a while the officers are upstairs, to be sure! Perhaps they have found him, and then I shall have no cause to be frightened! I am foolish to feel terrified as it is—very foolish!"

She placed the globe over the lamp, and as by this time the wick had fairly ignited, the whole of the apartment was tolerably well lighted up.

"Well," she continued, "a light is cheerful, certainly Now I'll just draw the curtains before the window, and wait patiently till I hear the officers ascend."

These words were full of danger to Tom King.

He could tell what an excited, agitated condition the girl's mind was in, and he was certain that when she drew back the curtains and discovered him—as she could not fail to do—she would immediately utter such a cry as would infallibly bring the officers to the spot.

But the highwayman had no means of averting the danger.

He was able to do no more than to stand perfectly still, and trust to some chance circumstance arising which, perhaps, at the last moment, would prevent the girl from carrying out her intention of drawing aside the curtains.

That was a frail hope, indeed; for, although much frightened, the girl tripped across the room.

Chance made her seize the curtain on the other side of the window to that behind which Tom was concealed.

She drew it easily and quickly.

Then she seized the other.

No sooner did she lift it, however, than she caught sight of the form of a man.

Her eyes dilated with terror.

She trembled, and a scream was evidently just about to issue from her lips; but Tom King, with great promptitude and presence of mind, placed one hand before her mouth and the other around her waist.

In spite of her struggles, he drew her closely towards him; and then, in those low, sweet gentle tones, which he could always employ whenever there was a necessity, he said:

"Fear nothing, my dear girl; you are in no danger. I would die rather than offer the least harm! Don't struggle—don't scream, but listen patiently to what I have to say. I shall not occupy you many minutes, and then, when I have done, you can call out if you like."

There must have been something exceedingly reassuring in Tom's voice, for the girl ceased her struggles at once, and turned her eyes curiously upon him.

"It is true that those officers who entered this room a few moments ago are in search of me," continued Tom King. "You see, I took advantage of your absence to secure myself behind the curtain. Up to the present moment I have escaped. The officers firmly believe that I am not in the room, and they will have no suspicion of my presence here unless you call out and inform them of it. Now I ask you: Are you so cruel—so hard-hearted—so stern, as to be willing to doom me to death? For, if the officers capture me, that, I assure you, will be my fate!"

As he spoke these words Tom King released his hand from the girl's mouth, and his arm from about her waist.

She trembled, and clutched the curtain tightly with both hands in order to support herself.

"Now," said Tom, "you know I am here—you know who I am. Now then, if you wish to doom me to death, raise your voice—the officers will hear you, and will come—they will capture me before your eyes!"

But she made no effort to cry aloud.

Then Tom King stepped back a few paces, and said: "Do I understand that you are unwilling to call around me those who are thirsting for my life?"

The girl glanced at him for a moment, and then slightly inclined her head.

"Enough," said Tom—"that is sufficient."

"But," she exclaimed, "what are you to do?—what would be said if it was known that I had you alone in this room unknown to anyone?"

"I will get over that difficulty easily," said Tom, "for I will leave the room at once."

So saying, he stepped towards the door.

"No—no," she said, springing forward, "you will not leave now, because, if you do, your capture is certain! I can hear people murmuring in the hall now."

"So can I." said Tom, "and therefore I ask you to allow me to remain here. I will depart as soon as ever I am allowed the opportunity. I will not breathe a single word respecting my presence here."

"I believe you," said the girl. "Stand behind the curtains—then, if anyone should open the door suddenly, there will be no danger of discovery. Stand there until the officers have left."

"Every command of yours will be immediately and implicitly obeyed," said Tom, with a bow. "I cannot forget the deep debt of obligation I am under to you; indeed, I shall always remember that you have saved my life."

"Hush!—hush! It's dangerous to speak—you cannot tell who may be outside. They might hear the murmuring of voices, and be surprised to find me here alone."

There was so much good sense in what this girl said, that Tom resolved to follow her wishes exactly, and therefore he concealed himself behind the curtains.

He only took up his position just in time, for immediately afterwards he heard the heavy footsteps of the officers as they descended.

His heart beat furiously when he heard the steps stop outside the door, and then a loud knock was given.

It was very difficult indeed for the girl to utter a permission to enter, but, remembering that the life of a fellow-creature was at stake, she summoned all her fortitude to her aid, and said:

"Come in!"

The door was opened, and the officers appeared at it.

"Well, miss," said the one who had first of all spoken, "we have searched the house—leastways the top part of it."

"And have you found him?"

"No, nor the least trace of his presence. If he entered this house he must have left it. You are sure he is not in this room?"

"Oh, quite—quite!" said the girl, glancing around her.

"Oh, very well, then, that will do. We must look for him elsewhere."

With these words the officers withdrew.

They descended the staircase.

Some kind of discussion took place in the passage below, but eventually all became silent, and there was every reason to believe that the police and the rest of the crowd had taken their departure.

The girl listened intently.

All was still.

Then rising from her seat, she exclaimed:

"The danger is over now—they have gone now. Then let me entreat you to leave this room, for I cannot tell how soon my father may return!"

"I will go instantly," said Tom King. "Accept my heartfelt thanks for the kindness you have done me. I wish it was in my power to repay you—but I can't."

"Go—go!" said the girl; "your absence is all that I desire."

"Farewell, then," said Tom King; "but let me tell you that it is my solemn conviction that the police officers have not left the house, and that the second visit they paid a few moments since to this chamber had some more particular purpose than is visible at first sight."

CHAPTER DCXL.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING SET OUT TO REJOIN THEIR COMPANIONS AT ENFIELD CHASE.

THE young girl received this intimation with surprise and terror.

Springing forward suddenly, she took hold of Tom King by the arm and prevented him from placing his hand upon the knob of the door as he was about to do.

"What purpose?" she asked—"tell me, what are your suspicions!"

"They are only vague," said Tom; "but that the officers meant something by their strange conduct I feel assured. What, we may perhaps discover."

"Do you think that they suspect you are here?"

"It is very possible; and, if so, I shall regret it exceedingly, and for your sake."

"Why for my sake?"

"Because, if the officers should discover that I am here, they would know that you had screened me from them—that you had endeavoured to conceal me. Do you know the consequence of such an act as that?"

The girl shook her head.

"Then I will tell you," said Tom, in whose mind all that had taken place at the trial was quite fresh—"I will tell you. If they found you had concealed me here, or attempted to conceal me, they would take you into custody, drag you to prison, and doom you to a long imprisonment in a foreign land."

The girl turned very pale.

"I would not have brought this danger upon you," continued Tom, bravely, "if I could have helped it; but when I entered this room it was vacant, though I had scarcely concealed myself behind the curtains before you came in."

"And what shall you do?"

"I will go now. There's a risk, of course, but perhaps no more risk than there will be in two hours to come. I will do my best to escape; if I fail, it will be no fault of mine."

"No—no!" said the girl, whose heart seemed suddenly to have been impressed in favour of the highwayman—"you shall not go at present. The risk to me is not so great as you represent. Stay at least a few minutes longer."

"I will, since you wish it, for it would be foolish for me to deny the peril with which I am threatened. Yet stay, I think, if it is known that I have sought shelter here, I can make you harmless for your share in the transaction."

"How so?"

"I will make it appear as though you had consented unwillingly to befriend me—that you had done it merely to save yourself from ill-usage, because I had placed you in bodily fear."

"Explain," said the girl, wonderingly.

"Seat yourself in that chair," replied Tom, "and I will bind you in it. Then, when you are found, you may say that I had overpowered you and bound you in order to cover my escape. Do you consent?"

"I will if you think it would be of benefit. But could it not be avoided?"

"Perhaps so; all depends whether the officers have really departed. Look from the window, and tell me whether there are any men yet lingering in the street?"

The girl obeyed.

"No," she said, "the street is clear; they seem to have departed to seek for you in some other quarter."

"Then," said Tom, "I trust that the secret of my presence here will be known to no one but ourselves; if so, then no danger will come to you. It would grieve me more—far more than the loss of my liberty—if you got into any trouble on my account!"

The earnest tones in which Tom King spoke could not be mistaken, and it was certain that they made their way to the young girl's heart at once.

"Now," he said, "once more farewell! Believe me, I shall never forget you!"

"Who are you?" said the girl—"tell me your name, so that I can preserve the remembrance of this incident."

A peculiar smile wreathed the highwayman's lips as he replied:

"As for my name, that does not matter, for I am not known by it. When I tell you that I am called Tom King, you will know best who I am!"

The highwaymam did not trust himself to hear more; but as he spoke the words, he abruptly opened the door and passed out.

The young girl, for a moment or two, was rendered immovable by astonishment.

When she recovered herself, and was able to open the door of the room, she found that her strange visitor had gone.

Tom had listened on the landing, after he closed the door, and, finding that the interior of the house appeared to be perfectly quiet, he glided on tiptoe to the head of the staircase, and began to descend.

Soon he reached the passage in which he had first taken up his quarters, and which had so recently been inhabited by his foes.

Now it was deserted.

A few rapid steps took him to the door.

In order to prevent himself from coming into violent contact with anybody—for the passage was perfectly dark—he had held out his hands before him.

Suddenly, they encountered something soft, but what it was he could not at first make out.

It seemed drapery of some description.

A closer examination showed him that it was a cloak, such as was usually worn at that period.

He took it from the hook on which it had been hanging, his heart glowing with satisfaction.

He wrapped it around him, listened for a moment, then opened the door and passed out.

The narrow street was perfectly silent, so he did not linger beneath the shadow of the old doorway.

He wrapped the cloak in such a manner as to conceal his apparel, and walked along hastily, yet without any appearance of undue hurry.

He was now intent upon reaching the farm-house with the least possible delay.

He doubted not that Turpin had already arrived; and if such was the case, he knew his old comrade would be full of a thousand anxieties on his account.

He might attribute his absence to a serious cause and even be rash enough to set out in search of him.

This Tom was resolved to prevent if he possibly could.

On his way he saw nothing of his foes, and had the satisfaction of perceiving that very little attention was bestowed upon him by the passers-by.

He knew quite well the exact situation of the farm-house where they had had so warm a welcome, and accordingly he made his way towards it in a straight line.

He had a long walk before him, but he did not mind that, for he was well aware that suspicion was less likely to be excited by his proceeding to his destination on foot than if he had gone on horseback.

By keeping out of the way of all people, he avoided an adventure, but by the time he arrived at the farm-house the night was well advanced.

Upon his entrance, he found Turpin waiting for him.

There was a cloud of anxiety on Dick's countenance, which disappeared when he had the satisfaction of seeing his companion return.

"I must have been more fortunate than you," he said, "for I have been here a long time."

"How did you perform the journey?"

"On a waggon. I was lucky enough to get through the crowd that was assembled round the Old Bailey without being seen by any of the police officers, and then, as I reached Holborn, I saw the waggon, and the driver, belonging to our friend here, and which had brought us to London. I got into it, and, remembering that you were disguised as a lawyer, I instructed the man to drive off at once, for your presence, attired as I had seen you, would have caused suspicion, and I should have been in great danger had I waited."

"Certainly you would; you were quite right, Dick, to secure your own safety. You see I have done the like. Then you managed to reach here without interruption?"

"I did," replied Dick. "And now I am anxious that we should set out once more. I want to rejoin Claude and Jack, for, after what has happened to-day, I can know neither peace nor rest."

Some refreshments were brought out by the farmer and placed upon the table.

The two highwaymen did ample justice to the meal, for they could not tell how long would elapse before they would be able to partake of such a one again.

The farmer continued his kind behaviour towards them, and our two friends both felt that they had secured an important and true friend, one who at any time would render them every assistance that lay in his power.

Had they listened to or regarded the farmer's wishes they would have stayed there for a much longer period of time, but Turpin was restless, impatient, and anxious, and insisted upon leaving and rejoining his other comrades with the least possible delay.

He felt the result of the trial keenly, and a feeling of great resentment against all his foes took possession of his heart.

"If they had been content to persecute me," he said, "all would have been well; but they have punished Maud for my sake. Well, well—they shall repent it. They shall not have her in their hands much longer!"

At length the horses were brought out, and friendly good-byes were exchanged between John Adams and the highwaymen.

Black Bess was in splendid condition for the road.

The long rest she had had, and the excellent food which had been placed before her, had produced remarkable and beneficial effects.

Dick's eye lighted up with joy and triumph when he beheld her.

"While Black Bess remains mine," he exclaimed, in a tone of enthusiasm, "I care not for all the police officers in the world! Bonny Black Bess! she has saved my life many and many a time; and I have heard to-day the account of a fresh instance of her sagacity!"

He sprang into the saddle, and his example was immediately followed by Tom King.

They waved their hands to their friends and trotted off, being lost to sight in the darkness almost in a moment.

"Enfield Chase is the place, Dick!" said Tom King. "Depend upon it, Claude and Jack are there waiting for us!"

"Then the sooner we arrive the better," said Dick. "My blood seems on fire!"

"Maintain your calmness, if you can," said Tom. "Let the subject of what has happened to-day remain until we are all four together, then we can discuss it. In the meanwhile, as we ride along, we will while away the tediousness of the journey by relating to each other what has occurred."

"It will, perhaps, be best," said Turpin, with an effort.

"I should be glad if, for a few minutes only, I could forget the events of to-day!"

"Don't let them press too heavily upon your spirits, as they appear to do. As I said before, let us postpone all conversation on that subject until we rejoin Claude and Jack."

To this Dick gave his consent, and Tom's proposition was carried out.

They of course knew nothing of what had happened to each other since they parted, except while in the court.

They had much to tell, for many adventures had befallen both.

Whenever they wished to reach the Chase in the shortest possible space of time, they always galloped across the country, avoiding all cross-roads and lanes, and human habitations.

By this means they secured themselves to some extent from delay and interruption; and, moreover, they were able to save a very great deal of ground.

It was about one hour after midnight when they arrived upon the borders of Enfield Chase.

So soon as ever they were beneath the trees, Tom King uttered the signal which had been agreed upon to be used on such occasions.

The clear whistling sound sounded very shrill in that silent spot.

As the echoes raised by the sound died away, the two highwaymen listened eagerly and impatiently for the answering signal.

CHAPTER DCXLI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL HAVE A SETTLEMENT IN FULL WITH MR. WRIGGLES.

While Mr. Wriggles was so profoundly occupied in meditating, and wondering where he had seen the two seeming police officers before, our friends exchanged significant glances.

This was the only means by which they could communicate with each other.

Suddenly Mr. Wriggles looked up again.

He fixed his eyes piercingly and scrutinisingly upon their countenances.

Suspicion had been growing stronger and stronger, and taking deeper root in his mind.

The conviction upon the minds of the two highwaymen was, that this time Mr. Wriggles had recognised them—that he knew full well who and what they were.

But if this was the case, Mr. Wriggles apparently took no notice.

He again stroked his chin with his hand, for a moment or two, and at last ejaculated:

"Ah, well, Gubble and Kibbins, I have been thinking this matter over, and in spite of what you say, I am convinced that Dick Turpin has not gone this way."

"It's only a matter of opinion, Mr. Wriggles," Jack ventured to observe.

"Which way do you propose we should take?" asked Claude.

"Why, back to London," said Mr. Wriggles, glancing furtively into their countenances,—"back to London. Come along; follow me!"

And as he spoke, the chief police officer turned his horse's head round in the direction of the metropolis, and struck him in the flanks with his heels.

"Mr. Wriggles!" bawled Jack, "stop—stop a minute, if you please! I have something to say!"

Mr. Wriggles pulled up, and, in the twinkling of an eye, our friends had placed themselves one on each side of him.

"Stand off!" cried the chief police officer, suddenly, and drawing a couple of pistols as he spoke. "I know you both! Now I recognise you!"

"Then you will be sorry for it, and wish your memory had not served you quite so well!"

Uttering these words, Jack suddenly grasped the pistol which was pointed at him, while Claude imitated the action.

A sudden twist wrenched the weapons from the hands of Mr. Wriggles, and he gave vent to a yell of fury when he saw the pistols flung over the hedge into the meadows.

At the same time, our two friends tightened their hold upon him.

"Now, Wriggles!" cried Jack, "you know us! I am Sixteen-String Jack, am I not?"

The police officer uttered an angry growl, and made a furious attempt to get his arm free.

But he failed entirely.

"And you recognise me! I am Claude Duval."

"Curses!"

"Give in, Wriggles—give in!" said Jack. "We're two to one! You don't stand the ghost of a chance! Give in!"

"Give in to what?" cried the police officer. "What do you intend to do?"

"That you will see presently," said Jack. "Let me advise you to make no resistance! If you do, you will only bring ill-usage on yourself!"

"But, d—n it all, has it come to this? Is the chief police officer to be taken prisoner by a couple of highwaymen? Is the world turned upside down?"

"We intend to make you a prisoner, that's certain!" said Jack. "And now we have you secure enough!"

Mr. Wriggles struggled again; but although he was gifted with no ordinary strength, yet he was no match for Claude and Jack.

In a very short time, he was overpowered.

Then Sixteen-String Jack hastily thrust one hand into a pocket in the skirt of Mr Wriggles's coat, and drew out a pair of handcuffs.

As soon as he saw them, Claude Duval comprehended what his comrade intended to do.

And despite the resistance the police officer made, he found the manacles were slipped over his wrists with quite as much ease and dexterity as he himself could have displayed.

He was now in a very poor condition to make any resistance to the highwaymen; and he knew it, for he hung his head with quite a dejected air.

Then Sixteen-String Jack whispered a few words to Claude Duval.

Mr. Wriggles tried hard to make out what those words were.

No sooner had Jack done speaking, however, than Claude burst out into a loud and uncontrollable fit of laughter.

"Hold him, Jack!" he cried—"hold him! Oh, that's too good—it's rich! Oh, Jack, what an invention you have got!"

Mr. Wriggles was quite at a loss to understand the meaning of this outbreak of mirth, and he glanced into Claude's countenance, and then at Sixteen-String Jack.

The latter was only smiling faintly.

"I'll hold him!" he cried. "You, Claude, look in his pockets, and feel in your own."

A few yards of rope were required.

"All right," said Claude. "I have some left, and no doubt Mr. Wriggles never travels without it."

Claude was right.

Mr. Wriggles always carried with him a large quantity of rope, which, although very fine, and capable of being rolled up into a small compass, was nevertheless very strong.

This bundle of rope Claude quickly found.

"Now, Mr. Wriggles," said Jack, "perhaps you will listen to me! We're two to one, and you know our characters. We have many old scores to settle off, and we mean to take this opportunity. You can resist as much as ever you like—only, I warn you that the more you resist and the more trouble you give us, the more ill-usage you will receive!"

Then, turning to his companion, Jack said:

"Now, Claude, I will hold him tight! Make haste, and secure the rope!"

Mr. Wriggles looked very uneasy, for the word "rope" sounded very ominously in his ears, and he wondered whether the highwaymen were about to avenge themselves upon him by hanging him up to a tree.

He was soon convinced that they had some other and more elaborate intention, for Claude began busily to tie the rope around his ankles.

He also tied it tightly round his arms, just above the elbow.

The rope then hung down in four long ends.

Having carried his proceedings so far, Claude stood up, front of the horse, and took hold of those ropes which were secured to his ankles, and at the same time Sixteen-String Jack suddenly pulled Mr. Wriggles backwards on his horse, so that, instead of sitting in the saddle, he was lying nearly at full length on his steed's back.

[DICK TURPIN ASSISTS BLACK BESS OUT OF THE RIVER.]

Claude pulled the ropes with all his might, so that the consequence was Mr. Wriggles found himself drawn out of the saddle.

His two legs encircled the neck of the horse.

In this position Claude bound them tightly, and then, despite his frantic struggles, secured the other ropes attached to his arms in such a way that he was forced to remain lying at full length with his face upwards on the horse's back.

The chief police officer, bound thus Mazeppa-like upon his steed, presented such a very ludicrous aspect that the two highwaymen could not refrain from laughing aloud.

This seemed to aggravate Wriggles more than anything else, and the manner in which he managed to curse and swear at them and at himself was astonishing.

But the more furious he got the more did the laughter of the highwaymen increase.

"Oh, Jack—Jack!" cried Claude, who was compelled to hold his sides. "You will be the death of me some day—I know you will! The idea of such a thing! Oh, it's grand!"

A volley of curses came from Mr. Wriggles.

"Oh!" said Claude. "I suppose you are not of the same opinion! Well, it doesn't matter—you are in the minority, the vote is carried by one. I tell you it's grand, so it doesn't signify in the least what your opinion may be!"

Mr. Wriggles was now in such a furious state of mind that he was scarcely conscious of what he was doing.

Once or twice they feared that he would get free.

But the cords were all securely knotted, and Claude believed that they would not be likely to give way for some time to come.

"Now, then, Jack," he said, "what's to be done next?"

"Well, that requires consideration, Claude. Let me see, didn't Mr. Wriggles say he thought Dick Turpin had not come down this road?"

"Yes, he did—I recollect hearing him say so."

"Very well, and he wanted to go back to London, didn't he?"

"He did."

"Then so he shall," said Jack; "we'll send him back straightway."

"Hark you, my fine fellows," said Wriggles, "you will find it your wisest plan not to carry this joke too far."

"Well, you will not consider London too far, shall you?"

"Oh, curses! If you send me into London in this ridiculous condition I will have such a vengeance for it as will make you bitterly regret this piece of folly! You will see the joke from another point of view then."

"All right," said Jack, "we'll wait till that time comes. At present, then, we have you bound fast to your horse, and you cannot resist or escape."

Wriggles tugged violently at his cords with no better result than hurting his wrists and causing his horse to prance and rear in a very uncomfortable way.

"Release me," he cried—"set me down—cut these cords, and I will ride back to London without looking at you. I tell you what I'll do: I will promise to leave you and all the lot alone for the future, and not trouble my head about you. There, what do you think of that? Is it a bargain? and if so, let me free."

"Don't you wish you may get it?" said Sixteen-String Jack. "I know the value of your promises. As I said before, there was an old score between us, and now the time has come for settling it off. After to-day we shall be able to begin again level."

Claude now drew closer to Sixteen-String Jack, and said, in a faint whisper:

"Do you really intend to start him on the way to London?"

"Yes, certainly I do."

"But he might get killed.

"Oh, never fear!"

"Well, then, start him at once, for if we linger much longer the chances are we shall meet with some one on the road, and then we shall find ourselves in an awkward fix."

"Very good!" said Jack. "But wait a moment first; I am considering whether, if we start the horse, he will gallop all the way to London; he might stop by the roadside, and that would be far from pleasant."

"You must take your chance of that."

"I don't know that!" said Jack.

"Mr. Wriggles," he added, turning to that functionary, "I wish that the horse should gallop all the way to London with you. Do you think you could manage to give him a dig with the spurs now and then?"

Mr. Wriggles's countenance assumed a dark tint.

But he made no reply.

"Well, I suppose by that you mean you won't. Never mind, I have a little apparatus here that will answer the end in view capitally. Perhaps you would like to see how it is I intend to make your horse spur himself?"

Mr. Wriggles glared at Jack, but did not speak.

He was growing apprehensive of what was about to come. The conviction settled upon him that something very disagreeable was in store.

Jack having spoken, cast his eyes to one side of the road, and there growing on the little bank upon which the hedge was planted he saw a tall thistle, which was furnished with an infinite number of sharp, prickly leaves. This he cut down close to the ground with one blow of his sword.

Then, taking a portion of the unused cord, he tied it firmly round the stalk of the thistle; and then, making a loop in the cord close to the knot, he slipped it over the horse's tail.

Then drawing the rope tight, he tied it again.

It seemed that the horse, who had not been consulted in the matter, had serious objections to this proceeding, for he kicked up his heels in a furious way, and Sixteen-String Jack narrowly escaped sustaining severe injury.

Under certain conditions horses are very stupid creatures, and the one upon which Mr. Wriggles lay proved no exception to the rule.

Having flung its heels high in the air, to the great discomfiture of the police officer, it whisked its tail round in a furious way.

It was with great difficulty Claude had up to this moment managed to keep the creature still by holding the bit very tightly.

When, however, he brought down the thistle with full force upon his hinder parts, to hold him any longer became an impossibility.

Uttering a wild snort of rage, fear, and pain, the animal wrenched its head loose and darted off along the road towards London at such a speed as it had never accomplished before; and at almost every bound it lashed its tail, being unable to comprehend that under the peculiar circumstances the best thing he could have done was to keep his tail still.

Sometimes the prickly bush descended upon the horse's hind quarters, and sometimes upon Mr. Wriggles's face.

As his hands were tied, and drawn under the horse's flanks, he could do nothing in the shape of warding off these occasional blows.

When the thistle bush descended, he would utter such an angry shout and pour out such a quantity of oaths that the horse became doubly terrified, and resembled in all respects a wild animal.

Mr. Wriggles could turn his head from side to side, and when he did so he found that the hedges and trees were slipping past him at a prodigious rate.

Then, as he drew nearer to London he encountered many people on the road.

When these people were standing still, the horse passed them so quickly that he was a mile off at least before they could recover from their surprise or make out what was amiss.

Of course all those who had vehicles, when they saw the horse tearing along at such a furious speed, drew up as close to the side of the road as they could, in order to allow him free passage.

Thus it happened, without coming into collision with any object, the horse at last managed to reach London. It was not likely that it would continue its career much longer.

Its fury increased rather than abated; while, as for poor Wriggles, he was more dead than alive.

He grew incapable even of levelling curses at those who had played him this trick.

People now began to join in the chase, and followed in the hope of being able to see the end of this extraordinary adventure. But the horse flew along at a speed which no other animal could accomplish.

It so happened until London was gained that the road was almost in a straight line, and the horse had kept along the middle of it, as straight as an arrow from a bow. But just within the metropolis, the road branched off in two different directions.

At the angle formed by this division of the roads, a church had been built.

A stone wall projected from the road.

Towards this stone wall Mr. Wriggles's horse flew in a direct line.

It was perfectly blind to all surrounding it, and perhaps was even unconscious that it was flying along in the way it was.

Those in the rear who observed his headlong course, and saw the stone wall in front, at once concluded that the race was at an end. And so it was.

Utterly heedless of the obstacle, the horse dashed up to it and struck with a crash that was awful to hear.

Such was the force of the concussion that the creature's body was hurled back several paces.

When the people came up, there lay the horse perfectly still.

His head struck with full force against the stone, and death was instantaneous.

But what was their surprise upon finding a man dressed in the garb of a police officer bound in such a strange manner to the steed?

He exhibited no signs of life, though they could not perceive that he had sustained any injury

They hastily severed the bonds and carried him into a public-house.

Mr. Wriggles was only stunned, and he quickly recovered his consciousness.

His face was smeared all over with blood, and so swelled in consequence of the repeated blows with the thistle that it was perfectly impossible for anyone to recognise him.

He refused to give any account of himself, or to say who he was.

He insisted upon being placed in a hackney-coach.

He instructed the driver to take him to Bow Street, and on his way thither he occupied himself in vowing vengeance upon the highwaymen.

What he had already done he declared should be as naught compared with that which he intended to achieve in the future.

CHAPTER DOLII.

DICK TURPIN ANNOUNCES HIS DETERMINATION TO HIS COMRADES.

Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval stood perfectly still, and watched with straining eyes the hasty and involuntary flight of their old enemy, Mr. Wriggles, until nothing but a cloud of dust could be distinguished in the dim distance.

Not until even this disappeared did they turn their heads and speak.

Claude was the first to break the silence.

"All's done so far, Jack!" he said. "But it's very odd to me if we don't hear something more about it before long!"

"What do you mean?"

"Simply this! After this indignity Wriggles will be perfectly furious. He will strain every nerve to capture us!"

"Ban!"

"The matter is somewhat serious!"

"But not very."

"I don't know that. At the first blush it seemed a capital notion, but now that I have had time to think about it——"

"Well, what then?"

"I can see many disastrous results arising from this practical joke. I repent now it is too late!"

"That is nearly always the case. But really, Claude, you view this matter much too seriously!"

"I think not."

"But you should bear in mind that no man can do more than his worst!"

"Well, well—the job's done now, and cannot be undone; so, of course, the wisest thing is to make as little trouble about it as possible!"

"So say I. I am of opinion, considering all things, that we have let him off very easily indeed; and you know when we set out, you expressed yourself quite willing to settle off old scores with him."

"True; but it's no good talking any further about it, Jack. If we wished it ever so, we could not recall him!"

"Very true; and it strikes me as being an excellent thing that we can't!"

"But, Jack!"

"What?"

"The horse might be stopped by some one or other before it has gone many miles, and in all probability, Mr. Wriggles will have consciousness enough left to declare what has happened to him, and people will make their way here after us without delay."

"I don't dispute that it's very likely indeed; so that, under the circumstances, we cannot do better than ride off to the Chase while we have the opportunity of doing so."

"With all my heart; and I hope it will not be long before we rejoin our two comrades. I feel slightly uneasy about them, I confess; yet Dick had a good start, and I fancy he would get off all right!"

"But how came Tom King to be dressed in a barrister's gown, and to be on such friendly terms with that lawyer?"

"That baffles me altogether, and we shall have to wait until we see Tom before that mystery can be cleared up."

With these words, the highwaymen mounted their horses.

The animals had, during the last few moments, been busily engaged in nibbling the grass that grew by the side of the country road.

As it was broad daylight, it was necessary that more than common circumspection should be used in making their way to their destination.

They took every possible pains to avoid chance travellers on the road, and took care to keep at a good distance from every habitation.

By this means they managed, as they believed, to reach the Chase without being observed by a single person.

They made their way at once to the old familiar spot, close to the little dell.

"They have not come yet," said Jack, glancing around him.

"No. I scarcely expected them. It is early yet; we must wait. In all probability, it will be midnight before they arrive."

"Most likely. Let us retire, then, at once, to the little dell. I confess I am quite worn out. We might sleep and watch by turns; and then whoever was watching would hear the signal that Dick and Tom will be sure to give as soon as they come."

"I was about to propose the very same thing myself, for I am dreadfully fatigued."

Without any further hesitation, the two highwaymen made their way to the spot we have so frequently described.

There they released their horses, after having removed their trappings.

Without the occurrence of any single incident of the least importance, Claude and Jack slept and watched by turns until their comrades arrive at the borders of the Chase in the manner we have described at the close of a preceding chapter.

Sixteen-String Jack was watching, and he instantly aroused his companion.

"Come!" he said, "Dick has arrived, and given the signal! Ah, there it is again!"

A faint, chirping whistle came quite distinctly to their ears, and Sixteen-String Jack, at once responding to it, hastened to the meeting-place.

Great satisfaction was felt on all sides as soon as they became assured of their mutual safety.

Tom King conversed readily and freely with his comrades, and answered their questions without reserve.

But Turpin was sullen and silent, and strode rapidly through the trees to the little dell.

Sixteen-String Jack was full of impatience to make Tom King acquainted with the capital trick he had played Mr. Wriggles; and, taking no notice whatever of Turpin's reserve, he commenced his narrative.

At first Turpin took no notice, being apparently entirely absorbed in his own reflections, which, if the expression of his countenance went for anything, were dark and bitter enough.

Very soon, however, his attention was aroused, as Jack's words unconsciously penetrated to his understanding.

"What," he exclaimed suddenly—"what is it you are telling me?"

"Did you not hear, captain?"

"Only the last few words. I have been wrapped up in meditation."

Sixteen-String Jack then, with the greatest pleasure imaginable, recommenced his narrative.

As he proceeded, however, Turpin's brow continued to contract, and his countenance to assume a darker expression.

Tom King, on the contrary, was so excessively delighted, and laughed so boisterously, that he was fairly compelled to hold his sides.

As soon as Jack had finished, Turpin said:

"This is unfortunate—most unfortunate; and I would have given anything rather than it should have occurred!"

"Why so, captain?" asked Jack. "I had no idea that you were so particularly fond of Mr. Wriggles!"

"No more I am," replied Dick, grinding his teeth. "But it is likely to interfere with my future plans; at any rate it will render the execution of them extremely difficult."

"I am sorry to hear that!" said Jack; "and, to tell you the truth, I never once thought of it. After it was done, though, Claude wished it had been left undone, because he feared it would make Mr. Wriggles so extremely bitter against us."

"There can be no doubt about it having that effect," said Turpin; "and that's what I so much deplore."

"But I maintain," said Sixteen-String Jack, "that Mr. Wriggles has done his worst already—that he cannot possibly do more than he has already done."

Turpin shook his head.

"You don't agree with me, captain?"

"Indeed, I do not."

"Why?"

"I think I can explain to you. Mr. Wriggles has no doubt done his worst up to the present time, just as some wild animal might have done its worst in prowling about and seizing its prey. Take the most ferocious animal you can think of, and, under usual circumstances, what it might do would be very serious, and might be called its worst; but take that animal, wound it, torment it, and inflict some very serious injury upon it, and then its actions will be thrice as ferocious as before—no matter what they are at first."

"There is sound sense in that, captain," said Claude, "and a wild animal, in my opinion, is just what Wriggles ought to be compared to."

"I could forgive him all," said Turpin—"think nothing of it, had it not been for the manner in which he has treated Maud,—that I can never overlook; and, some day or other, I will certainly punish him in the way that he deserves!"

"Whenever that may be," said Sixteen-String Jack, "you will find me ready to assist you. So I should be glad if you would look upon what I have done to-day as a trifling payment on account."

"It is not worth while to have any ill-feeling about such a wretch," said Tom King.

"Certainly not," replied Turpin. "And although I was much vexed at first, we will pass it over, and say no more about it."

"It will, perhaps, turn out eventually to our advantage," replied Jack.

"I don't quite see that."

"But you spoke of some plans which you had formed, captain. Let us hear what they are, and you will find me ready to assist you to the utmost, no matter what they may be."

"It is a very serious matter," said Turpin,—"a very dangerous one, too; and, therefore, I should like to place my designs before you in the clearest possible way."

"We are all attention," said the three comrades, as if with one voice.

"Well, then," exclaimed Turpin, "as you may easily guess, my plans concern Maud."

His companions nodded, for they fully expected it.

"There is little need," continued Dick, "for me to say a word to you about the trial, since you all three witnessed it, from beginning to end, like myself."

"You may depend," said Tom King, "if it had not been for Mr. Wriggles interfering, and placing that paper in the hands of the judge, Maud would have been declared not guilty, and would by this time have been with us."

"The judge was summing up entirely in her favour," said Turpin, "and there can be no question that the jury would have acquitted her unhesitatingly; but you see the result, which convinces me more than ever that my original idea was correct."

"Of what idea do you speak?"

"Why, that Maud was simply made a prisoner in order to decoy us to our destruction."

"I consider that is now perfectly plain," said Claude.

"Well, then, my comrades," said Dick, "is she to remain a prisoner in the gloomy cells of Newgate? Are we to give her up altogether, and abandon her to her fate?"

"No—no!" murmured the three highwaymen together.

"I am glad to hear you say that," said Turpin, "for, of course, neither of you can feel the same amount of interest that I do myself. So I suppose I shall be right in reckoning upon your assistance?"

"Quite right; have no fear that you will be disappointed."

"Well, then," said Dick, "I am resolved that she shall not remain a prisoner in Newgate many hours longer."

"But how shall you obtain her freedom?"

"That is what I want you to consider. I shall be glad of any suggestions."

"But," said Claude, "does it not strike you that, if we attempt to liberate Maud, we shall be doing just what Mr. Wriggles fully expects?"

"It does, certainly."

"His object will then be achieved. Rely upon my assurance, that it will not be half a watch that he will keep round about the whole prison."

"I admit that; and now, perhaps, you can understand why I so much regretted you had treated Wriggles in the way you have. If he escapes with his life, he will be doubly exasperated."

"And if some accident should happen to him?" murmured Claude, biting his nails.

"Why, then there will be more uproar still."

"No doubt of it."

"But," exclaimed Turpin, "it is quite useless for us to stand here wasting time by making such remarks as these. In spite of everything, Maud must be set at liberty. If you like to join with me and run the risk of the expedition, good; if not, say so without loss of time, and I will accomplish my purpose as best I can single-handed and alone."

These words were uttered in firm, decided tones, and, as soon as he had spoken them, Dick glanced successively into the countenances of his companions.

As he half expected, he found them clouded with doubt and irresolution.

They were silent, too.

After a pause several moments in length had endured between them, Dick said:

"Come, my friends, speak—and speak freely. Do not shrink or hesitate to make me acquainted with your feelings."

"Do you think," asked Claude, "that if we all set out to Newgate, and take every precaution, we shall gain our object, or, rather, shall we all four be taken prisoners?"

"I understand you," said Turpin. "That is sufficient—quite sufficient! Say not another word! I will dare this enterprise alone!"

So saying he turned round on his heel.

"Stay, Dick!" Sixteen-String Jack exclaimed. "Do not be so hasty! Wait a moment, and let us discuss this subject fairly."

"No, no!—no discussion is needed! I have heard enough—quite enough!"

"Then if you will not talk the matter over, will you allow us to consult together?"

"I—I—I don't know. I wish to start at once."

"But that would be sheer madness."

"Why so?"

"Look up. The colour of the sky will show you that the night is changing into morning. And what can you do by daylight anywhere near the prison of Newgate?"

"Pardon me, my friends, but when I think of Maud's position, and the indignities to which she has already been exposed, my brain reels, and calm, rational thought is impossible."

"Under these circumstances, then," said Tom King, in impressive tones, and joining for the first time in the conversation, "take counsel with us. We will not advise you rashly or wrongly."

"I know you will not!" cried Dick, pressing his hand.

"There is plenty of time between now and sunset to talk the matter over fully and weigh every consideration in the balance. Let us agree to do this."

"As you will."

"Then, first of all, let me recommend that we take what rest we can. I am worn out. You must all be worn out too. We shall then be also able to turn the matter over in our own minds first, which would be a great advantage when the time for deliberation came."

"I think you have good sense on your side," said Dick, in calmer tones then he had yet spoken, "and therefore I will give way to you."

"That's right. Now let us to rest."

"We are already somewhat rested," said Claude and Jack, "so we will take the task of keeping guard upon ourselves."

Tom King and Turpin were glad enough to assent to this proposition.

"Remember," cried the latter, as he stretched himself at full length upon the turf—"remember, you have much to ponder over!"

"All right, captain!"

After this response, all was perfectly still, the silence being only broken by Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack relieving each other.

CHAPTER DCXLIII.

A SERIOUS DIFFERENCE ARISES BETWEEN DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMPANIONS.

THIS interval of rest made a wonderful difference to our friends in every respect.

Just before sunset they arose, soothed, refreshed, and in a much better condition for the business they had before them.

Dick Turpin, as might be expected, was the first to spring to his feet, and his companions, being unwilling to tax his patience too severely, rose also.

"Now, my comrades," exclaimed the captain, as soon as his followers were gathered round him, "let me receive your advice. I confess I am burning with impatience——"

"No doubt—no doubt."

"And although you do not know from actual experience what it is to be in my position, yet you can form some conception of my feelings. It is worse than madness to feel that Maud is exposed to every insult and indignity Mr. Wriggles or the Governor might choose to offer her!"

"Calm yourself, captain; no good will be done in this matter if we do not preserve our calmness."

"As for old Wriggles," said Sixteen-String Jack, "it strikes me you need not trouble yourself very much about him."

"Why not?"

"Because I'll warrant his bones are so sore, after his enforced ride, that he will be quite incapable of moving hand or limb for some time to come."

"Now," exclaimed Turpin, "which of you will offer his advice first?"

"I will," said Tom King. "I have thought deeply and carefully over the whole subject from beginning to end."

"Proceed, then."

"Well, my opinion is that, if we adopt ever so clever a scheme, we shall not stand the ghost of a chance even of effecting our purpose. Stay!" he added, as Dick was turning impatiently away. "As you asked for my advice, hear me to the end."

"I will—go on!" muttered Turpin, frowning deeply as he spoke.

"After the little adventure with Mr. Wriggles yesterday, there will not only be such close guard kept round about Newgate, but there will be such a thorough search commenced that we should have much difficulty, if we had nothing else, to occupy us in preserving our own safety."

"And that's your opinion, Tom?"

"It is. I know you don't like it, and I am sorry for it, but the idea is such a thoroughly hopeless one as not to exhibit the faintest gleam of success. If I thought that anything else than our certain death or capture would follow this enterprise, I would join with you in it and not shrink in the least."

"Good—good!" said Turpin. "Then I have no other choice left me than to perform the task single-handed, for I suppose you, Claude, and you, Jack, are of the same way of thinking as Tom. Well, well, I don't feel surprised; I don't wonder at it in the least; I admit to the full that the idea is full of peril, and you have not the same inducements to urge you forward that I have. Well, let us say no more about it; it need not mar our friendship. I don't wish you to join me against your inclination in any enterprise, no matter of what character, and more especially in one of such a private nature as this."

"I have only a word or two to say," said Claude Duval. "I confess that my opinion is the same as Tom's. Like him, I believe that we stand not the least chance, but that our capture or death will follow the attempt as naturally as night follows day."

"Very good, then; you will wait here until I return."

"Stay a moment, Dick. I should like you to reflect upon this; Maud is only remanded. At the most, that remand will not be of more than a month's duration. We all know how near she was to being found not guilty yesterday, and the probability is, that at the second trial she will be set free, because there will be no excuse to make in order to detain her."

"But," cried Dick, "do you think that I would consent to her remaining in prison a whole month longer? Never—never! She shall be set free, and in a few hours, too. A month! I cannot bear the thought of such a thing. I wish now that I had acted according to the dictates of my own judgment in the first instance. Then, if I had done so, Maud would have been with us here to-day."

"Perhaps," said Tom.

"Well, perhaps I might have failed, I know; but, still, I generally succeed in that which I resolutely take under hand. Farewell, my friends! It is, perhaps, all for the best that I should start upon this mission alone. Perhaps success will be all the more certain for it. At least, I will try to look upon it in that light. Farewell!"

"But, Dick!" they exclaimed.

Turpin paid no attention, but, plunging among the trees, was immediately lost to their view.

They called again, and then the three highwaymen were about to rush after him, fearing, in his present state of mind, he would do some rash and fatal act, when Tom King asked them to pause.

"Let us consult a moment," he said. "Do you think he seriously contemplates attempting Maud's rescue himself?"

"I do. I feel sure that such is his intention," said Claude.

"Well, then, let us after him at once, and at all hazards prevent him from leaving the Chase; we must not scruple to employ violence. If he ride to London in his present excited state, his death is certain."

With these words the three highwaymen rushed with full speed in the direction Dick Turpin had taken.

They were immediately conscious that he had gone in a direct line for the spot where the horses had been left.

Suddenly emerging into a small open space, they saw him some little distance off.

He was doing something to the trappings of Black Bess, which he had managed to get ready for the road in such a marvellously short space of time.

"Hold—hold, Dick!" they cried. "Stop—stop!"

He just turned his head, but that was all.

Springing lightly and easily into the saddle, he turned Black Bess's head towards the borders of the Chase, and uttering that low, chirping sound which she so well understood as requiring her to put forth her best energies, Black Bess darted off and was out of sight instantly.

It was in vain that the three highwaymen strove to check her career.

Although the sun had not long set, there was a kind of mist or haze hanging over the whole face of the country rendering near objects confused and indistinct.

"Now what is to be done?" said Tom. "He is lost—I feel sure of it!"

"And I. It's a thousand pities!" exclaimed Claude.

"I wish I had agreed to have gone with him," said Sixteen-String Jack. "I should then have felt much easier in my mind than I do now."

"There's no help for it," said Tom. "We must mount and follow him with all speed. It would ill become us to allow him to ride thus headlong to destruction. Saddle your horses quickly—we must be off!"

"I fear we shall stand but little chance of overtaking him," exclaimed Claude Duval—"Black Bess was going at a wonderful pace."

"Well, let us try. Don't lose another moment. Forward—forward!"

With scarcely less celerity than Dick Turpin himself had used, the three highwaymen saddled their horses, mounted, and rode out from the Chase.

They looked around them and listened.

But they could neither see nor hear anything of their comrade.

"Don't linger!" said Tom. "Forward—forward! Every second takes him further away from us!"

"But which way has he gone?"

"This would be the way, for certain—it's the nearest to London."

Not another word was said, but all three plunged the spurs deeply into their horses' flanks and flew like the wind after Dick Turpin.

But although they stimulated their horses to the utmost to make every exertion, they found themselves, after a long, hard gallop, in just about the same position as at first.

That is to say, when they paused and listened, they were unable either to see or hear anything of the captain or his steed.

Filled with alarm at this result, they once more made their horses start off at full gallop, for they felt that was the only chance they had of success.

But to think of chasing Black Bess after she had had such a start as that, was almost as useless as chasing the wind.

Nevertheless, they would not admit of this conviction to their minds.

Suddenly Claude Duval reined-up.

And his companions no sooner observed the movement than they imitated his example.

"What's the matter?" they asked. "What has happened?"

"Hark!" said Claude. "I heard distinctly the clatter of many horses' feet upon the roadway! Hark! Did you hear it then?"

"Oh, yes, plainly enough! There can be not the least doubt about it!"

"They are dragoons," said Sixteen-String Jack. "I can tell that by the sound. Depend upon it, you were right, Tom, when you said they would be out in double force to-night."

"I quite expected such would be the case. And, now, my friends, what are we to do? We cannot continue our chase of Dick."

"That's certain!" cried Claude; "for, if we do, we shall run full tilt against these dragoons who are approaching. We had better make our way over the hedge, and cross the meadows.

"I think that's our best chance of avoiding them," said Tom King. "Come, and come quickly, or they may, perhaps, hear our movements."

The two highwaymen did not require much urging; for, not only were they solicitous of their own safety for their own sakes, but they felt that Dick's case would be hopeless indeed if they were not at hand to render him assistance.

Even should he be captured, they at least must retain their liberty, or there would be an end to all of them.

Fortunately. the hedge was of such a height that the horses could leap it with ease.

They alighted easily upon the soft turf of a meadow beyond.

The highwaymen pressed onwards, and owing to the foggy state of the atmosphere, they were convinced they should quickly get quite out of sight of their foes; and as for hearing, they had nothing to fear on that account, for the hoofs of the horses as they struck upon the turf produced scarcely an audible sound.

"And now," exclaimed Tom, pausing when he believed they were at a sufficient distance from the dragoons to make it safe for them to do so—"now, my friends, which direction shall we take next? How do you think we shall manage to intercept the captain?"

Both were silent.

"I can only think of one thing" continued Tom, "and that is to ride on towards London at full speed, and yet that's like nothing else but courting danger and death. I wish now that we had consented to go with him at all hazards."

"And I—and I!" murmured Claude and Jack.

"But it was such a hopeless excursion, and I never thought his determination was so strong. Forward, then, to London, my friends, let the risk be what it may! Forward—forward!"

With these words, the highwaymen, again clapping spurs to their steeds, dashed forward at a speed that would very soon bring them to their destination.

CHAPTER DCXLIV.

DICK TURPIN TAKES A TERRIFIC LEAP FROM THE BRIDGE OVER THE RIVER, TO AVOID HIS PURSUERS.

When Dick Turpin turned round and precipitately left his companions, there was a feeling of bitterness and anger about his heart, such as he had never before experienced.

He could not understand how they could talk and reason so calmly about Maud remaining a prisoner in Newgate for another month longer before anything else was done.

In his own mind he must have known that he did not stand the least chance of effecting his purpose if he went alone, and yet, as we have seen, acting upon the impulse of the moment, he had saddled Black Bess and darted off into the darkness of the night.

The excitement about his brain still continued.

Indeed, it seemed rather to increase than abate.

Unconscious of what he was about, he continued, at short intervals, to give utterance to the chirping cry; and every time it struck upon her ears, Black Bess would bound forward with additional speed.

He paid very little attention to the road he was taking.

He could feel that the hard highway was beneath the hoofs of Black Bess, and he knew that he was going in the direction of the metropolis. That was all the information he wished, or desired to possess.

By degrees, however, this fever and tumult of his thoughts calmed down, and then he became conscious that he had acted rashly and foolishly, as well as treated his comrades with injustice.

As he thought more and more upon this, he gradually reduced his mare's speed, and the gallant creature was glad enough to obey the rein, for the long gallop at the top of her speed had tried per powers.

Whereabouts he was, Dick Turpin could not clearly tell. He looked about him.

But the fog, which appeared to be drifting about in large masses, so altered the appearance of the landscape that every object seemed strange to him.

"No matter!" he muttered, at last. "It would be greater folly still for me to ride back to the Chase, and confess what my feelings now are! No—no; that will never do—never! I have started, and I must carry out my purpose. And, even now, the thought comes over me that I may, perhaps, be more likely to succeed by myself than if I had the aid of my three comrades."

He ceased suddenly.

For, all at once, there broke upon his ears a sound which arrested the whole of his attention.

It was a familiar sound to the horse, as well as the rider, and Black Bess turned her ears backwards in the direction from which it came.

"Horsemen at full gallop!" exclaimed Turpin, "and a large party of them, too! The speed is terrific! Then Tom was right, after all, when he said the dragoons would be out to-night, for they are dragoons, I am certain!"

It was easy for Dick to distinguish the difference between the sounds made by the horses used by the police officers and those used by the light dragoons.

"They are close behind me," he murmured. "Well, no matter—no matter! I am anxious to reach London in the shortest possible space of time, and I shall have a little excitement to urge me onwards. Now, Bess, on—on!"

Again Black Bess put forth all her marvellous powers of speed.

Suddenly, however, as he passed a spot where the highway was intersected by two cross-country roads, there suddenly emerged from the trees another troop of dragoons.

These set up a loud shout as Dick passed by, and immediately a hot pursuit commenced.

Dick waved his hat defiantly, and pressed onwards.

But the dragoons were frightfully close behind.

Indeed, he was within range of their carbines.

The sudden appearance of this second troop of dragoons is thus accounted for:—

They were making their way along one of the cross-country roads we have mentioned, and it was just as they were about to emerge on to the highway that Dick Turpin swept past at such a furious speed.

Then, never doubting that he was one of whom they were in pursuit, they pressed after him with all the speed they could induce their horses to make.

In spite of all her exertions, Black Bess could not gain much upon the horses behind her.

Several causes combined to produce this result.

For one, there was the trifling space between them at the first, and though this was made greater, yet it would be some time before she would be able to increase upon them so much as to fairly get out of their sight.

Ther, Black Bess was to some extent exhausted by her first gallop, which she had taken while Dick Turpin was in such a state of mental excitement.

Had he been in his sober senses he would never have dreamed of allowing her to make so much exertion unnecessarily.

Then, thirdly, tne horses possessed by this troop of dragoons were of very superior quality—indeed, they had all been picked, and were remarkable for their fleetness and endurance.

Every few seconds Dick glanced over his shoulder at his pursuers, and noted with no slight degree of alarm that they kept so close upon his track, and that in spite of all her efforts, Black Bess could not gain upon them to any great extent.

With low, cheering words, however, he endeavoured to urge her onwards.

Luckily the road was level, and in good condition, so that there was little fear that she would make a false step, or stumble.

Should she do such a thing his enemies would be upon him before he could recover her.

All at once the fog drifted away over the meadows, as it was impelled along by a fresh breeze which had sprung up.

Looking before him, Dick at once became familiar with his whereabouts.

At no great distance in advance was an old wooden bridge crossing a river.

Over this bridge he would have to pass in order to reach London.

This old-fashioned structure was strangely planned, for it spanned the river in a diagonal direction.

Seeing the bridge, Dick Turpin gave a cry of satisfaction, for he was surprised to find himself so much nearer to London than he could possibly have believed.

Glancing behind him, he saw that he was beginning to make the distance between himself and his pursuers greater and greater.

In another moment the bridge was gained.

It was a narrow, tottering fabric, and was composed of unhewn logs of wood.

Common safety made it necessary for all persons crossing the bridge on horseback to do so at reduced speed.

Dreading the consequences of a fall more than his enemies gaining upon him slightly, Dick Turpin pulled up Black Bess with the intention of allowing her to pass over it at a steady trot.

When once the other side of the bridge was reached, he knew all would be well, for there was a rapid yet gradual descent, in flying down which he would quickly make up for the time he had lost.

Just about as he reached the centre of the bridge, however, he suddenly perceived the figures of a large body of police officers coming towards him.

In consequence of the slope of the road from the other side of the bridge, Dick Turpin had not been able to see these police officers until they were actually upon the structure.

He had not heard them, for, as the ascent was steep, the police officers had allowed their horses to walk up.

Dick pulled up instantly and mechanically, while his brain spun round and round.

At the same time, one among the body of police officers uttered a terrific shout.

In spite of his mental confusion, caused by so suddenly finding himself in a situation of so much peril, Dick recognised the voice.

It was that of Mr. Wriggles.

The police officers then, with their chief at their head, pushed on to the bridge at full speed.

Then there came a cry from the dragoons.

They were close enough to see and comprehend the whole state of affairs, and one of them, in a powerful voice, cried out:

"Stop him—stop him! We have him now sure enough—caught like a rat in a trap! Make a firm stand! Don't permit him to break through your ranks!"

Just as these words were spoken, the troop of dragoons dashed on to the bridge.

Dick's capture now seemed certain.

There was apparently no loophole for retreat, nor the least opportunity for reflection,

In a few more seconds, at the most, he would be hemmed in and surrounded by these two bodies of his foes.

He was standing there, and they were rapidly closing upon him.

Dick knew that if his enemies once got around him on the bridge there would be an end to all possibility of escape.

He could not by any means break loose from them.

But he thought of Maud and the wretched existence she was leading in a cell in Newgate, and determined, no matter at what risk, to make the attempt to preserve his own liberty

All that we have just, at some length recorded, took place in an inconceivably short space of time.

Indeed, Dick Turpin's pause on the centre of the bridge and the appearance of his foes at both ends of it might be said to be instantaneous events.

Far down below, Dick could hear the rushing and roaring of the river, as it made its way through the constructed channel among the rocks.

He knew the water was far—very far beneath him, and that the bottom was composed of hard, jagged rocks.

Yet he made up his mind instantly to run the awful risk of leaping down.

It seemed like leaping to certain death.

But it was the only means by which he could avoid his enemies.

Therefore, without appearing to his enemies to pause or hesitate a moment, Dick Turpin backed Black Bess as far against one side of the bridge as he could.

Then, bending low down in the saddle, and disregarding the shouts of triumph and calls for surrender that came from his foes, he murmured close to the ears of his gallant mare:

"Over, Bess—over!—over, my lass—over!"

Black Bess drew herself back slightly, and a half snort escaped her nostrils.

Then she gave one terrific bound, clearing with ease the wooden parapet of the bridge.

So astonished were both the dragoons and the police officers upon witnessing this feat, that, as if by one impulse, they all stopped their horses upon seeing Black Bess thus suddenly and wonderfully rise into the air.

She disappeared instantly.

As soon as they recovered themselves sufficiently to do so, the whole of the party hastened to the side of the bridge to look down and ascertain the result of the terrific leap.

But over the surface of the water there hung so dense a vapour that they could not see down distinctly.

A splash, however, came upon their ears.

Then they fancied they could see something like a struggle going on down below.

They strained their eyes, and endeavoured to make it out.

But they failed.

Spellbound, however, they maintained the same attitude for several moments.

Then Mr. Wriggles roared out:

"Down—down all of you! This is the way. Be quick—we shall have him now! That leap has placed him entirely in our power! If he is not dead, his horse must be crippled, and probably both are lying insensible at the bottom of the stream! Quick—quick! Recollect the reward is just the same whether he is alive or dead!"

A faint kind of hurrah followed these words, and at a reckless speed the police officers and dragoons galloped pell-mell down the steep bit of roadway that led up to the bridge.

Upon reaching the bottom, they stopped, and then, not without a great deal of difficulty, they managed to pick their way over the rough, jagged rocks towards the edge of the stream.

But impelled as much by curiosity as the desire to capture the notorious highwayman several police officers and dragoons quickly succeeded in placing themselves upon the margin of the hasty current.

Then they endeavoured as well as they could to pierce the vapoury cloud that seemed to rise from the surface of the water and extend almost as far above into the air as the bridge above them.

But, although they used their best endeavours, and strained their eyesight to the utmost, they were unable to catch a glimpse of the highwayman or his steed.

At last, Mr. Wriggles arrived upon the bank of the stream.

He shaded his eyes carefully with both his hands, and looked steadily across the river.

"Can you see him—can you see him?" asked many eager voices.

"No," was the reply, given in a half-triumphant voice. "He must have been stunned or killed by the fall, and has been carried away by the current. Follow me! If we go further down the stream, we shall find him, to a certainty."

CHAPTER DCXLV.

RELATES WHAT BEFEL DICK TURPIN AND BLACK BESS AFTER THE LEAP FROM THE WOODEN BRIDGE.

When Dick Turpin felt Black Bess plunge down the terrific abyss, the bottom of which could not be distinguished, a strange, sickening chill crept over his heart.

That was about all he was conscious of, until, suddenly, he experienced a smart, severe shock. Then he was conscious of a struggle taking place on the part of Black Bess and himself.

He was aware that he was grasping the reins with extreme tightness, and that he was floundering in the water.

The current was very strong, and quickly carried both himself and his steed many yards below the bridge.

Then Dick began to recover himself.

The consciousness came over him that the injuries he had received, if any, were very slight.

This inspired him with hope, for if he had escaped so well, might not Black Bess have done so likewise?

She was still struggling with the stream—still being carried along by it.

He made an effort to stop himself.

The first time he failed, but the second was successful.

Planting his foot firmly against a piece of rock that jutted up from the bottom of the shallow river, he held to the reins with all his strength.

Feeling the restraint, Black Bess at once renewed her struggles to obtain a footing.

At length she partially succeeded, and then Dick, watching his opportunity, left the spot he then occupied and gained the bank.

This was by no means a very difficult task, for the stream itself, where it ran between the rocks, was of inconsiderable width.

Black Bess followed him with difficulty.

But whether this proceeded from some injury she had received, or whether it was only the action of the current, he could not at present tell.

The sides of the river were rugged and precipitous.

Clasping the huge masses of rock with one arm, Dick gradually drew himself out of the water, and then assisted Black Bess to follow him.

At length, after much difficulty, he managed to get her fairly on dry level ground.

Then, with a beating heart, and without thinking of himself for a moment, Dick proceeded to make a careful examination of his steed.

He feared to find some limb broken, or that she had received some serious injury.

That she should have altogether escaped injury seemed hardly possible.

Still, as he passed his hand rapidly, yet skilfully over every part of her body, he found that, beyond a few bruises and scratches, she had not received any serious damage.

"This is more than I could have hoped for," he ejaculated. "My heart is light, Bess, now that I know you are uninjured. You will be none the worse for that frightful leap, but I shall be sorry indeed for you to risk such another one. Surely the next time the result would be different!"

Then, after a pause, he said:

"I wonder whether I am hurt? Well, no matter; I would not care how many joints I had broken so that Black Bess was whole and sound. Let me try; I think that I have been lucky enough to escape with bruises and scratches, too."

While speaking these words, the highwayman rapidly made an examination of his person.

He was not long in discovering that he had received several alarming contusions, the effects and pains of which would be more perceptible in a few hours than they were then.

One ankle seemed badly sprained.

But to this mishap he attached but slight importance.

Then the sound of the voices of his enemies, as they made their way along the banks of the stream, reached his ears.

"They will search for me in the river's bed," he ejaculated; "that's where they'll expect to find me, so I'll steal off as silently as I can, and leave them there to look to their hearts' content."

Dick did not mount.

But merely holding by the bridle, led Black Bess over the masses of rock until at length he entered the high-road.

He then began to feel severe pains in many parts of his body, and their violence seemed to increase each moment.

But as for Black Bess, she seemed much better.

"I'll mount," exclaimed Dick, "and will soon be far away from this spot."

Dick never knew till then how difficult the simple act of mounting a steed might be made.

In vain he endeavoured to lift his left foot and place it in the stirrup.

Every time a cry of intolerable bodily pain would be wrung from his lips, and his foot would sink to the ground again.

At last, finding it impossible to mount in the ordinary method, he looked about him to find something that would aid him.

There was nothing but a five-barred gate.

Time was precious, and so he resolved to make use of this.

He led Black Bess close up to it, and then, with great pain and difficulty, climbed up the wooden bars one by one.

At length the top was reached, and then, by clinging tightly to the saddle, he managed to drag himself into it.

When once he was seated there, however, the chief part of the difficulty was over.

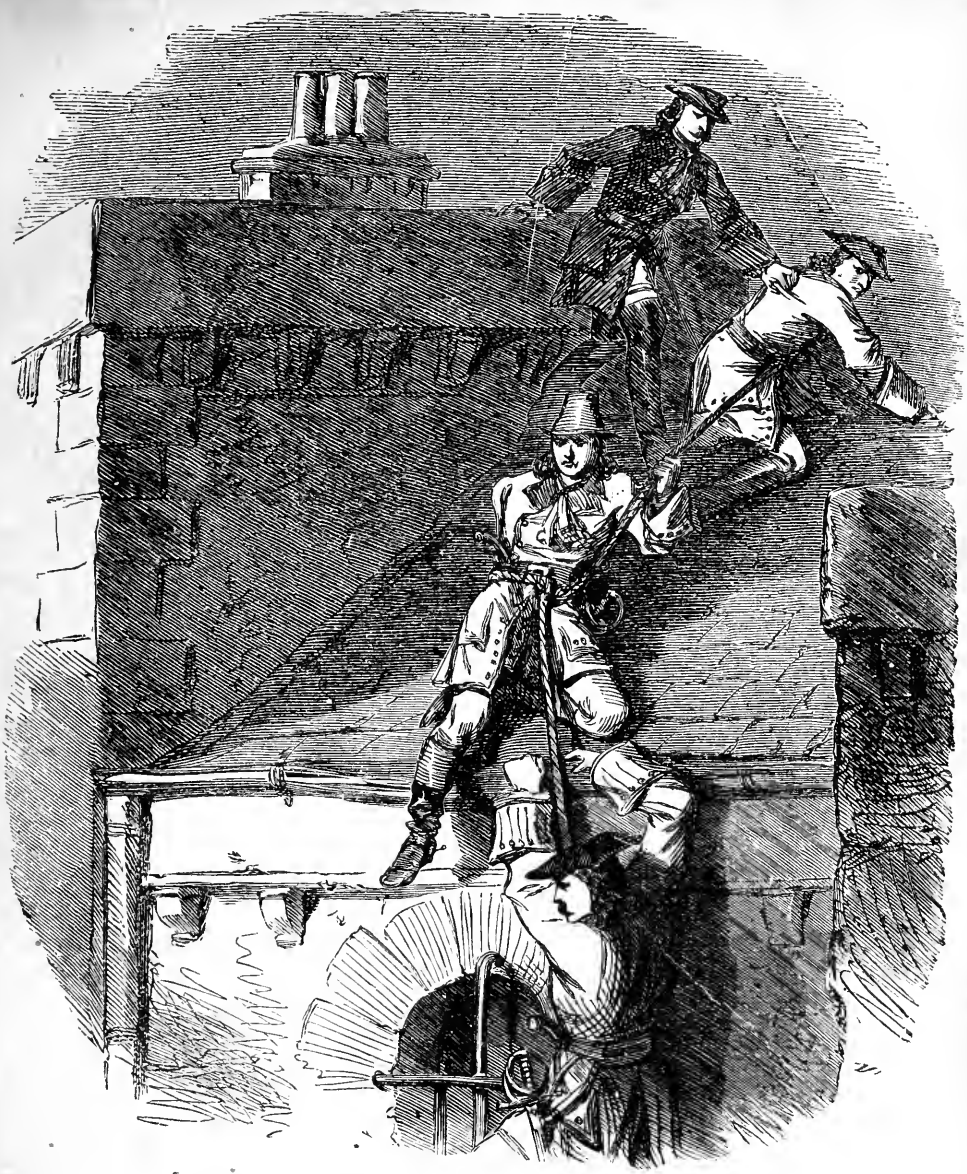
At a gentle rate Black Bess moved off down the lane.

She seemed to be in pain, and appeared to move her joints stiffly, and with difficulty.

Dick himself found his own pains grow worse and worse.

In spite of himself, an exclamation of pain would be wrung, at frequent intervals, from his lips.

Still he continued on his course, but gently; for although he listened with the greatest intentness, he failed to hear the least sound indicating the approach of his enemies.



The fact was, after viewing the bed of the river, and looking up at the height of the bridge above, all had come to the conclusion that the leap must have resulted in death, and that the two bodies had been carried away by the current.

Such being the universal belief, both upon the part of the police officers and the dragoons, they all busied themselves in looking along the banks of the river, and behind jutting fragments of rocks for Dick Turpin and Black Bess, who at that very moment were riding along in comparative safety.

"The risk will be great," said Dick to himself, "but I feel that I cannot travel much farther in my present condition. At all hazards I must stop at the next inn I come to, and have my own wants and those of Black Bess carefully attended to."

Another cry of pain came from his lips, and then he heard suddenly a beating of horses' hoofs.

The riders were evidently a long way off and not by any means in strong numbers

[DICK TURPIN AND HIS FRIENDS ON THE ROOFS OF NEWGATE.]

They were coming towards him, however, that was quite evident, and coming also at a speed at least four times greater than that which he was then making.

"They'll soon overtake me," he muttered, "and I don't care to increase Black Bess's speed. I'll draw aside, and let them pass."

Having come to this determination, Dick drew up close underneath the shadow of a large tree which had many wide-spreading branches.

On came the horsemen with unabated speed.

Gradually, however, as they approached, he fancied their speed relaxed, until at length, to his extreme vexation and alarm, they stopped in the roadway exactly opposite the tree beneath the shadow of which he stood concealed.

This was as awkward an event as could well have been imagined.

That Dick might have escaped the notice of these horsemen had they continued to gallop on, was quite within the bounds of possibility.

Now that they had paused so close, they could scarcely fail to see him, notwithstanding the darkness of the night and the wide-spreading shadow cast by the old tree.

And Dick was not only unable to see any means by which he could extricate himself from his present difficult position, but his pains were so violent that they seemed more than he could bear without giving vent to a cry.

The horses were three in number, and as Dick gazed at them from the shadow, he fancied the forms of the riders were familiar to him.

Their faces he could not see.

He waited anxiously to hear them speak.

But all three of the travellers seemed very much exhausted and out of breath, as though they had ridden hard for a great distance without stopping.

The horses also showed symptoms of distress, and appeared to be quite agreeable to taking a few minute's rest.

"It's quite time we——" said one of the travellers, but he was interrupted before he could get any further.

Dick Turpin no sooner heard the first word uttered, than he recognised the voice.

It was Tom King's.

With a cry, in which surprise, pleasure, and pain were strangely commingled, Dick Turpin rode forward.

"My comrades!" he exclaimed. "Is it possible? How came you here?"

"The captain, by all that's wonderful!" exclaimed the three highwaymen, who were not a little startled by Dick's sudden appearance upon a spot which they perfectly believed was occupied only by themselves.

Their first surprise quickly wore away, however, and, pressing closely round him, they exclaimed:

"This is indeed a lucky chance, Dick! We had almost lost all hope."

"But what has happened that you are here? Why were you in pursuit of me?"

"Because," said Tom, "when you hurried off in that insane sort of way, we felt sure you would not go far without meeting with serious danger."

"I admit," said Turpin, "that I had worked myself up to such a pitch of excitement, that I was scarcely conscious of what I was about."

"We all saw that, and so we resolved to pursue and overtake you if possible; but we lost sight of you in the fog, and were afraid we stood no chance."

"Then how came you here, and why did you stop just opposite that particular tree?"

"I will tell you. Hearing a troop of dragoons on the road behind us, we for safety's sake left the highway and took to the meadows. By this means we eluded them. Then, upon reaching the highway, we judged that you would make your way to London, and therefore resolved to gallop there too."

"Well?"

"We rode hard, and a few minutes ago resolved to pull up for a few moments, as the roadway is dark here, and allow our horses to regain their wind."

"Then our meeting has been brought about by the merest chance?"

"The merest!"

"If you had galloped by I should never have suspected your identity."

"It seems most extraordinary to me," said Claude Duval, "that you should happen to be under that tree just at that particular time!"

"And that you should pause just opposite to it instead of stopping further along the road!"

"It is a chance we must all rejoice at," said Tom King. "But now, Dick, give us your adventures."

In as few words as he could, consistent with being properly understood, Dick Turpin acquainted his comrades with all that had befallen him since their parting, a short time before.

They listened to his account of his dreadful leap from the wooden bridge with breathless wonder.

"We must be doubly cautious!" said Tom King, as soon as the captain had concluded. "Our danger increases! Dragoons and police officers are both abroad to-night, and evidently in quest of us!"

"There is no doubt about that."

"And you may depend that they are in strong numbers, and these are not the only roads they are patrolling!"

"It is through that unfortunate affair of yours, Jack!" said Dick Turpin. "Rest assured Mr. Wriggles has made a tremendous hubbub, and been the means of bringing all these troops out!"

"He is not dead, then?"

"No; I have heard his voice."

"I thought he would survive that ride."

"I have just been thinking," said Dick Turpin, "that all these strange events which have lately fallen out have happened for a wise purpose. In the end, all will be well!"

"What do you mean, captain?"

"I will explain to you as well as I can. But——"

"What?"

"We must repair to some inn close at hand."

"Will it be safe?"

"When I heard you in my rear, I had just made up my mind to do so, and run the risk. I am all bruises and scratches, and very anxious to have my own hurts seen to, as well as those of Black Bess."

"Both are very serious," said Tom King "and must not be neglected. I believe there is a rude place—half cottage, half inn—not far from here, where, doubtless, you will get all that you require, and there will be no necessity for us to stay long; so that there is not much danger after all."

CHAPTER DCXLVI.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES HAVE A LONG AND SERIOUS DISCUSSION, WHICH LEADS TO IMPORTANT AND EXCITING RESULTS.

WHILE speaking these words, Tom King put his horse in motion.

The others followed his example.

A few minutes' ride brought them to the dwelling of which he had spoken, and which answered very well to the description he had given of it.

The inhabitants were not a little surprised to see such a large party ride up to the door, for it was a little frequented spot.

They took charge of the horses gladly, and invited the visitors to enter.

The highwaymen were well enough pleased with the look of the place, for it certainly did not seem likely to be visited or found by their foes.

Although in such acute bodily pain Dick Turpin would insist upon proceeding to the stable and examining his mare.

It was a great relief to his mind to find that her hurts were so trifling as scarcely to be worthy of mention.

A little skin was rubbed off here and there, and one fetlock was badly swelled, but those things would easily be got right in time.

Leaving her at last, with many strict injunctions to the lout who performed the duties of ostler, Dick Turpin retired to the inn.

Although bruised and knocked in many places, none of the hurts were serious enough to require the application of anything more than sticking-plaster, which the landlady of the inn supplied them with.

Dick then dried his clothes, and by this time began to feel tolerably comfortable.

"Now, my friends," he exclaimed, "let us seat ourselves, and I will give you the explanation I mentioned."

They obeyed, and while sipping their glasses, Turpin spoke as follows:

"My comrades," he began, "first of all let me inform you that it is my unalterable determination to set Maud at liberty to-night—at least, to make an attempt at it. Do not shake your heads or say put it off to another time. That will be useless. I go to-night, and I leave you free to accompany me or not."

"But——" said Tom.

"Wait till I have done," said Turpin, interrupting him. "I can't go into the long question about Maud further than this. She is in Newgate, but, if I am alive, she will not be to-morrow morning."

The highwaymen remained silent and made no sign.

"Now, my comrades, I will ask you in one word whether you will accompany me in this enterprise or not? I need not say that I shall be best pleased if you will. You think it is a reckless exposure of life and liberty. If you will listen to me a moment or two longer, however, I shall be able to show you that the expedition is not nearly so dangerous as you imagine it."

"I don't know how you can make that out."

"Shall I try?"

"Yes, by all means."

"Then I will. I must be brief, for the night is going on apace. Well, then, it struck me that your trick upon Wriggles, which at first I thought so adverse to us, would in reality be a great safeguard."

"How so?" asked Jack, in the utmost astonishment.

"In his rage at the manner in which he had been treated, he would raise a great clamour and get all the men out he possibly could, being determined, no doubt, to annihilate us all to-night. He is out himself, I know that, because I heard his unmistakable voice quite distinctly. Now, then, from all this, does it not strike you that the impression among our foes is that Newgate will receive no share of our attention to-night, and, consequently, that it will be less closely guarded than on any succeeding night?"

Some moments elapsed before any reply was made to this speech.

The three highwaymen looked into each other's countenances successively.

It seemed as though they were all ready to say something, but neither liked to speak first.

At length Claude and Sixteen-String Jack looked Tom King in the face and nodded.

"You wish me to speak first?" he said, interrogatively.

"Yes—yes."

"Then I will do so."

"Now, Tom," said Dick Turpin, "bear in mind all that I have said, and let me have your opinion."

Turpin waited anxiously for Tom to speak, for he knew full well that his words would have great weight with his two companions.

"What you say is not altogether without reason," commenced Tom King.

"Bravo!"

"Indeed, the more I consider upon the subject the more does the danger wear off. Whether we are likely to succeed or not I can't say, but of this I am quite certain, that no better night than this could possibly be found if we waited a whole month for it."

Dick sprang forward, and grasped Tom's hand, and shook it warmly.

"You are with me, Tom!" he cried, "and I am glad of it! Now Claude and Jack, what say you?"

"Why, we are with you too, of course!" was the immediate reply. "We only wanted to hear what Tom thought to decide us."

"Well, then, my friends," cried Dick Turpin, "I am heartily glad to think we are once more united. Come on! Do not let us lose any more time, for every moment is precious. On our way to London we can talk over our plans. We are four in number, and it will not be a trifle, I feel assured, that will turn us back."

"You are right. What is the time?"

"Half-past ten."

"It's later than I thought."

"Still the night is young," cried Dick, "and we are in plenty of time to achieve our object. We can get from here to London in something less than half an hour."

"Then we had better start at once."

"Yes; finish up your glasses, and we will be off."

The glasses were emptied, the landlady called in, the reckoning paid, and then the highwaymen went out into the yard to see after their horses.

In a few minutes more they were fairly on the road to London, riding at a swift pace, but yet not so fast as to prevent them from conversing easily with each other.

As they all four bent their attention upon one point, it was not likely that any long time should elapse before one of them would have something to propose that was likely to answer the end in view.

Then an idea, when once started, quickly received suggestions from one and the other, until, in a marvellously short space of time, it grew up to a perfect plan of operations.

What the highwaymen's plans were we will not trouble the reader with.

So much depended upon circumstances over which they had not the slightest control, that it was impossible for all that they proposed to be carried out.

It will be sufficient for us to state that they formed a plan, and what that plan was will be best developed by a description of their actions.

Without meeting with any impediment by the way they managed to get as far as Smithfield Market.

They might now be said to be within sight of their destination.

The night was one exactly suited to their purpose.

The fog, of which we have spoken as being perceptible in the open country, was very much thicker and denser in London.

In Smithfield Market it had settled in one huge, heavy mass.

Few persons were abroad, and the enclosure, with its posts and rails, looked strange and ghost-like.

The highwaymen stopped near the north end of the market, and, standing together as close as their horses would allow them, Dick said, in a low voice:

"Now, my friends, we meet with difficulty the first. What are we to do with our horses?"

"It won't do to proceed any nearer to Newgate with them—that's certain," said Tom King.

"No, we must not venture to take them any nearer, I'm sure. And, now, the question is what are we to do with them?"

"I can think of nothing," said Sixteen-String Jack, "save the plan that I proposed to you some time ago, that one of us should remain in charge of the horses while the other three went to the prison."

"And who would be the one that would like to be left behind? Not you, Jack, I am sure."

"No, I should not; but it strikes me some one will be obliged to stay."

Just at that moment, the figure of a man came creeping towards them through the fog.

Owing to the darkness, and to being closely occupied in conversation, the highwaymen did not observe the approach of this man until he was close to them.

Then, suddenly, to their great surprise, he bounded forward, and cried, in delighted yet suppressed tones:

"Come at last, captain—come at last! I knew you would come, if I only had the patience to wait for you! Come at last!"

These words were addressed to Dick Turpin, and took him by surprise, as well as his companions.

The man seemed to be a friend, and yet Turpin did not recognise him.

This was strange, for the highwayman's memory was not overburdened with the recollection of friends.

Yet there was something familiar in the man's voice which seemed to carry him a long way back to the scene of early adventures.

"Who are you?" said Dick, speaking rather sternly. "Be careful! Who are you, I say?"

"Why, captain, don't you know me? Have you forgotten all about—about Jabez?"

"Jabez?"

"Yes; from Tom Davis's, at the Hand and Keys. You know all about it."

"And I know you," said Dick; "and am heartily glad to see you. You could not have presented yourself at a more welcome moment. Why you should expect me to appear anywhere about this spot I can't imagine!"

"I'll explain that to you directly, captain. You see, the other day I happened to meet with my old master. He looked a deal more cheerful than he had done for many a day, and I pretty soon found out what was the reason. It was because you had found him out, and taken him in hand—bless you for it!"

"Well—well."

"And I heard who was in the Stone Jug yonder; so I thought to myself that one of these nights you would be coming here and taking her out, in spite of the police; so ever since that night I have been watching about, first in one part, and then in another, hoping to catch sight of you, thinking I might be useful."

"You are a faithful fellow, Jabez; and you shall be well rewarded for to-night's work!"

"Thank you, captain! I shall be glad to receive something from you, for I have been very badly off lately; in fact, I seemed to go down along with the old inn."

"That will all be altered very soon," said Dick. "You have come just at the right moment; we want you to take charge of our horses for a couple of hours, or, maybe, longer."

"I'll do that for you, never fear. I've done it before, and you need not feel frightened in the least, or trouble your head about them at all while they're in my charge."

"I know that, Jabez—I have every confidence in you; so I sha'n't ask you what you are going to do with them, or where you are going to take them, but shall dismount and leave them in your hands."

"Very good, captain."

"But have you any information that you can give us about the police officers? Perhaps you can furnish us with a hint or two that will turn out of value?"

"I don't know that I can, captain. I can only say that you have got a very difficult and dangerous job before you, and you must take very great care, for, since I have been here, the officers have been in very strong numbers keeping guard all round about the prison."

"And are they here to-night?"

"Oh, no doubt of it."

"As many as usual?"

"I should think so."

"Have you seen them?"

"No, captain, I have not seen any to-night, and that's what makes me think that things are just in the same position as they have been for more than a week."

"Well, good-bye, Jabez!" said Dick Turpin, handing the reins of Black Bess into the faithful fellow's hand. "We shall be back here in not less than two hours; how much longer I cannot possibly tell; but be sure that you are here when we do come back."

"Oh, never fear!"

"And take care of the horses."

"I say again don't trouble yourself in the least about 'em—don't think about 'em!"

"I will not," said Turpin, and as he spoke he gave Jabez several silver coins.

Then, drawing their cloaks closely around them, the four highwaymen stole swiftly across Smithfield Market, and quickly disappeared in the maze of courts and alleys that lay near St. Bartholomew's Hospital.

CHAPTER DCXLVII.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMPANIONS MEET WITH STILL FURTHER SUCCESS IN THE PROSECUTION OF THEIR ENTERPRISE.

Dick Turpin and his companions strode onwards in silence, until suddenly the former paused.

They were standing just within the mouth of a court branching off from the north side of Newgate Street.

But before they ventured to emerge, Dick looked carefully up and down, but seeing nothing to excite his alarm, he left the court, and walked up the street in the direction of St. Paul's.

His comrades followed.

Presently he crossed over to the south side of the street, and, keeping the houses on his left hand, stepped forward slowly.

He was reconnoitring.

Where the police officers had disposed themselves, he could not tell.

Certain it is not one of them was visible in Newgate Street.

At length, when very near to the old prison, Dick turned down a very narrow, unsavoury court.

This led, by a devious and circuitous route, to Newgate Market.

It also worked its way round to the back of the prison.

"We shall find either watchmen or police officers here, you may depend," said Dick, in a whisper, to his comrades. "Wait here a minute where you are. I'll step forward and reconnoitre. It will not be so dangerous as for all four of us to go at once."

This was assented to.

Dick looked about him rapidly and cautiously.

At last he found what he sought.

Then, having satisfied himself by glancing round that no one was watching, he beckoned his companions to approach.

They obeyed.

"Do you see that house?" he said, pointing out one from the rest—"I mean that which is built quite against the prison wall, and has a white stone coping?"

"Yes—yes!"

"Well, then, it seems to me that is the house to suit our purpose."

"Very likely. But it's a long way from the top of that house to the top of the wall."

"How far?"

"Twenty feet."

"Yes, it's quite that, perhaps a trifle more."

"And shall we be able to climb up that wall like so many flies?"

"Well, not exactly; but I think, if we can manage to obtain a good strong rope with a hook at the end of it, and then get on the top of that house, we should be able to throw the hook upwards until it caught upon the revolving spikes at the top of the wall; then, by the aid of the rope, we could draw ourselves up without much difficulty."

"But the rope—where shall we get that?"

"I ought to have thought of that before. I can't imagine how I happened to forget it."

"It seems it cannot be dispensed with."

"No—without you can devise some other means of getting within the boundary of the prison."

"I think there cannot be an easier."

"Then if we only knew where to find Jabez, he would get us out of the difficulty pretty quick. Suppose you three conceal yourselves among some of these old sheds, while I, as cautiously as I can, go over to Smithfield Market again, and try to find Jabez?"

"There's no need for you to go, captain."

"I think I had better. I look upon this excursion as entirely one of my own; and besides, I fancy I should succeed with Jabez better than either of you. He would know me in an instant."

"Good! Return as quickly as you can—you will find us somewhere near this place."

With these words, Turpin departed.

His heart was filled with much greater confidence than it had been up to the present time, and he stepped along the street quite boldly.

It did not take him many minutes to reach Smithfield, and to his agreeable surprise as soon as he reached the old spot he was greeted by Jabez.

"Why, captain," he cried, "what brings you back so soon?"

"I want your assistance, Jabez."

"That's right, I thought you did—blest if I didn't! But after I took the horses to a place where I knew they would be taken care of I came back here to watch, for I thought you might come for something or other."

"It turns out a very lucky thing as it happens," said Dick. "I want you to go somewhere and purchase a long, strong, thick rope."

"As strong and as thick as I can get, I suppose?"

"Yes, it may have to bear a good weight to-night, and it would be awkward if it gave way."

"I'll see to it, captain—I'll see to it. Only give me the money, and I'll be back with the rope directly."

"Stay, I want something more."

"What?"

"A strong iron hook to fix at the end of the rope—a kind of grapnel, so that when I throw it upwards it may lay right hold of anything—you understand?"

"I know all about it, captain. Is there anything more you want?"

Dick paused, and then recollecting in the course of the expedition he might require various other articles, and that the present was a capital opportunity of obtaining them, he gave Jabez several other commissions.

"Now, captain, you sit down there on that rail and don't say a word to anybody while I am gone; I sha'n't be very long away, and I'll bring you the things wrapped up in a neat little parcel."

With these words he hurried off, and was almost instantly lost in the fog, which appeared to increase in density every hour.

Dick seated himself upon a damp and crumbling wooden rail and looked about him.

But the night was too unpleasant a one for people to be abroad, and he believed that he should escape all interruption.

Then he heard the bell of St. Paul's chime the half-hour.

"That's half-past eleven," he said. "Time flies quickly—I must make haste, for there's yet a great deal to do."

Jabez was only absent for a very few minutes, and yet the time seemed endless to Dick.

At last he had the pleasure of seeing him returning, carrying a stout parcel.

"There are the things, captain, put them under your cloak, and I hope you will make good use of them. I have ventured to add one or two things myself that I thought of."

"I shall find a use for all of them, no doubt," said Turpin.

"Are you sure, captain," asked Jabez, "that I can't come with you and help you?"

"Yes—you will render me service ten times as valuable by having the horses on this spot just when we come here for them, and want to ride off."

"They shall be here, captain—I pledge you my life they shall be here!"

Dick was quite satisfied with this assurance, and so, with all the necessary implements for his enterprise in his possession, turned round and hurried off again towards Newgate Market.

He reached the wooden shed in which his three companions were concealed, without raising the least alarm.

"Is that you, captain?" they asked.

"Yes. Is all well?"

"Quite well; there has not been a mouse stirring since your departure."

So saying, Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack came forward.

"Here is this parcel," said Turpin, "that contains the rope and some other articles. I fancy we had better divide it amongst us here, and then, afterwards pay a visit to yonder house."

"Agreed. But, Dick——"

"What?"

"Have you thought of how we are to gain admission to that house without creating an alarm?"

"No, I have not; but it must be done somehow. It is to be hoped that the inmates are few in number."

"But that's all chance."

"So is our whole adventure. Come on—follow me! The only thing that I can tell you is: observe my movements narrowly, and follow me up closely in all I do."

His three comrades promised compliance.

Dick then led the way towards the house he had pointed out.

As the first step it was necessary he should get on the roof of it without creating any alarm; but how he was to do this seemed a mystery.

With various thoughts chasing each other through his brain, he strode on until the door of the house was reached.

Then, raising the knocker, he allowed it to fall again, producing a dull, heavy dab.

"Stand aside," he said, in a whisper, to his companions, "so that your forms are concealed in the shade. When the door opens and I enter, follow me closely in and shut the door after you."

Dick had scarcely time to speak these words before the door opened.

An untidy-looking little girl, carrying a guttering candle in her hand, made her appearance at the door.

In an instant Dick Turpin darted in, and his companions kept just behind him.

With one sudden movement of his hand, he extinguished the light, and, before the frightened girl had time to recover from her astonishment, he put one hand before her mouth in such an effectual way as to stop all possibility of outcry, and the other round her waist.

"Now," said Dick, in a whisper, "be quiet, and pray to yourself for your life to be saved, for it is in greater danger than ever it was before!"

The girl made several convulsive movements with her arms and legs in reply to this speech.

No doubt, could she have succeeded in getting her mouth at liberty, she would have uttered a good loud scream.

But that was impossible.

"Stand still!" cried Dick—"stand still! or it will be the worse for you!"

In the meanwhile, the other highwaymen having entered closed the door, and hastily shot a couple of bolts into their sockets.

"Now, Tom," cried Turpin, "be quick! Bind this girl! Don't hurt her, but we must for our own sakes, keep her prisoner for a little while."

This command was executed with great speed.

But before they had time to arrange their proceedings any further, a voice came from the basement of the house.

"Maria—Maria!" it said, in shrill, piping tones. "What is the matter, you jade? Who is it? Why don't you speak, you little wretch?"

Maria was silent for the best of reasons.

Then a footstep was heard upon the stairs, and the next moment, although the place was dark, the highwaymen managed to make out a dusky-looking form some little distance off down the passage.

"Maria," said the shrill voice again, "where are you?—what are you doing? I know you brought a candle with you, but where is it? Oh, you young hussy, wait till I catch you!"

So saying, the speaker came on until she was close to the spot where our friends were standing.

They then seized her immediately, bound her securely, and placed a gag in her mouth.

All this was done silently, speedily and well; nevertheless, not without some slight noise being made—quite sufficient to attract the attention of the other inmates of the dwelling, or, at anyrate to reach their ears, if they were trying to make out what was going on.

"Wait," said Dick—"wait a moment! We shall have some one else here directly. Silence!"

The three highwaymen stood profoundly still, then another voice from the depths below exclaimed:

"Jane—Jane! Oh, you villainous old wretch! where are you? What's the meaning of all this? Oh, you won't answer, won't you? Well, then, I'll come upstairs, if I have got the lumbago in my back, and see if I don't pretty soon make you!"

After the utterance of this threat, a slow and heavy footstep could be heard ascending the wooden stairs.

And then another form appeared in the passage.

It was that of an old man, doubtless the husband of the woman who had made her appearance a short time before.

"Oh, dear! Oh, curse this lumbago—it almost pulls me to the ground! Never mind, you old wretch, you shall have it, for all that! Where are you? You had better speak!"

All remained profoundly silent.

The old man thereupon appeared to grow very frightened—to think it strange that the girl and his wife should both be gone upstairs and never come down again.

He was just about thinking of making his retreat, when he felt himself suddenly seized by someone.

A cry rose to his lips.

But he could not utter it, for a hand was at that very instant thrust roughly before his lips.

Then, in the twinkling of an eye almost, he was securely bound, and placed along with the other two.

CHAPTER DCXLVIII.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES MEET WITH AN ALARM.

"WAIT a moment," said Dick Turpin. "I question whether we have caught them all yet; perhaps some one else will come if we only have patience, and then our task will be all the easier."

The highwaymen waited.

But the silence that prevailed in the house remained unbroken.

No other sound of footsteps reached their ears, and at length they came to the conclusion that no others were below.

How many inhabitants the house might contain they had no means whatever of knowing.

Let them be ever so many, they certainly had not been alarmed by the slight scuffling that had taken place.

By the directions of the captain, Sixteen-String Jack cautiously displayed a lantern, the light of which flashed quickly all round about him, in order that they might as much as possible make themselves familiar with the kind of place they were in.

Doors opened from both sides of the passage, and selecting one of these, Dick turned the handle, pushed it open, and entered.

The apartment beyond was in profound darkness.

Sixteen-String Jack followed, however; and by the aid of the dark lantern they saw that the chamber was rudely furnished as a kind of parlour or sitting-room.

The three tightly-bound forms were dragged in and placed upon the floor.

Then the door was closed, and Dick, turning the key in the lock, withdrew it and placed it in his pocket.

The other rooms on the ground floor they judged to be unoccupied, for the doors were all secure.

"Now, then," said Dick—"now is the time to reach the top of this house! Yet stay—this is the only door that is left, and we may as well secure that like the rest."

The door to which Dick Turpin alluded was the one communicating with the lower portion of the house.

This he quickly bolted, and then the whole party ascended the staircase with great swiftness and silence.

As soon as they reached the first-floor landing they paused

But here all was silent as the very grave itself.

Whether there were people occupying the rooms which opened from it they could not tell.

If so, they must be asleep, or, at any rate, unconscious of the struggle that had taken place in the passage.

Dick Turpin did not speak, but contented himself with simply pointing up the next flight.

The movement was understood, and they followed him with alacrity.

The third storey of the house consisted of a couple of large attics, which occupied a space immediately beneath the tiles.

The first attic door, before which they paused, was fast.

Dick ascertained it by raising the latch.

The noise he made was slight in the extreme, and yet evidently it sufficed to attract the attention of some one within, for a voice cried out, in tremulous accents:

"Who—who is there? Who are you? What do you want?"

"Now," said Dick, turning to his comrades, "here we are, as I might say, on the very roof of the house. We have managed to get so far without much trouble, and we must not now turn back because there's some one in this room."

"No, no—certainly not."

"Then I'll force the door. You follow me into the room, and bind whoever it is instantly. When we depart we will set them at liberty."

The attic door was old and frail, so that Turpin had really very little difficulty in forcing it.

He just placed his thumb on the latch and his shoulder against one of the panels, and it gave way at once.

"Aha!" said a voice loudly, exultingly—"you are foiled—foiled again! You shall never take me while I have life! Follow me, and try it on if you will!"

As soon as the door opened, the highwaymen all rushed into the room; and the first object that met their gaze was the form of a man in the act of scrambling through the attic window on to the tiles.

He turned and spoke just as he got outside, and, with the last words upon his lips, he disappeared.

The highwaymen exchanged glances.

"I wonder who he can be?" said Claude.

"That doesn't matter," returned Dick. "My only concern is whether he will be the means of raising an alarm, and attracting attention, not only to himself, but to us. He evidently takes us for officers of justice."

"Something like it."

"Well, he's gone, and I hope that's the last we shall hear of him."

As rapidly as possible, all four made their way to the window, and looked out.

A perfect mass of roofs and chimney-pots, of all sorts, sizes, and colours, met their view.

They looked long and anxiously in the direction the man had taken, but were unable to see the least signs of him.

"I believe he has gone," said Dick. "And, now, if it happens that there is no one in the adjoining attic, why, then we are all right!"

"Is it worth while to go and see?"

"Yes, I think so. It would be a great satisfaction to know that we had nothing to dread on that score. Come!"

Dick Turpin, as he spoke, led the way to the other attic.

To the relief of all, they found it was untenanted.

"Now," asked Tom King, "what is it we are to do next? Get out upon the roofs?"

"Yes; and from thence make our way on to the top of Newgate."

"And this house—shall you leave any guard in it, or let it guard itself?"

"Let it guard itself, I think, for I cannot spare one of you. Wait a moment, however. Before we leave it altogether, let us go to the foot of the stairs, and listen."

His proposal was at once adopted.

No sooner, however, did they lean over the banisters, than the sharp tinkling of a bell somewhere far down below reached their ears.

Then there came some loud and heavy knocks upon the front door.

The highwaymen looked at each other with some degree of apprehension.

"Who is that?" they asked.

Tinkle—tinkle went the bell again, with redoubled violence.

Then again ensued the tremendous knocking.

"What is to be done?" asked Tom King. "This is a difficulty I never once thought of taking into account."

"No; nor I," said Dick, stroking his chin. "It's awkward!"

"Very."

"Do you think——"

"What?"

"That those who are knocking and ringing in that furious style——Dear me, hark at that, they'll break the bell-wire if they try such a pull as that again!"

Tom was interrupted in what he was about to say by a great increase in the loudness of the sound of the bell.

"I wish they would break it," cried Dick, "or go away and leave us! Confound it, what did they want to come interrupting us in this fashion for?"

"I am sadly afraid," said Claude Duval, "that although we have been so uncommonly careful, we have been observed by some of the police officers and tracked to this spot. They have mustered their forces outside, and are now insisting upon admission."

Dick Turpin knew full well that this was far from being unlikely, yet he did not like to discourage his comrades by saying that he thought Claude's supposition was in all probability a correct one.

"Something must be done," said Dick, "there is no doubt about that!"

"But what?"

"Why, these people outside, whoever they may be, must be admitted or got rid of somehow, otherwise general attention will be directed to this house, the result of which will be that we shall be discovered."

"Exactly so, and I only wish that the matter could be adjusted as easily as it can be talked about."

"Wait a moment," said Dick. "I think I can at least ascertain what kind of people they are outside, and how many."

"Do you mean whether they are police officers or not?"

"Yes."

"Well, it will be something to know that. Hark, there goes the bell again—they are getting desperately impatient."

In the meanwhile Dick Turpin hurried into one of the attics which had its window situated in the front of the house.

He opened it instantly, and, scrambling out on to the roof, stood in the gutter and looked over the parapet.

The darkness was most intense, but notwithstanding he managed to make out the forms of two or three people standing near the front door of the house.

From the position they occupied it would seem that they had stepped into the roadway a few yards in order to look up at the front of the habitation, thinking, perhaps, to understand from its appearance why it was no attention was paid to their appeal.

Having seen this, Dick waited for no more, but hastily withdrew himself and returned to the attic.

"I think we can manage it," he said, addressing his companions. "Follow me downstairs again."

They obeyed.

But not very willingly.

Reaching the ground-floor, Dick took the key out of his pocket and opened the door of the room in which he had placed his three prisoners.

He went up to the girl, and, in a stern, terrific voice, said:

"Now, then, which do you prefer to do—to obey every word of my commands or to die this instant? Take your choice—it is quite indifferent to me!"

As the girl was gagged, she could not speak, but, nevertheless, she looked imploringly into the highwayman's countenance, and her eyes expressed as well as they could that she infinitely preferred obeying him to losing her life.

This was no more than Dick expected, and he at once made a sign to his companions to release her.

He then led her out into the passage, and whispered in her ear.

"Did you hear that knocking and ringing at the door?"

"Yes—yes, sir."

"Do you know who it is?"

"No, sir, I don't; I'm sure—I'm sure I don't! I suppose, though, it's somebody wants to see master."

"Very well, then. Now I am going to let you open the door and speak to whoever is there; but mind how you attempt to play me false!"

"Yes, sir. Oh dear, I wouldn't think of doing anything of the kind!"

"Mind you don't! I see there's a chain to the front door, and you can place it so that the door can only be pushed open a certain distance and no further. Now, if those outside inquire for anybody, no matter who, say they are not at home, and your master and mistress either, and that you have been left in the house with strict orders not to admit anybody until they return!"

"I will, sir—I will! But what will they say to me for not answering the door before?"

"Why, pretend to be very frightened; say that the noise terrified you. Now, then, go to the door and ask who is there!"

From the manner in which the girl placed herself under Dick's direction, it was pretty certain that she would obey all his commands.

With a great amount of confidence, therefore, he stood close to her, and in low, trembling tones, which were just the thing for the occasion, she asked:

"Who is there?"

"Then there is someone at home after all, it seems!" said a voice outside. "Why on earth didn't you come before?"

"What do you want?" asked the girl.

"Open the door, will you?" was the reply, "and don't keep us chattering here!"

The girl withdrew the bolts, and no sooner had she done so than the door was thrust violently open.

But the chain which Dick had seen, and which he had properly placed, would not permit the door to open to any great extent.

"You thought of coming in in a hurry, didn't you?" said the girl.

"You young jade!" said the voice outside. "Where's your master? Wait till I see him again, and I'll give you your character! Where is he, I say?"

"Master's out," said the girl.

"Out? Well, that's odd—confoundedly odd, after asking all three of us to come here and see him this blessed evening! Gone out, is he?"

"Yes, and missus has gone out too, and everybody else in the house except me, and they have left me here to take care of it, and told me I wasn't to let anyone in till they came back."

A hurried kind of consultation went on outside for a minute or two, and then the same voice which had hitherto spoken, exclaimed:

"Well, my girl, I don't know what you were doing, but you were not paying attention to the door when we rang, that's certain. However, tell your master that we called according to appointment. And thought it very strange to find him away from home."

These words closed the conversation.

The disappointed visitors walked away, and Dick Turpin, rapidly closing the door, shot the bolts into their sockets again.

CHAPTER DCXLIX.

DICK TURPIN, TOM KING, AND CLAUDE DUVAL SUCCEED IN GAINING THE ROOFS OF NEWGATE.

"That danger is over, and I breathe more freely now," said Dick Turpin, as he joined his companions. "Come on, my friends, I don't think we shall have anything else to fear in the shape of an interruption."

"We hope not, captain."

"So do I."

"But what are you going to do with that girl?"

"We won't leave her down here," said Dick, after a minute's pause. "I will take her up into one of the attics."

The old man and the old woman were therefore left to their own company in the room into which they had been so unceremoniously thrust, and the girl was made to accompany the highwaymen to the top of the house.

Upon reaching the attic, they again bound her and placed her in a chair.

Then going to the window, they one by one got out upon the tiles.

The roof was steep and slippery, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that they managed to maintain their footholds.

As soon as ever they got out into the gutter close to the parapet, they were all right.

The four quickly stood together, and then, following the direction of Turpin's finger, they saw close before them, and, reaching to a great height above their heads, the black, gloomy, frowning walls of the prison of Newgate.

"It will be no easy task to scale that," said Tom King, looking up at it.

"Yet it must be done," said Turpin. "Here is the rope, and now the only question is, are we strong enough to throw it over the wall? If so, it will catch in those iron spikes as we draw it back, and remain secure. Then to climb up the rope will be tolerably easy."

"We can but try, Dick," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"I will try myself first," said Dick. As he spoke, he arranged the rope in a convenient coil in his left hand, while in his right he held the hook.

He swung his arm backwards and forwards several moments, until he imagined he had gained sufficient impetus.

Then, fixing his eyes upon the summit of the wall, he let go.

The hook flew up in the air, and such was the force with which it was thrown that it drew the rope after it easily.

But instead of falling completely over the wall, as Dick had hoped, the iron hook only struck against the outer edge of it.

The stonework afforded no hold, and so down it fell with even greater rapidity than it had ascended.

The strong iron hook falling upon the tiles made a prodigious clatter, which alarmed the highwaymen not a little.

They all started violently, looked about them, and listened, as though they expected that an alarm would be the immediate result.

But as minute after minute passed away, they grew more assured and comforted.

"It won't do to have that happen often, Dick," said Tom King, "and yet it was a first-rate throw; the least bit more, and the thing would have been done."

"You try, Tom, this time," said Dick, handing him the rope.

"Nay, I would prefer letting Claude try first. Here, Claude, you are strong and have performed such a feat as this before to-day—up with it!"

"I don't know whether I can manage that, Tom," was the reply, "but I'll try my best."

Claude seized the hook, and, not without a great deal of trouble, managed to place himself in a position that exactly suited him.

Then, much in the same manner as Dick had done, he hurled the hook upwards.

But all saw that the piece of iron had been thrown with much greater skill and strength than before.

Up into the air it went, rising at least a foot above the iron spikes that garnished the top of the wall, and then falling clearly down on the inner side.

His comrades could scarcely refrain giving utterance to a faint hurrah.

The hook struck, with an audible clink, against the inner side of the wall.

They waited a moment or two in silence, so that any alarm which might have been raised by the slight sound should pass away.

And then, with beating hearts and trembling fingers, they began to draw the rope.

Suddenly, when it reached the top, their suspense arrived at a climax.

It was by no means certain that the hook would be turned in such a manner as to take firm hold of any one of the spikes.

It might slip completely through them, or it might in only a partial hold, and fall once more heavily upon the tiles.

This fear was soon put an end to.

The rope was drawn tighter and tighter still, until at last it was as strong as if it had been secured to an anchor.

"All's well!" cried Dick. "We have conquered one great difficulty. Now, however, don't pause, my comrades. Up—up with you; the sooner we are on the other side of this wall the better it will be for us!"

As he spoke, Turpin commenced to ascend.

"You had better allow me to reach the top first," he said, "for fear the rope should not bear our united weight, and 'tis best not to strain it too much at first."

This was assented to, and, with great nimbleness, Dick Turpin, assisted in some slight degree by the stone wall, climbed up the rope, and at length seated himself by the side of the iron spikes.

His three comrades then ascended in succession.

The top of this wall was an excellent place so far as obtaining an extensive view of the prison was concerned, and for quite a minute our friends did nothing but gaze intently around them.

Then Dick Turpin began to haul up the rope.

"It won't do for us to sit here on this wall a moment longer," he said, "because of the great danger of being seen. Our forms would show out clearly and distinctly against the light sky to anyone who happened to be below."

"Which way do you want to go? Do you know whereabouts Maud's cell is situated?"

"Yes, I do; I can point it out easily. That is to say, without they have made any exception in her favour, which I don't suppose they have done. Look down yonder to the right. Do you see that piece of building with a number of small windows all looking out into that open yard?"

"Yes—yes."

"Well, those are the windows of the condemned cells, and I suppose we may safely take it that she is in one of them."

"It will be very difficult to get at them, Dick," said Claude.

"It will; and yet I think, if you will call the details of my plan to mind, there is a strong probability of our being able to do it."

Claude said no more, and Dick Turpin secured the rope to the iron spikes.

He had to do this in a peculiar manner, for, after he and his comrades had descended by its aid on to the roofs below, it would be necessary for him to shake the rope and thus disengage the hook at the top of the wall.

He allowed his friends to slip down first, and then followed them.

He was pleased to find that the first shake of the rope was quite sufficient to displace the hook.

They expected it to fall, so that Sixteen-String Jack was lucky enough to catch the piece of iron in his hat.

By this means any alarm was prevented.

They were now upon a portion of the roof of the prison which rose up and down in sharp angles, and which consequently made it very difficult for them to creep over and retain their footing.

For the most part the roof was composed of lead, and the smooth, metal surface afforded neither hand nor foothold.

Then the consequences of a slip or a false step were something terrible to think of.

The mischief would not end with the death of the person who was so unfortunate as to lose his hold, but the falling of his body on the stones in the court-yard would immediately create an alarm that would probably cause the destruction of the others.

In the face of these circumstances a discussion was held.

At last it was proposed that the long rope, which had already done them such good service, should be again brought into requisition.

For the convenience of climbing, it had been knotted in many places; and now the highwaymen proceeded to tie it round their waists in such a manner that they were all connected by it.

This made their difficult task much easier, because if one should happen to slip he could be recovered by his companions.

At length they came to the last piece of sloping roof.

A few feet below them was the top of another part of the building.

This roof was flat.

"We must drop," said Dick Turpin, who was first. "I don't think there will be much danger."

"Still," said Tom King, who was next to him, "if there should happen to be anyone in a chamber just underneath that part of the roof upon which you are going to fall, they will hear the noise, and suspect something is amiss."

"That's true enough."

"I fancy you will be able to lower yourself by the aid of the rope until your feet touch the roof. Then I will follow, then Claude; Sixteen-String Jack will be last; but then we might catch him, and so prevent the slightest noise."

This was a good suggestion, and immediately carried into execution.

Scarcely, however, had they reached this lower roof, than Dick Turpin, who had crawled to the edge and looked down into the yard below, said, in a whisper:

"Silence—silence! Don't speak again above your breath!"

"What is it?"

"Come here and look!"

Cautiously and silently his companions obeyed.

Looking down, they found they commanded a view of one of the court-yards in the prison.

The ground was no very great depth, and, in spite of the darkness, to which their eyes were well accustomed, they could see distinctly.

Some half-dozen men, marching in order like soldiers, headed by one who carried a lighted lantern, were the first objects that met the view of our friends, and upon which they riveted their attention.

Evidently these men were warders or turnkeys, engaged upon the double duty of making a round of the prison to see that all was well, and to relieve those other officers whose term of duty had expired.

The highwaymen drew their heads back, so that only just the upper portion of them appeared above the top of the parapet; for they were fearful that the men below might raise their heads and look up, when they would be in serious danger of being seen.

That danger, however, passed away.

The party of men, having in a careless way walked across the yard and looked about them, being satisfied that all was well, passed through a little doorway, and immediately disappeared.

There was a moment's silence among the highwaymen after their departure, and then Tom King inquired:

"Well, Dick, what is it we are to do next?"

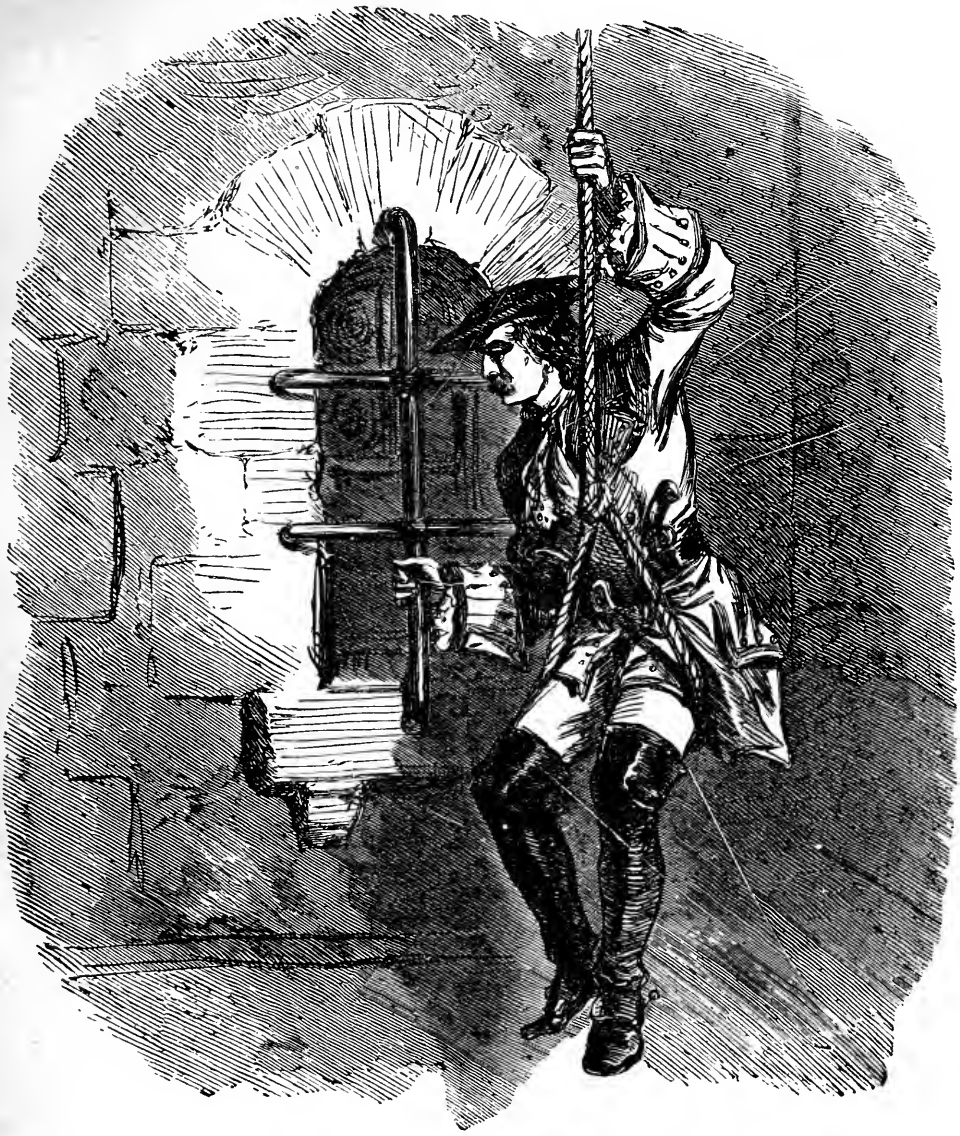
"Hush! I think we had better remain just as we are for a few minutes longer. It strikes me we shall see those men returning in a little while."

"Then, if you have any idea of that sort," said Claude, "we are certainly much better where we are."

Several minutes anxiously passed, during which our friends busied themselves by looking at every object that surrounded them.

The silence was unbroken, and there seemed no signs of the return of the guard of men.

"I think we might risk it," said Dick—"they don't seem to be coming"



"As you will; I am inclined to think myself that they would go back by some other route instead of passing over the same ground twice. Now, Dick, what is it we have next to do?"

"Why, my comrades, as I can explain to you, this portion of the building contains the condemned cells; they are beneath this roof, and the windows are below us."

"Yes, we understand all that."

"Well, then, remove the rope from your waists and hand it to me. I will then show you the next thing to be done."

The highwaymen hastened to obey this command, and then, when Dick Turpin received the rope, they watched his movements with great curiosity and interest.

CHAPTER DCL.

RELATES THE EVENTS WHICH TOOK PLACE UPON THE ROOFS OF NEWGATE.

THE position of the gallant little band upon the roofs of the prison of Newgate was no less peculiar than it was perilous.

Who would have believed that they would have had the temerity to thrust themselves, as one might say, into the very jaws of danger?

Yet there they were, all four of them—four men, the aggregate reward for whose apprehension verged closely upon the enormous sum of three thousand pounds!

And they were there, hemmed in on all sides by their enemies, and for what?

Simply because they would not allow their captain to incur the whole danger of this expedition himself.

Terrible as the danger was, they had preferred to share it to allowing him to go alone.

And the captain's object was—as the reader knows full well—to rescue Maud from that gloomy cell in which she had been so unjustly immured.

Truly was this a powerful incentive to do all—to dare all. At least, it was with Dick, for he could not forget who Maud was, and what she had sacrificed for his sake.

Surely, if she had done so much for him, and so willingly, he ought at least to free her from that disagreeable position which she would never have known but for her connection with him.

This was the way in which Dick looked at the matter.

Viewing the case as calmly and dispassionately as he could, he was not able to perceive that there was the slightest probability of the occurrence of a more favourable opportunity than the present.

True, his enemies expected that this was what he was most likely to do.

True, that they were on the watch for him at every point.

Not only was the exterior of the prison so well watched and guarded, but within additional precautions were taken.

Under the directions of Mr. Cawthorn—whose faith in the excellence of Mr. Wriggles's clever scheme was only slightly shaken—the round of the prison was made at much more frequent intervals than had ever been known before.

But more especially was a watch kept upon Maud's cell.

Still, all their trouble had up to this night resulted in nothing.

At first, when the matter was partially explained to the men, they were all eagerness and anxiety.

Everyone was preternaturally vigilant, and, although several nights elapsed without the occurrence of any unusual incident, they relaxed none of their watchfulness.

Unquestionably, had Dick Turpin made an attempt to free Maud within a week after the time when she was taken prisoner, he would have failed utterly, and the capture of his comrades and himself would have followed as a matter of course.

It may be considered fortunate, therefore, that circumstances presented the aspect they did, and also that Turpin should have submitted to the calm judgment of his friends.

Had he done otherwise, his doom would have been sealed, his destruction certain.

But, as may easily be understood, this preternatural and unremitting vigilance on the part of the turnkeys and warders rapidly wore itself out.

When they began to find that all their trouble went for nothing, they insensibly but surely relapsed into their old careless state.

That is to say, they did their duty as a mere matter of duty, and no more.

In a mechanical way they went their rounds, glancing round them all the time, but principally intent upon getting the business over as soon as possible, in order that they might rejoin their companions in the room specially set aside for their accommodation.

The same thing might also be said of those without.

Moreover, the story of the manner in which Mr. Wriggles had been treated had got abroad already, with many exaggerations, as a matter of course.

Very little sympathy was felt for him.

His domineering, violent ways had not made him many friends among his subordinates, and, to speak plain truth, they were rather pleased than otherwise with his discomfiture.

The general impression, however, that was produced by the event was, that upon that night at least the highwaymen would make no attempt upon the prison.

It was judged that they would be too much alarmed at their own actions.

This belief was much strengthened by the proceedings that had been taken.

Mr. Wriggles—whose rage was really and truly ungovernable—had for once made the utmost use of the power he possessed.

Every police officer who could possibly be spared was ordered to mount and ride off in hot pursuit.

Mr. Wriggles obtained permission from the proper authorities to call out the military, and the troops of light horse quartered in the metropolis were made good use of.

Considering that such energetic steps as these were taken, it was no more than reasonable to suppose that the four highwaymen would have rather more than they could do to look after their own safety, and certainly no opportunity of entering Newgate.

Anyone acquainted with the particulars would have been just of the same opinion.

We have seen that our friends, and Turpin especially, had a very narrow escape indeed.

We have been thus explicit—even at the risk of being tedious—in order that the reader should not be so far carried away by the whirl of events as not thoroughly to understand the aspect of affairs.

But, from what we have just stated, the conclusion may be drawn that Dick's foes, on this particular and eventful night, so far from being keenly on the look-out, were lulled into a state of false security.

Disbelieving that any attack would be made or attempted, they made themselves as comfortable as they could, for, after the extra duty of the last few days, it was positively a great relief to enjoy a little rest.

Therefore all conspired to favour the highwaymen's enterprise.

Those within and without the prison walls were only performing their duty in a perfunctory manner, to which indeed may be ascribed the success which had so far attended upon our friends, enabling them to scale the wall and gain the roofs.

It must be borne in mind that they had approached the prison in a very circuitous fashion, and had chosen what appeared to be the most difficult point for their attack.

Still, if the officers and others on guard had not been so impressed with the notion that nothing would be done that night, and if they had done their duty as they ought to have done, some one of them would have seen Dick Turpin and his comrades while they were in the act of scaling the wall.

For it will be recollected that, although they were concealed from view while on the roof of the house adjoining Newgate, yet they were visible when they began to climb the wall by the aid of the rope.

Dark as the night was, a keen eye might have detected them crawling up the face of the stonework.

Or, if not, they would at least have been seen during those few minutes that they sat upon the edge of the wall while waiting for the others to ascend, and while securing the rope for their descent.

On that occasion, their forms were clearly and sharply defined against the night sky.

Whether they had really been seen by any prying eye, or not, time alone can determine.

This, however, is quite certain:

Up to the moment when, as we described at the end of the last chapter, the piece of thick rope was handed to Dick Turpin by his followers, no alarm of any kind whatever had been raised.

And now, having, as it is hoped, made all clear, and explained everything, we will, in the succeeding chapter, take up again the thread of the narrative at the point just mentioned, and relate the events that immediately succeeded.

CHAPTER DCLI.

DICK TURPIN ENDEAVOURS TO DISCOVER MAUD'S CELL, AND IS ALARMED BY THE RETURNING PATROL.

"The more silent we are," said Dick Turpin, in a suppressed voice, and tying a firm knot in the rope as he spoke in such a manner as to form a large loop at one extremity,—"I mean he less we talk—the better it will be. The sound of our voices may be carried I know not where. Therefore, while I am preparing this rope, listen to my directions; and when you hear my signal, be sure you obey it instantly."

Dick Turpin then, while adjusting the rope, issued a number of directions to his companions in a low tone of voice, to which they heedfully attended, and promised implicit obedience.

What those instructions were it is not necessary now to state. It will be sufficient to describe what was done.

The rope was held by the three highwaymen, while Dick, taking hold of the end which he had prepared, slipped the loop over his head, and allowed it to fall down below his waist.

Then he clasped one hand tightly near the knot.

"Have you the rope firm?" he whispered.

"Yes," was the reply.

"Then be sure you keep it secure, for upon that my life and your discovery depends."

With these words, Dick Turpin hastily climbed up on to the parapet defending the roof, and then cautiously proceeded to lower himself over the abyss, his friends above holding the rope secure.

It must be understood that Turpin seated himself in the loop in the rope, much after the fashion of those men who gain a perilous livelihood by being lowered from the summit of a rock to plunder the nests of sea birds.

His left hand enabled him to balance himself upon the rope, and to sit easily; his right he employed to keep himself clear of the masonry, against which he would otherwise have been severely bruised.

Gradually and carefully, so as not to permit the rope to slip suddenly through their fingers, the three highwaymen above paid out the rope to let the captain down.

Dick's mode of operation now becomes clear.

He knew that one of the grated windows in the wall, to the face of which he clung, looked into the cell where Maud was confined.

There were at least a dozen of these barred apertures, and which was the right one yet remained to be ascertained.

But Dick had arranged a code of signals with his friends, so that he should be able to make them understand whether he wished to be lowered or raised—to be stopped, or to be moved either left or right.

When once he found the right window, he believed that, provided with tools as he was, he should have but little difficulty in removing the iron bars.

When this task was accomplished, Maud would be able to make her escape through the aperture.

His friends above would draw them up, and then all that would remain would be to make their way back as they had come.

It will be seen how many obstacles were in the way of carrying out this scheme; yet great as was their number and magnitude, they sank into positive insignificance when compared with any other means of achieving the same object.

How much easier it seemed to be than by some pretext to enter the prison itself, to make their way through the long stone corridors guarded by turnkeys, and break open the doors that interposed between them and Maud's cell.

In fact, it would have been impossible to effect Maud's escape by any such means.

The present plan was the only one which offered the least chance of success.

But it was absolutely bristling with danger, and no one was better aware of that fact than Dick himself, although he endeavoured to blind himself to it.

As he makes the perilous descent, holding himself away from the wall with his right hand, he employs his eyes in looking all round about him, and stretches his ears in order to catch the slightest sound.

It was well for him and for all that he was thus cautious.

Suddenly a faint sound down below attracted his attention.

In an instant he shook the rope.

This was the signal agreed upon to be given when he wished to stop.

The highwaymen held the rope still instantly.

Scarcely had Dick paused in his descent than a door beneath him, but a little on his right hand, was quickly opened.

Dick pressed himself as closely as he could against the stone wall.

That was the only chance he had of escaping the observation of those below.

No other means of concealing himself presented themselves.

But his body showed out dark and well defined against the lighter-coloured stonework.

From the door which had just been opened there issued a number of men.

Turning his eyes towards them, Dick saw they were the same who a little while back had crossed the yard.

"They return this way, then, after all," he murmured to himself. "So surely as they look upwards I shall be seen."

It was indeed a source of much regret to Dick that he did not wait a little while longer in order to satisfy himself that the patrol was not returning.

Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack above were not less alarmed by the sudden appearance of these men than was Dick himself.

When the signal to stop had been given they were not acquainted with the cause, but, having fastened the rope, they were impelled by curiosity to bend over the parapet and look down.

When they saw the turnkeys emerge with one man at their head carrying a lantern, their faces turned very white and their hearts fluttered.

The conviction instantly seized upon them, and pressed like an icy hand upon their hearts, that all was now discovered.

It was next to an impossibility that these men could perform their duty so negligently and carelessly as to fail to perceive Dick Turpin hanging suspended against the wall.

Yet they had the presence of mind to remain perfectly still, and to make no attempt to draw Dick up again.

This was partly because they had agreed implicitly to obey the signals he might give—they had placed themselves entirely under his command.

It was an anxious moment.

"Halt!" cried a voice below, which they believed proceeded from the man carrying the light.

The men stopped instantly and stood in a throng near the open doorway.

There was a momentary pause, during which one of the turnkeys fastened the door through which they had just passed.

At this time they were actually within twenty feet of the spot where Dick was hanging.

He even held his breath, fearful lest that slight sound should be carried to their ears.

But, by the most wonderful chance in the world, not one of those men raised his eyes to look upward.

The door having been fastened, the little troop was once more set in motion.

Dick ventured to breathe.

"It's a dark night," said one of the turnkeys, glancing up at the sky, which was covered all over with dense, heavy clouds, that looked as though they would shortly discharge their watery contents.

"D—n the night!" growled a voice in reply. "What an infernal nuisance it is that we should have to do double duty in this fashion! Bah—I am sick of it! Don't talk to me about the night!"

Some more words were exchanged, but the speakers were too far off for the highwaymen to catch what was said.

Again they paused before the doorway on the opposite side of the court-yard, and after a brief delay passed through it.

The coast was then clear.

Once more silence reigned about that portion of Newgate

Still it was several minutes after the turnkeys had disappeared before Dick Turpin could recover himself sufficiently to give the required signal to those above.

He continued to press himself against the wall, and could scarcely bring himself to believe that he had indeed had such a narrow escape from detection.

Soon, however, the consciousness came over him that the danger was past.

With that consciousness also came the knowledge that as yet he had a great deal to do before his enterprise was achieved, and that consequently there was not a moment to lose.

Then, with a solemn, clanging sound the clock in St. Paul's Cathedral began to chime.

Dick remained motionless listening to the sound.

"Two o'clock," he said to himself, as the ringing sounds were taken up by one church after another in the vicinity—"two o'clock! If I am speedy, there will yet be time; and surely this is the best part of the night for that which I have to do!"

As these words passed through his thoughts rather than escaped his lips, Dick gave the signal to his friends to be lowered a little more—he had not yet reached the level of the cell windows, though he did so in another moment.

Then again he gave the signal to stop.

He now looked anxiously right and left of him.

He wondered which of those windows looked into the cell that was occupied by Maud.

Looking to the right, he could count seven of those grated apertures, and to the left five.

He happened to be suspended about half-way between the fifth and sixth windows.

"Now then for Maud," he said to himself. "How shall I discover her cell? If I could but let her know that I am here all would be well! How can I do that? Surely, if I called upon her in faint, low tones, the sound would reach her ears—she would recognise my voice, and then, coming to the window of the cell, I should then learn in which one she was confined."

This was the best plan that Dick could think of.

It is true there was the disadvantage attached to it that the sound of his voice might reach unfriendly ears, and there was also the chance that Maud might not hear him.

Still, as it seemed his only chance, Dick determined to try the experiment, let the hazard be what it might.

He hesitated a moment as to which window he should select first.

Should he take the one on his left or the one on his right hand?

"Chance alone can guide me," he thought—"it is quite a chance. I will try the one on my right first, and I hope that it will prove the right one."

Accordingly, having come to this decision, he signalled to his friends.

In another instant he was close to the barred window he wished to reach—that is to say, the sixth one counting from his left hand.

Clinging closely to the stonework, and yet taking care that no portion of his body should hang before the window, and so obscure the light, Dick placed his lips close to the iron bars.

In a faint yet clear voice, he said:

"Maud—Maud!—are you there? Maud—Maud!"

His heart beat with unusual violence while he uttered these words, and then its pulsation almost stopped while he waited with painful anxiousness the answer to his summons.

CHAPTER DCLII.

MAUD MAKES A RESPONSE TO DICK TURPIN'S APPEAL.

Was it a dream?

Was it some fleeting illusion of the senses?

Had her fancy played her false? or could it indeed be that it was Dick Turpin who had uttered those words?

These were the questions that sprang suddenly into Maud's mind.

By one of those rare and fortunate chances which do sometimes occur, and which would puzzle anyone to account for, Dick had chanced to pitch upon the very window of Maud's cell.

It could only be a graceful fancy to suppose that some unfelt yet irresistible sympathy drew him to that spot, and influenced his decision when he was hesitating which window he should choose.

Faintly spoken as the words were, nevertheless they reached the ears of Maud with great distinctness.

She started up suddenly from a half-reclining posture, which she had assumed through sheer weariness and grief, and with parted lips and panting breath she listened for a repetition of the sound.

The belief in her own mind was that unconsciously she had fallen off into a light sleep, and that in her dream she had heard her husband call upon her name.

That seemed, indeed, a very probable conclusion to arrive at, for how unlikely it was that his voice could reach her there in that Newgate cell!

Therefore, beyond the first movement we have described, she did not stir, but sat there on the stone bench, as motionless as a statue.

Poor girl! Since we saw her last, on the day of trial, she had suffered much.

Broken in health as well as in spirits—worn out by a continual dread of hearing intelligence of Turpin's capture—she was now almost prostrated, and lacked the energy to make any sudden movement.

The trial had been a severe shock to her, and had been a trial in more senses than one.

She could not forget who she once was, and therefore she felt the degradation of her position keenly.

Then, naturally enough, during the course of the trial she had suffered herself to be buoyed up by hopes which at the last were shattered.

Unresistingly, then, she had been led from the dock into the stone chamber beneath it, and from thence to the cell which she now occupied.

Here, of course, she had remained ever since.

But that was not the extent of her misfortunes.

Mr. Cawthorn, the Governor of the prison, had fallen into sad disgrace and trouble with the authorities in consequence of Dick's escape: and as we know, he was a man spirited enough to revenge himself upon Maud, who had certainly done him no injury.

But the Governor was cunning enough to know that any indignity or insult he might offer to Maud would be felt more keenly by Dick than anything he could do to the highwayman himself.

On the evening of the day upon which the trial had taken place, Mr. Cawthorn made his way to the cell in which Maud was confined in order to satisfy himself by personal inspection that the prisoner was quite secure.

This visit was an opportunity which he could not afford to lose.

Upon entering the cell, he found Maud seated upon the stone bench with her hands clasped over her face, and looking the picture of absolute grief.

She was weeping, for he could see the tears trickling between her fingers, and every now and then a choking sob would reach his ears.

As soon as she became aware of the presence of some one in the cell, however, Maud removed her hands from her face and brushed away the tears from her eyes.

As she did this she saw the Governor standing before her.

"Soho!" he exclaimed, in a bantering tone, which was infinitely more disagreeable than violence or threats, "you thought to get off to-day, no doubt, but you didn't! Aha, it's not often that these stone walls are graced with anyone who has been gifted by nature with more than a usual share of loveliness!"

As the Governor repeated these last words, which it will be remembered had been made use of by the counsel for the defence, he made an ironical bow, while his lips curled with a sneering, sarcastic smile.

"If you have one spark of manliness in your bosom," returned Maud, "you will leave me here so that I can indulge in my grief alone, and not make a sport of my wretchedness! But I know," she added, "from experience that you are deaf to all such appeals! Rest assured, however, that when the opportunity arrives I will acquaint one of the sheriffs with your behaviour towards me!"

Mr. Cawthorn shook a little as Maud spoke these words, for he could not conceal from himself the knowledge that she was beautiful, and it was only reasonable to suppose that anything she might say to one of the sheriffs would be listened to with a greater amount of attention than was usually bestowed upon what prisoners generally said.

At the same time, he was aware that it would never do to let his prisoner see this, and so he attempted to carry things off with a high hand.

"Speak to one of the sheriffs, will you?" he repeated. "Ah, well, I would if I were you; and I hope every attention will be paid to your complaints. While you are about it I would request him to change your quartere—ask him to let you have the two best apartments in my house; this cell is quite unworthy of you, as indeed is my poor abode, still, the latter is preferable to this; so, when you are complaining, add that request, or if you like I will make it in your behalf."

Maud turned away her head, determined not to speak another word.

She conceived that that was the best thing she could do.

The Governor understood the movement, and hastened to say something disagreeable.

"I have some consolation to offer you," he said. "I have certain knowledge that Dick Turpin has been somewhere near the prison to-day, and I will stake my life that he will be nearer to it still before night. Such a watch is kept all round the building, that he could not possibly escape; and, take my word for it, before the hour of midnight will have sounded, he will be a prisoner, loaded with chains, in the deepest and strongest cell in Newgate."

For one moment Maud turned a wild, despairing glance upon the Governor; but when she caught sight of his mocking, sinister countenance, she turned away her head hastily again, and resolved not to hear anything more that he might say to distress her.

She placed both her fingers in her ears, and pressed them hard until she shut out the sound of his voice.

Finding that all his words were in vain, the Governor became silent, and, after a brief pause, left the cell.

But when the door closed behind him, Maud gave full and free vent to her great grief.

"Captive—a prisoner!" she moaned. "Oh, yes; I have no doubt of it! I know he would come near the prison—I know he would try to be present! But now his destruction is certain!"

Had the Governor known how deep an impression his words had made, he would have been satisfied with what he had done; but ignorance baulked him of more than half his revenge, for he did not know with what speechless agony and straining ears Maud listened through the hours of that night to every slight sound in the prison.

She was allowed but little rest, for the cell was visited at very frequent intervals by a turnkey.

It was his duty to walk into the cell, to look round it, and look at the prisoner, and satisfy himself that all was well.

Being thus constantly upon the stretch, and dreading every sound, had completely worn Maud out, and no wonder.

She was almost reduced to a complete state of stupor.

Then her solitude and peace were next broken in upon in a terrifying manner

Not many hours before she heard the voice of Dick Turpin calling upon her from the window, an unusual tumult in the corridor without had reached her ears.

All the blood in her body seemed to rush at once and with full force to her heart, and to settle there.

What could the commotion she heard portend, except that the worst had happened—that Dick Turpin was a prisoner?

As she heard the sounds without, her imagination pictured him surrounded by his enemies, and struggling fiercely as they dragged him on towards the dungeon.

But the noise came nearer and nearer to her cell, and then, to her surprise, the door was thrust open, and a figure entered which it was difficult indeed to recognise.

He was followed by another, who she saw was the Governor, and the rear was brought up by several police officers and turnkeys.

Inarticulate howls came from the lips of this man, and he rushed forward across the cell towards Maud as though he intended to inflict some personal violence upon her.

But if such was his intention—and no doubt it was—it was frustrated by the Governor, who seized him by the coat, and held him with a strength which none would have given him credit for possessing.

He knew the consequences would be very serious to himself if his prisoner received any ill-treatment while under his care

Therefore, in an agitated voice, he exclaimed.

"Mr. Wriggles—Mr. Wriggles, are you quite mad? Have you quite lost your senses? Do you wish to ruin me?"

"Curses!" roared Mr. Wriggles, for it was no other than that personage,—"curses! Let me go, I say! Revenge—revenge! I will be revenged!"

Maud drew back to the farthest corner of the cell, trembling in every limb.

The countenance of Mr. Wriggles was indeed something dreadful to look upon.

Smarting and aching with the injuries he had received during his ride upon the back of his horse, Mr. Wriggles, blinded with rage and pain, sought Maud's cell.

He had been severely punished about the head and face by the huge thistle which Dick had fastened to the horse's tail.

Indeed, his countenance presented a more hideous appearance than it did at first, for after it had been washed it began to swell all over, so that by this time his features were almost undistinguishable, while his head was at least double its usual size.

"Hark you!" he cried, hoarsely and fiercely, and addressing himself to Maud. "I will not lay a finger on you! No, no, I will not do that!"

"Quite right," murmured the Governor.

"But listen!" he continued. "Look at me! You see the condition I am in? You can guess who has done this, and what I have suffered? But I will be revenged! I will move Heaven and earth, and not know a moment's rest until I have captured Dick Turpin and his villanous associates! I swear it, and I will keep my oath! Every injury and pain I have suffered shall be returned with tenfold violence upon their heads! They cannot escape! I shall have them secure! Death and destruction! the pain I suffer now would be far beyond endurance if it was not for the thought that I shall capture them all before the sun rises again!"

"Well, come," said the Governor, who was anxious to get Wriggles away. "Don't waste any more time here. Come, you have much to do, if you intend to keep your word.

"Intend to keep my word?" said Wriggles. "Don't fear about that! I am going," he continued, fixing his eyes upon Maud's terrified countenance—"I am going, and Dick Turpin's destruction will follow! But do not think I shall quietly bring him a prisoner to this place! No, no! he shall have some foretaste of my vengeance before he is placed in his cell, and I warrant his condition will be such that there will be no fear of his making an attempt to escape!"

There could be no mistaking the tone in which these words were spoken.

Maud felt that Mr. Wriggles was fully in earnest.

She was terrified to death.

Impelled by an impulse she could not control, she sprang forward a few paces, and then, sinking on her knees, she clasped her hands together, and outstretched them towards Mr. Wriggles, who was still held in the Governor's detaining grasp.

"Mercy!" she shrieked—"have mercy upon him!—mercy! Do your duty if you will, but no more! I implore—I entreat your mercy! If you make him your prisoner, do not injure him! Spare him—spare him!"

"Aha!" cried Mr. Wriggles. "Good, that—I like it! Spare him? Look at me! Do you see the state I am in? Well, then, I will spare him as much as I have been spared! I have a grudge against you, too. I had thought of one way of revenging myself upon you, but I have thought better of it. I know that you will feel all that I do against Dick Turpin a thousand times more than all I can do against yourself. Oh yes, I will have mercy, depend upon it—lots of mercy—lots!"

Then, with another wild and hideous yell, caused in part by the terrible pain he was enduring in every joint of his body, and in part by the exultation he felt at the prospect of obtaining his revenge, Mr. Wriggles suffered himself to be led from the cell by the Governor.

Then the door was closed, and once more Maud was left alone.

But in what a terrible state of mind was she now left!

Who can form an adequate conception of what her feelings were after their departure?

She wept and sobbed until tears would no longer come to her relief, and then, utterly exhausted, she had sunk down in a half-senseless state upon the stone bench, and she was in this condition when she heard Dick Turpin call her by her name.

CHAPTER DCLIII.

DICK TURPIN SAWS THROUGH THE IRON BARS, AND MEETS WITH A MISHAP IN MAUD'S CELL.

"Dick—Dick!" she murmured, half unconsciously, and in a voice little above a whisper. "Was it indeed your voice I heard, or did my fancy mislead me? Dick, speak to me again!"

Faintly uttered as the words were, nevertheless they made their way to the attentive ears without.

Dick heard them.

His heart leaped up with joy

The revulsion of feeling that took place in his breast was so great that he almost let go his hold.

So many minutes had elapsed after he had spoken before he heard Maud's answering words, that he had come to the conclusion that his first attempt had been a failure, and that he must look for her in some other cell.

He was just about to give the signal for removal, when her faint, whispered tones reached his ears.

In the intense silence of that place, it was no wonder that they should do so.

The falling of a pin might almost have been heard, for at that hour the silence of the very tomb itself prevailed in every part of Newgate.

No sounds from without interrupted the stillness, and it would have been easier for anyone to believe that the prison was built in some lonely spot, far away from every habitation, than that it was situated in the heart of a great city, which scarcely knows peace night or day

Dick Turpin clung tightly to the iron bars of the cell to support himself, and then incredulity seized upon him.

It seemed that fortune could not have favoured him so much as to have taken him to the right cell at first, and so he exclaimed:

"Maud—Maud, was it you who spoke? Maud—Maud, answer me again! I am here, and in safety! Maud—Maud, reply to me at once!"

A half-suppressed shriek responded to this appeal.

This time there could be no doubt, and so Maud exclaimed:

"I am here—I am here!"

She looked around her half in terror, for she was unable to make out from what direction Dick Turpin's voice proceeded.

Upon this point, however, she was not long left in doubt and uncertainty.

Seizing hold of the iron bars that crossed each other over the window, Dick Turpin pressed his face against them.

The interior of the cell was pitchy dark, and he was unable to make out a single object.

But at that moment Maud happened to turn her eyes towards the window, and then she perceived the dark outline of a human form.

Her heart told her at once who it was, though she was quite at a loss to conceive by what means he could possibly have gained his present situation.

In a moment her exhaustion vanished.

She sprang to her feet, and by that action seemed to cast off the heaviness that weighed her down.

The only movable article the cell contained was a rude, strongly-made wooden chair.

With the speed of lightning she placed this just beneath the window

She mounted into it at once, and held up her arms towards the grating.

But she was not yet raised sufficiently to reach it.

Although he could not see her, yet Dick could hear and understand her movements.

Therefore he thrust his arm completely through the bars.

He felt it instantly seized by two soft, cold hands.

Then, by the aid which this support afforded her, Maud stepped up lightly on to the back of the chair.

She was in danger of falling each moment, but she did not heed that.

She clung tightly to Turpin's hand, and covered it with kisses.

"You are here," she said—"you are here! My heart told me you would come!"

"Yes, I am here," was the reply, "and with the intention of taking you away with me."

Maud could not suppress a cry of joy.

"Hush—hush!" he cried, "there must be no alarm. I have much to do in order to liberate you, and we will postpone our greeting to another occasion. I am expecting each moment the appearance of the patrol."

Maud trembled.

"How came you here?" she said—"how came you here? And tell me how it is that you intend to get away."

"I will," replied Turpin. "I know it would ease your mind, and I can work at the same time if you will release my hand. I have indeed much to do."

Maud was unwilling to unclasp her fingers and still more unwilling to descend into the cell.

The first, however, she was compelled to do, but not the latter.

Raising herself up still higher on the back of the chair, she shifted her grasp to the iron bars.

Here she could hold securely.

No sooner was his hand at liberty, than Dick plunged it into his pocket and drew out a small object.

It was a small steel saw, of exquisite temper and keenness, which he had been provided with by the foresight of Jabez.

"Now to remove the grating!" he exclaimed. "It will not take me long, for I have a rare tool here."

"But how is it you are at the outside of the window, and at such a distance from the ground?"

"I am fastened to a rope," was the reply, "and Tom, and Claude, and Jack are above on the roofs holding it. So soon as I can saw through these bars and get the window clear, I shall draw you through, and then, by the aid of the rope, we shall easily gain the roof above. Now do you comprehend?"

Maud did comprehend, but to her the task appeared of such a difficult nature that its accomplishment seemed very doubtful.

But Dick was not of this opinion.

Without further loss of time, he set to work upon the iron bar with his steel saw.

Near the spot where they had been soldered into the stonework the iron bars had worn away by the galvanic action of the two metals, so that their thickness was more than half reduced.

They were thickly covered with rust, too, and when he brushed that aside Dick discovered that the task he had to perform would not occupy him near so much time as he at first imagined.

With a lightened heart, he commenced his operations.

The fine steel saw seemed to cut through the soft and rusty iron with almost as much ease and rapidity as if it had been wood.

Soon one was sawn completely through.

It was the top horizontal bar.

Two more remained, and after the lapse of a short time those two were also severed.

It was unnecessary to saw them at the other end.

Dick Turpin believed he should be strong enough to seize hold of one end and bend them, if not completely back, at least far enough to answer his purpose.

Three perpendicular bars now remained.

Stimulated and encouraged by the success which had so far attended his endeavours, Dick commenced his operations upon them with renewed vigour and spirit.

Every now and then he would pause to listen, for he was in momentary dread that the men would again appear going the round of the prison.

His three comrades peeped over the parapet.

By his having remained so long stationary, they guessed he had been lucky enough to discover Maud's cell, and when, by listening, they could hear the faint grating sound produced by the saw as it was drawn rapidly backwards and forwards, their conjecture was confirmed.

Suddenly a half-uttered ejaculation came from Maud's lips.

Even as she uttered it she released her hold upon the grating and sprang as lightly as she could to the floor of the cell.

Then, with breathless rapidity, she removed the chair, and threw herself down upon the stone bench in the same way she was when Dick Turpin's voice first reached her ears.

For a moment Dick was startled, and even bewildered, by these sudden movements.

Maud had no time to utter a word by way of caution—nor, indeed, was it really requisite.

Of course Dick was on the alert, for he knew some cause had produced this action.

Before he had time to speculate upon it, he heard a sound which he recognised instantly, for it was familiar enough to his ears.

That sound was the removal of the fastenings upon the outside of the cell door.

Some one was about to pay the prisoner a visit.

Dick marvelled greatly who it could be.

He was tolerably well acquainted with the routine observed in the prison, and knew that it was most unusual for a visit to be paid at such an hour as that.

The sound of the bolt of the lock flying back warned him to be speedy in his motions.

Swinging himself to one side, he seized hold of the stonework, and preserved himself in that position.

No part of his body then hung before the cell window, and no one inside looking out would be able to perceive him.

With a heavy, grating, creaking noise, the door of the cell was flung open, and then what seemed to be a brilliant flash of light illuminated the cell.

So great was the curiosity and desire that Dick Turpin felt to ascertain who it could be that had entered Maud's cell at that hour, that, in spite of the obvious danger of such a proceeding, he bent his head slightly forward in such a manner, that he was able to peep through the bars.

He took the precaution to remove his hat, so that a very small portion of his head was projected beyond the ravel of the window.

Still he was unable to command a view of the whole of the interior of the cell.

The open door disclosed the form of one of the turnkeys of the prison.

The flash of light which, when contrasted with the previous darkness, seemed so brilliant, came only from the lantern he carried in his hand.

He flashed it all around him, so that, in succession, various portions of the wall were lighted up; and, at last, he allowed the beams to fall upon the recumbent form of the prisoner.

"Oh, all right, I see!" he exclaimed. "I thought I heard a noise; but you're all right, eh?"

He advanced a few steps into the cell.

Then Maud, pretending to awaken, looked at him for a second, and then immediately averted her head.

"Oh, you needn't be so sulky!" said the man. "Only while I am on juty, I'll keep good watch and ward, as the sayin' is—no fear of that!"

Maud was too agitated to make any reply to the turnkey's words, who, on his part, imagined that she disdained to do so.

Grumbling and growling, he withdrew, and closed the door, satisfied that all was well, and that he had alarmed himself without reason.

Again the fastenings were all put up, and then Maud started to her feet.

"Hush!" said Dick, in a whisper so faint that it could not possibly have reached the ears of anyone else besides the person he addressed. "We must be cautious! Wait a few moments; the man is suspicious. We will begin again presently."

Maud was only too glad to be silent, for the whole adventure filled her with dread.

She anticipated all the time that her own escape would be frustrated, and Turpin captured.

After the lapse of a short time, which he considered sufficient, Dick renewed his operations upon the iron bars.

These perpendicular ones were by no means so much rusted as the others, and, consequently, it took him much longer to saw them through.

Just as he was finishing the last one, he heard the hour of three pealed forth from St. Paul's Cathedral.

This warned him to make haste.

The night was speeding fast away, and if there was much more delay, the chances of ultimate escape would be much diminished.

At length, to his joy, the last bar was severed, and then, with speed and strength, he proceeded to finish his undertaking.

One by one he seized the iron bars at the end where he had severed them.

Then, placing his foot against the wall, he exerted his utmost strength, and bent them back; so that, in a few minutes, there was an opening quite large enough to allow Maud to pass through.

But now a fresh difficulty presented itself, which, hitherto, Dick had scarcely taken into consideration.

This was how he should get Maud through the window, supposing he should succeed in drawing her into his arms, and give the signal to ascend. There was the question whether the rope was strong enough to sustain their united weight.

The consequences of a fall were so very serious, that he felt he could not afford to run the risk.

"No—no!" he murmured. "Somehow or other, Maud must ascend alone, and I will follow!"

At this moment he looked up, and over the edge of the parapet above, he could perceive the head of one of his comrades.

"Hist!" he said, in a faint voice. "Look out! Is all well?"

"Yes!" was the reply.

"Then Maud will ascend first! I have removed the grating, and can enter the cell easily! When you have drawn her up let down the rope for me!"

"All right!" replied Sixteen-String Jack, for he it was who happened to be looking over the parapet.

Having arranged matters so far, Dick climbed in at the opening, and released himself from the rope.

To descend into the cell took him but a moment.

Then followed a warm greeting.

But it was a brief one.

It was too perilous for Dick Turpin to linger in a Newgate cell.

"Come, Maud," he said, "the most difficult part of our enterprise is over. All is well! Cheer up!—be of good heart! I will assist you to reach the window; and when you are there, you will see the rope hanging down. There is a loop in it; seat yourself, and hold the rope tightly with both hands. Our three friends will then draw you to the top, and all will be well."

Maud trembled greatly at this prospect.

But she summoned all her courage to her aid at once.

She was well aware how dangerous it was for Turpin to remain standing in that cell, and so she seconded his efforts to the best of her power.

The chair was again called into requisition.

Dick raised Maud in his arms until she was able to grasp the iron bars at the point where they had been bent back.

Then, by his further assistance, she drew herself up through the window; and as the wall was of considerable thickness she was able to seat herself upon it easily.

She saw the rope hanging down, and though the very thought of trusting herself to it made her feel faint and giddy, yet, nevertheless, she seized it boldly and quickly in the manner Dick had directed.

Slipping it underneath her, she seized the rope above with both her hands.

Sixteen-String Jack was watching, and no sooner did he see her seated than he said:

"Is all right?"

"Yes," she replied.

In an instant she felt herself drawn up.

Dick now proceeded to climb up to the window himself so as to be in readiness to seize the rope the moment it was lowered.

But his fingers would not reach the edge of the window-sill without he stood on the back rail of the chair.

He stepped upon it, and, as he supposed, somewhat clumsily, for his foot slipped and he fell with a heavy crash to the ground.

CHAPTER DCLIV.

DICK TURPIN DISPOSES OF THE TURNKEY, BUT MR. CAWTHORN DISCOVERS THE ESCAPE.

A CRY came from Dick Turpin's lips.

It was caused in part by the pain his fall occasioned him, and in part by the anger he felt at his own clumsiness.

Such a clatter as the fall of himself and the heavy wooden chair upon the floor of the cell produced could not fail to attract the notice of the man on guard outside.

The man's suspicions were already partially excited, for, as he paced up and down the silent corridor, he fancied he heard strange sounds in Maud's cell.

That was the reason why he so abruptly entered in the manner previously described.

"My eyes!" he ejaculated—"what's that?"

He took the readiest means of answering his question, for, with greater speed and dexterity than he had ever used in his life before, he undid the various fastenings and flung open the door.

Again he flashed the lantern around him.

What, then, was his consternation and surprise to behold, instead of his prisoner, Dick Turpin standing in the centre of the cell.

The man doubted his own eyesight, and believed he was dreaming.

His mouth opened, and he staggered back a pace or two in amazement.

When he unfortunately fell down, Dick did not lose his presence of mind.

That the noise would bring the turnkey into the cell he felt confident.

It was true that, before the door could be unfastened and thrown open, Dick might have climbed out of the window; but if he had done this and got off clear, the man would perceive in a moment that his prisoner was gone, would raise an immediate alarm, and then their chance of making an escape would be very much imperilled.

It only took a second for Dick Turpin to remember all this, and therefore he rose to his feet and stood calmly in the centre of the cell in the manner we have described.

But he did not for long remain motionless.

Long before the man could recover from his dismay sufficiently to emit a sound from his wide-open mouth, Dick sprang forward and grasped him by the throat.

"Silence!" he cried, sternly—"silence, on your life! Stir or speak at your peril!"

The lantern dropped from the strengthless fingers of the turnkey.

Crash it went on the stone flooring of the cell, smashing itself to atoms in the fall.

"Confusion!" exclaimed Dick, "everything is going wrong. I shall have the whole prison about my ears!"

He dragged the man roughly into the cell as he spoke.

Then closed the door.

He was only able to shut it; he could not secure it in any way, for, as a matter of course, all the fastenings were on the outer side.

Still, now that the door was closed, the sound would be cut off, and there would not be so much likelihood of an alarm being given.

The turnkey was terribly frightened, not so much at Dick's stern manner and his threats as at his extraordinary appearance in the cell.

It looked to him like the work of magic, for the idea of the window never once entered his imagination.

Dick was angry and vexed at this incident, because it could not fail to cause delay at a time when every second was too precious to be lost.

He was not long making up his mind what he should do with this turnkey; in fact, only one course of action seemed to be open to him.

Among the various things contained in the parcel Jabez had given him was a quantity of rope very much thinner than that which had been used to such advantage in their operations.

This Dick took from his pocket.

With great dexterity he made a running noose in one end of it, and, before the turnkey was well aware of what he was about, he found the rope rather tightly encircling his neck.

Dick drew the knot just tight enough to make the man's neck feel disagreeable and to induce disagecable sensations and reflections.

Then, in a rapid tone of voice, he said:

"I don't intend to strangle you—I would not take your life at a gift—but I am going to bind you securely; and while I am doing it, if you struggle—if you resist—if you utter a cry for help, or attempt to do so, I will, so surely as you are a living man, at that very instant draw the rope tight with all my strength, and there will be an end of you!"

Dick spoke these words in a very impressive way, and they derived additional force from the painful feeling of tightness that the turnkey already experienced about the throat.

He was thoroughly cowed.

Taking care to hold the rope in such a manner that he could, if necessary, give it a sudden jerk, Dick proceeded, with the other end of it, to tie the man's ankles tightly together.

Having done this, he wound the rope round and round his legs, knotting it here and there in various places, until he reached his waist.

He then secured the turnkey's wrists, and bound them tightly to his body.

Dick continued to wind the rope round and round until he had reached the man's neck, round which he again coiled the rope.

"You do not like that, I suppose?" was his remark.

The turnkey opened his mouth to make some reply.

What he was going to say would puzzle us to tell.

Dick's sole object was to cause him to open his mouth, and the moment he did so he thrust the rope between his teeth, having held it in readiness to do so.

He drew it until the man's jaws were wide apart, and until his countenance was much distorted.

Then, with a feeling of great satisfaction in his breast, Dick tied a strong farewell knot at the back of the turnkey's head.

It was now as impossible for the man to utter an intelligible sound as it was for him to move.

Had he been buried up to the chin in earth he could scarcely have been more deprived of the use of his limbs.

By an effort of strength, Dick lifted him off the floor of the cell and placed him upon the stone bench.

He laid him upon it at full length, and covered him over with the rude coverlet or blanket which was placed there for the accommodation of the prisoners.

While in this position, it would have been difficult for anyone to tell who and what he was.

Having succeeded so far, Dick's heart felt lighter.

He was anxious to be gone.

Still, he felt it was of paramount importance to ascertain whether all was quiet within the prison, or whether an alarm had been given.

With this view, he opened the door to the extent of about half an inch, and listened.

All was perfectly silent.

He closed the door again quickly, much relieved, and with a light step crossed the cell.

Looking out at the window, he saw the rope hanging down, and oscillating violently backwards and forwards.

"Jack is impatient!" he murmured. "They imagine some accident has befallen me! I must be quick, or else out of their kindness they will be getting me into a fresh difficulty!"

With these words on his lips, Dick once more placed the wooden chair beneath the window, and prepared to mount it.

This time he was more careful in his movements than before, and succeeded in grasping the window-sill with his fingers.

To draw himself up was a task he could perform easily.

And then he was further assisted by the iron bars.

With great rapidity he scrambled through the opening, hastily seated himself in the rope, and gave the signal for those above to draw him up.

This was at once obeyed, and in another moment, to the great relief and joy of all the rest, he was standing safe and unharmed upon the roof.

"Confound it!" he exclaimed. "I am fated to receive hard knocks! That fall from the chair on to the stone floor has hurt me not a little. We must use double speed, my friends. The turnkey cannot do any mischief, it is true; but the first time one of his companions walks down the passage, he will observe that the cell door is not secured—will enter to ascertain the cause, and then an alarm will be raised."

"We must manage to get away before that happens," said Tom King, "or else it will be a case with us."

"I am ready," said Dick. "You, my friends, lead the way; I will attend to Maud, and follow."

"We cannot do better than retrace our steps," said Tom King.

"That's my opinion," said Turpin. "Quick! I am in hopes that we shall reach the street unobserved by means of the house next door."

Tom King made no reply, but busily set to work to commence a retreat.

The iron hook was thrown up to the roof just above them, and Tom King was the first to climb up.

He assisted his companions to follow him, and Turpin and Maud came last.

The angular portion of the roof which had given them so much trouble before now lay in front of them.

Still, they did not shrink from facing this obstacle, but made good use of the experience they had gained.

Without the occurrence of an accident, they at length arrived at the outer wall of the prison.

Once more Claude Duval's services were called into requisition to throw up the rope.

The feat was cleverly performed, for, at the very first trial, the hook attached itself to the chevaux-de-frise, as the iron spikes on the top of the wall were called.

But the exultation they felt at this success quickly vanished.

A sound came from below which filled them top-full with alarm.

That sound was the roaring of voices, the hasty trampling of many feet, and the springing of rattles.

An impulse which they could not restrain compelled them to look down; and there from the low, arched doorway through which the patrol had passed not so very long before, there issued a tumultuous throng of persons.

"Quick—quick!" cried Dick—"quick! Alarm has been given—all is discovered—they have found the turnkey in the cell!"

"They see us, too!" said Claude.

"Haste—haste! Are you right, Tom?"

"Right!" was the reply given by Tom King, who at this moment reached the top of the wall.

Sixteen-String Jack, and then Claude, quickly followed.

Then the rope was fastened securely round Maud's waist.

Dick hastily ascended.

Thus it happened that Maud was last upon the roof of the prison.

But the reason of this was, that time would be saved by the adoption of this course, inasmuch as the rope would be drawn up and there would be no necessity for lowering it again.

She reached the top in safety, and then the ascent on to the roof of the house was hastily commenced.

Those who were down in the court-yard below, however, looking up, caught sight of the dusky figures of our friends as they were revealed by the lighter-coloured clouds behind them.

"Fire—fire! I say! They are on the wall—down with them!"

A sudden movement took place among the highwaymen, and Turpin quickly shielded Maud with his own body.

Scarcely had he done this, than a terrific explosion, which raised a thousand reverberations far and near, took place.

There was a dazzling sheet of flame, a yell and a shout from those below, then darkness and silence.

"Are you hurt?—is anyone wounded?" cried Dick, anxiously. "Speak—speak!—are you all safe?"

"Quite safe!" was the response.

And as it was given, Claude, and Jack, and Turpin slid with amazing rapidity down the rope.

For once Dick resolved to run the risk whether the rope would bear a double weight or not.

Clasping his arm round Maud's waist, he seized hold of the rope, but twisting it in a peculiar way round his arm.

Then he slipped swiftly down to the roof of the house.

Maud was terrified almost to death, and could scarcely believe that Turpin had not been injured by the discharge of the blunderbuss, for such, judging from the loudness of the report, the weapon must be.

CHAPTER DCLV.

THE ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE IS ACCOMPLISHED, BUT AT A FEARFUL COST.

Being well aware, however, of the necessity of calming herself, she subdued her agitation as well as she was able.

The great terror she felt on Dick Turpin's account had the effect of making her almost insensible to the danger to which she was exposed by the passage over the roof of the house adjoining Newgate.

Convinced that nothing but speed could save them, and that their sole chance depended upon reaching the ground in the shortest possible space of time before the alarm raised should become universal, the highwaymen hastened towards the garret window, which to them appeared a haven of safety.

Nevertheless, Sixteen-String Jack was not forgetful of the rope.

It had already done them good service, and he could not tell whether circumstances might not arise to make it useful once more.

But his principal reason for delaying a moment to shake the hook from the top of the wall was, that he was fearful their pursuers might avail themselves of it.

Another moment saw them all standing in the attic.

Dick could tell how alarmed Maud was by the manner in which she clung to him.

In hurried words, he endeavoured to inspire her with courage, and placed his arm around her waist in order to support her steps.

Addressing his companions, he said:

"You go first, my friends, and I will follow. Quick—to the staircase!"

Ere leaving the attic, Claude Duval closed the window, so that there would not be any palpable indication of the route they had taken.

He also closed the door behind him.

Without pausing as they should have done, the highwaymen commenced the descent of the staircase.

Ere they had gone far, however, a terrific uproar from the lower part of the dwelling reached their ears.

They could hear loud and angry voices, the trampling of many feet, and all those other noises which result from the sudden irruption of a large body of men.

"Halt!" cried Dick, in a moment. "We must retreat! Escape in that direction is entirely cut off!"

He sprang lightly up the stairs again, almost carrying Maud with him, who, upon discovering this failure, believed that the end would be the capture not only of herself but of her four friends as well

This was not unlikely.

Dick dashed open the door of the attic in front of the house, and no sooner did he cast a glance into the interior than a shout escaped his lips.

His friends, who were close behind, saw in a moment what had caused this ejaculation.

The girl they had left securely bound to the chair had disappeared, and on the ground lay fragments of the rope with which she had been secured.

"This explains all," said Turpin. "The jade has got loose somehow or other, and has let in the officers—she will tell them all! This is truly awkward!"

"Never mind," said Tom King, "follow to the roofs. We must seek some other means of reaching the ground, and that at once, or it will be too late!"

This was true.

"Luckily," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack, "I have the rope; it is of good length, and may enable us to get down in safety."

"A good thought!" said Dick. "I wish that had occurred to me at first, we would not then have attempted to re-enter this house—it would have been much the best."

"It is not too late," said Claude Duval. "Haste—haste!"

Although in a situation of so much peril, the highwaymen preserved their calmness admirably

They were, of course, exceedingly anxious, for they were filled with the dread that it would be impossible to gain Smithfield Market without being captured.

Not a word of these doubts and fears escaped their lips

All their energies were bent to getting once more upon the roofs.

This occupied but a brief space of time.

Before they crept out of the window, however, they had heard police officers hastily ascending the stairs, so that the pursuit after them would be very close and hot indeed.

As Dick was last, he filled up the time by barricading the attic door with all the heavy articles of furniture the place contained.

It was not likely that it would prove anything more than a temporary barrier to the police officers, still, it would cause a brief delay, and every moment was of the utmost importance to them.

Tom King went first and led the way.

Fortunately, the houses in the narrow court we have mentioned were all about the same height from the ground.

They were all defended with a stone parapet about three feet in height, so that it was an easy matter not only to pass rapidly from one roof to another, but also, by stooping down, to hide themselves from the gaze of any people below.

The court terminated in a ruined and, apparently, little-used portion of old Newgate Market.

The distance to the ground was very great, and when, on reaching the end building Tom King looked down, he shook his head, for he knew well enough the rope was nothing like long enough.

Creeping a little further along the angle of the building, he saw, many feet below him, a wall, which, apparently divided the market from some contiguous property.

"That is our only chance," he said, addressing his companions, "and it is a desperate one. We have no time to hesitate—we must adopt it! Secure the hook to the parapet! We must then slip down the rope and stand upon the wall; then, when we have all reached it, the rope must be removed, secured to the wall, and then I doubt not we shall be able to reach the ground."

This was a very desperate undertaking, and the highwaymen by no means relished the idea of making such a perilous descent.

But just at that moment the police officers, having, with more difficulty than Dick imagined, broke open the attic door, appeared upon the roof.

The sight of their foes so close to them, and their cries of exultation, instantly put an end to the hesitation they had felt.

Without saying a word, Sixteen-String Jack lowered the rope, and almost before it was secured Tom King slipped down it, and in an instant was standing safely on the top of the wall.

"Come," he said, "be speedy! I fear, now, we shall find our foes waiting for us so soon as our feet touch the earth."

Tom King sat astride the wall and held the rope.

By doing this he rendered the descent much easier to his companions.

So great was the expedition used that before the police officers had time to get half-way over the housetops the little party were standing in safety on the wall.

Finding that their prey had disappeared, however, the police officers cried aloud, and made every noise they could think of to alarm their companions who were below

By the same means as before our friends slipped down the rope.

It was a rapid process, and to their infinite satisfaction they quickly found themselves standing on the firm earth.

But just at that moment a shrill whistle reached their ears, and Claude Duval found himself suddenly grasped by some one

To wrench his head round, and to deal two terrific blows at his adversary were simultaneous motions, and the next thing of which the others were conscious was the officer who had attacked him lying insensible on the ground.

"That whistle will bring all the rest upon us!" cried Claude. "Forward—forward!"

Half fainting with terror and fatigue, Maud was scarcely able to move.

Turpin, too, felt severely the effects of the hurts he had received, although he was partially rendered insensible to them by his excitement.

Nevertheless, he drew his sword and supported Maud's steps.

A considerable distance had yet to be gone over before they could reach the spot where Jabez was waiting with the horses.

This, it will be remembered, was in the open space of Smithfield Market.

To gain this, it was necessary that they should run out of Newgate Market, across Newgate Street, and through several courts and alleys.

Such a large party as five persons could not by any possibility make their way through the streets without attracting attention.

Then, all the police officers around the prison were on the look-out in all directions.

Luckily, as we have explained, these were by no means so numerous as they had been, and this proved very greatly in the favour of the highwaymen.

"Let me lead the way!" said Tom King, darting forward. "You, Dick, follow next, and let Claude and Jack bring up the rear, and cover your retreat."

He did not wait for any reply to be given to this command, but hastened onward at a rapid rate, closely followed by Turpin, who was almost compelled to carry Maud—she was so terrified and exhausted.

Without accident they reached Newgate Street.

"Now comes our danger!" exclaimed Tom King, pausing for a second. "Speed alone can save us! Follow me quickly!"

He darted across the thoroughfare as he spoke.

The remainder of the party pressed closely after him; but immediately a loud shout was set up, showing that they had been seen and the alarm given.

They could hear the hasty rush of footsteps; but the sound only increased the speed of the highwaymen.

Panting and breathless, they raced through the numerous courts that lay between them and their destination.

The police officers, however, were hard upon their track.

The blowing of whistles and the springing of rattles came continually upon their ears, and it seemed that they were spreading round them in a circle, so that they justly feared they would be surrounded on every side by their foes.

"On—on!" cried Tom King. "Do not falter. We have not much further to go now! On—on!"

His words, and the manner in which he bounded forward, cheered and inspired the rest.

They followed him swiftly, and at length, to their infinite satisfaction, the large, open space of Smithfield was reached.

Luckily for their safety, the fog still hung in heavy masses about this damp, unwholesome spot.

Under cover of this murky vapour, they would stand a much better chance of getting clear away.

Only one drawback was attached to it, and that was the difficulty they experienced in deciding upon the exact spot where Jabez was waiting with the horses.

Any mistake on this point would be attended with fatal results.

"Straight on!" said Dick, who noticed Tom's hesitation—"don't pause! Go straight on—our foes are gaining rapidly upon us!"

This was the case.

The officers, stimulated by the hope that on the present occasion they should be able to secure the whole of the immense reward, pressed forward with great speed.

In a fair race, there could be no doubt that the highwaymen would have distanced the police officers easily, for they were much more lightly clad, and were not so encumbered with accoutrements.

As it was, however, Maud's condition much impeded their progress.

It was only at this moment that the thought struck Claude that he might make himself more useful than he had yet done.

With a bound, he placed himself abreast with Dick Turpin, and then he said:

"Resign Maud to my care for a few moments. I have not gone through quite so much exertion as you have. I can carry her easily. You know best where the horses are. Do not hesitate—every moment is of infinite value! Let me take her, and do you lead the way!"

Turpin did hesitate for a moment, but only for a moment.

The desire he felt to keep Maud continually under his protection subsided when he thought of the dangerous condition of his comrades, and that Claude was in a much better state to assist her than he was himself.

Therefore he resigned her to his charge.

With an exertion of the great strength he possessed, Claude Duval raised Maude fairly in his arms, and then, notwithstanding his burden, ran forward with great speed.

The delay caused by this change was very slight, and no doubt it would quickly be made up, for Turpin now went first.

He knew exactly the spot where he had left Jabez, and felt sure that he might reach it blindfold.

But a pang of alarm shot through his heart when, at the same moment, the thought occurred to him that the officers might have seen the horses and secured them.

And when he observed how fearfully close his pursuers were behind, even if they reached the horses, he doubted whether they would have time to mount before they were surrounded.

He felt how much depended upon himself, and so he bounded forward with a rapidity that was surprising, considering the exertion he had already undergone.

"Thank Heaven!" he ejaculated, after running a few paces, "the horses are there, and Jabez is with them! On—on, my friends—safety lies before us! Rest assured that all will yet be well!"

CHAPTER DCLVI.

THE POLICE OFFICERS ATTACK THE HIGHWAYMEN, AND MAUD AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK ARE WOUNDED.

A MOMENT afterwards, and Dick Turpin perceived some dusky object looming before him through the fog.

"Hist!" he cried. "Jabez, are you there?"

"Is that you, captain?"

"Yes. All's well

"Then here are the horses, and in first-rate condition for the road."

Dick Turpin did not stand still while these words were uttered.

With that speed and agility which long and continual practice alone could have given him, he sprang on to the back of Black Bess.

"Now, Claude," he cried, "give Maud to me, and then mount and away!"

Claude raised Maud up, and Dick, taking her in his arms, placed her before him in the saddle.

At that very instant, however, there was a terrific discharge of firearms.

Maud uttered a loud and piercing shriek, while an ejaculation, either of pain or astonishment, escaped the lips of Sixteen-String Jack.

The slight delay that had taken place in mounting their horses had enabled the officers to come up with them.

But they were on foot, and no sooner did they perceive that the highwaymen were engaged in mounting their horses, than a feeling of rage and desperation took possession of them.

At the command of their leader, every one drew a pistol, and fired at the dark, shadowy figures just in front.

Then, rapidly passing the discharged pistols from their right hand to their left, they drew their swords, and rushed impetuously forward, so as to be able to secure and overpower anyone who might have been injured by the volley.

Before our friends fairly started, the foremost officer reached them.

He saw one figure on foot, and, raising his sword, he made a slashing cut at it.

With a smothered groan, Jabez sank to the earth, for he it was the officer had attacked.

Dick Turpin just perceived this incident, and that was all.

Already had he given Black Bess the impulse forward, and, even had he attempted it, he could not have drawn her in immediately, and certainly not in time to help his faithful ally.

The officer dropped his sword, and sprang upon the prostrate form.

"Here's one of 'em!" he cried—"here's one of 'em! Hurrah!"

His voice mingled strangely with the clatter of the horses' feet as they sped along St. John's Road in the direction of the open country.

"Who is it?" said one of the officer's companions.

"I don't know—it's one of 'em! A lantern!" cried the leader of the party. "Let us find out, if we can, who it is. If it should prove Dick Turpin, the others may escape, and welcome!"

A lantern was now immediately produced.

The officer who held it pressed forward, and, removing the dark slide, allowed a bright beam of light to fall upon the countenance of the prostrate man.

A loud shout of anger and disappointment came from their lips when they discovered who it was.

"Curses!" said the officer, who thought he had made such a clever capture—"curses!"

"Who on earth can the fellow be?" said another. "I fancy he's dead."

"He was evidently assisting the highwaymen to escape," said the chief officer, "even if he was not one of them, so he deserves all he has got. But don't stand chattering here! Forward! Just on the other side of the market we can obtain horses. We will mount in pursuit!"

Leaving Jabez on the stones of Smithfield Market weltering in his blood, the officers, sheathing their swords, hastened across the open space in the direction of the stables of which their leader had spoken.

Here, with very little loss of time, they obtained horses.

In a few minutes, all were mounted and galloping along at full speed.

"They have got the start of us," said the chief officer; "but no matter, it doesn't signify; let us stick close to their heels—they can't go far without being interrupted. All the roads are well watched by the dragoons!"

A disorderly shout followed this speech, and then all was silent.

The officers bent the whole of their energies to urging their horses to make their utmost speed.

Leaving them in hot pursuit, we will return to our friends.

The speed at which they flew onwards quickly left Smithfield Market far behind.

Despite her double load, Black Bess kept the lead apparently without the slightest effort.

Maud clung tightly to Dick Turpin—so tightly, that there was scarcely any necessity for him to hold her on the saddle.

As soon as he could recover his breath sufficiently to speak, he said:

"Maud—Maud, why did you shriek like that? Were you hurt? Did that bullet reach you, or were you only terrified at the sudden report?"

She made no reply to this speech, but clung still more convulsively to Dick.

From this he concluded she was unhurt, but overcome with terror and exhaustion.

He was satisfied that he had escaped injury on his own person, and he did not believe that Black Bess had suffered.

Turning round, he cried out at the top of his voice.

"My friends, speak—tell me, is all well? Are you all unhurt?"

"All except myself!" exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack.

"And you?" said Turpin, anxiously.

"A mere nothing, captain—a trifle not worth speaking about."

"But it was very near being serious," said Claude Duval. "A difference of half an inch would have cost you your life."

"Where are you injured?" cried Turpin.

"The bullet has carried away the lower part of his ear, and ploughed the skin on his cheek!" replied Claude Duval, who at that moment happened to be nearest to Dick Turpin.

The highwaymen had made good use of their time, and had managed to get a considerable distance from Smithfield.

"Hark!" cried Tom King, suddenly—"hark! I fancy the officers have obtained horses and are in pursuit!"

Upon hearing these words, all listened.

The clear, ringing sound produced by horses' hoofs beating upon the high-road reached their ears with more distinctness than they desired.

"Yes, they are after us," cried Dick, "and we must push onwards at full speed."

Although the pace at which the horses were going was something terrific, the highwaymen endeavoured to accellerate it.

They succeeded, and had the satisfaction of finding that the sounds of pursuit grew fainter and fainter, until at length they ceased altogether.

Nevertheless, they did not suffer their horses to relax their speed.

Presently, however, when the country was fairly reached, and when there was nothing around them save green trees and fields, Dick again addressed himself to Maud and endeavoured to arouse her.

"Speak—speak!" he exclaimed. "Do not keep so silent—speak, if it is only one word to assure me you are uninjured!"

An inarticulate sound, which seemed more like a stifled groan than aught else, was the sole reply.

Alarmed at this cry, Dick placed his hand upon her shoulder and endeavoured to raise her to a more upright position.

A cry unmistakably of pain issued from Maud's lips.

Simultaneously, Dick uttered an ejaculation.

The hand which he placed upon her shoulder encountered something cold and sticky.

His sense of touch alone told him what this was.

But it was too terrible to believe upon such testimony.

Therefore, he held up his hand, and as well as the darkness of the night would permit, looked at it.

He saw plainly enough that it was stained with blood.

"Help—help!" he cried. "Maud is wounded—badly wounded—perhaps to the death, and I knew it not—I knew it not!"

Acting upon the impulse of the moment, he caused Black Bess to come to a standstill.

His comrades hastened to surround him, and when they learned the discovery he had made, their solicitude seemed almost equal to his own.

Maud was not dead, for he could feel her breath upon his hand, while at short intervals low cries of pain escaped her.

But she was certainly unable to reply to any of the questions they addressed to her respecting the nature and situation of the wound.

Although she was not yet dead, Dick feared that the wound might prove a fatal one, and so, with painfully-breathless anxiety, he endeavoured to ascertain its position.

"It's in her shoulder!" he exclaimed—"her left shoulder. Alas, alas! I fear——"

"Don't anticipate the worst," interrupted Tom King. "The wound after all may be nothing serious, although it has bled so profusely. Forward—forward, or the little advantage over our enemies which we have gained will be lost!"

"Listen!" said Dick. "Hear my commands and obey them. Maud's state is such as to call for immediate attention; therefore, let the risk and danger be what it may, I shall stop at the next roadside inn I come to, and have her hurt attended to as well as circumstances will permit."

"But, Dick——"

"Not a word, Tom—not a word! You follow after me with what speed you will. For once I will urge Black Bess to the utmost, and see what she can accomplish. You follow close after—keep behind as well as you can."

Without waiting for another word to be spoken, and without uttering one himself, Dick Turpin, by every means in his power, made his gallant mare understand that a time had arrived when it was necessary that she should put forth all her energies.

With a neighing sound, Black Bess appeared to respond.

She bounded forward like a dart, and although the speed she had previously made was wonderful, yet it was as nothing in comparison with the manner in which she now flew along the high-road.

In spite of all the efforts the three highwaymen made to keep up with their captain, Black Bess shot ahead, and left them far behind.

"If she keeps up that pace," said Claude Duval, "he will not be long reaching a roadside inn."

"That's true enough," said Tom King, "for I happen to know there is one, called The Bell."

"About how far is it from this spot?"

"Two miles, at the most. It is just at the commencement of a straggling little village."

"And you think Dick will stop there?"

"Yes, I am certain."

"Well, then," said Claude, "as soon as we are within half a mile of it, let me know."

"Why?"

"I will pull up and take my station on the road, while you and Jack push onward with all speed to the inn. Jack's wound wants attending to."

"But why should you stay behind?"

"Do you not comprehend my motive? It is in order to increase your safety. I shall wait there, listening intently; and the moment I hear the hoof-beats of our pursuers on the road, I shall gallop on to the inn, and give you timely warning."

"Excellent!" said Tom King. "That's a capital thought! I feel much easier now. As you say, Jack's wound, though far from serious, requires attention; and when we arrive, I can take charge of the horses, so that there will be no delay in that respect."

"Good!" said Claude. "So that, after all, this halt will not be half so dangerous as I thought at first."

Nothing more was said until the three highwaymen were about half a mile from the Bell Inn.

All three drew up the moment Tom King spoke.

"Dick is there by this time, rest assured. Perhaps Maud's wound is already being attended to."

"Forward, then," said Claude. "Do not waste a minute, for who can say how soon I shall hear our pursuers approaching?"

"Keep good guard, Claude!"

"Never fear for that. I will be vigilant, depend upon it, and you shall have timely notice of their coming. So farewell!"

"Farewell," said Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack, who once again put their horses in motion.

Claude backed his horse as close to the hedge-row as he possibly could, so that there was little fear of his being seen by any chance passer-by; and then, bending forward, he placed his hand to his ear, and listened with the greatest intentness.

In the meanwhile, his two comrades, after a few minutes' gallop, reached The Bell.

They pulled up in front of the inn with a dash.

"Now, Jack," said Tom King, "enter the house. Leave the horses to me; I will go round to the stables with them, and will take care they are in readiness."

Sixteen-String Jack obeyed.

He made light of his wound, for he thought it a trifle.

Nevertheless, in his long and rapid gallop a great quantity of blood had escaped from it; so much to his surprise, the moment his feet touched the ground his head spun round, and he would have fallen had he not grasped the saddle.

He recovered himself almost instantly, and, with slow, staggering steps, he made his way to the front door of the inn.

He felt strangely giddy, and had extreme difficulty in preventing himself from fainting.

CHAPTER DCLVII.

DICK TURPIN IS DRIVEN FROM THE INN BY HIS FOES, AND FINDS A REFUGE BENEATH THE TREES IN EPPING FOREST.

It took Dick Turpin only a few minutes to reach The Bell inn.

Upon arriving, he dismounted hastily, and, calling aloud for the ostler, left Black Bess, and ran, with Maud in his arms, towards the front door.

In the anxiety he felt, he forgot all about Black Bess, and omitted to bestow upon her his usual amount of care and attention.

Although the hour was such a late, or, rather, such an early one—for morning was approaching—The Bell Inn was open.

The reason for this was that a coach stopped there; and but for the chance custom derived from this source, they would have done but a poor trade.

The ostler was on the look-out, so he responded immediately to Dick's call, and taking Black Bess by the bridle, led her into the stable without another thought.

The front door of the public-house was latched.

Dick dashed it open with a loud noise, and strode along the passage.

Aroused by the tumult, the landlady ran out of the bar.

"A private room!" said Dick Turpin. "Five guineas for your best room!"

The landlady stared in astonishment, but she understood that an unusually large amount of money was to be earned, and so, dropping a curtsey, she exclaimed:

"This way, sir—this way, if you please! There's the parlour, and it's quite private, I assure you!"

She flung a door open as she spoke, and Dick, hastily passing through it, deposited Maud upon a couch.

"Have you any skill in surgery?" said Dick to the landlady. "This is my wife, and she has been accidentally wounded."

"I can dress a simple hurt," said the woman; "but if it's a serious wound I would rather not meddle with it."

"Let us see," said Dick. "Remove her dress."

The landlady obeyed.

An ugly-looking wound, situated near the shoulder joint, was then brought to view.

The landlady shook her head.

"I dare not meddle with that," she said. "The bullet is there, beyond a doubt, and must be extracted."

"Fetch a surgeon, then, instantly! I will pay any amount for the services of a medical man! Call in the nearest surgeon!"

"Dear me," said the landlady, "I am all in a flutter, and quite forgot! Why, there's a doctor in the house now—Doctor Thrales. He's waiting for the coach; he often comes."

"Ask him to step in," said Dick, interrupting her. "I will pay him any fee! Call him—call him!"

Dick was full of impatience, and the landlady, perceiving it, hurriedly departed.

Dick bent down over the couch, and saw that Maud was quite insensible.

Her hands and face were very cold, and Dick's dread that she had been fatally injured grew greater and greater.

Then the landlady returned, ushering in a tall, dark sallow-faced man.

He inclined his head slightly to Dick, who immediately said:

"Here, sir, is my wife. She has been wounded in the shoulder. Look—look, and tell me whether the shot will prove fatal!"

"It is a very serious hurt," said the doctor, after an examination. "Luckily, I have my case of instruments with me. I will extract the bullet and dress the wound. She must then be kept perfectly quiet for several days at least."

The word "Impossible!" rose to Dick's lips, but he did not utter it.

He became instantly absorbed in watching the proceedings of the surgeon.

The bullet was skilfully extracted, the wound bound up and skilfully bandaged, and, after a bottle of some pungent essence had been uncorked and applied to her nostrils, Maud regained her consciousness.

"Dick!" she exclaimed, in a moment—"Dick, where are you?"

"Hush!" he replied, hastily, fearful that she might utter his name. "Do not speak yet—pray do not! I am here, and all is well!"

Perceiving that the surgeon was restoring his instruments to the case from which he had taken them, Dick said:

"Here, take this as your fee. I am infinitely obliged to you."

Then, in a whisper, he added:

"Do you think the consequences will be serious?"

"Not if she remains here, and is kept perfectly quiet," was the reply. "But if she is moved, I would not answer for the result."

The surgeon left the room, and in the passage encountered Sixteen-String Jack.

He was leaning against a wooden petition, and in a faint tone of voice, was asking for assistance.

"Another wound to dress?" said the surgeon, in surprise. "How came you by that hurt?"

"We were travelling along the highway," said Jack, "and were attacked by highwaymen. I have been wounded, and my friend's wife."

Jack's hurt was insignificant, and the surgeon simply placed a bandage over it to check the flow of blood.

Just at that moment, however, there was the sound of horses' feet outside.

Then the door of the inn was flung open, and Claude appeared.

In his excitement and haste, he did not notice the presence of the surgeon.

"Quick—quick!" he cried. "They are close behind us now! Where is the captain?"

"In another room."

"Tell him, then, at once! There is not a moment to be lost!"

So saying, Claude departed, in order to give the warning to Tom King.

The surgeon was so bewildered by the suddenness of Claude's appearance, and so surprised by the words he had uttered, that for a moment or two he could do nothing but stare vacantly about him.

Sixteen-String Jack hastened along the passage, and opened at random one of the doors.

He looked in, but the apartment was empty.

He went to the next, and here he found Dick.

"The officers are close behind us on the road," he said, in a whisper. "Fly! Haste—haste! The horses are outside, and we are all waiting for you!"

Dick was in a dilemma.

He pressed his hands to his temples, and strove to think.

If either Maud or himself remained there, they would to a certainty be taken prisoners by the officers, and carried back to Newgate.

Then the surgeon had told him that if Maud was moved the worst might be anticipated.

But seeing that either way she would be moved, he saw clearly enough it was best that he should take her.

"Lead the way, Jack," he said, suddenly. "I will follow, though the risk is fearful."

"Not so great as remaining behind," said Jack.

"True!" was the reply.

And as he spoke, Dick raised Maud in his arms, and followed Jack to the front of the inn.

The horses were there, all in readiness.

"What can all this mean?" said the surgeon, grasping the landlady by the arm. "What is it all about? I can't understand it!"

Before she had time to make any reply the highwaymen sprang upon the backs of their horses, and started off with a prodigious clatter.

An impulse, which they could not resist, compelled the doctor and the landlady to stand at the door and listen until the sounds made by the horses' hoofs had died away.

Then they were about to close the door, when the same sound reached their ears, but from the opposite direction.

They stood still and waited.

In a short time the police officers, who had been reinforced on the road, made their appearance on the scene.

Finding the inn was open, and that people were standing about, they resolved to pull up, in order to ask whether anything had been seen of the highwaymen.

Accordingly, the leader rode up close to the front door, and said:

"We are officers in pursuit of the notorious highwaymen, Dick Turpin and his gang. Have you seen anything of them? They are mounted on four horses, and one is carrying a woman—a prisoner they have rescued from Newgate!"

"Why—why," exclaimed the doctor and the landlady in a breath, "they've been here for ever so long!"

"Been here! Do you mean they stopped?"

"Yes, certainly!"

"Then why did you not detain them?"

"We did not know who they were!"

"And where are they now?"

"They set off at a gallop along the road!" replied the landlady.

"How long is it since they left this inn?"

"Only a few minutes; the sound of their horses' feet has only just died away!"

"Then forward, my lads!" cried the chief officer. "This is better news than I expected to receive! Forward—forward! Whip and spur, and we shall have them yet!"

Meanwhile the highwaymen had galloped on, and coming to the foot of a steep hill, they allowed their horses to ascend it at a gentle pace, believing that in the end they should gain time by doing so.

"Maud," said Dick, bending down over her, "are you better?"

"Yes, much better—much better! But——"

"But what?"

"I feel very, very faint."

"No doubt. Wait a moment—I will consult with my comrades."

Turning round in the saddle, in order to address his companions, he said:

"I don't want to gallop a yard further than is absolutely necessary. Let us try to throw them off the scent. And then the question comes, Where shall we go to? What place is there that will afford us secure safety for a time? Maud's life imperatively demands it."

"I am afraid it will never do to return to the Chase," said Tom King. "I should not be at all surprised if it is not well watched at every point."

"But what other place is there?" said Turpin. "I am too excited to think. Is there no other place you can suggest?"

"There is Epping Forest," said Claude Duval; "that's at no great distance from here. It's a huge place, and, if we once gained its inmost recesses, I think we might bid our foes defiance. What say you?"

"Nothing could please me better," replied Turpin. "It is the very place. To Epping Forest, my friends. That shall be our residence for a time. As you say, I believe when there, we can set the police officers at defiance."

"Onward, then!" said Tom King. "We have breasted the hill now, and I know every inch of ground between this and Epping. Follow me, and I will lead you there straight."

There was a long, gently-sloping descent from the top of the hill, and the rate at which the highwaymen flew down it was truly amazing.

At length Tom King cried:

"Halt!"

They all pulled up.

"That has given us the start, I rather think," he said. "Now, then, to ascertain whether we are within hearing of our foes, or not."

So speaking, he slipped off his horse, and lay at full length upon the road, pressing his ear close to the earth.

He listened intently for several moments.

Then, rising and knocking the dust from his apparel, he said:

"All's well; I can hear nothing whatever of them. They must be a long way off. Now follow me down this lane. It is so narrow, that they will never think we have turned down it."

He sprang into the saddle as he spoke.

It was on the tip of Turpin's tongue to say: 'What lane?" for he could see none, when Tom King turned his horse's head and passed between two tall trees.

The others followed, and to their surprise they saw an exceedingly narrow lane—scarcely wide enough to allow the passage of one vehicle—which wound through a kind of preserve or plantation.

The darkness was intense, and the trees grew in such a manner that anyone in the roadway at night would never notice the narrow gap between them, they seemed one solid mass.

Trusting more to the sagacity of their horse than to their own powers of vision, the highwaymen pressed onwards at good speed, of course not so rapidly as upon the broad high-road.

"This is a private road," said Tom King "and one which we have no right to be upon; it leads to the back of a large mansion, which is surrounded by spacious grounds."

"No matter," said Claude, "it has answered our purpose admirably."

"You are right, for it is the nearest way to the place we want to reach. There's a gate beyond, and then, if we keep steadily across the meadows, we shall reach the forest in something less than half an hour."

Tom King's words were proved to be perfectly correct.

By taking the course he had mentioned, they came in sight of Epping Forest in little more than twenty minutes.

Dick welcomed the sight of the huge trees gladly, and he increased his speed.

Maud was again unconscious and icy cold.

He was full of terror on her account, and it was a positive relief to him when, at length, he found himself galloping rapidly along a wide, open glade in the old forest.

They had heard nothing whatever of the police officers since they quitted the high-road, and, therefore, not without reason, flattered themselves with the hope that they had been entirely successful in throwing them off their track.

CHAPTER DCLVIII

THE HIGHWAYMEN DETERMINE TO TAKE UP THEIR QUARTERS IN THE CAVE IN EPPING FOREST.

"HALT," cried Dick Turpin, when they had penetrated some distance into the forest—"halt! Now, my friends, we are safe, and I am full of alarm on Maud's account."

"No—no," said Tom King, "let us not pause—a few minutes more can surely make no difference, and you will admit that the further we get into the forest the better it will be!"

"We are safe enough here, I think."

"Perhaps so—perhaps not. We can't make sure that we have entirely baffled our enemies. For once, be guided by me. Now that we are in the saddle, let us push on, and get, if possible, into the very heart of the forest."

"Agreed!" said Turpin. "Lead on, and make good speed—it will at least obviate the necessity of another removal."

"It is the best in every respect!" responded Tom; and after one glance upwards at the stars, he led the way along another open glade.

In this manner they continued for nearly half an hour.

At the end of that time the trees grew so closely together and the undergrowth was so dense and luxuriant that it became impossible to proceed further on horseback.

In consequence of the branches of the trees commingling above, dense darkness prevailed all round the spot, making their progress still more difficult.

Dismounting, however, Tom said:

"This is by no means a comfortable place to stay in; there are many better in the old forest. Look, here seems to be what at some distant date was a narrow footpath—doubtless it will lead us somewhere. Follow me!"

With all his anxiety, not even Dick Turpin was desirous to remain where they had halted on this occasion.

The ground beneath their feet was soft and swampy, and a peculiar odour hung about that was particularly disagreeable to the senses.

Tom King went first, leading his horse by the bridle.

Dick surrendered Black Bess to the care of Claude Duval, and, raising Maud in his arms, followed his old friend.

After following the devious windings of the footpath among the trees for a distance of about two hundred yards, the highwaymen suddenly emerged into an open space about ten feet in diameter.

From the time they entered the pathway the ground had had an upward tendency, so that the open space we have just mentioned was of considerable elevation.

After giving one glance around them, ejaculations of surprise and pleasure burst simultaneously from the lips of all.

Half hidden by the trees was a large piece of rock, which jutted up abruptly from the surface of the ground.

In one side of this rock was a kind of recess, which, to judge by appearances, was evidently the entrance to a cave.

"We are in luck," said Tom King. "Chance has guided us to the very spot we wished to reach."

"It seems so," said Turpin. "Hasten forward, and explore that place while I endeavour to restore Maud to consciousness.

He placed her gently down upon the soft turf as he spoke.

Not the least signs of animation could he behold, and but for the faint fluttering he felt beneath his fingers when he placed his hand upon her breast, he would have believed that she was dead.

The feeble pulsation of her heart, however, inspired him with hope.

He chafed her cold hands between his own, and called upon her by name.

But without result.

At this moment the three highwaymen returned with satisfaction legibly imprinted on their countenances.

"Here is an excellent cave," they exclaimed—"a kind of natural hollow in the rock! It will screen us from observation, and protect us from the weather; nothing could be better!"

"I rejoice to hear it," said Dick, "for Maud's sake especially; at the least, she will require careful attention for a long time to come."

"Stay," said Tom King. "You require water—that will recover her from her swoon."

"I do want water," said Turpin: "but where is it to be obtained?"

"If I mistake not, I heard a trickling sound when near the opening of the cave. Wait a moment—I will see."

Tom hastened off, and found that he had not been mistaken.

From the side of the rock a tiny jet of water issued, which fell into a hollow in the rock beneath, where there was a considerable quantity of the clear, cold fluid.

Tom glanced around him for some object which would serve to carry the water, and perceived, at no great distance, a large and curiously-shaped shell.

To pick it up, fill it with water, and to carry it to Dick Turpin took him but a moment.

The cold water quickly revived Maud, and, opening her eyes, she pronounced herself already better.

"Let me lie still, if you can," she said. "That is all I desire, and then I doubt not I shall soon recover. But the officers—where are they?"

The sudden remembrance of her foes caused her to start and look anxiously around her.

"Fear nothing," said Turpin; "they have lost sight of us altogether. We are now in Epping Forest."

"Yes," said Tom King; "and, as I take it, in the very heart of it. Yonder is a cave, which will serve as a place of refuge. I don't believe anyone saw us enter the forest. It is a huge place, as you know full well, and, even if the officers knew we were concealed in it, it would be a work of weeks and months to discover us."

This was probably true, for at the time of which we write, Epping Forest was at least four times the size that it is now.

Every year, indeed, the noble mass of trees diminishes, and in a short time Epping Forest will become a thing of the past, unless vigorous steps are taken to prevent its demolition.

Strong wooden fences cross and recross it in every direction. Not a day passes but some spot is railed-in from the rest, so that even now only a few places remain where the public are allowed to wander through the glades and among the trees.

Yet the cave we have just spoken of still remains, and still is known as "Turpin's Cave."

Even now it is almost in the centre of the forest, measuring from Epping to Lea Bridge, and is situated about a mile north-west from the village of Loughton.

It served Dick Turpin well on an after occasion, as will be described.

We have seen that his first discovery of it was most fortunate.

Claude Duval attended to the horses, and Dick Turpin was pleased to find that Maud was much better than he had dared to hope.

A marked change was visible so soon as ever she was assured that her husband, his friends, and herself were all in safety.

After the lapse of a short time, she was carried to the cave, where a rude kind of couch had been prepared with such materials as came to hand.

A fire was lighted, and some game killed.

A hearty breakfast was then made by the four highwaymen, which was very welcome after the fatigues of the night.

Leaving one to watch while the others slept, the day was passed away, and by nightfall they had to a great extent recuperated themselves.

Maud slept heavily, and Dick at frequent intervals cured a quantity of cold spring water over the bandages.

He knew, by experience, that this simple means was about as efficacious as any for preventing inflammation—that, indeed, was the only thing to fear.

The hemorrhage had entirely ceased, and the healing process would doubtless go on rapidly and well, provided there was no inflammatory action.

During the whole of the time, they had not heard a single sound to inspire them with alarm, so, with good reason, our friends indulged in the belief that they had completely baffled their foes, and that they were in entire ignorance of their whereabouts.

While seated around the fire after the evening meal, the highwaymen held a consultation as to the nature of their future proceedings.

"For the present," said Dick Turpin, "having reached what I believe to be a secure hiding-place, it is manifestly our best course to keep perfectly quiet for some length of time to come."

Tom King nodded, to show that this was just his own opinion.

"What we have done," continued Dick, "will raise no slight commotion, rest assured of that; and, although we have been so fortunate hitherto, it is my belief that if either or all of us ventured out upon any one of the roads within twenty miles of London, we should inevitably be captured."

"It is quite possible," said Claude.

"But we have many strong reasons for remaining," continued Dick. "First, there is Maud; then Jack is wounded, and if he keeps quiet so much the better; we are all exhausted and completely worn out. I propose, therefore, that we stay here for some time to come, until, in fact, our enemies have got tired of watching for us and despair of making a capture."

There was too much sound sense about this advice for it to be disregarded.

Dick's proposal, therefore, was unanimously adopted, and for several days was carefully carried out.

Each morning showed a perceptible improvement in Maud's condition.

As for the highwaymen, they lived peaceably and pleasantly enough, occupying their time chiefly with shooting birds, which supplied them with food.

After the excitements they had lately gone through, this rest was pleasant enough, and all enjoyed it.

As may be imagined, however, on many occasions conferences were held about the future.

They knew that they could not always exist in that place.

On one of these occasions, Tom King said:

"The proposition you made, captain, some long time ago must not be overlooked. Even putting a life in the forest at the best, the other would be far preferable."

"I quite agree with you," said Turpin. "I had not forgotten it. It is strange what difficulties we have had in the way of the accomplishment of that design."

"But I think they are all overcome now," said Claude.

"I cannot think of any. If we wait here until the country is quiet, we can then communicate with either Tom Davis or old Mathew, and place in their hands the money we have buried."

"True," answered Turpin: "that will be quite sufficient for our purpose."

"In my opinion," said Tom King, "some steps ought to be taken in this matter at once."

"Not yet, Tom—not yet."

"But consider a moment. We have already been here for a length of time, Sixteen-String Jack is well, and Maud is in a fair way of recovery. Surely the alarm must, to a great degree, have subsided."

"Notwithstanding all that," said Turpin, "it is too soon."

"I think not; for, when Tom Davis receives the money, some time will certainly elapse before he is able to find a suitable place; and before all the preliminaries are arranged, during that time we must perforce remain where we are. So I think, if the business is commenced immediately, we shall find everything arranged by about the time when we shall desire to quit this place."

This proposition of Tom King's was provocative of much discussion.

Long into the hours of that night the highwaymen sat weighing the matter over and considering it in every possible aspect.

To follow them would be tedious; let it suffice to say that eventually it was decided that Tom King was right.

It was still further arranged that to Tom King should be entrusted the task of proceeding to Enfield Chase, unburying the gold, and placing it in the hands of Tom Davis.

The succeeding night, if it proved to be a dark one, was decided upon for the enterprise.

Such being the case, Tom lay down, and took all the rest he possibly could, in order to prepare himself for his undertaking.

He was fully conscious that it was attended with a considerable amount of danger, but, under any circumstances, it would certainly be better that he should be in full possession of all his physical energies.

CHAPTER DCLIX.

TOM KING SETS OUT UPON HIS DANGEROUS ENTERPRISE

NIGHT at length closed in.

It was dark and cold.

Large masses of clouds piled themselves upon the horizon, and, before the sun had set, had spread themselves over the entire firmament.

But the huge mass was in rapid motion, although it required a keen eye to detect it, for it was only at rare intervals that any break was seen.

A piercing wind, that came in short and fitful gusts moaned among the tree-tops, which clashed together as they were shaken to and fro.

Then the wind would cease, and drops of rain would fall.

In fact, there was every indication of a squally, tempestuous night.

All these elemental signs, which would have dismayed an ordinary traveller, were observed by Tom King with pleasure and delight.

Nothing could be better calculated to suit his purpose than such a night as that promised to be.

He felt assured no persons would be abroad if they could possibly get indoors.

He had some difficulty in curbing his impatience so as to wait until the night was tolerably well advanced before he set out.

At last, however, the wished-for hour came.

Bidding Turpin farewell, for the captain remained in the cave with Maud, Tom King, leading his horse by the bridle, and followed by Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, left the enclosure, and directed his course towards the outskirts of the forest.

His two comrades accompanied him until he was able to mount his horse.

They then bade him farewell, and Tom King rode on alone.

He pushed on at good speed to get clear of the trees.

He had been in the forest quite long enough to be tired of it, and his heart beat high with pleasure at the prospect of an adventure.

Scarcely a thought of danger entered his mind.

He had the prudence, however, to emerge from the forest stealthily, and to reconnoitre well, before he ventured to leave the cover of the trees.

It was not possible to see to any great distance, but he found all around him still and quiet.

His horse, after such an unusually long rest, was full of spirits, and the moment the highwayman relaxed the reins, bounded off at a swift gallop.

Tom's breast was filled with exultation, and he could have shouted, so much were his spirits elated.

"I will not only do all that I have promised to-night"

[TOM KING'S SINGULAR ADVENTURE IN THE LANE.]

he said, mentally, "but I will have an adventure, and find out what has been going on while we have been in the forest."

Tom did not hesitate about his course.

He made his way in a direct line across the country to Enfield Chase, his intention being, first of all, to obtain possession of the money that was buried there.

Great caution would be necessary, for his enemies might be suspicious that he was lurking in the vicinity.

Among the trees, however, it was easy to baffle pursuit, and Tom King was so thoroughly well acquainted with every inch of ground that he was quite confident he should be able to reach the little dell by the nearest course.

According to his favourite plan, he avoided all beaten roads, and took his way over the meadows, heedless of all the obstacles he met with.

At that time the distance from the borders of Epping Forest to the borders of Enfield Chase was very trifling.

But between the two places ran the great north road leading from London to York.

This Tom would have to cross; and when he found he was approaching it, he slackened his pace and advanced with caution.

That road probably, above all others, would be closely watched and guarded by his foes.

Nevertheless, if ever so good a look-out was kept, it would be quite possible for him to cross over unperceived, provided he took the precaution to reconnoitre carefully.

A tall hedgerow, dividing two meadows, running at right angles to the highway, afforded him an excellent cover.

Keeping close under the shadow which it cast, he bent his head well down on his horse's neck and crept slowly forward.

At length he reached its extremity, and found that he was only separated from the high-road by another hedge.

Dismounting and holding the reins in his hand, he crept up the little embankment forming the side of a watercourse, and peered through the twigs.

The road beyond he could see dimly and indistinctly.

No person was upon it, certainly.

He listened.

He started, but instantly recovering himself, he muttered:

"It was fortunate I stopped and did not continue my headlong course—the patrol is coming."

The steady tramp of horses' feet, proceeding at a walking pace, could be distinctly heard.

For a time Tom was puzzled to decide from which direction the sound came.

At one moment it would seem to come from the south, and then from the north.

It was odd that Tom should be thus puzzled, for he was well practised in such matters.

At least a moment elapsed before he came to a correct conclusion on the matter.

"Two troops are approaching this spot," he said to himself—"that's the secret. I will wait and see what happens next."

Louder and louder came the tramp of the horses' hoofs, and then the jingling of accoutrements rose on the night air.

"Dragoons, as I expected," said Tom.

On they came, steadily and slowly.

Tom's opinion was, judging from the position of the two troops, that they would meet somewhere near to the spot where he was concealed.

This expectation was fully realised.

Almost at the same moment, two stern voices cried out: "Halt!"—and then, as he continued to gaze between the interstices of the hedgerow, Tom perceived two small troops of light dragoons, each numbering about a dozen.

"Is all well?" said one of the voices that had cried halt.

"Yes, all is well," was the reply given by the other.

"Curse this work!" said the first speaker. "I wish my friends had thrown their money into the street, instead of buying me a commission. Bah!"

"It's a d—d shame," returned the other, "that soldiers and gentlemen should be called upon to do the work of dirty police officers! I'm sick of it. I'll sell out!"

During this speech, several murmurs arose from the men in both troops of a character that showed they disliked their extra duty quite as much as their superiors.

No more was said, however, by the officers in command. Discipline exerted itself over them, so they cried out:

"Silence in the ranks! Right about face! Quick march!"

The two troops faced about and retraced their steps.

Tom paused until they were almost out of hearing.

Then he exclaimed:

"Now is my opportunity. I shall get clear across and over the meadows long before they can reach this spot again."

He had found, while leaning against the hedge to observe the movements of the soldiers, that there would not be much difficulty in forcing a passage wide enough to allow himself and his steed to pass through.

Accordingly, he set about this at once, and soon had a gap large enough for his purpose.

He led his horse through and walked him gently across the road.

Fortunately for him, there was on the other side, and almost opposite, a wooden gate leading into the meadows.

Tom hastened towards it, but found it was locked.

A piece of rusty iron chain and a little padlock he felt determined should not turn him from his purpose.

Perceiving a large round stone close by, he lifted it up with both hands and dashed it with full force against the lock, which was demolished at once.

The gate creaked a little way open.

Tom entered the meadow hastily, and closed the gate behind him, for already he could hear sounds that indicated the return of the patrol.

Springing into the saddle, his horse darted across the meadow, and in a moment he was lost to sight in the darkness that prevailed everywhere around.

The country through which he had now to pass, in order to reach his destination, was rough and rugged.

There were few habitations in the vicinity, and no broad roads, so Tom felt that he could proceed with confidence and safety.

When, however, he perceived looming before him in the distance the huge trees which then stood proudly and nobly in Enfield Chase, he paused, for he felt the time had come when it was necessary for him to proceed with circumspection.

He considered that in all probability it was known they had of late been taking up their quarters in the Chase.

He had held long conversations with Claude and Jack upon the subject, who had told him how they had left Gubbins and Kibble secured to two trees.

It will be remembered by the reader that, in the hurry and confusion which took place upon their return to the Chase, the highwaymen quite forgot all about the two unfortunate police officers.

It was their intention, upon returning from the Old Bailey, to proceed at once to the trees and ascertain whether the officers were still bound to them; but Turpin's strange manner, and his sudden departure, and then equally sudden pursuit, not only prevented them from carrying out their resolve, but drove it completely from their minds.

Therefore, whether Gubbins and Kibble were still tied to the tree—whether they had managed to release themselves—or whether, by their shouts and cries for aid, they had attracted attention, the highwaymen knew not.

The only means of putting an end to that difficulty was by going direct to the trees.

Tom pondered a great deal over this, and, considering the length of time that had elapsed, he eventually came to the conclusion that the officers had managed to regain their freedom.

In the latter case, the Chase would, beyond a doubt, be carefully and closely watched, from the belief that the highwaymen were secreted somewhere in it.

"I will enter the Chase at the most difficult part," muttered Tom King, "that part which, above all others, they would expect me to avoid; then, as soon as I am fairly under the trees, I will make my way direct to the place which Claude and Jack described."

At the north-eastern extremity of the Chase stood a spacious and substantially-built mansion, surrounded by large grounds, which were carefully screened from the vulgar gaze by high brick walls.

These grounds, Tom knew, opened upon the Chase, and this was the route he had determined upon taking, despite the risk he ran of being seen by some of the inhabitants of the mansion.

Believing this to be a trifling danger, Tom King crept close along beneath one of the high walls of which we have spoken, until presently he came to a stout oak fence, between four and five feet in height.

Over this he made his horse leap, and then he found himself in the Chase, though at a great distance from the spot he wished to reach, which was situated in the southern portion.

However, he set off at a gentle trot, taking his way through the numerous glades, and passing round all the thickets and dense masses of undergrowth, instead of forcing his passage through them.

At length he paused.

"This must be somewhere near the spot," he exclaimed—"yes, surely this is it."

Tom looked carefully around him as well as the darkness would permit, and, from the minute description he had received from his two comrades, he felt quite convinced that he had arrived at the identical spot.

All around, however, was perfectly silent, nor could his eyes detect anything but the trunks of the old trees.

Alighting from his horse, he examined them one after another, and at last an ejaculation escaped his lips.

Lying near the two trees were several fragments of the rope by which Gubbins and Kibble had been bound.

But of the two officers themselves not the least trace remained.

They had completely disappeared.

"It is as I expected," said Tom King, "they are at liberty. Whether they freed themselves or were freed by others matters not in the least, in either case they would spread the information that we were here."

Taking every care and precaution he could think of, Tom King crept through the trees towards the little dell.

He reached it in safety.

He listened; but save the clashing of the branches of the trees, all was profoundly still.

The wind had dropped, and now rain descended with great violence.

"That will drive all to take shelter. I rather fancy," said Tom, drawing his cloak around him. "Now for the treasure."

He knew perfectly well where the money had been buried, and, removing the heap of stones which marked the spot, he began to dig hastily with his sword.

The ground was soon turned up, and then the treasure was revealed.

Altogether it represented a very considerable amount—more than sufficient, Tom felt convinced, to fulfil all their requirements.

He bestowed as much of the gold about his own person as he conveniently could, and the remainder he placed in the pockets underneath the flaps of his saddle.

Having removed the whole amount, he carefully filled in the earth and replaced the stones, so that there should be as little signs of the earth having been disturbed as possible.

By the time these preparations were completed the night was considerably advanced.

The rain, which had descended so violently, was but a shower, and now showed signs of rapid abatement.

But the wind rose again, and blew with unpleasant force, so that the weather was scarcely less disagreeable than it had been.

There would be little more than sufficient time to proceed to Tom, hand him the money, and return to the cave in Epping Forest, even supposing that he met with no interruptions on his way.

But Tom's heart was light enough, and the spirit of adventure strong within him.

He was delighted to think he had succeeded so far and so well.

Up to the present moment he considered his enemies had given him no trouble whatever.

Once again he mounted his steed, and, after having carefully reconnoitred, he ventured to emerge from the trees into the open country.

An hour's gallop across the country would take him to the house where Tom resided in Camden Town, then a small village lying quite away from London.

This, however, would doubtless prove a more dangerous route than that which he had previously taken, for the closer he drew to the metropolis the more vigilantly were all the roads guarded by police officers and dragoons.

CHAPTER DCLX.

TOM KING MEETS WITH AN INTERRUPTION ON HIS WAY TO PAY A VISIT TO TOM DAVIS.

SATISFIED that the coast was clear, Tom just grazed his steed's flank with his spur, and set forward at a greater speed than was exactly safe, considering the nature of the ground.

Ere going far, however, Tom found his further progress barred by another high-road.

He paused, just as he had done on a former occasion.

It was possible that he might have galloped clear over it without danger, but then there was a risk.

It would not do to go to Tom Davis's house with a troop of officers at his heels; and, in order to reach there, he would have to cross several high-roads.

For aught he knew, if the alarm was once given, it would be rapidly transmitted from one troop to the other; and, if they amalgamated their forces, he would stand but a very slight chance of escape.

Slightly parting the hedge, he listened as before for the tramp of horses' feet.

But all was still.

Suddenly, however, the silence was broken in upon, not by the sound he had expected to hear, but by another of a very similar character.

This was the grating, grinding sound produced by the rapid revolution of wheels over the miry road.

Tom listened.

"A travelling-carriage and four horses," he murmured. "What a speed they are making! Is not this a chance for a glorious adventure? Of course it is. Shall I embrace it? No, I think the danger is just a little too great. For myself I don't care, but I am entrusted with that which belongs to my comrades, and I should do wrong to wilfully run any risk of losing it. No, whatever this carriage may contain, it shall pass on unmolested so far as I am concerned. I will have an adventure, though, to-night, in spite of all circumstances, but it shall be on my return to the forest, after I have surrendered the treasure to the keeping of Tom Davis."

At the precise moment when Tom arrived at this determination the travelling-carriage came in sight.

He caught a glimpse through the hedge of a couple of flashing lights.

Then with a whirling rush, the vehicle swept by.

Just as it passed the spot where he was concealed, one of the windows was suddenly broken by some person within.

The crash made by breaking the glass was quite audible and Tom caught, or fancied he caught, a dim and indistinct glimpse of a female face at the carriage window, and also of a man's arm.

A low, smothered shriek, which seemed to have been stopped by the sudden placing of a hand before the mouth, next reached his ears, and then the carriage was gone.

For a second or two Tom King was so astonished at this strange and unexpected incident, that he stood perfectly still.

Then, with a sudden determination, he broke through the hedge, and dragged his horse after him.

Springing into the saddle, he said, half aloud:

"There's some poor defenceless girl in danger or distress, and, let the risk be what it may, I will do my best to be her protector. I should never forgive myself if I abandoned her to her fate."

With these words, and without any further consideration whatever, Tom King hastily clapped spurs to his horse and galloped off along the highway as though he was not running the slightest risk by doing so.

But Tom was always the champion and defender of beauty and innocence.

On the present occasion he was so firmly convinced that the female of whom he had caught such a transient glimpse was detained in the carriage against her will, that he lost sight of every other consideration.

Luckily for his safety, the travelling-carriage, after continuing along the high-road for a few hundred yards, suddenly turned down a narrow lane leading in the very direction Tom wished to go.

He knew the lane well, and was aware that it was one but little used by travellers.

That there should be any dragoons or police officers patrolling it was extremely unlikely, so, dismissing all anxiety from his mind, he renewed his efforts to overtake the carriage.

But, travelling at the speed it did, this was no easy matter, and a considerable time elapsed before he succeeded in placing himself abreast with the horses.

"Pull up, coachman!" he roared—"pull up! Or, as sure as you hold the reins in your hand I'll send a bullet through your carcass!"

The coachman paid no other attention to this threat than to give his horses a smart cut with the whip.

Then Tom hastily drew a pistol from his pocket, and fired in the air about a couple of feet above the coachman's head.

He was quite sure that the bullet could not have struck him, yet, nevertheless, wonderful to relate, the coachman uttered a howl, and fell off his seat.

He came down with quite a bang upon the hard road.

Then he rolled over and over with a rapidity that would have done credit to a professional tumbler, and finally fell with a loud splash into a deep and broad, but stagnant ditch by the roadside.

To stop the horses was now an easy enough task for Tom King to accomplish, and, in an incredibly short space of time, the vehicle was brought to a standstill.

One window of the carriage was then let down with a loud, rattling sound.

"Villain!—rascal!" cried a voice, hoarse with rage. "Who are you? By what right do you stop my carriage?"

Whether Tom intended to make any reply to this speech is doubtful.

At any rate, before he could do so, he heard a faint and stifled voice exclaim:

"Help—help!—oh, pray help me! Protect me from this man!"

"Ah, you will not be silent?" said the male occupant of the carriage. "Take that, then, for your obstinacy!"

The sound of a blow followed.

This exasperated Tom King to the utmost degree.

Slipping from the back of his horse, he drew his sword, and ran to the door of the post-chaise.

He turned the handle, and then the door was violently dashed open, and a young man, richly and fashionably dressed, sprang into the roadway.

There was an air of distinction about him—a haughtiness in his attitude, which, combined with the elegance of his apparel, convinced Tom King that he was of rank.

The young nobleman—if such he was by title—stopped as soon as he reached the ground, and turned his back to the door of the post-chaise.

At the same moment he drew his sword.

Holding it before him in an attitude of defence, he cried, in tones of the greatest rage:

"Who are you?—by what right do you bar my passage? Begone, and be thankful I have spared your life!"

Tom could not forbear giving utterance to a light laugh, which seemed to change the nobleman's rage into positive madness.

"You hold a lady prisoner in that carriage against her will," said Tom King, crossing his sword over that of the impetuous young man. "I demand her instantaneous release!"

"I have no words to waste on such as you!" cried the young nobleman, with unabated rage. "I hold myself accountable to no man for my actions, and no one shall interfere with me, except at the peril of their life! You will soon see how I shall dispose of your interference!"

So saying, the young man commenced a desperate attack upon Tom King, and our friend quickly found he should have some difficulty in parrying all the thrusts that were made at him.

In an instant he discovered that his unknown antagonist was a more accomplished swordsman than he had ever encountered in the whole course of his life before.

But, a sudden thought striking him, Tom King gave ground, and slowly retreated from his opponent.

To continue the conflict, it was necessary that the young nobleman should follow him up; and in doing this, he, as a matter of course, was compelled to remove from the position he had taken up at the door of the vehicle.

Tom wanted to draw him altogether away from it, and so he continued to retreat.

Step by step the young nobleman followed him up with great vigour, and by the look of his face it could be seen that his firm determination was to put an end to the conflict at once.

As soon as he imagined he had gone far enough, Tom stopped, and, after parrying a few thrusts, began to move round in a kind of circle.

He continued this manœuvre until his back was turned towards the door of the carriage, which was some few yards behind him.

No sooner had he gained this position than Tom King revealed his motive.

His voice was full of exultation as he cried:

"Now, lady, whoever you are, alight and escape. Fear nothing. Your abductor shall not reach you, except over my dead body!"

Tom almost paid for this with his life.

While speaking he had ceased to keep that close and vigilant watch upon all the movements of his adversary which was necessary to his own safety.

He slightly changed his attitude, and by good fortune received in his left arm the thrust which had been aimed at his heart.

"Beware!" cried the young nobleman with increasing furiousness, as he recovered and placed himself in an attitude of defence—"beware, I say!"

It would seem as though these words were addressed to the lady in the carriage.

If so, however, she paid no attention to them, for a slight girlish figure sprang into the roadway.

A loud growl immediately followed, and then a large, vicious-looking dog also jumped out of the carriage.

The young girl—for she was nothing more—after running for a few paces, stopped abruptly, when she found the savage brute was in pursuit of her.

"Beware!" cried the young nobleman again, his voice rising high above the clashing of the steel. "If you go a step forward that dog shall tear you down! Mind her, Venom—mind her!"

These words were spoken to the dog.

It was evident the animal understood them, for it crouched down as though in readiness to take a spring, and showed its white, glittering teeth.

Terrified beyond measure, the girl paused in her flight.

But for the presence of this animal she would before have shrieked aloud, or attempted to escape from the carriage, but her abductor, with many threats, placed the dog on the opposite seat, and assured her, if she either moved or spoke, it would spring at her throat.

When Tom called out to her, however, she believed she had a protector near, and so disregarded the threat.

But now she was afraid to move.

It took Tom out a second to comprehend the whole state of affairs.

"Unmanly brute!" he exclaimed, addressing his antagonist. "I could not find words to express my disgust!"

The young nobleman did not reply.

He made a feint and then a thrust.

With great difficulty Tom parried it.

For the tenth of a second, maybe, the young nobleman was off his guard.

Brief as was the time, Tom took advantage of it.

His arm was already shortened, and so he gave a sudden lunge forward.

Before the young man could step aside, or interpose his own blade, Tom's sword entered his chest; and such was the force of the blow, that the hilt of the weapon struck violently against him.

With a yell of agony, he sprang back, and then sank down upon the ground.

Seeing his master fall, the dog turned, in an instant, towards Tom.

He sprang at him like some wild beast.

But, watching for an opportunity, our friend, by one blow, clove the animal's skull in two.

Having wiped his sword on the brute's shaggy coat, he sheathed it, and then hastened towards the young girl, who, he could see, was ready to faint with alarm.

"Save me—save me!" she cried, as he approached; and had not Tom darted forward suddenly, and placed his arm round her waist, she would have fallen to the ground.

"Be under no apprehension now," he said. "Your abductor—for such I take him to be—cannot harm you now."

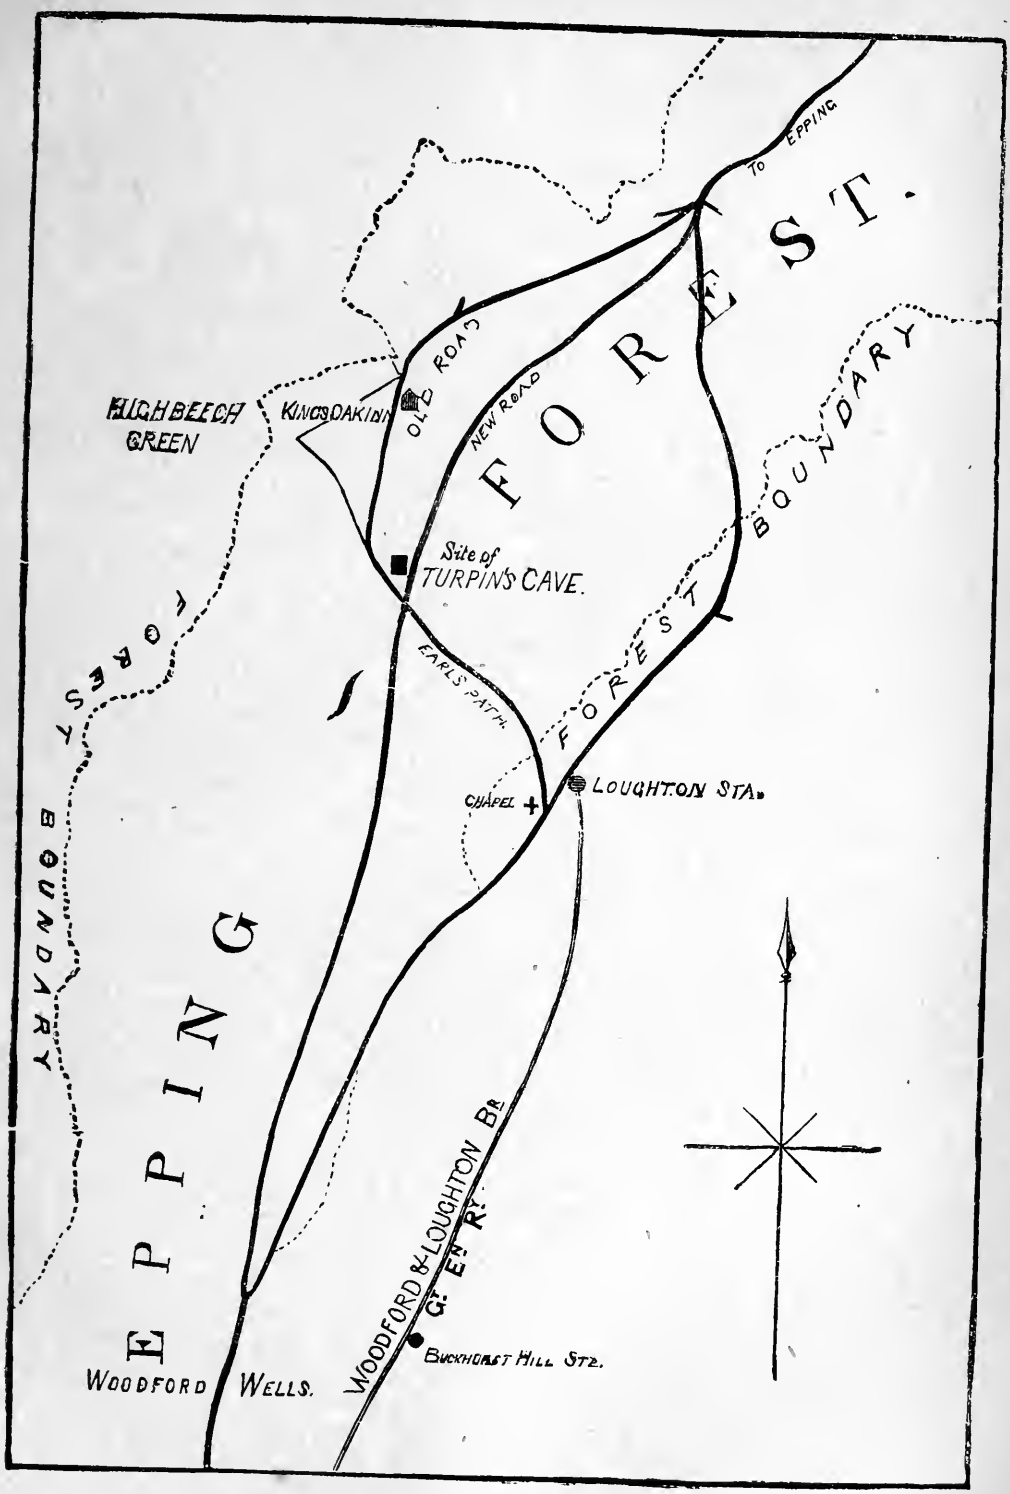
"Is he dead?" she asked, with a shudder.

"That I know not. If he is, he richly deserves his fate. However, that has nothing to do with you. Seek your own safety."

"Yes—oh, yes; I must return at once. My friends will be full of alarm on my account. With a specious tale, the villain allured me from my home; and I began to fear that I was lost, when the carriage stopped."

"Come, then!" said Tom; "recover yourself as well as you can. We must leave this spot. I shall be in considerable danger if I linger."

"But where shall I go?"



"I wish I could accompany you home," said Tom, "but that, I fear, is impossible. Come with me, however, to the top of this lane; you will then be in the high-road. That high-road is now patrolled by troops of light dragoons, and the officer in command will see that you incur no further danger."

"Thanks—thanks!" said the young girl. "I will follow your advice. You have saved me from a fate I shudder to think of. Accept this trifling gift as a remembrancer of our meeting; and although I cannot now express my thanks, yet tell me your name, so that I may know to whom I am indebted for my preservation."

CHAPTER DCLXI.

TOM KING RECEIVES SOME IMPORTANT INTELLIGENCE, AND HANDS OVER THE MONEY TO TOM DAVIS.

WHILE speaking these words, the young girl drew a ring from her finger, and held it out at arm's-length towards the highwayman

PLAN SHOWING THE EXACT SITUATION OF DICK TURPIN'S CAVE IN EPPING FOREST.
Distance of Cave from Loughton Station, one mile and a quarter.

"I accept your gift with great pleasure," he said, making a bow, "and I will always wear it in remembrance of you. As to my name, never mind what it is; I can't tell you my real one, nor the one by which I am known. Therefore, if you desire to remember me, do so by any name which your fancy may suggest."

This speech evidently was not what the young girl expected, for she drew back from Tom, and regarded him with slight distrust.

He noticed it, but affected not to do so.

"Come!" he cried. "The distance to the high-road is but trifling, and when once you reach it, you will be in safety."

The girl walked on beside Tom King in silence.

Not another word was exchanged until the end of the lane was reached.

Tom King had led his horse by the bridle.

He paused, and, having listened for an instant, said:

"Hark! Can you hear that faint, far-off sound? One of the troops I spoke of is approaching, so you will be safe—quite safe. And now, farewell!"

"Whoever you are," said the young girl, impressively, "accept my best thanks for the service you have rendered me."

"But my last speech was not so candid as you expected," said Tom King, interrupting her. "Well, no matter! I have interfered and prevented the consummation of a great wrong. For me, that is sufficient. And now, farewell!"

"Farewell!" said the young girl, pressing his hand tightly, for to her there was something charming in the mystery that appeared to hang over her preserver,—"farewell! And although you have chosen to keep your indentity a secret, and although I could almost guess who you are, believe me, I am not the less grateful on that account. Farewell!"

Tom did not speak again. but, springing into the saddle, waved his hand, and the next moment had trotted off down the lane.

The troop of dragoons, whose approach he had announced, was much too near at hand to be either safe or pleasant.

Tom did not go far down the lane, however. He felt an invincible repugnance to looking upon the scene of his adventure once more; so he leaped his horse over a hedge, and continued his course over the meadows.

Without the occurrence of any special incident which deserves our notice, he at length managed to reach the village of Camden Town without being seen by any of his foes.

The house in which Tom Davis resided was one of a small row of cottages lying some little distance north of the village.

It was a retired, out-of-the-way spot, and when Tom reached it the hour was such a late one that all the inhabitants appeared to have retired to rest.

Alighting from his steed, he opened the little gate leading into the garden in front of the house, and passed through it, his horse following him.

On the soft mould the horse's hoofs raised no sound, though they made sad havoc with the flowers, which Ellen had been at some pains to cultivate.

No light shone from any of the windows, and from this Tom concluded that the inmates had all retired to rest.

It was necessary that he should wake them, and without making any noise that would arouse the neighbours.

After hesitating a moment, he stooped down and picked up a handful of gravel-stones from the garden-path, and threw them gently against one of the upper windows.

He waited a moment, and then he saw some white, moving object through the glass.

Immediately afterwards the window was opened.

"Hist!" said a voice, which our friend recognised at once as belonging to Tom Davis—"who's that?"

Tom did not trust himself to speak for fear his voice should reach other ears, so he stepped back a couple of paces and raised his hat.

Dark as it was, Davis recognised him instantly.

"All right," he said; "wait five minutes, and I will be with you."

Tom nodded in token of assent, and then began to look around him for some place where he could dispose of his steed.

There was an arched passage or entry which divided the house in which Davis lived from the one adjoining.

This entry led to the back premises.

"I can't do better than put my horse in the back garden," thought Tom; "there will be much less danger of its being seen there."

Tom adopted this plan without further consideration, and, by the time he had secured the reins to a railing and returned to the front of the house, Tom Davis had opened the door.

Tom entered quickly, and the former landlord of the "Hand and Keys" produced a light.

"Ah!" he said—"is it you, Tom? I thought at first it was the captain."

"No, I have come from him with a message."

"I have been expecting one for a long time," said Davis. "I began to fear that the project had been abandoned."

"Not by any means. I have brought you to-night more money than you can possibly require for the purpose."

"I rejoice to hear that," said Davis, his face beaming with satisfaction. "I long once more to have an inn of my own."

"No doubt you do."

"Sit down—sit down," continued Davis. "I have some home-brewed in the cellar, and we will drink some of it before we part."

"I must not stay long," said Tom. "When I leave here, I have an hour's ride before me, and the road is literally beset with my foes."

"And no wonder. There has been a pretty commotion over your late exploits. It's a mystery to me how you have all escaped the close search that has been made after you."

At this moment the door opened, and Ellen entered.

Tom King was much struck by the change in her appearance.

The reader will remember that a long time had elapsed since he saw her last.

The greeting was a warm one, and Tom King was deluged with questions.

To these he answered briefly, and, as the reader is acquainted with everything that has occurred, there can be no necessity for giving his replies.

Ellen was sent down into the cellar for the home-brewed, and then Tom King emptied his pockets of the gold he had crammed into them.

Davis's eyes sparkled when he beheld so much wealth.

"Here is enough," he said—"quite enough."

"I have much more in the pockets under the flaps of the saddle," continued Tom King—"much more. You must understand it is the captain's wish that you should, if possible, purchase the inn out and out, and then we shall not be interfered with by any meddlesome landlord."

"I understand all about that. Still, there is more than will be required."

"That is my impression," returned Tom King; "if so, you can easily return it. And now I am anxious to learn what has taken place while we have been in hiding."

"Have you not heard?"

"Not a word. You are the first person I have addressed on the subject since we rode out of London."

"Taking Maud with you," said Davis. "Ah, well—there's one thing I much regret, and that's poor Jabez."

"Claude said he believed he had been wounded by the police officers."

"He was killed," said Davis. "It's a pity; we should have found him an excellent servant and a faithful ally."

"I have not the least doubt of that. What more?"

"Mr. Wriggles returned to London about an hour after you succeeded in getting clear off. He came back asserting most positively that Dick was dead—that he had been drowned in a stream, though, owing to the darkness, he had not been able to find his body."

"And what did he say when he found out his mistake?"

"I can't exactly say, but I believe he was uncommonly furious At first he could not believe it, but the whole of the circumstances were pretty soon proved to him, and he had no room left to doubt."

"And what has he been doing ever since?"

"Oh, he vowed vengeance against all of you, after his on fashion, and I believe he has been almost unceasingly employed in galloping over the country."

"And have you any more news?"

"Oh yes!" said Tom Davis, his eyes sparkling with satisfaction. "There has been a jolly row at Newgate; the authorities were in a desperate rage to think all their extra precautions should go for nothing. Also Mr. Cawthorn has been suspended," continued Tom Davis, "notwithstanding the powerful friends he has, who have more than once interposed to save him."

"A new governor has been put in his place, I suppose?"

"Oh yes, for the time being; but all the other men employed in the prison have been discharged, and a fresh lot employed."

"'Tis the old tale—eh, Davis?" said Tom King.

"Yes—yes; people are generally very careful to look the stable door after the steed has been stolen."

"That's just it, Davis; and the only thing we have to do is to avoid Newgate for the future."

"By all means. There's such a look-out kept now as was never dreamt of before, and your certain destruction would be the result of any attempt to get near it."

"And that's all?"

"Pretty nearly all, if not quite. The police officers are set to patrol in all directions, and so are numerous troops of dragoons. In fact, every road round the metropolis is closely watched."

"I can easily believe that, for I have had no little trouble in making my way here; still, I have come in safety. They have tried patrolling before, and it didn't answer; but I suppose they have faith in it?"

"Yes—that's just it," returned Davis, "and, for my part, I don't believe that the patrolling ever will do any good."

"You think the soldiers are disgusted at being set to such employment?"

"I do—in fact, I am quite sure of it. I don't say they would not capture you if they could, because the reward would be some little compensation to them for their trouble; and yet I don't know—they might like to set their faces against being turned into police officers."

"At any rate," returned Tom King, "I will keep clear of them. I shall not trust to that. And now, Davis, farewell! To you and old Matthew we leave the choice of the spot and the dwelling. All you have to do is to find us a safe place of refuge from our foes—some place to which we can go, and where we can remain just as long as we think proper."

"I perfectly understand you," said Davis; "and, all this time having been tramping all over the country, I believe I know just the place that will suit us; whether I shall be able to purchase it or not I don't know; however, I will try."

"Do so," said Tom King, rising to depart. "But, before I go, one word more."

"What is it?"

"We are in no particular hurry to quit our present hiding-place. I believe we should be secure there as long as we like to remain, only it is not very comfortable, you understand."

"I should think not."

"But don't on that, or any other account, hurry over what you have to do. Mind you choose a place that is in every respect well adapted to our purpose."

"Leave that to me," said Tom Davis. "I'll see to it; and now, as I suppose you are anxious to be off, farewell!"

"Farewell!" said Tom, "Yet stay, I have left my horse in your back garden. You must come with me, and I will give you the gold out of the saddle."

"All right."

Tom King bade Ellen adieu, and followed Davis into the garden.

Here he surrendered the money.

"There is no occasion for you to go round to the front without you wish to do so," said Davis. "At the bottom of the garden is a wall, not more than four feet high, beyond that is a bit of waste land."

"Thanks," said Tom, as he sprang into the saddle. "That will suit me much better. I wish I had thought of it before; however, no matter. Farewell, Tom, and be sure you give your attention to every word I have

Tom King bent low down in the saddle, and his horse, after three good bounds, cleared the wall at the bottom of the garden easily.

The piece of waste ground was quickly passed over, and then Tom muttered:

"I wonder, now, whether I shall be as fortunate on my return journey? At any risk, however, I must enter the forest unperceived."

CHAPTER DCLXII.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT DICK TURPIN'S CAVE IN EPPING FOREST.—TOM KING FINDS HIS RETURN JOURNEY FULL OF PERIL.

On a preceding page is given a plan drawn and engraved expressly for this work, showing the exact position of Dick Turpin's cave in Epping Forest.

Before going any further, the author wishes to correct a rather serious error which occurs in a former chapter.

It is there stated that the cave in which the highwaymen took up their quarters is still in existence.

Recent inquiries made upon the spot prove this to be a mistake.

In the chapter alluded to, the reader will remember mention was made of the various alterations which are being made in Epping Forest.

Upon such a large scale are they carried on that some change can be noted nearly every day, and before the face of some of these improvements Dick Turpin's cave has fallen.

The dense thicket with which it was surrounded has quite disappeared; but the large oak tree that grew by the side of it, and whose branches sheltered it, still remains, and serves to point out its exact locality.

This oak tree, then, it must be understood, stands within about thirty yards of the road leading to the King's Oak Inn, and is shown on the map by a black mark.

It stands just in the hollow of a hill, and in the next number an engraving of this tree will be given, taken from a sketch made on the spot during the present week.

The plan shows the various roads leading to the cave, so that by its aid the precise spot can be found with little difficulty.

The forest is easily reached by rail from London

The station at Loughton is shown upon the plan, and the distance is little more than a mile from it to Turpin's cave.

The drawing given in our next will enable those readers who feel sufficiently interested in the characters in this story to make a journey to Epping Forest, to recognise this one particular tree from all the rest.

It is much to be regretted that the cave has been demolished, but it is so.

It is a thing of the past, as the whole forest will be ere long.

But the oak tree still stands, and strange feelings must of necessity come over the hearts of those who, bearing in mind his long and eventful career, stand upon the same ground as Dick Turpin once did.

Most forcibly are we carried back to those old times when locomotion was tedious and difficult—to the days when a journey from London to York took almost as long as it does now to go from London to New York—when communication between distant places was well-nigh impossible, and when no scheme had been organised for the safe transmission of money, making it compulsory for all to carry their wealth from place to place about their own persons.

But this is a digression.

Few, if any, of our readers require to be reminded that we are not writing of the present day, but of a hundred and thirty years ago, when the whole framework of society was entirely different to what it is now.

Events which were considered every-day matters then would be deemed impossible now, and, indeed, would be.

But to resume our narrative.

We return to Tom King.

He had just given vent to an aspiration which was scarcely likely to be realised.

Nevertheless, he set forward carefully. He had had one adventure, and was satisfied.

Moreover, time was short, and it was in the highest de-agree important that he should enter Epping Forest before daybreak.

Much time had already been consumed. It was late when he started, and it behoved him to avoid, as far as he could, hindrances of all kinds.

After a little consideration, he came to the conclusion that he could not do better than to return as nearly as possible by the way he came. It certainly seemed to offer him a better chance of escaping his enemies than an unknown route.

In this way, then, he reached without accident the high-road into which the lane led in which he had achieved so terrible an adventure.

The same repugnance which he had felt before prevented him from entering it at all, or even crossing it.

He left it on his left hand, intending to cross the high-road at a point a little nearer London than where he had crossed before.

Upon arriving at the hedgerow, he waited as usual to ascertain whether any of the patrols were within hearing.

All was still.

Reassured by the silence, Tom made his horse leap into the road.

Scarcely was this done, however, before he heard a voice cry:

"Here he is—that's him! It must be him! Forward, my lads! This description quite agrees! I thought, if we waited, we should see him return!"

What more was said, Tom did not wait to hear.

He took the meadows again—changing his direction, however, for, finding he was about to be pursued, he did not attempt to make towards the forest, but took a northerly direction.

Turning his head to see who his pursuers were, he was much surprised to see a troop of dragoons emerge from the top of the narrow lane down which he had turned in pursuit of the carriage.

From their manner and appearance, as well as from the words he had overheard, it was evident they had been waiting there expecting his appearance.

But why was this?

Tom gave a second glance, and then his surprise ceased.

The girl he had rescued was among them.

Had she betrayed him to his enemies?

It seemed scarcely possible that she could be guilty of such black ingratitude to one to whom she had professed herself so deeply indebted.

But the present was no time for such conjectures as these.

The dragoons had taken to the meadows with great spirit, as though they intended to strain every nerve to effect his capture.

Tom pressed his horse hard, and soon had the satisfaction of perceiving that he was gaining upon his pursuers.

Still, it would take some time before he could get out of their sight and hearing.

He was exceedingly careful to keep to the open country, and to avoid crossing all high-roads, while, at the same time, he did not go in the direction of Epping Forest.

Although Tom King was so puzzled to account for the presence of the dragoons and the girl he had rescued at the corner of the lane, there is no reason why the reader should be left in a state of uncertainty and doubt upon the matter.

According to Tom's advice, the young girl besought protection at the hands of the officer in command of the approaching troop of dragoons.

He questioned her closely, and very soon elicited a full account of all that had happened.

Half terrified, and wholly unnerved, the young girl said things which otherwise she would not have thought of saying.

The upshot of this was, that the dragoons went first down the lane to the scene of conflict; and after what they saw there, they considered themselves justified in taking the girl prisoner.

The idea then occurred to the officer in command that Tom King would probably return by the same way he came.

Accordingly, he took up his position in the manner we have described.

His expectations were fulfilled, and he commenced a vigorous pursuit. But he made one mistake, and a very serious one.

"Now, my lads!" he exclaimed, "there's your game! After him, and bring him down! If you will take my advice, you will try to do it among you. We have had a good deal of trouble, and we ought to be recompensed for it in some way or other."

The men murmured an assent.

"Very well, then! Let us manage this affair ourselves. If you call in the aid of others, there will be so many to divide the reward amongst that your share will be just nothing at all. Do you understand that?"

"We do, captain—we do! Forward! We'll have him!"

There is a certain amount of avarice, more or less, in every breast, and so it caused the dragoons to fall into the same error as their leader.

Away, then, they went, at full speed; but strive as they would, Tom King continued to gain upon them.

Still they would not abandon the pursuit, but galloped on even after the highwaymen had got out of both sight and hearing.

Tom King continued on his onward course, taking every care to keep away from Epping Forest.

At length, however, he deemed it safe to pull up.

His steed was terribly exhausted, and unless it had some few minutes' rest it would be unable to proceed much further.

Tom listened, but could hear nothing of his pursuers.

Now, then, was the time to rest, and he looked about him for some convenient spot where he could remain secure—at least, from chance observation.

Almost immediately his eye rested upon a mass of brickwork.

It was a house in course of erection.

The carcass, as it is technically called, had been run up, and the roof put on.

This place, then, would serve admirably to shelter him and his steed from the cold, and no one passing by would suspect that he had chosen it for his hiding-place.

Accordingly he bent his steps towards it.

But when he came closer he was surprised to find what a general air of desolation and ruin hung about the place.

It seemed as though the workmen had discontinued their labours for a length of time—as though, indeed, the building of the house had been commenced, and, for some cause or other, never finished.

This did not trouble Tom King in the least.

On the contrary, he was rather pleased than otherwise to note the aspect of the building.

He dismounted, and led his horse through the half-formed doorway.

The interior was profoundly dark, or appeared to be so, but Tom King paused a few moments, and then, as he fully expected, he found himself able to make out the different objects by which he was surrounded.

One by one they appeared to grow out of the darkness.

Feeling sure he should be able to avoid any obstacles, he led his horse forward into the interior of the building.

The creature was much exhausted and covered with foam.

It seemed glad enough to stand still.

Tom trod upon something soft, and, stooping down, found it was wood shavings.

He took up a handful of them and rubbed his horse down.

As soon as he finished this task, he made his way to the front door and listened.

He was still unable to hear anything of his pursuers.

"They have missed me!" he said, exultingly. "I will wait a little longer, and then, if all is still, will gallop off to the forest. Surely I shall be able to venture upon doing so. How silent this place is. Ah!"

Tom King uttered this ejaculation suddenly, for, just while he made this reflection, the unmistakable sound of voices reached his ears.

Footsteps, produced by persons walking rapidly along, were also audible.

"Some one comes," he said. "Well, there is nothing wonderful in that, I suppose, for a kind of road seems to lead past this place. I will retire again, and wait till they have passed by; their presence cannot concern me."

Tom King placed himself by the side of his horse.

Even while he spoke these words, in his own mind,

[VIEW OF THE OAK TREE IN EPPING FOREST WHICH MARKS THE SITUATION OF DICK TURPIN'S CAVE.]

(From a sketch recently made upon the spot.)

was not so sure that the coming of these men did not concern him.

Although he had changed his position, he continued to listen, and presently was able to make out that two men were approaching, and that they were in earnest conversation with each other.

One appeared inclined to hesitate and draw back, the other to go forward.

"Come," said the latter, "don't hang back in that fashion—you act like a fool!"

"But I'd rather be out of this business, and that's the truth," said the other voice; "so you may as well let me go as have an unwilling hand at the work."

"Bah! I am ashamed of you! Think of the money we are going to handle. We have had part of it, you know, and, what's more, we spent it. The remainder must be had. Why should you be so squeamish? The job will be all over in less than no time."

"I don't know that."

"But you ought, so come on; whether or not, you must perform what you agreed to do—it is too late to retreat."

"Well, then, tell me how you intend to manage it?" said the other. "I shall be more content then, but, as it is, I don't relish the idea at all; he is an officer, and knows what fighting means."

"That does not signify in the least. You leave the arrangement of the affair to me, and you will find all will turn out right, and it will be the easiest-earned money you ever put in your pocket in your life."

CHAPTER DCLXIII.

TOM KING FRUSTRATES A PLOT AND SAVES THE STRANGER'S LIFE.

Tom King heard these words distinctly, and, as may be imagined, they awakened a strong interest in his breast.

He listened eagerly, so as to catch every word if possible.

Nearer and nearer came the two men, and he fancied they were about to pass by, when he heard one of them exclaim:

"This is the place, Joe. If it was made for us it could n't be better."

"What, this old house?"

"Yes, though it isn't old, for that matter; I rather call it a new one; at least, it's never been finished."

"Well, never mind that, I think it will suit myself."

"Of course it will, so follow me and don't be an idiot."

The two men entered the strange-looking building, and Tom King was in a great state of anxiety lest his horse should make some movement or sound which would attract the attention of the new-comers.

But the creature was so thoroughly tired out that it was only too glad to stand perfectly still.

The two men did not penetrate near so far into the dwelling as Tom did.

They remained in what was intended for the front room of the house, which was separated from the one at the back by means of folding doors.

They went close up to the window, and when they assumed this position, Tom King was able to catch a glimpse of them.

He could see their heads and the upper part of their bodies looking dark and dim as they were revealed against the sky.

"Are you ready?" cried the one who seemed to take the lead in the affair—"are you ready, Joe?"

"Yes, very nearly."

"Then rest it on here, like me—it will be steady then, and don't you see we can scarcely fail, for we have two chances."

"Yes, yes—I quite understand that, but I'll tell you what, it's the first time I have engaged in a job of this sort, and it will be the last."

"I shouldn't wonder," said the other, in a peculiar tone. "I think that is very likely indeed."

The words were uttered in a peculiar tone—so peculiar, that the man to whom they were addressed noticed them.

"I say!" he exclaimed. "What do you mean by speaking like that—I don't understand you?"

"Hush! don't bother. Listen, will you!"

Both men were silent, but, save the moaning of the wind, no sound came to their ears.

Tom King was rather in doubt as to their precise intentions.

They had said a good deal, but yet not sufficient to enlighten him.

That they were after no good was quite evident, and if they contemplated the perpetration of any act of villany he determined to interpose himself and thwart it.

He waited patiently, however, in the hope of hearing more.

It was too dark for him to observe all their motions, and he could only guess what they meant when they spoke of something as "it."

From time to time the men muttered to each other in an undertone, but their remarks were nothing more than a repetition of what they had said before.

At length the silence was broken in upon by a sound very familiar to Tom King.

The two men simultaneously exclaimed:

"That's him!"

The clear, ringing sound of a horse's hoofs became audible.

Some one was coming at a very rapid trot along the narrow road which led past the half-finished house.

Tom King came to the conclusion that these men were lying in wait for the approaching horseman.

This could only be for two purposes, either robbery or murder, perhaps both; either, however, should be frustrated.

"Mind all that I have said, Joe," one whispered to the other—"mind all that I have said!"

"Never fear for me," was the reply, in a growling tone. "I will do my share now I have gone so far."

"That's right. Now don't say another word until it's all over. He's close at hand now."

This was the truth; and the time was close at hand for Tom King to interfere, if he intended his interference to be of any service.

Stroking his horse on the neck, Tom crept on tiptoe noiselessly towards the window, or rather the opening intended for one, at which the two men had stationed themselves.

They were so intent on what they were about and in listening to the sounds of the horse's feet, that they never heard Tom King approach, or even dreamt that anyone was in the building besides themselves.

Noiselessly, Tom had drawn his sword, and with the glittering blade in his hand he crept forward.

His impression was, that the two men intended to fire upon the horseman as he rode by, and he was anxious to know with what kind of weapons they were provided.

A pistol he thought would scarcely answer their purpose.

Drawing nearer and nearer, he believed he could see resting on the brickwork the barrels of two guns.

A moment's reflection told Tom King that the best course to be pursued was to cause the men to discharge their weapons before the traveller arrived.

When the guns were discharged there would be no longer any danger to be apprehended.

He trusted to the effect the shock his sudden appearance would give them; therefore, in a loud voice, he cried out:

"Villains—rascals! Surrender—you are discovered!"

He accompanied these words by dealing a blow at the gun barrels with his sword, so as to cause their muzzles to be elevated in the air.

A yell of astonishment and fear burst from the lips of both men.

The strength suddenly appeared to forsake their limbs, and they sank backwards on the rough flooring.

But their fingers encircled the triggers, and, in the act of falling, the weapons were discharged.

Tom King was only just in time, for even as the men fell backward the traveller appeared.

The report caused by the discharge of the firearms was terrific, and shook the whole building to its foundations; indeed, the sound convinced him that they were blunderbusses the men had held.

The numerous missiles with which they had been charged expended themselves harmlessly among the brickwork and timber above.

"Help—help!" cried Tom to the stranger. "This is something that concerns you deeply!"

This cry was almost unnecessary, for the new-comer no sooner heard the report than he checked his horse abruptly, and alighted.

"What is it?" he cried, in a clear, firm voice. "What's amiss?—what does it all mean?"

"That question you will be able to answer better than myself. Help me to secure these men, who intended to assassinate you as you rode by."

The two villains by this time recovered from their surprise, and finding that their adversary was only a human being like themselves, they rose to their feet and made a rush to escape; but both were caught, nor could they release themselves, although they struggled hard to do so.

"Come on, you lubberly pirate," cried the stranger. "This way—let's have a look at you."

He dragged his prisoner out into the roadway as he spoke, and endeavoured to look into his countenance.

But the man averted his head.

The stranger was not to be baulked, however, and catching a glimpse of the other's countenance, he said:

"Why, is it you, Dick Roper? I always thought you were a crawling, cowardly hound, but I never thought you would attempt my life."

"You know him, then?" said Tom King, who succeeded in dragging the other into the road.

"I do," replied the stranger. "I can remember him from my boyhood. But who are you, sir, that have saved me from this cruel fate? I have only just reached the land, after a long and perilous voyage; it is hard to find oneself in danger afterwards on the shore."

"No matter for me," said Tom King; "chance made me acquainted with their designs. What do you intend to do with them?"

"That is more than I can tell."

"Have you any idea why they made this attempt upon your life?"

"None whatever."

"Tell me," cried Tom King, shaking the one he held by the throat—"tell me the meaning of this. If you refuse, you are a dead man this moment!"

"I will tell all, sir—I will, indeed—every word of it; but spare my life—do spare my life!"

"If you tell them anything," cried the one who had been named Dick Roper—"I say, if you tell them one word, I will murder you afterwards."

"I don't care," was the reply. "I didn't want to have anything to do with it; but I gave my word, and I was not allowed to go back. We were to have shot Mr. Fleming there as he rode past. We knew he would arrive to-night."

"A nice plot, truly; but you have something more to tell before I can spare your life."

"What is that, good sir?"

"The name of your employer. Who was it set you on to do this deed?"

The man hesitated a moment, but when he perceived Tom King bringing his pistol to a level, he said, quickly:

"It was Mr. Fleming's brother that set us on."

An ejaculation, expressive more of grief than anger, came from the sailor's lips.

"What say you to this information, sir?" asked Tom King. "What will you do with these two men now?"

"Release them," was the sad reply—"let them go. I can do nothing against them, although they richly merit punishment. But my brother——"

"True," said Tom King, understanding what was meant. "You could not fail to implicate him in the affair—and you don't wish to do that."

"No, that I don't."

The young sailor—for he was not more than five-and twenty at the most—was deeply affected.

He let go his hold upon the throat of Dick Roper, and said:

"Begone, miserable wretch—begone! But beware how you attempt anything against me another time. You know why I have spared you—go!"

Dick Roper did not rise, although he was free to do so.

"Mr. Fleming," he said, "this is generous behaviour on your part. I did not expect it. It has a good effect. It was gold that tempted me to undertake this job—nothing but gold. I was tempted, and I wanted money badly, but no sum, however great, shall ever induce me to raise my finger against you after this."

"I trust you will keep your word. I forgive you. Now go."

As though heartily ashamed of himself and overcome by the manner in which the sailor had acted, Dick Roper crawled away, and was quickly lost to sight in the darkness.

"Shall I release this fellow?" said Tom King. "He appears to have been an unwilling agent in the business."

"Yes—yes, let him go—let him go."

Mr. Fleming spoke sadly and regretfully.

Tom King did not hesitate about obeying these instructions, but immediately released his prisoner, who, overjoyed to escape so easily, darted away, and was lost to sight in a moment.

CHAPTER DCLXIV.

DESCRIBES THE MANNER IN WHICH TOM KING CONTRIVED TO PASS THROUGH THE TROOP OF DRAGOONS.

After this, a pause ensued.

Tom looked at the young stranger and saw that he was standing in an attitude of profound meditation.

He did not like to be the first to break upon the silence, nor did he desire to do so.

Although the exciting nature of the incidents that had just occurred were sufficient to drive all other thoughts from his mind, he nevertheless remembered that his pursuers were somewhere in the rear.

Whether they had abandoned the chase or not, or whether they had lost his track, he could not tell, and so he bent forward in a listening attitude, straining his ears to catch the slightest sound.

No heavy, dull shocks, such as would indicate the approach of a troop of horsemen, were audible, and therefore he began to breathe more freely.

How he was to reach Epping Forest without being perceived by any of the numerous troops of dragoons who were patrolling the high-roads he could not tell.

He must trust himself, as he had always done, to chance and to his own invention.

It was necessary, though, that he should set off at once, or he would be overtaken by the daylight.

Dawn was close at hand, though not so close as he feared.

These thoughts were running through his mind when the young sailor started.

He stepped forward suddenly, and with the cordiality of a seaman extended his hand, saying:

"Sir, I crave your forgiveness. It was negligent and wrong of me to forget your presence, but——"

"I have nothing to forgive," interrupted Tom, returning the friendly pressure; "I can understand your feelings full well."

"Perhaps you can, sir—perhaps you can. What I have learned to-night troubles me sorely, so much so that all that joy I felt at returning home has vanished, and I shall dread to take another step towards it. But why do I intrude these remarks upon you? You know nothing of my history. Pray tell me, sir, to whom it is that I am indebted for my life?"

"Surely that does not matter much," said Tom, with affected joviality. "I am what I am, and nothing more."

"A strange answer."

"You think so, no doubt. As I told you, chance made me acquainted with the designs of those two villains, and it was my duty as a man to thwart them."

"It was; and nobly you have performed it, though there are not many who would peril their lives in order to render assistance to some one they did not know."

"I have often done it," said Tom—"in fact, it's a custom with me. I sometimes think that by such deeds I atone for——but what am I talking of? Something that cannot interest you, and which, without further explanation, would be incomprehensible."

"There you mistake," said the stranger. "I feel the deepest, strongest interest in you. Don't imagine, however, that I shall allow such a service as this to pass unrequited."

"I need no reward," replied Tom, "and shall accept none."

"I do not wish to offer you any; but, so far as my experience goes, there is scarcely anyone who doesn't stand in need of a service of some kind. Is there anything that I can do for you in return for what you have done for me?"

Tom was silent.

He was considering, when all at once his keen sense of hearing enabled him to detect the approach of the patrol.

From the speed they were making, he did not believe them to be those who had given him chase. He concluded they must be others engaged in the regular duty of patrolling.

"Are you considering," said the stranger, "whether there is some service I can render you?"

"I am," said Tom, quickly, inspired by a sudden thought. "I always make it a rule to take no reward for such deeds as these; however, you can do me an important service."

"Name it—name it, then, at once!" cried the seaman, eagerly. "What is it? If it is in the power of man, I will do it."

"No doubt you will consider my request a very simple one; but it is not so in reality."

"Indeed? Go on; I am impatient to know what it is."

"Well, then, for the present, at any rate, you know not who I am; yet, I will say this much: I am a fugitive pursued by the officers of justice—no matter for what. The roads are patrolled by troops of dragoons, all anxious to capture or slay me. Hark! Do you hear that sound?"

Tom paused, for the trampling of horses' feet made itself audible with considerable distinctness.

"Yes," replied the stranger. "Horsemen are coming."

"They are my enemies!" returned Tom. "In order to reach a place of shelter I shall have to pass through many such troops. However, never mind that just yet. Our present business is with the one approaching."

"But I am considerably puzzled to know how I can aid you."

"A few words more will make all clear."

"Speak, then, for they are close at hand!"

"They are. When they see us upon the road together they will pause and question us. You, of course, will be in no danger—they will know they do not require you."

"Yes, I suppose that's true enough," was the reply, "for during the last five miles or so of my journey I have been perpetually interrupted by these fellows, who, after being made acquainted with my name, have allowed me to pass on."

"Just so. That is the way they treat all travellers in the hope of coming to the person they want at last."

"I understand. And you are that person?"

"I am one of them; for they seek others besides myself. Now, when these dragoons approach, if you will give them your name and vouch for me, saying that I am a particular friend of yours and on my way with you to your house, they will allow me free passage, and no suspicion will be aroused."

"Is that all?" cried the sailor in a loud voice. "Tip us your fin again! Why, damme, I'd do as much for anyone I met, let alone a friend who has shown himself to be such by saving my life. You're on the weakest side, ain't you, and isn't it natural for me to stand by you?"

"Then you will grant my request."

"I will. Didn't I say so? I'll pitch it pretty strong into those shore-going marines as soon as they reach us."

"Ten thousand thanks!" said Tom King. "We are now quite equal, for by doing this you will save my life."

"Look upon it as done."

"I will, for I know I can trust you. Mount your horse; I will do the like; it will then seem as if we are journeying onward."

"Agreed."

The freehearted, generous young man mounted his steed at once. Tom King led his own out of the half-built house and mounted too.

"Which is the way to the place of shelter you spoke of?" inquired Mr. Fleming. "That's the way we'll take."

"Nay, I cannot quite consent to that," said Tom. "Which is the way to your own home?"

"Never mind that!" was the reply, and Tom fancied that the words were followed by a sob. Mr. Fleming hastily continued, however: "I don't wish to return home now. My feelings have undergone a total change—all ways are the same to me; so, of course, I will take that which leads you to a shelter."

"You are too generous," said Tom, who could scarcely believe that he had found such a staunch, warm-hearted friend. "That's my way," he added, pointing towards Epping Forest.

"Forward, then," was the immediate response, and at a gentle trot the horses made their way along the road.

The dragoons were approaching, and, therefore, not many minutes elapsed before a meeting took place.

To say that Tom King wholly relied upon this expedient, or that he felt entirely at his ease, would be untrue. His breast was filled with anxiety, not only on his own account but on account of his new friend, for in the event of failure he could not escape punishment.

"Halt!" cried a voice, a moment afterwards, and, in obedience to the command, the troop of dragoons and the two riders stopped simultaneously.

"Another stoppage!" cried Mr. Fleming, with well-assumed anger. "Curse me!—but this is too bad, setting sail and anchoring every few minutes. This makes about ten times I have been stopped altogether."

"I am very sorry for it," said the chief dragoon, riding forward. "I cannot help it; our orders are not to let anyone pass unquestioned."

"Then you are bound to obey them!" said the sailor. "Give me obedience before all things!"

"So say I," replied the dragoon; "but it's d—d hard to find myself turned into a scurvy police officer."

"No doubt—no doubt! I suppose you want just what the other troops did—a declaration of my name, and some proof that I am the person I represent myself to be?"

"Just so."

"Then pray make haste! Tell one of your fellows to bring a lantern here to look at my papers; you will find 'em all right! My name's Fleming — Lieutenant Fleming, of his Majesty's Ship Aurora."

"I am very happy to make your acquaintance, sir," said the dragoon, with a bow, "although under such disagreeable circumstances. If you are desirous of making any speed, these perpetual interruptions must be very annoying to you."

"They are annoying—d—d annoying!"

"Well, I will not hinder you. Your papers have evidently been examined by the other troops, and all is well, or you would not have been allowed to proceed so far. So, to save you time, ride forward: I will consider the mention of your name sufficient."

"Many thanks, sir," returned Lieutenant Fleming, "and you will complete my obligation if you will extend the same favour to my particular friend, Mr. Roberts."

The name was uttered with a readiness that surprised even Tom King.

The reason, however, was simple enough; the lieutenant had a friend whose name was Roberts, and his presence of mind enabled him to utter it glibly.

"Certainly—certainly!" said the dragoon. "I would take your word for a great deal more than that. So far as I am concerned you and your friend may pass on, and I hope you will meet with the same courtesy from the other troops on the road; I warn you there are many of them between here and London."

This dragoon was evidently a gentleman—his civil mode of speech at once proclaimed it.

Moreover, in an indirect manner, it had so happened that he had heard of one Admiral Fleming, and he jumped to the conclusion that the young man before him must be the admiral's son.

"One word, however," said the lieutenant, "before we part."

"A hundred if you wish it. It is a pleasure to encounter a gentleman."

"Permit me to echo your remark. Your men are cold no doubt—pray accept this trifle, and allow them to spend it in grog at the next public-house they come to. And now, lastly, what's all this about?"

"Is it possible you don't know?"

"It is a fact, I assure you. Indeed, you will not think that wonderful when I tell you I did not land until yesterday. I have heard you were anxious to capture somebody or other, but I do not know who."

"Well, then, the fact is," answered the dragoon, "we are sent out to capture or slay four desperate, daring highwaymen."

"Highwaymen?"

"Yes. From all that I have heard, they are gallant enough fellows, and it's a pity, in my opinion, they did not take the King's money instead of going on the road. That, however, is neither here nor there. There are four of them—one known as Dick Turpin, another Tom King, another Claude Duval, and the other Sixteen-String Jack."

"I have heard of them all," replied the lieutenant. "There was no slight excitement about them when I set sail last."

"And there's more excitement than ever now," was the answer; "but, rely upon it, their race is over—their hours are numbered. They have been playing hell's diversion among the officers at Newgate, and such a storm is raised that nothing in the world but their deaths will quell it!"

CHAPTER DCLXV.

LIEUTENANT FLEMING TAKES TOM KING INTO HIS CONFIDENCE.

"WELL, I only hope you will make haste and catch them," said Lieutenant Fleming, "and so be rid of your disagreeable duty. Good night."

"Good night!" returned the officer of dragoons, and as he spoke the words, he drew aside and allowed the travellers to pass onward.

"You understand that you've saved my life," said Tom, when they had got out of earshot, "for, as you may easily guess, I am one of the four they mentioned."

"But which one? Surely, after knowing so much, you may as well tell me that."

"I will. I am known as Tom King."

"Known?"

"Yes."

"Then it is not your real name?"

"No—and excuse me if I keep that to myself."

"Well—well, you have a perfect right to do so, and I don't wish to pry into your confidence. And now tell me where it is you want to go?"

"To the town of Epping."

"Indeed! That happens strangely."

"How so?"

"It is there that my father lives."

"It is fortunate, then, that we can journey on together so pleasantly," said Tom. "I shall have the knowledge that I am not taking you out of your way."

"That would not matter in the least," said the lieutenant, his voice again becoming sad; "home will not see me this time—I shall be off to sea again at the first opportunity."

"You may know best," said Tom King, "what to do; but, so far as I can see at present, I fancy that would be a rash proceeding on your part."

"Why so?"

"If your brother is so unfriendly to you, it does not follow that the remainder of the family are so."

"You do not understand," was the reply. "Ours is a strange household."

"You have roused my curiosity strongly," said Tom—"very strongly, and your open, candid manner emboldens me to ask you a favour."

"What is it?"

"Before I ask it, let me assure you that I do not wish you to grant it unless you feel a desire to do so."

"I can guess your request, I think," said the sailor. "It is that I should give you a few words of explanation respecting what you have seen to-night."

"You have guessed rightly."

"Then, if you do feel such a desire, I am very glad. My friends are not near me, and at the present moment I feel badly in want of some one's advice. If you will listen to my story, perhaps you may give me a hint as to the best way for me to proceed."

"I will try my best," said Tom. "Understand, however, that before I took to the highway I was a gentleman. As to the occurrences which forced me to such a course, never mind. I am what you see, and can be no other; but my feelings have not altered, and any confidence you may place in me will be held sacred."

"Of that I have no doubt. I could tell before you spoke that you had at some time or other moved in a very different sphere to what you do now."

"Never mind the past," said Tom, bitterly. "Allay my curiosity."

"I will. My name, as you are already aware, is Fleming, and I am a lieutenant in his Majesty's service. My father still holds the rank of admiral.

"When a young man, my father married, and afterwards I was born. My mother died. Years passed, then my father married again.

"You see from this, that it is an old story I am going to tell you, and that it will possess little of interest."

"I am by no means sure of that," said Tom. "Pray proceed."

"My father's second wife had a son also, who was christened Edgar."

"Was that the brother of whom that rascal spoke?"

"It was."

"Then he is your half-brother?"

"Just so; and I thank Heaven there is no closer relationship between us."

"But the cause of this enmity which evidently exists?" said Tom. "What was it?"

"That is almost more than I can say, except that it was my father's second wife. You can easily guess which of the two was her favourite—I was not, certainly.

"She was a proud, defiant, domineering woman, and soon found means to make my father subservient to her will."

"Go on," said Tom, as the lieutenant paused. "I am anxious to hear the rest. To me, your story possesses an uncommon interest."

"Well, then, my brother Edgar was represented to everyone to be all that was good, noble, and exemplary—I, with what truth you may guess, was represented the contrary. Not only was this the case, but he was carefully taught by his mother to look upon me with an eye of hatred, to consider that but for me he would be heir to all the admiral possessed.

"You can comprehend no doubt the effect this would have upon a lad, and so you see I blame his mother more than I blame him."

"And no doubt you are right," said Tom. "Go on—don't let me interrupt you."

"By her subtlety, then, I received an evil name, and was considered to be no good by everybody; and when I was young, I frequently heard people remark, 'What a pity it is Frank is not more like Edgar.' These remarks rankled deeply in my heart.

"And so time passed on, and in succeeding years came another event, which caused the coal of envy that was smouldering between us to burst into a flame.

"Among the visitors who came to our house was a young girl, some three or four years younger than myself. In a word, she was beautiful, and I loved her. I had good cause to believe my affection was returned, and almost for the first time in my life I knew what it was to be happy.

"But my brother, who seems from the first to have been destined to be a blight upon my brightest prospects, looked with an eye of love upon our fair visitor as well, and so I was tortured with a thousand jealous pangs.

"I chafed bitterly under this, and one day spoke to her fiercely and impetuously. A coolness immediately arose between us, of which my brother availed himself to the utmost."

"And I suppose," said Tom King, with a bitter, mocking laugh, "that this girl returned, or affected to return his love?"

"I don't know that—jealousy answers 'yes,' love answers 'no.'

"In the midst of these perplexities I was shipped off to sea. It was my stepmother's doings. She had gained absolute command over my father, and he dared not disobey her commands.

"It was in vain that I expressed my disinclination to go. I was compelled."

"And is this the first time you have returned?"

"No—I have made my second voyage."

"I recollect now," said Tom, "you mentioned something of the kind to the officer of dragoons."

"I believe I did."

"And when you returned the first time—what then?"

"It was a miserable home to go to, and a poor welcome I received. My brother scowled and turned away, my stepmother frowned; my father, so long subjected to her influences, looked upon me coldly. The sum of my wretchedness was complete, when on the succeeding day I encountered Bessie."

"The girl you loved?"

"Yes—that was her name. She received me as coldly as the rest, and I turned away broken-hearted. By chance, however, I heard soon after that Edgar had been persecuting her with his addresses, and that he had not been received with any favour. She had assured me over and over again that she could not love him. I took heart from this, and visited her again.

"Not to linger over this, I will just say that, to the best of my belief, the misunderstanding between us was cleared away. She treated me kindly—sometimes, as I thought, affectionately.

"At length the time for my departure came; but for her, I should have been glad enough to go. Before I left I poured into her ears the confession of my love. She told me the evil reports and the scandalous rumours that were whispered about me. I ground my teeth to suppress my passion, and said to her:

"'Bessie, I will not contradict those rumours; I will not ask you for your answer now; I will go to sea. Let my actions prove me—judge me by them, and by them alone. When I return, I will ask you for your reply.'

"It was in this way that we separated—and now you know all.

"The hatred of my brother Edgar has increased rather than abated—it has become absolute insanity. By bribes he has won over that man to make an attempt upon my life. Can you form an idea of the disheartening crushing effect this has had upon my spirits?"

"I can, indeed."

"Now, however, believe me, I feel very different to what I did only a short time ago. So you see, making you my confidant has done me good, for it has raised my spirit. I will resist these wretches to the last!"

"And you are right," said Tom King—"perfectly right! And if you feel that I can be of any service to you in the matter, here is my hand; and though I risk my life a thousand times, I would back you up and do my utmost to assist you in gaining the victory. You cannot guess my reasons for this course, but I will tell you this: I feel as strongly upon the point as you do, for it was from a similar course of circumstances that I lost all, my affianced bride included, and was forced to seek my living on the King's highway."

CHAPTER DCLXVI.

TOM KING AND LIEUTENANT FLEMING HOLD A CONSULTATION AND ARRANGE THEIR FUTURE PROCEEDINGS.

Tom King pronounced these words with so much excitement, energy, and impassionment, that Lieutenant Fleming regarded him with the greatest surprise.

"You speak strongly," he said—"very strongly."

"I speak as I feel; and so, sir, if you are willing, I will in all ways aid you, either in council or by a strong arm and a sharp sword."

"You are generous," said the lieutenant—"generous to a fault, when I think that——"

He paused in some confusion.

"I know what you would say," added Tom King, hastily. "Never mind. Tell me—do you accept my services?"

"I would gladly do so, but that I feel I ought not to call upon you to place your life in so much jeopardy."

"Pho—pho! that's not worth a thought; I am so used to danger that I think nothing of it. In being with you I should probably run no more risk than if we parted."

"If such be the case, then, I embrace your offer gladly. Ten thousand thanks for your good-nature."

"Let us pass over the compliments and come to business. What do you imagine will be your first step?"

"I leave that for your decision."

Tom considered for a few moments.

"You are your father's eldest son," he exclaimed, thoughtfully, "therefore, in the event of his death, should that take place without his having made a will, you will be heir to all."

"Just so."

"It is impossible to say what may be the result of your visit to your home. Rely upon it, things are in a curious condition, or Edgar would not have adopted such a dangerous means of putting you out of the way."

"I understand," said the lieutenant. "You think, if there was a will in his favour, he would not trouble himself about me?"

"I think he would not run the risk of being found guilty of a murder."

"Then do you advise that I should return home at once?"

"No, upon second thoughts, you had better not."

"What then?"

"Where does this girl live—the Bessie of whom you spoke? Is it near your home?"

"About ten miles from it."

"Well, then," replied Tom, with the same bitter, mocking laugh that had grated so harshly on the ears of the seaman once or twice before, "as I have no faith in woman's constancy, I would recommend that you see her first."

"For what reason?"

"Why, you see that she might care most for whatever you possess. If she found you were cut off from the greatest part of your father's property, she would probably have nothing to say to you. On the contrary, if you went to the hall first and asserted your position, she might then be of a different way of thinking."

"No—no!" said the lieutenant, enthusiastically, "you wrong her!—believe me, you wrong her! You don't know her as I do. She would be incapable of such conduct."

Tom laughed again.

There was nothing mirthful in the sound, and it grated disagreeably on the lieutenant's ears.

"Take my advice," cried Tom—"go to her first, make her believe that you have nothing and expect nothing. If she accepts you, then she is worthy of you; if she hesitates, you will know what to do."

"I am not afraid to put her to the test," said the lieutenant, "and I will do as you desire. I am quite confident as to the result."

"There was a time," replied Tom, "when I would have said the same. For your own sake, I trust you will not be deceived as I was."

"You have met with bitter disappointment in early life?"

"I have, and in more respects than one. In your case, you may learn a lesson from my experience. You have taken me into your confidence—in return, I will tell you something of myself."

Briefly, then, Tom related the events of his early life—events with which the reader has been already made acquainted, so we will not set down his words.

"You see," he added, "that my faith was as strong as yours, yet it was broken. All women are alike, and it may be that the hesitation she has displayed has arisen solely from the fact that she was uncertain which would be better in a mercenary point of view."

The story Tom told made a very deep impression upon the heart of the lieutenant.

"I will test her affection," he said. "After all that you have told me, I should be filled with doubts, and it is better to have them set at rest, either one way or the other."

"Much the best," said Tom; "the pang may be sharp at first, but bear it."

"Still I have confidence in the result."

"I trust with all my heart that you will not be deceived."

"Now that I know all," murmured the lieutenant, "I do not wonder at your actions."

"Look," said Tom, breaking the thread of conversation, "the day is breaking, and yonder is Epping. I have something to propose."

"I am all attention."

"In your visit to this girl I can be of no service whatever—in fact, I shall be only in the way. Go there alone."

"Willingly, if you wish it. And you?"

"My three comrades are in a safe place of concealment. I promised them faithfully I would return by daybreak; if I fail to do so, they will imagine I have been captured, and in their anxiety to save me, they may bring destruction upon themselves; therefore, while you are absent upon this errand I will rejoin them, and snatch a few hours' repose; to-night at dusk I will meet you under that tree."

As he spoke, Tom pointed to a huge oak tree evidently many centuries old, that stood upon the borders of the north side of Epping Forest.

They were close to Epping, then a small village, consisting only of a few labourers' cottages.

"I am content to form any arrangement you wish," said the lieutenant. "It is kind and generous of you in the extreme to take this interest in my fortunes."

"Say no more about that. You may fill up the time between now and nightfall by making what inquiries you can about the neighbourhood; all information will be useful. I would meet you earlier, but the danger is so much greater if I venture out by daylight."

"Of course it is."

"And now before we part, one question more," said Tom King. "Whereabouts is your home?—is it far from here?"

"No, there it is, yonder."

The lieutenant extended his arm, and pointed to a handsome though antiquated-looking building, a little more than half a mile distant.

It had an air of great grandeur about it, and was surrounded by beautiful domains.

"That's my father's residence!" he exclaimed.

"Enough," said Tom, "I asked because I did not know whether it would be necessary to bring my horse; as it is so near he would only be an incumbrance. So I will meet you on this spot at nightfall."

"Agreed. Before we part, however, once more accept my thanks."

"All that I have done," said Tom, "has been done freely, and believe me, I even yet consider I am under an obligation to you; however, that point will not signify between us. Remember this is the spot to-night."

"Do not fear that I shall mistake it," said the lieutenant. "I know it well; I can remember it from my boyhood."

"We will then go straight to your father, and no doubt a little promptitude of action will set all right."

Again exchanging farewells, the two new but firm friends parted.

The lieutenant watched Tom disappear among the trees, and muttered:

"A noble fellow—a noble fellow! he should have been a sailor, not a highwayman!"

A shade of great anxiety then crossed his countenance.

Urging his weary horse onward, he took his way along the road in a westerly direction.

As soon as ever he found himself beneath the trees, a sense of great security came over Tom King, and without the slightest hesitation he made his way towards the cave.

He knew how anxiously his comrades would be waiting his return.

His strange adventure with the lieutenant furnished him with ample food for reflection.

At length, shortly before sunrise, he reached the appointed spot.

"Who's there?" said a voice, as he approached the enclosure—"who's there?"

"Tom," was the reply.

There was a crash of branches, and then Sixteen-String Jack stood before him.

"I am heartily glad you have returned," he said, "and so will be all the others; we were getting terribly apprehensive."

"All's well. I have succeeded much better than I could possibly have hoped for."

In another moment, Tom was surrounded by his friends.

They insisted at once upon having a full account of all that had happened to him; and while he was engaged in relating his adventures, Claude and Jack prepared the morning meal.

But the adventure with the lieutenant created the greatest interest in their breasts.

"I have promised to meet him at nightfall," he said. "So in the meanwhile I will get as much rest as I can, not that I anticipate any particular danger."

"Let us accompany you," cried Claude and Jack—"it is very possible we may be of service."

"It will not be necessary, I fancy," returned Tom, "and I should not like to displease my friend, and he might look upon your presence as an intrusion."

The point was urged no further.

Maud was much better, though not out of danger, and was with the greatest satisfaction that Dick Turpin learned the money had been placed in the care of Tom Davis, and that his scheme was in a fair way of being consummated.

He was growing tired already of a forest life, for there were many inconveniences attached to it, and he felt that nothing but stern necessity should induce him to adopt such a mode of life.

As for Tom, having related everything, and partaken of a good breakfast, he lay down to sleep and to ponder over the nature of the events that were likely to take place that night.

We take this opportunity to add a few words upon a subject which we believe to be a deeply-interesting one to our readers—the precise situation of Dick Turpin's cave.

The engraving on page 1129 is a correct and faithful representation of the oak tree marking the exact spot.

It has been sketched upon the spot—the view being taken from the north-west, and looking towards Earl's Path.

It is a massive, noble tree, and can easily be distinguished from the dwarfs around it.

About its root can still be traced some indications of the existence of the cave, for the ground is broken and uneven.

In order that there should not be the possibility even of anyone being disappointed after making the journey, by failing to find the tree, the writer—while the artist was engaged in making his sketch—occupied himself in cutting upon the bark of the tree the letter T.

He did this as well as the only tool he possessed—a small penknife—would let him. Still, however rude may be the carving, it will answer the purpose intended.

The tree may now be positively identified, and no one can be in doubt as to which is right, as might have been the case but for this precaution.

The spot where the tree stands is now comparatively bare, the trees having been cut down and the thickets removed.

In the year 1737, however, the period of our story, the cave was literally buried in vegetation.

One thing more remains to be stated.

The broad road near the oak tree known as the "New Road," has only been made recently. At the time of which we write the road to Epping lay past the King's Oak Inn. This is mentioned because at the present time the cave appears to have been situated in a very open, public place. This is only in appearance, however—every allowance must be made for the alterations wrought by time in the space of nearly a century and a half.

After this digression—if anything so germane to the story can be so called—we resume the regular thread of the narrative.

CHAPTER DCLXVII.

TOM KING KEEPS HIS APPOINTMENT, AND SETS OUT FOR THE ADMIRAL'S RESIDENCE IN COMPANY WITH LIEUTENANT FLEMING.

Tom's impatience was very great indeed, and no sooner had the sun set than he bade adieu to his comrades, and set out on foot through the forest to the appointed spot.

When he arrived there, the twilight had almost gone, and the shades of evening were deepening into night.

He did not take up his position beneath the tree, but paused in a thicket hard by, in a position that enabled him to command a view all round him.

Before the lieutenant could reach the tree he should see him, for, as we have said, he satisfied himself by a glance that he had not yet arrived.

Scarcely, however, had he made these preparations, and settled himself in this situation, than he perceived a dusky form wrapped in a cloak approaching.

It walked straight to the tree, and paused there.

Tom hastened forward at once.

A hand was extended to him, which he grasped cordially.

"I have been hiding myself for some time," said the lieutenant. "I did not like to linger near the tree, lest it should give rise to suspicion."

"You speak firmly and happily," said Tom King. "She has stood the test?"

"She has indeed," said the lieutenant, warmly—"bravely, nobly stood it! After leaving you, I put up at an inn not far from where she lives, and, having remained there some time, set out on foot to meet her. I was so fortunate as to encounter her alone. She started when she saw me, and a flush of colour came to her cheeks.

"'Bessie,' I exclaimed, 'I have returned. You remember the circumstances under which I left you. Judge me, then, by my actions, and answer the question I ask of you.'

Gently and timidly, she placed her hand within mine. That answer was sufficient.

"Don't think, however, that in the midst of the happiness I then felt I forgot the warnings I received from you.

"I thought to myself: 'Perhaps she has learned that my father has made a will in my favour, and that is the reason of the change in her sentiments.'

"'Bessie,' I said, 'before I ask you to confirm your answer, I have a confession to make. My father——'

"Then she interrupted me.

"'I know all,' she said—'I know all! Do not pain yourself by relating the particulars! Believe me, I know all!'

'I was thunderstruck when she spoke these words, and for the life of me could scarcely resist asking her what it was she did know. I found it necessary to proceed with caution.

"'Then, if you are in full possession of the facts, answer me—tell me, do you indeed love me?—are you willing to share my lot?'

"'I am,' she answered. 'No sooner did the intelligence reach me, than my mind was made up.'

"I was more puzzled than ever. I knew her naughty spirit, and if she once guessed my object was to test her affection, she would have discarded me at once, no matter at how great a cost to herself. However, I ventured to observe:

"'I am afraid you have not been correctly informed

"'I have—I have, indeed! The villany of Edgar—the baseness of your stepmother has been made known to me. I have learned that they invented all those charges that were whispered against you—I have found out the extent of their unnatural hatred!'

"'Indeed!' I said, breathing more freely. 'I find you are right, after all.'

"'I knew,' she said—'but, so far as your own interests and position are concerned, I am afraid you have returned too late.'

"'Not too late,' I said, 'if by tarrying I have come in time to receive the assurance of your love.'

"'I am almost certain,' she continued, presently, 'that your stepmother has taken the utmost advantage of your absence.'

"'How mean you?'

"'Your father has grown weaker, and got more under her control than ever. I have heard from the very best authority that he has made a will.'

"'A will?'

"'Yes; one made out through the importunities and under the supervision of your stepmother. You may guess it contains nothing favourable to you. The whole of the landed property and the whole of your father's wealth, with the exception of a small sum, has been bequeathed to your younger brother and your stepmother. You have been cut off through your unworthy and unnatural conduct.'

"'It seems, then,' I exclaimed, 'that you do indeed know all. I am a beggar! That was the confession I wished to make.'

"'And I wished to spare you the pain of doing so,' was her reply. 'Had it been otherwise, you might have doubted my motives. Rumour has been busy with my name. I have heard it said that I have been trying only for the position which a marriage with your father's heir would give me, and that was the imputation which kept me silent. As for Edgar, I have never loved him, though you once so wrongly and bitterly accused me of doing so. When I found that he was the heir, then my mind was made up.'

"Can you guess—can you form any idea of my happiness?" concluded the lieutenant, addressing Tom King. "Even though I am conscious that I have lost all, I am truly happy. It proves that her love for me is pure and disinterested."

"It is indeed," said Tom, "and, for your sake, I am heartily glad of it."

"You see," continued the lieutenant, "there will be no need to carry out our expedition to-night. Home is no longer a place for me. I am an alien, but I am content."

"What!" exclaimed Tom King, in surprise. "Have you decided not to visit your home?"

"I have. What good purpose could it serve?"

"I know not precisely. You may be intoxicated with joy at finding your love is so truly and so well returned, but do not on that account suffer me unjust to triumph. Your love should be rewarded."

"What, then, do you propose?"

"Simply that we carry out our original intention. Obtain an interview with your father—see him—speak to him. Do not suffer him any longer to be the dupe of a base, designing woman and her villanous son. It would be a crime on your part, were you to allow him to expire with such a film before his eyes as there evidently is. Do not hesitate, but come with me."

"You are right," said the lieutenant—"I feel that you are right. It would indeed be a crime upon my part! If my father proves himself deaf to the voice of nature, why, so be it; if he is really and truly content that things should remain as they are, I shall bow to his decision.'

"Certainly," said Tom; "but make the effort first to right yourself. By every law the property is yours and you should have it. You would turn it to a good purpose—he would only make an ignoble use of it."

"Come, then," said the lieutenant, "I am ready. Follow me."

"With all my heart," said Tom; "and it will not be my fault if this matter is not set right."

With rapid steps, the pair walked in the direction of the admiral's mansion.

"How shall you obtain an entrance?" asked Tom King, in a whisper. "For my own part, I fancy it would scarcely be advisable for you to go to the front entrance. You might be denied admission, or, at any rate, you might find it impossible to obtain a private interview with your father, which is essential."

"True; I did not think of that difficulty."

"Is there no means by which you could enter the house secretly? You know, of course, where your father's room, is situated. If he is alone in it, enter, and I will keep guard at the door and take good care that no one interrupts your conference."

"I remember now," returned the lieutenant, "that there is a window through which, no doubt, we can pass easily; and then, I fancy, there will be but little difficulty in reaching my father's chamber."

"That's the plan, then," said Tom King. "Keep under the shadow of these trees, it is important that we should enter unperceived. Show me the way to the window you speak of."

The lieutenant led the way, and Tom King followed closely in his footsteps.

They reached the house in a few moments.

Passing round one end of the building, the lieutenant paused before a window on the ground floor, that appeared to open upon a kind of lawn.

"Hush!" he said. "Be silent—be careful. This room, I fear, is occupied—there is a light in it."

"Creep forward cautiously," whispered Tom King, "and let us listen; it may be we shall hear something to our interest."

They approached the window as closely as they dared, and then peeped in carefully to ascertain whether it was occupied.

It was well for the success of their plans that they had taken these precautions.

Looking through the glass, Tom saw, upon the centre table, a large lamp burning, the wick of which had been turned down, so that only a dim light was diffused over the apartment.

His eyes instantly became fixed upon the two persons who were in it.

One was a stout, florid-looking woman, with light, flaxen hair, an ordinary countenance, and an ungainly figure.

Nevertheless, there was in her features and in her whole deportment an expression of haughty, domineering authority.

She was just the woman who, by artful cajolery would first attract the attention of a man, and afterwards convert him into a slave.

The other was a young man who bore so great a resemblance to the female just described, that Tom King had no difficulty in deciding that the pair were no other than Edgar and his mother.

Mrs. Fleming was standing up, gesticulating fiercely, while Edgar seemed irresolute and half terrified.

He was sitting in a dejected attitude upon a chair.

Tom concluded that his mother was endeavouring to instil into him some portion of her own confidence.

This, however, was nothing more than a surmise, but the point was one he determined to ascertain; therefore, he placed his ear close against the window, and listened intently, hoping to be able to make out the words that were said.

Anyone with less acute powers of hearing than he possessed would probably have failed.

At first Tom only heard indistinct murmurings, but this soon developed itself into articulate sounds.

CHAPTER DCLXVIII.

EVENTS OF AN UNUSUALLY INTERESTING CHARACTER TAKE PLACE AT ADMIRAL FLEMING'S RESIDENCE.

"FOOLISH boy!" cried Mrs. Fleming; "you have ruined all by your precipitation! Not only have you involved me, but yourself as well!"

"I can't help it now, mother!" growled Edgar in response. "It's done; I judged it would be for the best!"

"But you are not competent to judge, boy," said his mother, imperiously, and addressing him as though he was a child. "You should always consult me!"

"Well, what's the good of bothering about it! The plot failed, and he escaped! But where is he? Why has he not returned? What can his absence mean? How is it that he has not yet made his appearance at the Hall?"

"It is that which troubles me!" replied his mother, biting her lips. "I feel convinced that through your folly he knows all, and is now engaged, beyond a doubt, in devising means to destroy us!"

"It's your fault—there's some consolation in that!"

"What?"

"Your fault! If you had chosen to tell me that the old man had made a will in my favour, I should have been content, and not have taken such extreme measures."

"You are an idiot, and unworthy to be my son!"

"Come, come, mother—don't you call me any names, or you will find I shall give you back as good as you send. I am in a fix, but it is a great comfort to think you are in it as well as myself."

"Is it, indeed? But you shall repent of this in the long run. The will is made, and you will find I shall have considerable authority over you."

"Till I am twenty-one, mother, and no longer."

"We shall see. As for this unfortunate affair, perhaps we may hear no more of it. At any rate, it is no good grieving—we must make the best of it."

"I am glad to hear it," replied Edgar. "I thought you were going to cry about the spilt milk."

"No, fool—I was not. One thing, however, remains that must be done."

"Pray, what's that?"

"Your father has made a will."

"You told me that before."

"Its precise terms I shall not make you acquainted with, though I will say that your brother will find he comes off second best."

Edgar rubbed his hands with glee,

But yet——"

"There's something else wrong," interrupted Edgar.

"There is."

"What?"

"Your father has made the will——"

"Don't call him my father—say 'the old man,' or anything of that sort."

Mrs. Fleming frowned, and went on as though she had not heard her son's remark.

"But he insists upon keeping it himself, and obstinately refuses to give it up. Thank goodness! it is signed, and if we keep good guard, I don't know that there will be much to fear."

"Get it out of him, mother—get it out of him. You know you can always twist and turn him as you wish."

"I have tried and failed."

"Then you are losing your power—be careful!"

"We shall see," cried this bad woman, scornfully. "Thank goodness! the instrument is properly witnessed—there can be no cavilling about it hereafter."

"Then the sooner he drops off the hooks the better!" was Edgar's rejoinder.

"Come," said his mother—"let us go to him. You have almost as much power as I have—if we both entreat him at the same time we may get it."

"Does it matter so much as that?"

"It does. I can never rest until I have the will secure in my own possession. Now come and assist me to obtain it."

Sullenly Edgar rose from his seat and prepared to follow his mother.

"Confound you!" he muttered. "Why did you not tell me about this will before, then I should be free from all perplexity?—now I am all uneasiness."

The precious pair then left the room, and as soon as Tom King saw the door close behind them, he turned round to his new friend.

"Now, lieutenant," he said—"now is your chance. Come here!"

The young man looked very sad.

His noble, high-souled nature was evidently much pained by the preceding scene.

"To think," he murmured, "that I should have such a mother and such a brother!"

"Don't apply such sacred words to such unworthy wretches. But come—cheer up! The information we have learned is most important, and has amply repaid us for our delay.'"

"How so?"

"If you do not understand me I will explain presently—now is the moment for action. Come here!"

"What is it you want me to do?"

"You are more familiar with these premises than I am, therefore open the window noiselessly and enter—I will follow—then lead the way to your father's room."

The lieutenant made no reply further than going to the casement and opening it.

He stepped through into the room, and Tom King followed.

He closed the window behind him.

"Quick—quick," he said—"or we may be too late! In a moment of weakness your father may surrender the will to them, and then our task will be all the more difficult. Quick—quick!"

"Follow me noiselessly."

"I will," replied Tom King; "but take the most circuitous and least-used way to your father's chamber."

"I can do that," he said. "There is a little door opening from the library where he always sits that is but little used. There is a narrow staircase leading to it."

"That will be the place, then," said Tom, promptly. "Let us go there; we shall be able to see and hear all that goes forward."

This being agreed upon, the lieutenant left the room and crept noiselessly onward.

It was very dark; but he was so familiar with every turn in the old building that he could have made his way to any part of it blindfold.

Tom took hold of his cloak, and was thus enabled to follow him easily.

Otherwise this would have been difficult, for, in places, the darkness was extreme.

"Steps," said the young lieutenant, suddenly—"here are steps."

"That lead to the door you spoke of?"

"Yes."

"All right! Ascend them,—I am ready."

The lieutenant pushed open a door, and commenced the ascent of a narrow spiral staircase.

The top was quickly reached, and then the murmur of voices immediately reached their ears.

Both were extremely careful not to make the least noise.

From the plainness with which they could hear those within, they believed that even the rustling of their garments would betray them.

As silent and motionless as statues, they stood upon the little square space at the top of the steps, with their ears close to the panels of the door.

There was no difficulty in hearing every word that was said.

Just before taking up this position, Tom King had whispered to his friend:

"Let us listen. If your father is weak enough to surrender the will, we must interfere; if he does not, and they retire, you must enter. Rely upon it, if you can only have a few minutes' conversation with him, all will be well—he cannot forget the feelings of a parent."

The lieutenant did not reply, and in the darkness Tom King did not perceive that he shook his head sadly.

It was with considerable interest therefore that they strained their ears to catch every syllable.

A voice, which both immediately recognised as the admiral's wife's, exclaimed:

"But why persist in such a ridiculous determination? Let me have the will. Believe me, I will take care of it!"

"Or give it me, father," said the voice of Edgar.

"What is your motive for wishing to keep it yourself?"

"I do wish it, and so for once I am determined to have my own way!" said a voice, in tremulous accents, which Tom at once correctly concluded was that of Admiral Fleming.

"But I can see no reason in it,—it's absurd! Tell me, now, where have you put it?"

"It is safe."

"But I am not content with that assertion, nor is Edgar. It is of the utmost importance—as you ought to know full well—that we have possession of that most important document. Your unworthy son, in his rage and disappointment, may attempt I know not what!"

"Never mind," said the old man, doggedly. "I tell you the will is safe; and if you don't like to be content with that, you must remain discontent!"

"But, father," interrupted Edgar, "you will not refuse to give it me; or, I will tell you what I should like to propose."

"Listen to Edgar," said Mrs. Fleming—"listen to him. He is a sensible boy, and is full of affection for you!"

"Well—well," muttered the old man—"what is it?"

"You have drawn the deed up yourself, have you not?"

"Yes, I have. Your mother told you so, I suppose?"

"No, she did not. I only thought it because you have had no lawyer."

"Well, what then?"

"It may not be quite correct—you may unintentionally have omitted something of importance—something that may cause trouble and confusion in the future. Submit the will to a solicitor, and let him keep it in his charge."

"Well, well, I will see about that, my boy. I will think of it to-night, but not now—not now. Come to me in the morning—then I shall have made up my mind."

"Why not decide now?"

"No, I do not choose. I have been told that I have no will of my own—that you and your mother rule me completely; so now I am going to prove that such is not the case."

"Who told you that, sir?" asked Mrs. Fleming, angrily.

"That does not matter," said the old man. "Now leave me. I am busy, and do not want to be disturbed. Leave me—leave me, I say! Go at once; if you refuse, I will put the will into the fire!"

This threat appeared to sink deeply into the hearts of Mrs. Fleming and her son.

The former knew what extreme difficulty she had had in obtaining the document at all, and once destroyed, she feared she could never succeed again.

"We will go," she said. "Now, as always, your slightest wish is law to both of us. Foolish man, to trouble yourself with what envious people say! I trust you will think over Edgar's reasonable proposal."

With these words the pair left the room.

The listeners heard the door closed, and after that all was silence.

The lieutenant was deeply affected by this scene.

Tom pressed him on the shoulder.

"Come!" he said. "Now be firm—be a man! Enter—appeal to your father, and induce him to treat you with more justice—tell him all! Do not, from false notions of delicacy, shrink from it; it is your duty to tear aside the veil that obscures his vision!"

The lieutenant pressed Tom's hand, and then softly opened the door.

Noiselessly he glided into the apartment, leaving the door ajar so that Tom, as he stood upon the threshold, was able to command a view of the entire room.

Seated at an antique writing-table was an old man, who was closely muffled up as though the cold affected him.

At the moment the lieutenant entered, the admiral's elbows were resting on the table, and his hands pressed tightly against both sides of his face in such a manner as to cover his ears.

His eyes were fixed vacantly upon the book before him.

Owing to these circumstances he neither saw nor heard the lieutenant enter.

With an expression of profound melancholy on his countenance the elder-born approached the table and then stood still, gazing upon the form of the father who had treated him so harshly and unjustly.

CHAPTER DCLXIX.

MRS. FLEMING IS ENRAGED BY HER DEFEAT, AND SUMMONS THE POLICE OFFICERS TO HER ASSISTANCE.

A SLIGHT shudder came over the admiral's form, as though he was made aware by some sympathetic magnetic influence that he was not alone.

He suddenly raised his head.

An ejaculation seemed to rise to his lips and to die away there.

He sank back in the chair, gasping for breath, and with his face pale as ashes.

At length his lips moved, and in a low, faint voice he murmured:

"Frank—Frank, is it indeed you I see, or—or——"

"It is no spectre," said the lieutenant, coldly; "I am, or ought to be, your son."

"But—but——"

"Father," said Frank, "I have come here to ask you one question, and only one. Give me your reply to it. First of all, however, remember that I am your elder-born; remember I was forced away to sea; yet, nevertheless, I have won the good opinions of all. You see I have been promoted. I am now lieutenant."

Tom King, looking narrowly into the admiral's countenance, saw his eyes glitter.

"The question I am about to ask is this: I have heard that you have made a will—a most unjust, iniquitous will—one that will do me a lasting injury. You have cut me off from your possessions, and bestowed all upon your second wife and her son. Is this true?"

The admiral did not speak.

"I will take your silence as consent. And now, father, tell me whether it is by your own free will that you have made this disposition of your property, and, if you have disinherited me, what have I done to deserve it?"

Still the old man was silent.

"Enough," said the lieutenant. "I do not wonder that you are unable to reply. However, I do not intend to level reproaches at you, it is not a filial act, and I do not come here for that purpose. Ere I leave you, and for ever, I will tell you this—you can believe it if you think proper. Last night, your son Edgar, my half-brother, having planned and decided upon my assassination, employed two men—Dick Roper was one of them—to shoot me as I rode along towards this house. By the merest chance in the world, the project failed; I escaped, and they are now full of alarm on that account."

"Is—is this true?" said the admiral, finding his voice at last.

"Did you ever know me to tell you a lie, father?" was the response.

"But—but——"

"It seems incredible, you would say. It is true, nevertheless. I can produce a witness, or you can send for Dick Roper, if you consider my testimony insufficient."

"And does your mother know of this?"

"My mother?"

"Yes, boy, your mother."

"If you mean Mrs. Fleming, I say she did know of it, though, in justice to her, I must state that she did not obtain the information until afterwards. Edgar's own heart prompted him to the deed."

"And you are a lieutenant you say, my boy?"

"I am. Here are my papers."

"Then I believe you—I believe every word!" exclaimed the admiral, as he glanced at a packet his son handed him "Your character has been unjustly represented to me. Had you been what they have made me believe you to be you could never have been promoted so quickly."

"I am glad to obtain that acknowledgment from you, father. And you know, at the same time, it is through no influence of yours that I have been advanced."

"So much the better. I can see now I have been made a fool and a dupe of. What I heard to-day was no more than the truth, and I am thankful that I had the strength to make a stand against them."

"Give me your hand, father, for I feel that I am once more your son."

The admiral's emotion was very great, and his face was so ghastly white that the lieutenant grew alarmed.

"You are ill, father," he said; "this excitement is too much for you. Let me ring, and summon attendants."

"No, no—no, no—do nothing of the kind. I am all right. A little shock—but nothing. I can stand more than that. I have made a will, my boy. I had intended to do you a never-ending injury. Thank Heaven, it is not too late!"

Hastily the old man opened a drawer and took from it a folded paper.

"Look, here is the will, planned, devised, and only written by me at the dictation of—of—my second wife," he added, after a pause.

"And what shall you do with it?" asked Frank.

"You shall see. Behold, it perishes! As soon as the last scrap is consumed, all that I have is yours, as heir-at-law, with those exceptions that you know of."

While speaking, the admiral with nervous, trembling hands, held the will over the flame of the lamp on the table before him.

The paper caught light in an instant, and burst into a blaze.

"You see," he muttered, with a smile, "the flame is eager to devour it——"

The remaining words of his sentence were drowned by a shrill shriek.

Like some demented creature, Mrs. Fleming dashed into the room.

"Hold, foolish man!" she screamed, almost inarticulately. "What would you do?"

"It is done," said the admiral, in a loud voice—"it is done?"

With these words upon his lips, he sank back in his chair.

Mrs. Fleming clutched him by the arm.

Then, turning angrily towards Frank, she exclaimed:

"So, sir, you have improved! You steal into the house like some midnight robber! You have imposed upon your weak and foolish father. Don't think, however, that you will receive any benefit from this act! Look up!" she added, turning to her husband. "Tell him that you have made a will in favour of his brother."

The admiral did not speak, and so she shook him violently.

Then she released her hold, and, with a dull, heavy sound, the old man's head fell forward on the table.

Mrs. Fleming screamed.

"He is dead," cried Frank—"he is dead! Monster in female form, you have killed him!"

"Nay, it is you, unworthy son! But he is not dead. He cannot, must not, shall not die until a fresh will is signed!"

With rude violence she lifted up the admiral's head.

One glance into his countenance sufficed to show her that life had indeed fled for ever, and earthly matters would trouble him no more.

"Help!" she exclaimed—"help, help! You shall rue this deed! Frank Fleming, I accuse you of this! You have summed up your iniquity by murdering your father! I accuse you of the crime!"

"Woman," said Frank, angrily, and drawing himself up to his full height, "quit this house—and quit it instantly! I would have you know that I am master here!"

Mrs. Fleming laughed scornfully.

"That has to be tried," she said. "I know your father's intentions—he never meant that you should be his heir. I shall not leave, nor shall you, except in the custody of the police."

"Don't try me too far, woman!" cried Frank. "Do not drive me to the extremity of using force! But I solemnly declare, by all that is sacred, if you do not quit this house of your own will, I will eject you from it!"

"I will go, sir—I will go."

"Depart, then, at once!"

"Yet do not think that you have triumphed!" cried Mrs. Fleming, maliciously, as she moved towards the door. "You have yet to learn that I am not the woman to stand calmly and be trampled upon by you! I am going, not because of your threats and because I am vanquished, but to fetch the officers of police, into whose custody I repeat I shall give you for the murder of your father!"

"Begone, woman!" cried Frank, with great difficulty keeping his anger within moderation—"begone, I say, or I may be tempted to do that which I should afterwards regret!"

With a loud, mocking, derisive laugh, Mrs. Fleming left the room.

As soon as she had departed, Frank turned towards his father's corpse.

He called upon him by name, and raised his head, as if scarcely convinced that life had indeed fled.

This second inspection, however, removed all lingering doubts, and, harshly as he had been treated by his parent, Frank could not help feeling deeply affected.

It was at this moment that Tom King pushed open the door at the top of the stairs a little further, and entered the chamber.

He had forborne from doing so earlier, because there had been no necessity for his interference.

He judged, indeed, that his presence would have been looked upon by his new friend as an intrusion.

After the words he had heard Mrs. Fleming utter, he believed his best plan was to leave.

Therefore, he touched Frank upon the shoulder, and, when the lieutenant looked up, he clasped him by the hand.

"I congratulate you," said Tom, "on the success that has attended your visit! Your father did you justice at the last minute, and no more. As all is plain and straightforward, I must beg of you to allow me to depart."

"Why so? State your reasons."

"You remember the insane threats Mrs. Fleming made use of when she left the room?"

"About fetching the officers?"

"Yes. Whether she will execute her purpose or not, I cannot tell. She will act altogether from impulse, and there is no knowing what an angry, disappointed woman may not do. You must not think that I wish to leave you, or that I consider you are in any danger from the ridiculous charge she has made against you, but——"

"I understand you quite well," said the lieutenant. "You are quite right. The police officers and you would not agree in the same house together. I commend you for looking after your safety."

"Then, if it pleases you," said Tom King, "I will leave you now, and repair to my companions in the forest."

"You are at perfect liberty to do as you think proper, and yet——"

"What?"

"It may sound selfish and ungenerous to say so, but I wish you could remain and see the end of this affair."

"I will do so if you wish it."

"No, no—that is asking you to run too great a risk and making you a poor return for all you have already done. No, no—I am deeply enough your debtor already. Accept my best thanks, and I can say no more than that. When you stand in need of a friend, apply to me."

"That is quite enough," said Tom—"nay, too much! And now, farewell!"

"We will not part here—I must show you the way out of the building. Come, follow me!"

Lieutenant Fleming led the way out of the library by the principal door, which opened upon a large landing on the grand staircase.

Tom was about to address to him some remark, when suddenly a loud knocking at the front door below reached their ears.

Both started, so suddenly did the sound come upon them.

Tom stood still, and as soon as the heavy knocking ceased, he whispered:

"She has carried out her threat; depend upon it, they are officers who are at the door! Hark—hark!"

"Open, in the King's name!" cried a voice. "In the name of the King, I call upon every good man and true to allow his Majesty's officers to enter this house!"

Then followed another tremendous knocking.

"I must leave the premises in some other manner," said Tom, "and at once!"

"Stay an instant" said the lieutenant. "From this portion of the staircase we can command a view of the front door without fear of being seen. The servants will throw open the portal, beyond a doubt, and then we shall know for certain whether they are really police officers, or whether we have been alarming ourselves unnecessarily."

To this Tom assented, and they took up their positions accordingly

They were only just in time.

The front door was unfastened and flung open by a sleepy servant.

In a moment a throng of police officers poured into the hall, and in the midst of them Tom King and the lieutenant perceived the form of Mrs. Fleming.

CHAPTER DCLXX.

EVENTS AT THE HALL GROW MORE AND MORE COMPLICATED, AND A POLICE OFFICER DETERMINES TO TAKE A PEEP BEHIND THE SCREEN.

PERCEIVING this, Frank took hold of Tom King by the arm and led him back into the library.

But before they could cross the threshold they heard the voice of Mrs. Fleming below.

"Upstairs," she said—"upstairs! That is the door—the one facing you when you reach the first landing. Do not hesitate!"

"All right, marm," said a voice, with a strong nasal twang. "You've no call to be so wiolent and to excite yourself so much. Just allow me a minute to make my perperations."

The officer in command of this troop of police was quite a strategic general in his way; and so, before he attempted to ascend the staircase, he left several of his men posted about in various parts of the hall and lower portion of the mansion.

"It was in vain that Mrs. Fleming impatiently stormed, and bade him follow her up the staircase; he would not until all his preparations were complete.

In point of fact, this occupied only a moment, though it seemed much longer to the angry woman.

The young lieutenant closed the door of the library quietly behind him, and then, addressing Tom, said:

"What do you intend to do?"

"I scarcely know what to attempt," was the reply "Have you no means by which I could leave the mansion without fear of being seen by the officers?"

"I fear not."

"Then I will take the risk of concealing myself in this room; in all probability the presence of the police here has nothing to do with me, they have merely come in obedience to Mrs. Fleming's demands."

"You may depend that is it."

"Well, then," said Tom, "add still further to the obligation I am under to you."

"I will willingly do all I can to assist you."

"Then I will hide behind yonder screen. If it is you they seek, they will not think of searching behind there; if so, why, I must take my chance

You must do the best you can to remove their suspicions."

"I will. I don't think you have any cause to fear, for no one in the house has seen you but myself."

"Very true."

Just then there was a sound of footsteps without, and Tom King had only just time to step behind a large folding screen that was placed in one corner, when the door was violently flung open, and Mrs. Fleming and the officers appeared.

"There he is," she shrieked—"there he is! Look at him. There he stands, and there is his murdered father! Take him into custody this instant! I charge him with murder!"

It is a false, malicious charge," said Frank, "and one I am sure no men with common sense would listen to! I have just returned home," he added, addressing the officer, "and paid a visit to my father. He looked pale and worn, and, either from decay of nature or else from the shock of my sudden appearance, he has just expired, to that woman's intense mortification."

"Listen to me," cried Mrs. Fleming, "while I state the case. You see before you the profligate, outcast son of the admiral; he disowned him, and made a will cutting him off entirely from all his possessions. To-night the villain steals into the house, seizes upon the will by main force, destroys it, and then puts an end to his father's life."

Frank absolutely staggered back as he heard these words.

"It is false," he repeated—"utterly false!"

The police officer, however, seemed to pay great attention to the charge.

With a professional air, he walked up to the table, upon which the admiral's head still lay.

He raised it somewhat roughly.

The moment he gazed into the face of the corpse, he exclaimed:

"Ah, this looks like proof, indeed! Come forward, several of you and swear to what you see."

The men advanced, and the police officer, pointing to the forehead of the dead man, said:

"Look. Do you see that large, livid bruise? It was there when I raised him up."

"But it had nothing to do with his death," asserted Frank; "his body fell forward after he expired, and his head, striking upon the table, received that bruise."

"Be cautious, young sir, in what you say," cried the officer; "I am bound to caution you that all you say will be taken down and used against you in evidence."

"I do not fear my words," was the reply. "I speak the truth, and the truth only."

"Drag him away," cried Mrs. Fleming—"drag him away! I will not allow him to remain beneath this roof a moment longer!"

"Remember," cried Frank, "that I am still my father's heir. This house is mine, and I command you to leave it. As for you, sir," he added, addressing the police officer, "I am ready to surrender myself to you at any moment. For my own sake, I must insist upon having this affair thoroughly cleared up. The charge is, at the same time, malicious and false. I had no hand whatever in my father's death, unless, indeed, as I said before, the shock of my appearance has killed him."

"Then, if I understand rightly," said the chief officer, with some respect, "you are heir-at-law to all the admiral's possessions?"

"I am. And now," he added, as a fresh thought struck him, "I will turn accuser. I command you to take that woman into custody, and also her son Edgar; the first charged with using undue influence with my father to induce him to write a will disinheriting me; and the other, charged with attempting my assassination. Now look to it."

The officer was rather bewildered, and he looked first from one and then to the other.

At last he exclaimed:

"My duty, then, in this case, is clear and plain enough. Without taking you into custody and removing you from this house, I will remain and keep guard over you. In the morning, the magistrates shall be assembled, and the case inquired into."

"I am quite willing to consent to such a course," said Frank. "I do not fear the result."

His manner formed a marked contrast to that of Mrs. Fleming.

She turned ashy pale, and trembled.

She was well aware that the charge of assassination preferred against her darling son could be substantiated in every particular, and the result of that she could see plainly enough.

In those days the attempt at murder was punished by death, and the thought of her favourite boy ascending the scaffold was too much for her to bear.

"Now, marm," said the officer, "have you any objections?"

"Yes, I have," she answered. "Frank—Mr. Fleming, will you listen to me?"

"Speak on, woman."

"If you will withdraw the charge you have just made against me and my son, and suffer us both to leave this house in peace, I will withdraw that which I made against you. Reflect."

"Are you in earnest?"

"I am."

"Then I consent, provided you sit down at the table and write a document to that effect."

The wretched woman was only too glad to comply with this demand.

Advancing to the table, she wrote a few lines hastily to the effect mentioned.

"Now, sir," said Frank, addressing the police officer, "take up that paper and read it."

He was obeyed.

The officer read as follows:

"I, Matilda Fleming, most solemnly declare that the charge of murder made by me against Mr. Frank Fleming is altogether groundless and without foundation, the said charge being prompted only by malice and disappointment.

(Signed) "Matilda Fleming."

"Do you mean this, marm?" said the officer.

"I do."

"Then," he added, "it is my duty to take you into custody for making a false charge."

"Do nothing of the kind," said Frank. "Madam, leave this house at once, take your son with you, and never let me see or hear anything of you again. Now begone, or I shall change my determination."

"But I can't let them go," the officer blurted out.

"You must," said Frank, "for I positively decline to make any charge whatever."

"But you have made it."

"Then I recall it. No notice must be taken of those hasty words."

Mrs. Fleming hurried out of the room, went up to her son, and poured in his ears such a narrative of Frank's intentions as frightened him almost to death.

He was only too glad to fly with her.

The officer scratched his head, much puzzled.

"D—n me, sir," he said, "if I can understand all this! I perceive you're left in possession. There'll have to be a coroner's inquest, and all that sort of thing, which I have nothing to do with. There's no good to be done by me in the matter. Now, Mr. Fleming, I have a communication to make to you."

"Say on, sir. But, first of all, just listen to a brief explanation of all that you have seen."

In a few words, Frank made the officer understand the state of affairs; and when the young man had finished, he professed himself extremely satisfied.

"It will be all right," he said—"all right; there will be an inquiry, which I said before—but you have nothing to fear from that."

"And now what is your communication to me. Be brief, and then you and your men are free to share the hospitality of the mansion."

"Many thanks, sir, but we have certain information that Tom King and another of his associates have been lurking round this building. Then they disappeared; so we infer they have entered it, of course for the purpose of committing a felony. Well, sir, we were coming here to search for them when we were met by Mrs. Fleming."

"And what do you wish to do in the matter?" said Frank. "I fear your suspicions are groundless."

"Not quite so. However, that, with your permission, I shall quickly ascertain. I have posted my men all round this house, and in various parts of the grounds, so that no one can leave without being seen; my men are also stationed in the lower parts of the building. I can now begin my search with the certainty of doing some good by it."

"You are heartily welcome," said Frank, biting his lips, "to search this house in any way you think proper. I believe you are mistaken, but that point had better be cleared up."

"Certainly, sir; and after the search, whether successful or not, I trust you will renew the offer you kindly made respecting the hospitality."

"Depend upon that," said Frank; "I will give orders at once for a substantial meal to be prepared."

The officers were all profuse in their acknowledgments.

"You can begin your search now," said Frank, not without a little uneasiness in his breast. "Here is this room where my father was sitting when I entered. He had occupied it for some time. I have never quitted it since I first came in, so it is pretty clear those you seek are not in this apartment."

"Quite clear," said the officer, glancing keenly all round him. "But they are remarkably clever chaps, I can assure you. Many have tried their hands upon them without result. Well, they are certainly not here, without they happen to be behind that screen; and, in case they may be, I will, with your permission, take a peep."

CHAPTER DCLXXI.

THE POLICE OFFICERS ARE ALARMED BY A MYSTERIOUS SOUND, AND DISCOVER THE SECRET PANEL IN THE WALL, BEHIND WHICH TOM KING IS CONCEALED.

THE lieutenant's heart fairly ceased to beat when he heard these words pronounced.

He looked upon the destruction of his friend, to whom he owed so much, as certain.

He was powerless to afford the least assistance.

If he placed any obstacles in the way of the officers, or raised any objection to their proceedings, the only effect would be to involve himself in a web of difficulties without rendering Tom King the least amount of assistance.

As for the highwayman himself, he set his teeth hard, and determined not to surrender without a desperate resistance.

Beckoning to his men to follow, the chief police officer walked towards the screen.

The lieutenant grew desperate.

How should he hinder him?

At the very last moment a sudden and excellent thought darted into his mind.

The library was illuminated by a large lamp standing in the centre of the table.

When the officers had their backs turned towards him, the lieutenant suddenly upset it.

There was a terrific crash of broken glass.

In an instant the whole apartment was plunged in the profoundest darkness.

"Help—help!" cried the lieutenant, as though he was injured. "Help—help! Oh, what is this? Mercy—mercy!"

The crash—the sudden extinguishment of the lamp, and the lieutenant's cries, were all sufficient to fill the officers with alarm and confusion.

The darkness was profound, and, by a mutual impulse, they all stood perfectly still.

Some time elapsed before the chief officer could recover himself sufficiently to speak.

At last he managed to say, in trembling accents:

"What—what's the matter? What has happened?"

There was no response.

The alarm increased.

All remembered that a dead man was in the chair at the table.

Had he anything to do with the fall of the lamp?

That was the question they asked themselves.

Accustomed as they all were to look upon death in almost every shape, they were on that occasion, in the darkness, paralysed by fear.

Tom King was not a little astonished at this event, but he had the presence of mind to stand perfectly still, for he guessed at once it was part of some plan of his friend to rescue him from his perilous situation.

Immediately afterwards he felt himself grasped by some one.

It was the lieutenant.

Having upset the lamp, and having, as he believed, succeeded in thoroughly alarming the police officers, he slipped on tiptoe across the carpet in the direction of the screen.

Being familiar with that room, he had no difficulty in making his way across it noiselessly in the darkness.

He seized Tom by the hand, and gently drew him out from behind the screen before the police had in the least degree recovered from their panic.

Knowing the necessity there was for silence, Tom followed his conductor on tiptoe.

He had not many steps to go.

The lieutenant paused.

He felt with his hand against a panelled wall.

Suddenly and silently a tall, narrow door opened.

He thrust Tom through the aperture, and whispered faintly:

"Remain here till you hear further from me. Believe me, you are safe."

The door the lieutenant had opened was a secret one, and secured by a spring.

He knew that whenever it was closed there was a loud snap, and he endeavoured to shut it as gently as possible.

Still, a slight sound was produced, which he endeavoured to conceal by crying out:

"What does all this mean? Where are you all? A light—a light, I say!"

This reached the ears of those without, and the door of the library was thrown open.

Those who came brought lights, and, when they entered the apartment, a singular-looking scene was presented to their view.

The lieutenant was standing near the table.

The large lamp was lying in fragments on the floor.

The policemen, with an expression half of alarm and half of bewilderment upon their countenances, were huddled together in a throng near the screen.

"Bring the lights this way!" cried the lieutenant.

"What is it—what is it?" cried all the police, who no longer felt apprehensive now that the darkness was removed.

"I can scarcely tell you," said Frank, "further than just as you were about looking behind the screen the lamp was dashed aside, and I felt myself grasped tightly by some one."

"Who—who?" they all cried.

"That I have no idea," he said. "It startled me, and, therefore, I cried out."

"It's all right," said the chief officer—"I can understand it."

"Can you indeed?"

"Yes; Tom King is somewhere about these premises—I am convinced of that! Now, my boys, let us search—let us look behind this screen!"

The officers did so, but, of course, were unrewarded for their trouble.

They searched eagerly all round the apartment, and when they came to the little door, through which the lieutenant and Tom King had gained admission, they flung it open.

"Aha!" they cried. "This explains the mystery—he is down here!"

It was a very natural conclusion for them to arrive at, and so, without another thought upon the matter, they darted pell-mell after their leader.

In their excitement, they forgot all about the lieutenant, who took care to maintain his position near the table.

When he was satisfied that all were some distance down the staircase, he crossed over to one portion of the wall and tapped against it.

He placed his lips close to the wood-work, and said:

"All is well so far; but the danger is not over yet! Don't make a movement until I come to you!"

He did not wait for a reply, but returned to his former position.

After a moment's reflection, he decided to accompany the officers in their search.

Therefore, he sped swiftly down the staircase.

At the bottom, he found them standing all together, holding a consultation, which, by the expression of their countenances, seemed to be a serious one.

"I tell you I have been standing here all the while," said a voice, "and nobody's come down those steps excepting you—that I'll swear to!"

"Well, he's in the house somewhere, rely upon it! Keep a good watch! Still, we will continue our search! If he is anywhere on the premises he must eventually fall into our hands!"

With great vigour, the officers continued their search.

For upwards of an hour, they ransacked, as they believed, every hole and corner in the building.

But without result.

At the end of the time mentioned, they all met in the entrance-hall, and looked at one another with disappointment on their countenances.

"He don't seem to be here," said one, "and, besides, what has become of his companion?"

This was a question they were not likely to answer satisfactorily.

It was just at that moment that Frank appeared, and he said:

"The refreshment I spoke of is now quite ready. You will find the table laid and everything waiting for you—you can partake of the meal or not, just as you please; you may either have a snack now and renew your search, or finish, and have something to eat and drink afterwards."

"Many thanks to you, sir," said the chief officer; "but we are quite faint and tired, and—that is if you will let us rest for a little while—we should with your permission be very glad to begin the search afresh, for we are by no means certain that he is not on the premises."

"You are heartily welcome to search as much as you think proper; in fact, I shall not be satisfied myself until you have gone carefully over every part of the house; they may be cunning enough to conceal themselves while you are here, but as soon as you have departed they will show themselves."

"Depend upon that, sir," said the officer—"depend upon that."

The prospect of a good meal quite revived their spirits.

Frank led the way into one of the lower rooms, where a very substantial meal had been spread upon the table.

They were pleased to see that there were several flagons of foaming ale as well as bottles of spirits on a side table.

The owner of the house evidently intended to regale them in first-class style.

They sat down, and in a very little while all were most busily occupied in satisfying their appetites, which, to judge by the quantity of food consumed, must have been voracious indeed.

The more they eat, and the more they drank, the more good-tempered they got, until after a time they forgot almost all about Tom King—that is to say, those did who were seated at the table doing justice to the good things upon it.

It must be understood that the commanding officer had taken the precaution to divide his men, one half being on the watch while the other half sat down.

At length those who were on guard were relieved from their duty, and those who had satisfied their hunger were put in their place.

It was now growing towards morning, and a slight drizzling rain was falling, which made it very uncomfortable for those whose duty it was to remain outside.

It was many a day since they had had such a glorious feast, and they felt more inclined to lie down and sleep off the effects of it than they did to act the part of sentinels.

No alarm was given, and the second portion of the troop was regaled in safety.

Suddenly, however, a terrific uproar was heard upstairs.

It sounded as though ten thousand hammers were at work all at once.

The chief officer had occupied a seat at the table during the whole of the time, so that now his intellects were in rather a confused state.

Nevertheless he started to his feet upon hearing the knocking, and called to his men to follow him.

They did so with unsteady steps.

"The library," he said—"the library; that's where the noise comes from! Hurrah!—perhaps we shall have them yet!"

Tumultuously they dashed into the room.

It was vacant, for the corpse of the admiral had by Frank's orders been removed to another chamber.

The whole place was filled with the hammering noise, and the officers looked round about them in stupid surprise, unable to tell from what particular spot the noise proceeded.

The blows were so continuous that they filled the whole apartment.

Suddenly the chief officer, who had been listening intently, cried:

"Here it is—this is the way! I know the spot where the knocking is—this is it!"

Uttering these words somewhat incoherently, he rushed across the room towards the secret door behind which Tom King had been concealed by Lieutenant Fleming.

CHAPTER DCLXXII.

TOM KING ENDEAVOURS TO MAKE HIS ESCAPE FROM THE ADMIRAL'S MANSION.

In order to explain the cause of the mysterious knocking, it will be necessary to advert to the proceedings of Lieutenant Fleming.

Having seen the officers all seated at the table, and busily at work devouring the comestibles upon it, he took an opportunity to withdraw.

Summoning the servants, he ascended the staircase and entered the library.

By his directions, the body of the admiral was, as we have already hinted, removed to another chamber.

This being done, he closed the door, and, satisfied that he should be free from interruption, tapped gently against the panel.

Tom knocked in reply.

Then, pressing upon the spring, the secret door flew open.

"I think I may congratulate you," said Frank; "the danger, I believe, is over."

"Is it so?"

"I think I may venture to say it is. I have induced the officers to sit down and regale themselves after their long search; they are now busily engaged in devouring the good things before them."

"But they are still suspicious?" said Tom.

"They are; and you must use great circumspection."

"And what about those who were spoken of being outside? Do you remember the chief said that he had posted his men all around, so that no one could leave the premises unobserved?"

"I recollect that perfectly well."

"Then how have they arranged matters?"

"Thus: those who conducted the search are now sitting down to the meal. As soon as they have finished they will be sent outside, and those who have been guarding before will come in for their share of eatables."

Tom nodded.

"I should recommend you to wait where you are until the guards change; believe me, I have taken every pains to let them have unlimited quantities of ale, and wine, and spirits—they are fond of them, I know, and therefore——"

"You think I shall stand a better chance of eluding them?" said Tom, interrupting him. "Well, so do I. Let me again say how heartily and entirely I am obliged to you."

"Don't mention it—don't mention it, if you please; we'll look upon it as a mutual obligation; I do all this freely and spontaneously."

"I believe it," said Tom; "and I regret that the time has come when we must part. I assure you it is a long time since I found so agreeable a companion."

"We had better not begin to compliment each other," said Frank; "we should rather keep more serious matters before our minds. Now, listen! I have an important communication to make to you!"

"What is it?"

"At the back of the recess in which you have been standing is another secret door more cunningly conceived than the first."

"Indeed! I had no suspicion of such a thing."

"No one would; but in old mansions of this kind, you know, there are always such things as these. The construction of this strikes me as being most admirable."

"Admirable indeed!" said Tom.

"Should by any chance the first secret door be discovered, and the recess revealed, you, I fancy, would think of looking for another secret door leading elsewhere."

"Exactly."

"And, in your case, you will find that second door leads to safety."

"I am glad to hear that. Believe me, I have been exceedingly anxious to know in what manner I should leave the mansion."

"All may be easy—at least, I hope so."

"What, then, is this communication that you have to make?"

"This: on the other side of the second secret door is a long flight of steep stone steps; they descend quite to the foundation of the building. You must descend them."

"And, I presume, at the bottom I shall find a subterranean passage?"

"Yes; I could tell you, if I had time, a strange tale about that very subterranean passage. It was used by an ancestor of mine during the reign—if I may so call it—of the usurper Cromwell, but it is now out of the question."

"I understand how you mean to serve me," said Tom. "This subterranean passage has an opening at some distance from this spot?"

"It has. When you reach the bottom of the steps, you will find a low door. It will yield to a touch. You will then be in a long, narrow, but straight passage. Follow it fearlessly until you reach its extremity."

"I understand perfectly."

"Now, then, for the means of egress. This is a most important point indeed. For many reasons I should be very sorry if the existence of this passage was suspected."

"Rely upon my caution," said Tom. "I will pay the utmost attention to all your directions."

"I have no doubt of it. At the end of the passage, then, you will find its height decrease so much that you will scarcely be able to stand upright. Over your head is an iron trap-door, and now for the means of raising it."

The lieutenant stepped into the little secret recess, and, pressing another spring, caused a little door about six inches wide to fly open.

"This," he said, "was intended as a repository for wealth. Large sums have from time to time been concealed in it. Now it is used only to keep this."

As he spoke, the lieutenant held a singular-looking instrument, shaped somewhat like the key of a large clock.

"Take this," he said, "and at the extremity of the passage, in the wall which bars your further progress, you will find, a little way from the ground, a small hole. Fix this key into it, and then, putting forth your strength, turn the handle round and round in the same way as you would use a windlass."

"Go on," said Tom, perceiving that the lieutenant paused. "Believe me, I am all attention."

"I do not doubt it. I was only anxious to know whether you entirely comprehended my meaning. We have time now for conversation, because the guard has not been changed. But you must remember when once you are down in that subterranean passage it will be too late for you to make any inquiries."

"All is simple and clear enough at present. What will be the effect of turning the key round in the manner you have described?"

"It sets in motion some simple yet ingenious machinery which raises the iron trap-door above. At each revolution you will hear a clicking sound. You may then let go of the handle with safety, and the door above will not descend into its place, being kept there by a ratchet attached to one of the wheels."

"And how many revolutions must it perform?"

"That depends in a great measure on yourself. As you turn the handle round you will see the trap-door above rise rapidly; when you find there is space enough to crawl out, do so."

"And," asked Tom, "is the trap-door level with the ground? or by what means is it concealed?"

"It is level with the ground, and on the top of the iron door is a good thickness of turf, and the closest scrutiny would scarcely discover its existence. The turf is cut all round to the shape of the door, so that when you raise it the turf rises also, and when the door falls the turf falls also, and the ground presents a level, undisturbed appearance."

"A most excellent contrivance."

"It is indeed, and you must understand that the piece of turf that I have mentioned is near the centre of a kind of thicket or shrubbery, some little distance from the mansion."

"I understand all now," said Tom. "A thousand thanks for your kindness! My safety I now look upon as assured—the officers will never find me there."

"I think not; but you must be on your guard. You are mistaken, however, in thinking you know all—there is one thing more to which I must request your particular attention."

"And what is that?"

"When you emerge, you will find that the trap-door has been raised, and is held in its position by a notched bar of iron. This bar you must give a smart stroke to the effect of which will be to remove one of the notches from the iron point on which it rests, and the great weight of the door will cause it to fall into its place."

"Rely upon it, I will carry out your instructions in every particular," said Tom.

"All that will then remain," added the lieutenant, "will be to take care how you emerge from the thicket; and when you have done so, and have no fear of being seen, make your way back to your own place of refuge."

"I will," said Tom. "But hark!—what's that?"

Some kind of commotion was going on in the large hall, and the lieutenant hastily stepped on to the landing to ascertain the cause of it.

"It's all right!" he said. "Those men who have finished their feast are about to leave the house and relieve their comrades. Those who are outside will be anxious enough to come in, I'll warrant; so that you may reckon upon the guard being changed in a very few minutes."

"I will wait," said Tom, "until the other men come in."

"It would be better, no doubt."

The police officers took their departure, and a pause of several minutes ensued.

Then those who had been on duty in the grounds made their appearance.

The lieutenant informed Tom of their arrival, and told him that they were all seated at the table, without a thought of anything except of making a hearty meal.

"The time, then, has come," said Tom, "for me to say farewell. Good-bye! In all probability we shall never meet again. Yet I shall always remember the great service you have done me. Good-bye."

"Farewell," said the lieutenant. "I regret the parting quite as much as you do, but it is inevitable."

Again uttering the word "farewell," the lieutenant opened the secret door, and allowed Tom to pass through.

He furnished him with a small wax taper; and with this in one hand and the singular-looking implement in the other, Tom King descended the spiral staircase.

The door above was closed upon him with a sharp snap.

He experienced much regret at this parting, but the feeling soon wore off as his curiosity was excited by the different objects around him.

The darkness in that place was so thick and palpable, that the wax taper signally failed to disperse it.

It seemed more like a tiny twinkling star shining through a huge black cloud than aught else. Feeling his way more than seeing it, Tom King cautiously descended, for the steps were slippery with moisture, and in some places overgrown by a kind of moss, which was very treacherous to tread upon.

Without any accident, however, Tom King traversed the whole of the secret passage until he came to its extremity.

"I would give much," he muttered, "to know whether there is an officer above; if so, an alarm will be made."

There was no help for it, however—the risk must be run.

He had no means whatever of ascertaining what was going on above.

Stooping down, he quickly found the hole of which the lieutenant had spoken.

The handle fitted into it easily, and he commenced turning it.

[CLAUDE DUVAL RELATES HIS EARLY HISTORY TO HIS COMPANIONS.]

He found it required a considerable exertion of strength, but each revolution of the handle caused the trap-door above to rise about an inch, so that he very soon found the fresh air blowing on his face.

CHAPTER DCLXXIII.

EXPLAINS THE MEANING OF THE VIOLENT HAMMERING UPON THE SECRET DOOR IN THE LIBRARY OF THE ADMIRAL'S MANSION.

As soon as this happened, Tom suspended his operations.

As the young lieutenant told him, the trap-door remained raised, and looking up, he caught sight of the faint, dim light surrounding it.

Before going any farther, he resolved to make the attempt to ascertain whether any of his foes were near at hand.

With this view, he took hold of the edge of the trap-door with his fingers, and drew himself up until his eyes were on a level with the ground.

All around was very dark and misty-looking, and, after several seconds' observation, he concluded that no one was at hand, and that it would be perfectly safe for him to emerge.

Again, therefore, he turned the handle, and in a few moments had the pleasure of finding the trap-door raised to a height sufficient to enable him to crawl out.

He extinguished the taper, and then, with little trouble drew himself up and scrambled out.

Before he could rise to his feet, however, some one sprang upon him.

Although taken so by surprise, Tom King did not lose his presence of mind in the least.

He knew that his first effort must be to prevent his assailant from giving the alarm to his comrades.

With great suddenness, then, he seized his aggressor by the throat, and with such tightness that the police officer was unable to articulate a sound.

But he was a determined man, and possessed a tolerable amount of courage.

He was resolved his prisoner should not easily escape him, and, had the officer been perfectly sober, Tom King would have stood rather a poor chance.

That one circumstance made a very great difference, and Tom King's superiority soon manifested itself.

All at once, a new thought darted into the highwayman's mind.

There was one effectual means of disposing of his antagonist.

Summoning up all his energies, he flung the officer to the ground, and, before he was aware of what he was about, Tom thrust him between the ground and the edge of the trap-door.

The officer's disappearance seemed almost magical, it was so sudden.

Tom heard him fall with a dull, heavy thud upon the ground beneath.

Then all was still.

Bearing in mind the instructions he had received, Tom King kicked the piece of iron that supported the trap-door.

Down it went with a rush, and then the ground presented quite an ordinary appearance to look at, especially by the dim light there was around.

No one would imagine the existence of any such place.

The officer had been almost strangled, and the fall through the trap-door into the passage beneath deprived him of what little consciousness he had remaining.

In a short time, however, he recovered his consciousness.

At first all was a blank, and then, with the suddenness of lightning, he remembered everything.

Some horrible curses broke from his lips.

"I am down in this rat-hole a prisoner, I suppose!" he exclaimed. "Of course it will be no good for me to try to reach the open air! He has made all secure in that quarter, I'll be bound! But he must have come from somewhere, that's quite evident."

And uttering these words, half aloud and half to himself, the officer groped his way along the passage, which he was easily able to do, for, by extending his arms, he was able to touch the earth on both sides.

On he went, meeting with no accidents, for really there were no obstructions in the way.

Had not his intellects been quite so confused, that officer, courageous as he was, would scarcely have ventured to walk so boldly and rapidly in the darkness along a passage that he knew nothing about.

Besides which, his excitement was so great that he quite forgot he carried with him a dark lantern, and had the means of procuring a light in his pocket.

Suddenly he encountered the door that we have mentioned as being situated at the bottom of the steps.

He was rather awkward in opening this, but at length he succeeded, and groped his way up the secret staircase until he reached the top.

He was convinced that the other extremity of the passage was now reached, for in front of him was evidently a panel of wood.

He was well aware that just beyond must be one of the apartments in the mansion.

He passed his hands rapidly all over the piece of woodwork in front of him, but failed to find anything resembling a fastening.

All was perfectly smooth.

A deep silence, too, prevailed around, and the darkness seemed to grow more and more intense.

Then the terrible thought occurred to this officer that, after all, his position might be far more dangerous than he at first imagined.

"In all probability," he told himself, "the passage terminated in some little-used portion of the mansion."

He was aware from experience that all such places were very strongly constructed, and he might have great difficulty in forcing his way out.

The more he thought about this, the more uneasy and troubled he became

"My comrades are in the house now," he said. "I will attract their attention if I can. When they leave, the people who live here may refuse to hear me."

Growing more and more alarmed each moment, the police officer drew a large pistol from his belt.

It had a solid, formidable butt, mounted and inlaid with brass.

Seizing hold of the barrel of this weapon, he hammered away with great force and vigour upon the piece of wood in front of him.

But so strong and substantial was that inner secret door, that it did not even shake beneath his blows.

As he found no notice appeared to be taken of this summons, a cold sweat started out upon his brow, and, feeling perfectly desperate, he drew forth another pistol, and renewed his hammering with both.

He shouted aloud for help, but even in his own ears his voice sounded hushed and muffled, and it certainly was not heard by those in the library.

This, then, is the explanation of the mysterious knocking that caused so much consternation to the police officers.

We have stated that they at length discovered the exact spot from which the blows appeared to come, and, as the reader knows, they were right.

The reason they were so puzzled upon this point, is because of the peculiar position of the inner door.

Had it been upon the panelling of the room, they would have understood it at once.

"Here it is!" cried the commanding officer. "We have found him at last!"

In his beery condition, he did not reflect upon the unlikelihood of Tom King creating such a disturbance in order that his hiding-place should be discovered.

"Down with this panel!" he cried—"down with it—we'll have him!"

"Had not we better call in the young gentleman and speak to him about it?" said one of the officers, who was rather more sober than his leader. "I should not like to do anything that he might consider uncivil."

"No, nor I—nor I," said the chief officer. "Send for him."

Frank was accordingly sent for, and on his arrival he professed to be as much astonished as any of them, and declared that he knew nothing about it.

"Then, what had we better do?" asked the chief officer, with a hiccough.

"That I leave entirely to you," replied Frank. "I am only anxious that the rascals should be captured. How they can be there I cannot imagine."

"Nor I—nor I," said the chief officer; "but they're wonderful fellows."

"Are they, indeed?"

"Yes, and there's no knowing what they might do."

"Then," said Frank, "it may be some desperate plan of theirs—who can tell?"

The lieutenant hazarded this supposition, not because he thought it was at all likely, but because he feared something had happened to Tom King, and that he had adopted this means of entreating assistance.

"Well, I am going to do my duty," said the chief officer, with the dogged obstinacy of a drunken man—"I am going to do my duty, and let those who prevent me do so at their peril!"

"No one wants to prevent you," said Frank, "or, at least, I don't. If they are here I am anxious they should be taken prisoners."

"Very good!" said the chief officer. "Don't interfere with me! I know they are there—I am sure of it, and I will pretty soon have a hole in this wall and drag them out."

So saying, he stooped down and picked up the poker from the hearth, close to which he was standing.

It was no flimsy, modern article, but a heavy, substantial bar of iron.

Beyond all doubt, the officer could demolish the panel with that.

Before Frank could say a word or interpose, he struck the secret door such a terrific blow somewhere near the spot where the spring was situated, that it flew open at once, disclosing the small square recess beyond.

"Hurrah!" he cried—"here we are—got them at last! Forward!"

So saying, he flourished the poker round his head and rushed in.

To his disappointment the recess was empty.

But the hammering and knocking continued with unabated vigour.

"There's another door here!" cried the officer. "I will soon have that down; and mind you, as soon as ever I do, rush forward and seize them—don't give them time to make any resistance!"

This second door was not demolished quite so readily as the former.

The officer at the top of the staircase found his alarm subsiding.

Evidently his friends had heard his summons for assistance, and were making vigorous efforts to liberate him.

The chief officer was not able to wield the poker in that little recess with so much effect as he had done in the room beyond.

Determined, however, to make one effort, he struck the door a terrific blow, and flung himself against it at the same time.

Unluckily, he put forth about ten times the amount of force that was required.

He dashed the whole weight of his body against the door, which opened as easily and quickly as though some one had been at great pains to oil the hinges.

Some rather curious effects followed.

The first was, that the officer on the top of the steps received such a sudden blow on his nose by the violent opening of the door, that he turned head-over-heels, and in that fashion revolved to the bottom of the flight.

The chief officer, having given himself so much impetus, could not stop, consequently, he shot down the stairs after his subordinate head-first.

The other officers in obedience to his orders rushed forward also.

The idea that there might be a staircase commencing at the very threshold of that inner secret door never once entered their minds, and it was not until some half dozen of them had rolled down the steps after their leader that the discovery was made.

The remainder then stopped, looking in each other's faces with blank dismay.

Then evidences that a great commotion was going on apparently in the bowels of the earth reached their ears.

"Lights—lights!" said the officer, who had suggested that Frank should be sent for—"lights! We must descend these stairs, and ascertain what has happened."

Lights were rapidly procured, and the remainder of the force descended slowly and carefully.

With much difficulty they raised their comrades, who lay in a confused and struggling mass at the bottom.

All were very much the worse for their tumble, especially the chief officer, who was quite insensible.

The other officer who had been the cause of all this disturbance was just returning to consciousness.

After some delay all were carried up into the library.

In the meanwhile the officer once or twice mentioned as having his senses more about him than the rest, hastily made an examination of the passage, but failed to discover either any mode of exit from it, or any traces of the highwayman

When he returned to the library he found his commander had opened his eyes and was beginning to realise what had taken place.

He was in a very damaged condition, and so was the officer who had preceded him in his fall.

"Who was it made all that hammering?" gasped the chief. "What did it mean?"

"It was Wilcox, sir," said one of them—"he did it"

"Was it you, Wilcox?" asked the chief officer, angrily.

"It was, sir, but——"

"Take that, you idiot—take that!" interrupted the chief, "and don't you play such a fool's game as that again, or it will be worse for you! Take that, and that as well, and tell me how you like it!"

CHAPTER DCLXXIV.

TOM KING MANAGES TO REACH THE CAVE IN SAFETY, AND CLAUDE DUVAL IS CALLED UPON TO RELATE THE PARTICULARS OF HIS EARLY LIFE.

As he spoke these words, the chief officer broke away from those who held him, or rather who had placed themselves so as to support him, and rushed towards Wilcox.

Every time he cried "Take that!" he administered a sharp crack with his clenched fist.

Evidently, Wilcox did not like it at all, but that was of no consequence, for the chief officer continued just the same until compelled to pause through sheer exhaustion.

"Now, you villain," he cried, "explain yourself—explain yourself, I say! What is the meaning of all this?"

Wilcox at this juncture presented a truly deplorable spectacle.

His nose had been severely injured by the blow it received from the door, and was swelled up to something like three times its natural size when his chief commenced the attack upon him.

Now all his countenance was puffed up round it, while a ruby stream trickled down his chin on to his neckcloth.

He made an odd snuffling sound when he was spoken to, and endeavoured to reply.

Fearing to receive fresh violence made him try his best to give an account of what had happened.

Accordingly he did so, though his narrative was somewhat confused.

When it was found that he had actually had one of the highwaymen in his grasp, all the other officers gave vent to a perfect howl, and seemed more than half-inclined to rush forward in a body and inflict summary punishment upon him.

They were restrained more by the voice of their leader than aught else.

"Come," he said—"make haste! We must not trouble ourselves any further with that fool! Follow me!"

So saying, he staggered from the room, for he had not yet recovered from the effects of his fall, though recent events had gone far towards sobering him.

His men of course followed in his footsteps, not even excepting Wilcox.

Planting his hat firmly on his head, the chief officer led the way out of the house, and hastened towards the thicket that had been described to him.

He reached it in a few moments, and trampling down the shrubs, finally stood on the little open space we have mentioned.

He called then for lanterns, and when the light of about half a dozen of them was directed upon the ground they were able to make out not only the position of the trap-door but also evident indications of a sharp struggle having taken place.

Of the highwayman, however, not a single trace remained.

He summoned those he had posted in various positions, and inquired from them whether they had seen anything suspicious.

He was answered in the negative.

There was no trace left of the highwayman beyond the thicket.

They could see where he had forced his way out, but nothing further.

From this, it is evident that Tom King succeeded in getting away from the admiral's mansion unseen.

Such being the case, there can be little interest in describing the doings of the police officers.

We will return, then, to the highwayman.

As soon as he had disposed of Wilcox, Tom stood perfectly still and listened.

Then he cautiously crept away, keeping his body close to the ground, and passing about midway between two of the sentinels.

When he had once passed them, the remainder of his journey was simple enough.

He made for Epping Forest, and entered it at the nearest point.

When he found himself beneath the trees, a feeling of complete safety came over him.

But the night was almost over, and he was well aware his comrades would be looking and waiting for him.

It was just before daybreak when he reached the cave, where he found his friends secure and safe enough.

Nothing whatever had occurred during his absence to disturb their tranquility.

The same words will apply to several days that followed.

It was plain to be seen, however, that the highwaymen were chafing under the restraint this placed upon them—they were all desirous to be up and doing.

On his return, Tom King, as a matter of course, related all that had befallen him.

At first he was apprehensive that the officers would discover their whereabouts.

He imagined that after they became aware of his actual presence at the admiral's mansion they would jump to the conclusion that it was in Epping Forest where they had taken refuge; and, indeed, such might have been the case even then, although they had remained undisturbed, for at that time the forest was of such great extent that it would have required a long time to search over every part of it provided they had no clue to guide them.

Every precaution was taken to guard against discovery, and no one ventured to go far away from the open space in front of the cave.

Maud was progressing slowly but favourably towards recovery—it might be said indeed that she was out of danger, and Dick experienced a feeling of great relief on that account.

Yet, the time hung heavily upon their hands, and every day it became more and more difficult to find something with which they could occupy themselves.

On the fourth day after Tom's adventure, the friends were all assembled in the little open space.

It was a glorious, bright, sunshiny day, and the atmosphere was warm and genial, not at all in accordance with the season of the year.

"Claude," said Jack, breaking in upon the silence which had lasted several minutes, "do you recollect our sojourn in Enfield Chase?"

"Yes, very well. What of it?"

"One night, while we were there, you promised to relate your history—you even began it."

"Yes, I remember, and we were interrupted by hearing that strange cry that came from the lips of the wounded poacher."

"Exactly; and since then we have not heard another word of it."

"It's a good thought," said Dick, "it will serve to while away the time, and make the day pass more pleasantly if you, Claude, will finish what you then begun, and relate your adventures up to the time of your meeting with Sixteen-String Jack."

"I don't mind," said Claude, who was seated upon the trunk of a fallen tree—"I will gladly do anything to amuse you, though, for my own part, I am not very fond of raking up the past."

"Never mind that—let us hear your story—your life from the commencement, recollect, up to the time of your meeting with Jack."

"And after that," said Tom King, "we will call upon Sixteen-String Jack for his story."

This proposal was at once eagerly assented to by all parties.

"Give me five minutes to think," said Claude Duval, covering his face with his hands, so as to shut out external objects, "and then I shall be able to tell you my tale plainly and straightforwardly, without omitting anything, or having to go back."

"Agreed—agreed!"

While Claude was thus engaged in refreshing his memory and calling up recollections of the past, his companions ranged themselves around in convenient positions, and prepared to listen to every word he was about to say.

All fancied that some kind of mystery hung over Duval's early life, and they were curious to know whether their speculations were well founded.

About his adventures previous to his meeting with Tom King, the highwaymen knew nothing, or very little.

It is true, from time to time hints had been dropped respecting it, but even Sixteen-String Jack, Claude's oldest associate, knew so little of his story that he waited with quite as much eagerness for the first words as did any of the others.

At length Claude moved his hands from his face, and looked around him.

Perceiving that they were all waiting for him to commence, he cleared his voice and spoke as follows:

CHAPTER DCLXXV.

CLAUDE COMMENCES HIS HISTORY, AND RELATES AN ANECDOTE OF HIS UNCLE, THE GREAT CLAUDE DUVAL, AND OF HIS MAJESTY KING CHARLES THE SECOND.

"If I recollect right, when you wanted me to relate my history on a previous occasion, you requested me to begin at the very beginning, and I suppose that is just what you desire at the present time?"

"Decidedly."

"Well, then, I will commence with saying that I feel myself rather in doubt as to whether I am a Frenchman or an Englishman. I prefer to think the latter; and it seems to me, I have about as much claim to one as to the other—I suppose I can please myself.

"My father and mother were both born in England, as were their parents before them; but originally, the family was a French one, as the name alone will show. My parents, nevertheless, always considered themselves English, but, from particular reasons, they left England and crossed over to Normandy, where I was born. It is an indifferent, unimportant matter, and those who like may dispute about it; however, I maintain I am English, and have spent the greater part of my life in this land.

"The circumstances I mentioned as causing my parents to go over to Normandy are worth more than passing mention.

"Of course you have every one heard of the great Claude Duval, who ran such a remarkable career in the reign of King Charles the Second?"

"Of course we have," was the reply—"and it is not likely he will ever be forgotten."

"Well, then, it was through this great Claude Duval, who was my uncle, that my parents left England. He created such a commotion throughout the whole land that everyone bearing his name was looked upon if not with suspicion at least with curiosity, and in order to escape the impertinent questions of numerous people, my parents crossed the channel.

"I happened to be the youngest child of a very large family, and my father was also a younger son, so that when I was born my uncle had been dead something like thirty years."

"Stay a moment," said Dick, "I have no doubt you have in your remembrance some anecdotes relative to this uncle of yours; if so, let us hear them first, and then go on with your own history afterwards."

This proposal was greeted with acclamation, and Claude replied:

"I daresay I could remember three adventures of his, and if you like I will tell them at once."

"Then do so—pray do so!"

"One day, then, Claude Duval set out upon a highway expedition—I say one day, for such was his daring and contempt for the authorities that he frequently stopped people by daylight.

"He was also very fond of high life, and adopted numerous schemes to get introduced to the mansions of the nobility.

"In this he frequently succeeded, and more than once he gained admission to the Court, and one day he was seen walking arm-in-arm with the King.

"However, that is not the adventure I spoke of; but it was brought into my mind because the place he selected for his adventure was at Windsor, where the King was then staying.

"On that very morning there was to be a grand hunt, but Claude interfered and spoiled much of the sport.

"Passing through a portion of the forest, he saw a person on horseback advancing towards him whom he recognised in a moment. This was Sir Thomas Roper, the Master of the King's hounds, and the individual who had the direction of the whole affair.

"Although within a very short distance of Windsor Castle, and although Sir Thomas Roper's men might be close in the rear, yet Claude Duval rode up to him, and, putting a pistol to his breast, called upon him to deliver.

"It was in vain Sir Thomas cursed and swore, and refused to deliver up any of his wealth. Claude, who possessed great strength, seized him, dragged him from his horse, and tied him neck and heels together, and took fifty pounds out of his pocket. He then secured the knight's horse to a neighbouring tree, and while doing so, exclaimed:

"'Now, Sir Thomas, you see what you have got by your obstinacy; if you had given me this bag of gold at first I should have let you ride on unmolested; as it is, you will have to remain where you are for the present, and it strikes me, that instead of leading the hunt for his Majesty, his Majesty will have to hunt for you!'

"With these words, Claude Duval rode off, and, making some change in his apparel, presently had the audacity to join in the King's train as it was setting out from the castle.

"Great was the outcry for Sir Thomas Roper, but he was nowhere to be found. The King was furious with rage, and declared that without the keeper of the hounds was discovered the hunt could not take place.

"Claude then whispered to a gentleman near him, that he believed Sir Thomas was in a certain part of the forest at some distance off, and offered to show them the spot.

"This whisper was passed from one to another until it reached the ears of royalty itself. Then the King, turning round, requested this stranger—for so Claude was looked upon—to lead the way to the place he had mentioned."

"He must have had a rare audacity to have ventured upon that," said Turpin. "I question whether he could succeed in doing such a thing now."

"It would be quite impossible," was the reply; "but you must not forget that the time I am speaking of was just after the Restoration. Everyone was filled with joy, and numberless people flocked around the King. You know, or have heard, of the riotous, extravagant manner in which he treated them, and a great deal of Court ceremony was at that time set aside. More especially were the French people welcome to the King, for he could not forget what friends they had been to him in his long exile.

"I should have mentioned that Claude whispered to the gentleman near him in French, for he understood the language perfectly well, and could speak it as readily as English.

"Well, then, he led the King and his courtiers a fine dance through Windsor Forest. He picked out the muddiest, dirtiest parts he could find. He was careless as to the consequences to himself, and as he led the way all the others followed, not wishing to hold back when another went so boldly forward lest unworthy imputations should be cast upon them.

"For several hours the hunting party did nothing but force their way through tangled thickets and thorny brushwood until there was not one whose dress was not torn to shreds, and whose skin was not scored all over like a joint of pork.

"When he had carried on this diversion long enough, he brought them round to the identical thicket where he had left the unfortunate master of the hounds. He did this because the King was growing angry and tired. He was aware if it was discovered that he had been playing a practical joke upon his Majesty and his nobles the consequences would be serious.

"Great was the astonishment of all parties when they saw Sir Thomas lying down close to his horse's feet in such a ridiculous position. The King fairly laughed aloud, and demanded to know the reason why he was in such a predicament.

"'Unbind me first, your Majesty,' was the reply. 'My neck and heels were never so close together before, and I am afraid I shall never be able to straighten my body out again!'

"The King ordered the rope to be cut, and then Sir Thomas was profuse in his excuses and regrets. He concluded by saying:

"'I trust your Majesty, although deprived of my presence, has nevertheless had some sport.'

"'Yes,' was the reply, as his Majesty looked at his own tattered garments and those of the nobles around him, 'we have had rare sport to-day. Have you?'

"'Yes, d—n it, I have! Pray excuse me, your Majesty,' he added, immediately, 'it was quite a slip of the tongue.'

"'Well, what sport have you had?'

"Sir Thomas remembered how much the adventure had cost him, so, for the life of him, he could not help replying:

"'All I have had I have paid d—d dear for, your Majesty.'

"The King was not averse to an oath now and then, as doubtless you are aware, and the rueful appearance of Sir Thomas Roper put him quite in a good temper.

"'Come, now,' he added, still laughing, 'what has happened?'

"'Why, your Majesty, I was encountered by a—pardon me again if I say a d—d scoundrel, for I don't know what else to call him! Quite against my desire, he bound me neck and heels, as you saw, and then had the impudence to charge me fifty pounds for doing it, although I would gladly enough have spared him the trouble.'

"The King laughed immoderately, and so did all the train, Claude Duval himself included.

"With many grimaces and contortions, Sir Thomas straightened his body, and then, mounting his horse, joined the King's train, which now moved off towards the castle.

"It so chanced that Claude had no opportunity to withdraw, and before he had gone many yards, he found Sir Thomas looking at him very intently, for it happened that they were riding close together.

"The worthy knight believed he recognised Claude, and yet could scarcely believe such a thing. The conviction settled upon him, however, before he had gone many yards, and so he cried out:

"'Your Majesty—your Majesty, the scoundrel who robbed me is now riding in your train!'

"The cavalcade stopped in a moment, and a scene of great confusion ensued. The King's curiosity was roused, and he commanded Sir Thomas to point out his assailant.

"'There he is!' he said, pointing to Claude Duval—'that's him! I will swear to him out of a thousand!'

"Public attention being thus fixed upon Claude, everyone suddenly remembered that this was the first time Claude had been seen in their company.

"'Who are you, sir?' said the King, addressing him.

"Claude knew how to reply, and quite unabashed, he answered:

"'A Frenchman, your Majesty.'

"'I know that; but who are you? State your name and condition!'

"'Every word your Majesty utters is to me a command,' replied Claude, with a bow, 'and therefore I throw myself upon your Majesty's clemency, and say that I am Claude Duval!'

"The commotion increased tenfold at this announcement, and Claude Duval took advantage of a general movement to shrink back. He touched his horse sharply with the spur, and placed himself quite clear of the throng.

"'Your Majesty,' he cried, 'I trust will forgive me! It was nothing more than a frolic, after all, and I believe it has caused every one some amusement!'

"'You have been playing what you think a devilish good joke, Claude Duval!' said the King. 'But let me give you a caution!'

"Claude bowed.

"'Don't try anything of this sort again. As you say it was a frolic, I forgive you, but upon one condition only!'

"'A thousand thanks, your Majesty!' he replied 'Let me know the nature of your commands!'

"'Why, you must return the bag of gold you took from Sir Thomas, and make him that reparation. It's not fair that he should lose so much by the transaction, and that you should gain all the profit.'

"'Pardon me, your Majesty—would you allow me to say a few words? I am a highwayman, and what I take I am bound by the laws of my fraternity never to return; but I have heard you owe Sir Thomas some long arrears of salary, amounting to about ten times the sum I have taken! If you will pay him that on your return to the castle he will not begrudge me a trifling commission such as I have taken!'

"While he was speaking, Claude Duval saw the King's countenance change. He did not at all relish being told of his debts in this manner, and no doubt, if Claude had been foolish enough to linger, the adventure would have ended disagreeably enough for him.

"No sooner had he spoken, however, than, with a smile and a bow, he turned his horse's head, and before the King could recover his composure he was quite lost to sight among the trees. A pursuit was commenced, but it had no effect. The adventure got wind, and I can assure you that Claude Duval was quite the talk of the kingdom."

CHAPTER DCLXXVI.

A SECOND ANECDOTE OF CLAUDE DUVAL, SHOWING HOW HE DANCED A CORANTO WITH A LADY ON HOUNSLOW HEATH.

WHILE relating this anecdote, Claude Duval was frequently interrupted by bursts of laughter from his companions.

"Capital—capital!" they cried, with tears in their eyes. "That's a capital joke! I never heard of that adventure before!"

"I believe it's quite correct," said Claude. "I have heard it told many and many a time; but, however, I will make haste and give you the two others, and then go on with my own history."

"If the others are as good as the first," said Dick, "pray don't hurry! You can put your own history off till to-morrow, if you think proper."

"Well, just as you like; I am quite willing to do my best to make the time pass pleasantly. With regard to this next anecdote, however, I fancy you must have heard of it before; but many incorrect versions are current; this, however, is the right one:

"A certain nobleman, whose name I don't remember—in fact, I have never heard it—was once riding over Hounslow Heath in his carriage. He had his wife with him, a sprightly, charming young girl, and quite young enough to be his daughter—in fact, he was a middle-aged man, and she was but little more than a child.

"This nobleman had also in the carriage along with him the sum of four hundred pounds, and of this Claude was aware, and he resolved to take possession of it.

"This nobleman's wife, young as she was, knew the value of money very well, and was exceedingly fond of it. Her husband either could not or would not support all her extravagancies, and frequently refused her demands for money.

"But this lady possessed the strange accomplishment of playing most exquisitely upon a kind of miniature flageolet that was composed of the most valuable materials, and worth a very large sum. The sounds that came from it were extremely sweet and beautiful, and would have enthralled the ear of anyone who was at all sensible to the influence of music.

"The nobleman was an ardent votary of the Terpsichorean art, but above all he delighted in listening to the sweet strains of his wife's flageolet. She soon became aware of this, and turned the circumstance to her own advantage.

"Whenever she wished to cajole him into complying with her wishes or demands, she produced this instrument, and played upon it until she gained his consent to what she required.

"On the present occasion, she knew that he had this large sum of money in the carriage, and begged for half of it; but her husband was inexorable, and refused to listen to her appeal. She then demanded a hundred pounds, one-fourth of the whole sum, but this he also refused, stating the whole amount was due, and that he must pay it to a certain creditor in London.

"The lady used every artifice she was mistress of, and, failing in all of them, she at last resorted to the flageolet. Never had she played so sweetly and beautifully as on that night, while leaning back in the carriage. The interior of the vehicle was quite dark, or nearly so, and the music was of that character which sounds best when heard in the darkness.

"When she imagined a requisite effect had been produced upon her husband, she paused in her playing, with the intention of renewing her demands. But she paused, for, to her intense astonishment, she heard somewhere close at hand strains exactly similar to those which had just been breathed from her own instrument. The only difference, indeed, was that the notes were louder and more powerful in tone.

"I should have told you that Claude Duval was fond of music, and that his favourite instrument was a flageolet. He could play upon it with great grace and skill, and, so fond of it was he, that he rarely travelled without carrying this instrument in one of his pockets.

"He intended to stop the nobleman's coach, and rode across the heath close to the door of the vehicle with that intention, when all at once he heard the sweet notes I have mentioned. He was as much charmed as the nobleman himself, although the sound was very faint. But he followed the carriage, and, as soon as the lady paused, began to play himself.

"The lady listened for some time in surprise, and then pulled the checkstring. The coachman stopped in a moment, and as soon as he did so, Claude rode up to the door with the flageolet in one hand and his hat in the other. He bowed profoundly to both inmates of the carriage.

"But the light of one of the lamps shone into his countenance, and, as Claude Duval was at that time quite a noted character, the nobleman and his wife recognised him instantly.

"The lady's heart fluttered with delight, for Claude had a reputation for gallantry such as no other man had ever possessed. But the nobleman muttered several oaths between his teeth, for he looked upon the four hundred pounds as no longer his own.

"Claude was not only charmed by the lady's music, but by her extreme loveliness, and, therefore, making another bow, he said:

"'I trust, my lord, that you will not refuse me a trifling favour. It will do you no harm, and will afford me very great delight.'

"Claude paused for the nobleman to reply, but, as he said nothing, he continued:

"'Fair lady, would you do me the favour to alight for a moment, and dance a coranto with me on the heath?'

"'Now, d——' began the nobleman, in an angry voice, but the second word died away in a whisper on his lips.

"All at once he thought of the four hundred pounds which he had had no little trouble to obtain, and he thought to himself that he would rather allow his wife to dance on the heath with Claude Duval than he would lose his gold.

"The lady simpered, and held out her hand without the slightest hesitation. The adventure presented itself to her in a charming aspect.

"She knew it would get talked about, and it would be a great gratification to her to boast of it.

"Claude wanted no other reply, but handed the lady out of the carriage in a second. The nobleman made a movement as though to detain her, but then he thought again of his money, and changed his mind.

"Claude led his partner to a smooth place on the heath, and then bowed to her profoundly, according to the fashion of the times.

"It was a strange, stately kind of dance, very different to those in vogue at the present day. The partners stood opposite to each other at some distance, and the closest contact that was permitted was an occasional touch of the very tips of the fingers, when the arms were extended at full length.

"Claude accompanied the dance by playing on his flageolet, which he did very cleverly, and danced so lightly and so well in his heavy riding boots, that it would have filled a London dancing-master with envy to have seen him.

"When the dance was over, Claude led his fair partner back to the carriage with all possible ceremony and respect.

"During its continuance the nobleman had remained seated, amusing himself by biting his lips fiercely, and now and then rapping out an oath, by way of varying this amusement whenever he saw his wife look smilingly and lovingly at the highwayman. More than once he was on the point of springing out, and it was nothing but his gold that restrained him.

"The lady took her seat in the carriage again, and Claude thanked her once more for her condescension. Then he lingered by the carriage door.

"'What do you require now, sir?' said the nobleman, gruffly.

"'My lord,' returned Claude, 'you have four hundred pounds with you in the carriage, done up in four leather bags.'

"'And what of that, sir—what of that?'

"'Nothing,' said Claude, 'only with so large a sum of money by you, it seems strange that your lordship should have forgotten to pay the musician.'

"'Well, d—n——' but the nobleman paused.

"'I had not forgotten,' he added, and while he pronounced the words he stooped down and produced from beneath one of the seats a bag of gold. He placed it in Claude Duval's hands, who bowed profoundly.

"'Many thanks, my lord, for your liberality; it shall not be without benefit to you. I am well aware that you have three hundred pounds more, and when I set out to-night I determined to possess myself of the whole amount, but I will be content with what your lordship has so freely given me. You may retain the remainder.'

"'Thanks for your generosity! I know full well, if you chose, you could take it, for I should not think of risking my life in an encounter with you.'

"Claude bowed to the implied compliment, and answered:

"'I will even go still further. Between this and London you may possibly be stopped by others of my profession. Should this be the case, say to them: "Hawks fly by night!" and they will allow you to pass on unmolested.'

"'Thanks—thanks again! You are indeed a generous fellow, Claude, and what I have heard of you is fully proved by your conduct to-night.'

"'Accept my best thanks,' said Claude, placing his hand upon his breast and bowing to the lady. 'Believe me, your fair image is indelibly impressed upon my heart, and will always remain there. I shall never forget you. I trust, however, we may meet again and under as pleasing circumstances. Farewell!'

"'Farewell, sir!" she replied. 'You have been more fortunate with his lordship than I have!'

"'I do not understand you, my lady!'

"'Why, he was deaf to my appeal when I asked him for one of those bags of gold you are about to carry away!'

"'Can it be possible?'

"'It is true, sir!'

"'I am astonished!—I should have imagined anyone would be delighted to be your slave?'

"'Ah, sir!—you speak like all other gay deceivers!'

"'How so?'

"'The promises are fair enough; but when it comes to the performance it is another matter!'

"'My lady! I trust you do not include me in that imputation!'

"The lady shrugged her shoulders.

"'Put me to the test!'

"'You know my necessities!'

"'For money?'

"'Yes!'

"'Then, lady, on my knees I make you an offer of the whole. Take it—pray take it!'

"'Ah, sir!' said the lady, with a sigh, 'you are indeed different to——'

"'No comparisons, lady. Here, take this gold—I give it freely, and this is all I will take by way of return!'

"As he spoke, Claude Duval sprang up, placed the gold in the lady's lap, bent forward and imprinted a passionate kiss upon her lips!

"Then leaping down before either the nobleman or his wife could recover from their astonishment, he galloped off in the darkness, leaving the pair to ride home to London—the husband in anything but an amiable frame of mind!"

CHAPTER DCLXXVII.

A THIRD ADVENTURE OF CLAUDE DUVAL'S, SHOWING HOW HE PLAYED THE DEVIL AT A ROADSIDE INN.

"And that was the end of that adventure, I suppose?" said Dick Turpin, perceiving his companion pause.

"Yes; I have never heard any more!"

"Nor whether he ever saw the lady again?"

"No."

"Well, it was as cool and daring as the other!"

"Quite so; but I presume you have heard this before?"

"Something like it!"

"Well, this is the correct version of the affair."

"Then let us have the third adventure."

"With all my heart! After that I think we will let him rest in peace!"

"As you will!"

"This third anecdote, then, is little known—though I believe it is perfectly true! In fact, I may say I am sure of it!"

"Proceed, then!"

"Early one evening, some time after his adventure with the lady on the heath, Claude Duval found himself near the village of Beaconsfield.

"Looking along the high-road, he perceived in the distance the sign of a public-house, or roadside inn.

"Riding on a little farther, he saw the sign was the Crown.

"At length arriving opposite the building, he observed a great number of people, while inside some extraordinary festivity was going on.

"Lights were gleaming from all the windows, and the strains of music could be plainly heard.

"From the manner in which the shadows swept past the windows it was evident that dancing was going on within.

"Believing himself to be little if at all known in that part of the country, Claude Duval determined to go inside and ascertain what was going on.

"The fact was he ran rather short of cash, and was anxious to replenish his purse as soon as he conveniently could.

"The ostler came forward and Claude surrendered his horse, at the same time giving the ostler strict injunctions as to what he was to do, accompanying them with a crown-piece, to prevent any of the details from slipping his memory.

"The ostler was unused to such fees, and prepared to treat Duval with every imaginable respect, for he was under the impression that he must be a nobleman at the very least.

"This done, Claude entered the house, and sat down in the public room, in which several persons were seated.

"So unpretending was Claude's demeanour, that he attracted but little attention.

"He soon singled out a person who seemed likely to answer his purpose.

"This was an old man who seemed half-farmer, half-grazier.

"He was talking to an acquaintance, and Claude heard him say that he had agreed to stay all night at the inn, because he was afraid to travel in the darkness, as he had over a hundred pounds in his pocket.

"His acquaintance applauded his prudent determination.

"Claude nodded, though none took notice of the movement.

"He had resolved, in spite of all precautions that might be taken, that the money should be his.

"Not long afterwards, the old farmer—for such I will call him—asked the landlord what was going on upstairs.

"He was informed that it was a rejoicing held annually in the village, and that the sports terminated by a kind of ball in the evening.

"'As I am going to pass the night here,' said the farmer, 'perhaps you would not mind allowing me and my acquaintance to go up and join the merrymakers?'

"'Certainly not!' said the landlord. 'I can assure you the company will be very glad to see you. You are heartily welcome!'

"Having gained this permission, the farmer and his friend left the room, and ascended the stairs.

"But it was necessary that Claude should follow them, and this, to speak the truth, he was nothing loth to do.

"He called the landlord aside, and made the same request to him that the others had done, and it was granted with the same readiness.

"Mounting a flight of rude stairs, Claude pushed open a door, and found himself in a large room, which, judging by appearances, had to a great extent been extemporised for the occasion.

"A kind of wall or partition had been knocked down, so that the malt-room was taken in and rendered available for dancing.

"Claude apologised for his intrusion, and spoke in the manner for which he became famous, and captivated all the female hearts in the room at once, while the others looked on in envy.

"He was assured that it was no intrusion, and that he was heartily welcome to share in their amusements.

"Claude returned thanks in an appropriate speech, but he looked after the old farmer who possessed the bag of gold more than he did after anyone else.

"He soon discovered that the old man was well known to many present.

'Not one would speak civilly to him, for he had the reputation of being a covetous, avaricious old rascal, who would stop at no villany to obtain gold, which he kept hoarded up from all eyes but his own.

"When Claude heard this, what little compunction he might have felt about easing the old man of his coin vanished entirely.

"He cast about him for some means by which his purpose could be accomplished, but without success, until at length his eyes rested upon the chimney.

"That furnished him with an idea.

"It was a very large chimney—the bottom was of unusual width, and of a funnel-like shape.

"What Claude had thought of, you will quickly see.

"Watching his opportunity, he left the room.

"Descending the stairs, he made his way to the stables, and called the ostler.

"'Here I be, sir,' said that individual, as he descended a ladder that led to the loft.

"He made a number of bows as he spoke, and touched his forelock repeatedly.

"Claude drew him aside.

"'My good fellow,' he said, 'I want to speak to you.'

"'Yes, your honourable honour. I'm a listening.'

"'Have you got a big dog?'

"'A big dog?'

"'Yes!'

"'I rather believe we have, your honourable honour! Haven't you seen old Towzer?'

"'No.'

"'He is a big 'un!'

"'Where is he?'

"'Here!'

"The ostler led the way into the yard, and showed Claude a mastiff of unusual size, which was chained to a large kennel.

"'He will do first-rate!' said Claude. 'I suppose there is such a thing as a butcher in the village?'

"'Of course there is—old Wheeler.'

"'Well, I want you to go to him and fetch a cow's hide.'

"'A what?'

"'A cow's hide!'

"The ostler looked at Claude in amazement.

"'A cow's——!' he began, and then stopped, looking quite puzzled and bewildered.

"'Just come along with me, and I will explain! Here, some inside the stable again!'

"The ostler hardly knew whether he was standing on his head or his heels.

"But he followed Claude nevertheless.

"'Now,' said the latter, as he seated himself on the top of a cornbin—'look here!'

"He took a couple of guineas from his pocket while he spoke, and held them out towards the ostler.

"'Do you know what these are?' he asked.

"'Guineas, I reckon.'

"'Of course they are. Take them—they are yours. They are genuine. Put them between your teeth and try!'

"The ostler did so.

"'Oh, they are good!'

"'I told you so. Well, they are yours. Put them in your pocket, and then I will tell you what you are to do for them.'

"'Work for a month, I reckon!'

"'Oh, no—nothing of the kind; for about half an hour—no more!'

"'How long?'

"'Half an hour.'

"'What, for two guineas?'

"'Yes.'

"'I say, master,' said the ostler, 'lookee here! I don't know who you are, or what you want, so just take your money back till you have told me what you want me to do!'

"'Very good! I like you all the better for that! I am going to play a bit of a joke upon an old man who is upstairs!'

"'Two guineas is a good deal for a joke!'

"'I know that; but I should not begrudge twice the sum to have a good bit of fun.'

"'What sort of a joke do you want to play him?'

"'I want to give him a good fright. You know a covetous, miserly old rascal he is?'

"'Who?'

"'Why, the old man.

"'Is it old Hobbs?'

"'Yes.'

"'And you are going to play him a joke?'

"'If you will assist me.'

"'All right, then! Why, I would run a mile to have my revenge upon him! Curse him!—he once served my poor old mother a scaly trick, though she is dead and gone now—rest her soul!'

"'You will be even with him to-night then, for if I can only carry out my plan he will be frightened out of his life, which will be a rare piece of diversion for me!'

"'I will serve you in everything!'

"'That's right.'

"'How shall you frighten him?'

"'I shall try to persuade him that the devil has come to fetch him.'

"'He will some day, never fear.'

"'He will be in a desperate way.'

"'But how shall you play the devil?'

"'With Towzer and the cowhide.'

"'How?'

"'I will tell you plainly, and then return to the inn, leaving you to carry out the remainder of the affair.'

"'I'll pay attention, sir.'

"'Put the two guineas in your pocket then.'

"'But I don't want to be paid for this job.'

"'But I insist upon it!'

"'Very well, then, since you are so pressing, I don't mind.'

"'Now, then, in the first place, you must go to the butcher's in the village and obtain a cow's hide.'

"'All right.'

"'And when you have got it you will put it on old Towzer.'

"'Ha, ha, ha! Ho, ho, ho! Put the cow's hide on old Towzer?'

"'Certainly—fasten it on him securely, and take care that the horns are exactly over his ears. Get a cowhide with two good horns—mind that!'

"'Oh, you leave that to me, your honourable honour!'

"'I will. When you have done that, tie a rope round old Towzer, and get a ladder and carry him up to the top of the house.'

"The ostler nodded.

"'You know the chimney in the malt-room?'

"'Oh yes!'

"'Then climb over the roofs till you come to the top of it, and let Towzer down. I will be in the room and see to the rest!'

"'Very good, sir! Won't I be level with the miserly old rascal!'

"'I hope you will,' said Claude, 'for, from the top of the chimney, owing to its great width, you will be able to see very well all that is going on, and hear too.'

"With a few more injunctions, Claude Duval left the ostler and returned to the inn.

CHAPTER DCLXXVIII.

CONTAINS THE CONCLUSION OF CLAUDE DUVAL'S ADVENTURE AT THE CROWN INN.

"Upon returning to the room, Claude Duval found the amusements going on much in the same way as when he left.

"He believed that his absence had not been noticed, or if it had, no notice was taken of it.

"He appeared to be enjoying himself along with the rest, but yet he kept an eye upon the old farmer, and waited impatiently for the fun to begin.

"At length, when the mirth and jollity were at their height, a most awful and hideous yell was heard, which rose high above all other sounds.

"Then a rumbling noise followed, and the next moment a horrible form appeared in the fire-place.

"Even Claude was startled, and if this effect was produced upon the one who had planned the whole affair, you may perhaps be able to understand what were the feelings of the guests.

[CLAUDE DUVAL'S ADVENTURE WITH MAZZAROTH THE ASTROLOGER.]

"The dog enveloped in the cow's hide presented a most singular and horrifying spectacle.

"The fire was hot, and, therefore, the animal with a howl of pain made a frantic dash among the dancers.

"The confusion was then at its height.

"Such shrieks and cries, and trampling, and, in a word, such a Babel had never been known in the Crown Inn before.

"Everyone hastened towards the door, but such was the general alarm that not one was able to find it. The task was rendered more difficult by Claude, who, having the whole of his plan arranged beforehand, knew precisely what to do.

"Like a flash of light he drew his sword, and gave a slashing blow at the rude kind of chandelier depending from the centre of the room. It was a rough affair, consisting only of some wooden laths slightly nailed together, upon which were stuck a great many tallow candles.

"The blow Claude gave sufficed to demolish it entirely, and down it came with a crash, materially increasing the terror that all felt.

"The apartment was then plunged in profound darkness, if we may except the dim light that came from the smouldering fire.

"As soon as he had sheathed his sword Claude hastened towards the miser, who had crawled into a distant corner. He pounced upon him, and held him with a firm grip.

"'Mercy—mercy!—oh, mercy!' gasped the trembling and terrified wretch—'have mercy upon me!'

"'Prepare to meet your doom!' said Claude, in a hollow voice.

"The miser trembled as though in the midst of an ague fit.

"'I have come for you!' continued Claude, in the same sepulchral tones. 'Your life is over—your course is run. Come with me!'

No. 146 will be Published next Thursday.

"'Oh, Mr. Devil, let me off this once—for just a little while longer!'

"'No,' said Claude—'your appeal is vain! You must come with me!'

"He shifted his grasp upon the miser as he spoke, and, putting forth his strength, lifted him off the ground.

"A most hideous yell burst from the old man's lips—so loud and horrible as to startle even Claude himself. After the utterance of that shriek, however, the miser became perfectly silent, and Claude guessed in a moment that he was insensible.

"To let go his hold was Claude's next act, and then, thrusting his hand into the miser's pocket, he drew forth the bag of gold, and rapidly placed it in his own.

"In the meanwhile, the dog in his strange disguise, after scouring round and round the room, leaping over the bodies of the prostrate dancers, and after frightening them to death, succeeded in making his escape through the doorway.

"The creature was by this time worked up to almost a state of madness, so, giving a sudden leap, he alighted on the shoulders of those who crowded the threshold, and, scrambling over the heads of the remainder, finally pitched head-foremost down the staircase.

"Old Towzer lay for a moment or two at the bottom of the stairs with his back on the ground and his feet in the air, then, recovering his equilibrium, he darted out from the open doorway into the yard.

"Here he was received by the ostler, who was waiting for him. With great dexterity he pulled off the cow's hide and secreted it, and ended by chaining old Towzer up as before.

"All this was done by the time Claude had succeeded in obtaining the bag of gold.

"The alarm began to subside, and those who had managed to reach the ground floor now had the courage to provide themselves with candles and ascend again.

"Claude joined the throng near the door, and behaved himself exactly like them. He pretended to be as frightened as any of them.

"Finally, amid much confusion, the apartment was again lighted up.

"Everyone began to wonder then what could be the meaning of this disturbance and what it was that had caused it.

"'It must have been the devil!' said one.

"'That's just what I thought,' said Claude, 'and once he almost laid hold of me.'

"'Did he, though?'

"'Yes; but I escaped him, and he rushed on, crying out: "Hobbs—Hobbs—Hobbs!"'

"'Hobbs?' echoed everyone. 'Why, that's the old miser! I shouldn't wonder, now, if the devil didn't make a purposed journey to fetch him.'

"'Where is he?' cried another—'who has seen him?'

"The guests looked from one to another, and very quickly ascertained that Hobbs was not among them.

"They stared blankly at each other, and then shook their heads mysteriously.

"'Hobbs,' cried one, in a loud voice, 'where are you?'

"There was no response. At that moment Hobbs was lying doubled up in a distant corner to which the light did not penetrate.

"'He's gone, for certain,' was the conclusion of several.

"'And a good job too!' added others. 'He was a rascally, pilfering, miserly old hunks—that's what he was!'

"'Well, I suppose it's all right now,' said Claude. 'I never was so close to Old Nick in my life before, and don't want to be again, so, if he's going to pay the room a second visit, I'd rather leave.'

"'No, no—it's all right now, depend upon it! He's got old Hobbs, and that will satisfy him for awhile.'

"At this moment a silence ensued—one of those sudden pauses in conversation which frequently take place, which was broken in upon by a faint, smothered groan.

"'What's that?' said Claude, pretending to be greatly alarmed.

"'Mercy—mercy!' cried a voice. 'Oh, good Mr. Devil, have mercy upon me, and let me go!'

"'Why, that's old Hobbs!' said some one.

"'Yes, I'd swear to his squeaking voice,' added another.

"'Forward!' cried Claude. 'He's up in this corner. Perhaps the devil has not flown away with him after all.'

"Rather reluctantly the guests followed in Claude's footsteps, two or three of them carrying candles.

"'Here he is,' said Claude, 'sure enough and there no one with him that I can see.'

"Old Hobbs, whose intellects were in a very confused condition, continued his supplications for mercy.

"'Get up!' roared half a dozen with one voice—'get up, you old fool! There's nothing the matter!'

"Hearing himself thus addressed, Hobbs ventured to raise his head from the ground.

"He glared fearfully around, and then he murmured:

"'Where is he?—has he gone?'

"'Who—who?'

"'The—the——'

"'What?'

"'Devil!'

"The guests drew back several steps.

"'Save me, my good friends!' whined the miser—'save me!'

"'Save you from what?'

"'The devil!' cried Hobbs again.

"'There's no one there that I can see, except yourself,' cried Claude.

"'Is there not, good sir? Thanks—thanks for that assurance! You are sure there is no one else?'

"'Quite sure! Raise you head a little, and you will see.'

"After many efforts, Hobbs at length succeeded in raising his courage sufficiently to do this.

"He then saw that he was indeed alone. He gathered himself up, and sat down on the floor in a very undignified manner.

"'Oh!' he said, 'I will repent—I will reform! I have had a narrow escape—a narrow escape!'

"'Who from?'

"'The devil!' cried Hobbs again.

"There was something so amusing in this reiterated reply that none of the guests could forbear from laughing.

"'What did he say to you, then?' asked Claude.

"'Oh, I can't tell you—I can't tell you! I saw his great horns, and his gleaming eyes, and his long tail. He laid hold of me with his cloven hoofs, and declared he would carry me away, but he must have dropped me.'

"'And what then?'

"'I don't know anything more,' added the miser, gradually recovering himself—'I don't know anything more.'

"He rose to his feet.

"'Let me go,' he said—'let me go!'

"'We are all willing,' said the guests. 'We don't want to have the devil's own among us.'

"'Oh, but this is a warning to me! I will alter—I will repent from this hour! I will pay back all the money I have so unjustly gained. There's you, friend Styles—you will permit me to call you friend, will you not?'

"'Oh, bother!' said Styles, who was the man Claude had overheard talking to the miser.

"'Well, then, friend Styles, there's you. I have cheated you out of ten pounds to-night. Here, here—come to me. You shall have it back—you shall have it back.'

"Anxious to receive some of his money back again, Styles stepped forward.

"The miser put his hand into his pocket, where he knew the bag of gold had been, and then uttered a yell of dismay.

"Styles drew back.

"'What's the matter?' he asked—'has the devil got you again?'

"'No, no—my money! Oh! my money—my money's gone! There's thieves—I have been robbed! I am a ruined man—my money has been stolen!'

"'Stolen?'

"'Yes—yes!' said the miser, crying bitterly. 'My money is all gone, and I am beggared!'

"'But who has stolen it?' asked Styles, doubtfully.

"'Some of you in the room!' cried the miser. 'I will have you all searched! Call the police! Oh, my money—my money!'

"'Stop a minute!' said Claude Duval; 'I rather think I can explain all this!'

"'My money—my money?' screamed the miser.

"'Yes — that's it! Do you mean to say,' asked Claude Duval, 'that you had your ill-gotten gains about you when the devil came?'

"'Yes—a hundred guineas, and all in gold—all in g old!'

"'And the devil picked you up, you said, didn't you?'

"'Yes—he did!'

"'And let you go again?'

"'Y—yes!'

"'Then,' added Claude, solemnly, 'you may depend upon it that the reason why he let you go was because he took your ill-gotten money instead. Reform and repent, and you may cheat him at last!'

"'But why didn't he take me?' moaned the miser—'why didn't he take me? He might as well have taken me as my money!'

"'You had better not say that again,' said Claude, 'for fear he should appear. As for me, I have had enough of this place. I am not fond of a house that the devil pays visits to; so good night, friends all—I will be off!'

"With these words, Claude Duval stalked out of the room and down the staircase.

"A warm discussion then followed, which in a moment or two afterwards was interrupted by a loud crash of breaking glass.

"Everyone turned round and saw that one of the front windows had been broken.

"They hastened towards it, and clustered round it in a throng.

"Looking down, they saw in the open space in front of the inn, which was fully lighted up by the moon, the figure of a man seated on a magnificent steed.

"'Good night, friends!' he cried. 'And if anyone should ask you who played the devil at the Crown Inn at Beaconsfield, tell them it was Claude Duval, the dashing highwayman!'"

CHAPTER DCLXXIX.

CLAUDE DUVAL BEGINS TO RELATE HIS OWN HISTORY, AND DESCRIBES HOW HE PAID A VISIT TO MAZZAROTH, THE ASTROLOGER.

"You kept the best adventure till the last, Claude," cried Dick Turpin. "That's a capital joke—and, what's more, I have never heard of it before."

"Nor I—nor I," said Sixteen-String Jack and Tom King.

"But it's perfectly true, for all that," replied Claude. "I know for certain the incidents took place just as I have described them; and to this day you will find people living in and about Beaconsfield who will give you just the same account of the proceedings of that eventful night."

"They are three good anecdotes," said Dick, "and display his character in its true light. There's no mistake about them: I could have said at once who was the hero of those adventures."

"Well, now," said Tom King, "suppose you leave your uncle in peace and begin your own history. It really seems as though something or other was always going to interpose to prevent us from hearing it."

"Well, it shall not be my fault this time," said Claude, "for if you will listen I will begin without delay."

"Do so, then—do so, by all means!"

"I have told you already," Claude began, "that I was the youngest son of a large family. My brothers and sisters were all grown up and married before I was more than a child. They left home, and I was left alone with my father, my only surviving parent, and who was of very great age.

"I continued to live with him in the little village in Normandy until I was about twenty years of age.

"At that time my father was nearly seventy, and beginning to grow quite childish. He would often say to me:

"'Claude, you must go out in the world and push your way forward; but not yet—not yet! You must stay with me till I die, which won't be long first.'

"He spoke truly enough, for just about the time of which I am speaking he took to his bed, and never rose from it again.

"It was one dark, rainy, miserable night, and I was all alone in the cottage, when my father called to me from the adjoining room and said:

"'Claude—Claude, come here! Let me feel your hand! I am dying—dying fast!'

"I went to him, and found a great change had taken place in him. I was nervous and terrified, for I had never seen death before, and I wished to send out for assistance.

"'No, no, Claude,' he answered, 'I will not consent to such a thing! No one on earth can do me the least good. I am past the doctor's skill—I feel sure of that!'

"I suggested a priest.

"'No—no!' he answered. 'I have never had one of those meddlesome rascals in my house yet, and I will not while I have breath and strength to prevent it. Take my word for it, Claude, that when you are quitting this life, you may as well do it on your own responsibility, for there is no fellow-creature like yourself who can do the least good, though they will profess it, and endeavour to extort money.'

"'Just as you will,' I replied; 'only I thought you might wish to see one'

"'No, no—Claude, I will die after my own fashion. I can feel that I am going.'

"His face continued to change very much, and by this time presented quite a corpse-like appearance, so that my alarm grew greater and greater.

"'Claude,' he managed to say to me at length, 'listen attentively to the last words I shall ever speak to you—treasure them up in your mind, and be sure you pay attention to them!'

"'I will,' I answered—'I will—you may depend upon it!'

"'Very good. I have no doubt you would like to know what is to be your destiny in life. You would like to know what is going to happen to you in the future, and then shape your course accordingly, and reap much advantage; whereas, if you were ignorant of it, you might go blundering on in the wrong path.'

"I was at a loss to understand what he meant, and told him so.

"'I wish I had known of it earlier myself,' he answered—'I should have been much better off; but it is no good grieving about that. I am glad to think you have the opportunity of profiting by it.'

"'By what?' I asked.

"'By a knowledge of the future.'

"'And how can I obtain that knowledge?'

"'That is what I am about to tell you. As soon as I am dead and have been buried, you must go to Paris, and in a certain street you will find a house—I cannot remember the number, but in my pocket-book you will see a card containing the full directions.'

"'And what am I to do there?'

"'Go in, and you will be shown into the presence of a man who can reveal to you your future destiny. Comply with all his injunctions, or the consequences will be serious, and, in return, he will show you the principal events in your life. You will know then what you are intended to become.'

"'And do you really wish this?'

"'Yes, I command it! Can you fail to see the immense benefit you will derive from it? Do not fail—it is my last dying wish!'

"'I will regard it, never fear!' I answered, and no sooner had I given the assurance than he expired.

"Of course you think it strange, now—and so do I, though I did not then—that my father should be of such an opposite disposition. You see he would not believe in the benefit of a priest, but yet he was credulous enough to think there was a man who possessed the key to the future.

"The little village where we had lived was always a hateful place to me, and I had longed to see the world; so, after the funeral, I sold up everything, and very gladly set out towards Paris, to fulfil my father's dying wish.

"'Yes,' I thought, as I trudged along, 'I will never return to this part of the country again—I have had enough of it; Paris is the place for me!'

"In due time I accomplished my journey, and, referring to the pocket-book, found the card of which my father had spoken.

"'The very first thing I did was to repair to the address that was upon it. I inquired my way of many people, and at length I began to grow somewhat uneasy, for I found I was approaching a very disagreeable portion of the city. Indeed, the houses were all wretchedly dirty, and the inhabitants, many of whom were standing at the front doors, were the most repulsive creatures I had then seen.

"'At last I came to the house.

"'It was in a narrow, filthy court, and was perhaps a trifle more dirty and dilapidated than the tenements adjoining it.

"'I found a small door, upon which a number was painted, and, after some search, discovered the handle of a bell; I pulled it, and, waiting for some time, the door was opened.

"'A miserable-looking old hag appeared upon the threshold.

"'"I want to see Mazzaroth!" I exclaimed.

"'"Enter,' was the reply, 'and ascend those stairs until you can mount no higher—then knock.'

"'She pointed to a dark and dirty flight of stairs as she spoke. I didn't half relish this adventure, but I determined to carry it out, for I was prompted, not only by a wish to perform my promise, but also by a great degree of curiosity, which I may be excused for feeling.

"'Groping my way in the dark, I mounted the staircase; but before I reached the top, I had to pause several times to recover my breath.

"'At length, according to the old woman's words, I came to a place where I was prevented from going any further. I knocked, and a sepulchral voice bade me enter.

"'I obeyed, and found myself in profound darkness.

"'"What want you?" said the voice again.

"'"Mazzaroth.'

"'"I am here. What do you seek?'

"'"To know the future.'

"'"Are you a believer?'

"'"I am.'

"'"Then your wish shall be granted.'

"'The darkness was then dispelled as if by magic. I could not exactly understand how it was done, but I fancy a large piece of black cloth was hung across near the door, and that this was suddenly drawn aside.

"'Be that as it may, I found myself standing in a rather spacious apartment, the atmosphere of which was insufferably hot and stifling.

"'In the centre stood a tall, gaunt figure, attired in flowing robes. It was a man of advanced age. His hair was white and scanty, and on the top of his head he wore a tight-fitting skull-cap of black velvet. His hands were bony, like those of a skeleton. One of his fleshless fingers rested on the edge of a small table. On this was a large globe of glass or crystal, which afterwards seemed to be composed of looking-glass, for it gave a distorted reflection of the different objects around.

"'In one corner was a furnace, which was the source of heat, and from which ascended a thin blue vapour. From the ceiling were suspended several strange animals, all stuffed, so as to represent life itself.

"'Ranged all round the walls were numerous glass-cases and other things, which displayed to view the most horrible and loathsome objects that can be conceived.

"'In one would be seen the skeleton of a man, and in the next an object presenting the appearance of an Egyptian mummy. Then in another would be seen the body of some hideous, misshapen monstrosity, the skin of which was puckered and shrivelled by the liquid in which it was immersed.

"'All these and many more things were around that I could not perceive at first, but which I had afterwards ample opportunities of beholding.

"'At first, I was principally interested in the figure of the astrologer himself, for so he was styled.

"'"Young man,' he said, addressing me, as soon as I appeared before him, and fixing a scrutinising gaze upon my countenance, 'you wish to see the future?'

"'"I do,' I answered. 'I have come here expressly by my father's wish, in order to know what line of life I shall be most likely to adopt.'

"'"I will endeavour to show you,' was the reply.

"'"Endeavour?' I echoed. 'I thought you had the power!'

"'"I have great power,' he said, with a frown—'great power; but I can tell you nothing without invoking a subtle spirit!'

"'"Invoke him, then!' for I was not in the least alarmed either by his words or manner.

"'Evidently he did not like my mode of speaking; but he went on:

"'"I must go through an incantation, and the articles required for it are expensive; if you are inclined to pay for them, then I will do my best to bring the spirit into this globe.'

"'He touched the crystal ball as he spoke.

"'"Will he be there?' I asked, with great curiosity.

"'"He will.'

"'"And is he there now?'

"'"No.'

"'I took a step forward.

"'"You doubt,' said the astrologer. 'Now behold!'

"'He touched the crystal globe with the end of his wand, and immediately its character changed. From being opaque, like looking-glass, it suddenly grew transparent, and I could see through it distinctly. It was evidently empty, or if the subtle spirit was there he was at that moment as invisible as the air itself.

CHAPTER DCLXXX.

CLAUDE DUVAL CONTINUES TO RELATE HIS ADVENTURE WITH THE ASTROLOGER.

"'I must say that this produced a deeper effect upon me than anything I had yet seen.

"'By a simple touch, a great alteration was wrought, which certainly bore the appearance of being the work of magic.

"'"Now,' said the astrologer, 'do you doubt?'

"'"I do not,' I said. 'I am anxious that you should invoke this spirit.'

"'"But the incantation?'

"'"How much will it cost?' I asked.

"'"You do not seem very rich,' said the astrologer, 'and I should not like you to leave this room disappointed; you might spread injurious reports, and say that I was an impostor.'

"'"How much?' asked I again, impatiently.

"'"I will charge you the merest price for the various drugs I shall have to use.'

"'"But how much?'

"'"Do not be impatient. I am considering.'

"'Then, after a pause, he added:

"'"Two hundred francs.'

"'"Then I must bid you good-day, I answered; 'I have no such sum about me.'

"'"Indeed?'

"'"I can assure you I have not. All I possess is one hundred francs.'

"'"I can assure you,' returned the astrologer, 'that the incantation will cost double that amount; but still, rather than allow you the opportunity of saying I cannot perform what I promise, I will undertake to show you your future for that amount.'

"'I did not know how to refuse, but yet I felt disinclined to part with all my wealth, for I spoke the truth—one hundred francs was then all that I possessed.

"'I put down the money on the table, and, as soon as the last coin was deposited, the astrologer touched it with his wand, and the whole vanished.

"'I confess this startled me not a little; but when I saw my money gone, I deeply regretted my foolishness, and wished I had kept the money in my own pocket and left the future to itself.

"'However, there was no hope for it, and I resolved to keep an eye upon all his proceedings, and watch him narrowly.

"'I could not get rid of the idea that he was a rank impostor, though certainly what I had seen would have convinced many of his supernatural powers.

"'"Advance,' he said to me. 'There—stand quite still—that will do.'

"'He placed me just in front of the crystal globe, and about a foot away from the table.

"'Don't move,' he said, 'or speak—mind that. Whatever you hear or see, do not move or speak; if you do, your death will be the result!'

"He then took hold of his wand and made a circle on the floor with it just round about where I stood. I watched him closely, and my scepticism received another shock, for wherever he moved the point of the wand along the floor, a line of fire followed it.

"There I stood, then, surrounded by this fiery circle, and not daring to move or speak; but I was permitted the use of my eyes, and I employed them to good advantage.

"I saw the astrologer go up to the furnace, and wave his wand in a strange manner, and go through several strange motions, all of which were well calculated to inspire awe and terror.

"Then he took up a large iron pan and placed it over the furnace. Into this, after again going through his posturings, he threw a small object about the size of a bullet. No sooner did it touch the bottom than a terrific report followed.

"'Ras Algethi!' cried the astrologer—'Ras Algethi, come hither!'

"I concluded Ras Algethi was the spirit he was about to summon, and would unfold my destiny.

"'I must try a stronger spell,' he muttered; 'I had hoped that would be sufficient. I must try again.'

"This time he threw what appeared to be another bullet into the pan. Where he obtained them from I know not—I only saw them suddenly appear in his hand just when he was about to throw them down.

"This time there was no report, but a bright green flame shot up; it extended itself all over the bottom of the pan, and reached up into the air about eighteen inches.

"The astrologer continued to wave his wand and to make many gesticulations, while at frequent intervals he would pronounce the name 'Ras Algethi.'

"Then slowly the green flame died away, and, after so vivid a light, the apartment seemed to be in darkness

"'Is he there?' asked the astrologer.

"'I can see nothing.'

"'Then I have only one resource. If he refuses to obey my call, you must depart unsatisfied.'

"Again the astrologer cast a bullet into the pan, and this time with a different result. A dense black smoke ascended in incredible quantities from the pan. It quickly spread itself over the whole of the apartment, and a moment afterwards the astrologer was completely covered up by the vapour and lost to my sight, though I could still hear him pronouncing the words 'Ras Algethi' with great energy.

"But still the smoke continued to ascend from the pan and to spread itself over the apartment, until presently after I was not able to distinguish anything—the darkness was indeed most profound.

"I held up my hand before my eyes, but could not see it. Then followed a terrific, crashing, roaring noise.

"'Behold!' cried the astrologer—'behold, he is here at last!'

"I strained my eyes, and then the smoke slowly rolled away. Once more I was able to discern the crystal globe, and standing by it, much in the same attitude as when I entered, was the astrologer.

"But the interior of the globe was no longer vacant. In it was a small, strange-looking figure, whose appearance would certainly have struck terror to the heart of a bold man. I shuddered when I saw him first, but believing that the whole was susceptible of easy explanation, I recovered my courage.

"'Now then,' said the astrologer, 'speak, and he will answer you—not by words, but by means of those letters.

"I should have told you that Ras Algethi—for such I suppose was the spirit's name—held in his hand a wand similar to that held by the astrologer.

"In front of the globe were the letters of the alphabet, from A to Z, and the figure held the wand in such a way that, although the letters were on the outside of the glass, it could point to them easily.

"'Now then,' said the astrologer, 'what is your first question?'

"'I want to know my future. What is the next thing that will happen to me?'

"The astrologer raised his wand and waved it several times. I bent all my attention upon the figure, being anxious to observe its movements.

"'Look closely,' said the astrologer, 'and observe the letters before which the wand stops. You will find words and sentences will be formed.'

"I did watch, and the first sentence was certainly calculated to reassure me and make me feel happy.

"The figure moved round, pausing every now and then before certain letters. I took accurate note of them, and found the sentence to be:

"'You will shortly come into possession of a large sum of money.'

"I was about to express myself well satisfied with this reply, when the astrologer checked me by a gesture.

"'You must only demand the questions,' he said; 'if you utter any other words, the spirit will disappear, and I shall be powerless to summon him again.'

"'Well, then,' I said, 'I wish to know what event will follow the last?'

"Again the same manœuvres were gone through, and I made the next sentence out to be:

"'You will have a narrow escape of your life.'

"This was almost as satisfactory as the first; it was certainly much better to have a narrow escape than perish.

"'What will happen next?'

"Again I watched the letters closely, and the following sentence was produced:

"'You will then go over to England, in which country you will play the part of a highwayman.'

"Now I should tell you that during this last sentence I noticed a circumstance which had escaped my observation before. This was, that the astrologer while waving his wand about constantly contrived to do so in a peculiar manner.

"Strangely enough, there was some kind of connection or sympathy between the wand in the hand of Ras Algethi and the one in the hand of Mazzaroth, the astrologer.

"I noticed that whenever the latter allowed the point of his wand to remain opposite to a letter the figure swung round, and the point of the wand it carried stopped exactly opposite to it.

"I was sure I was right, and the discovery exasperated me greatly. It was the astrologer who was giving me the answers, and not the subtle spirit Ras Algethi.

"Although he told me I risked my life by any attempt to speak or move, I darted forward and seized him by the throat.

"He was quite taken by surprise by the movement, and therefore I gained an advantage over him which he never recovered and which I never lost.

"'You rascally old cheat!' I exclaimed—'I see through the whole of your scheme. You must have taken me for a fool if you thought I should be gulled by it! I will turn prophet for once, and, mark my words, you will have the narrow escape of your life, and not me.'

"He struggled in vain to speak. Not only was my grasp upon his throat a tight one, but he was also confounded at the discovery of his trickery.

"'Now,' I said, 'confess—confess all! On that condition only can I spare your life. Confess, I say!'

"'I will,' he contrived to gurgle out—'I will! But you must release my throat a little, or I cannot.'

"I did relax my grasp a little, but only a little, for I guessed he would prove a slippery customer, and would be prompt to avail himself of any chance of getting the upper hand.

"'Now,' I said, 'is not all this an infamous imposture? Answer me at once, or I strangle you upon the spot!'

"'It is!' he gasped.

"'And that Ras Algethi, as you call him, is no more than a puppet that moves everywhere you may direct by your wand?'

"'It is so.'

"'And you contrived to put him in the glass while the chamber was filled with smoke?'

"'That was done easily. There is a spring in the table.'

"'I don't want to know any more,' I exclaimed, 'I can see through it all easily enough. I quite understand it, but I am in the mind to make one of your prophecies come true.'

"He glared at me in dismay.

"'Now,' I said, 'be quick and make up your mind. Tell me which you prefer. Will you hand over to me the whole of your wealth? If you refuse, you die upon the spot!'

"'I have no money,' he said—'only your hundred francs.'

"'You lie!' I exclaimed. 'And as I suppose I shall never get the truth out of you, I will adopt a more summary method of ascertaining how much money you have concealed in this apartment. It is in vain for you to refuse or resist—you must understand that I am master here!'

CHAPTER DCLXXXI.

CLAUDE DUVAL PLAYS THE PART OF AN ASTROLOGER TO GREAT PERFECTION.

"STRANGELY enough, these words only made him more violent, and he tried more desperately to escape from my hold; but it was quite in vain, for I had the advantage of youth and great muscular strength on my side.

"In a few minutes afterwards, the old astrologer found himself gagged, bound hand and foot, and lying in one corner of his apartment.

"I had divested him of his long flowing robe and his skull-cap. To the edge of the latter I found that a small quantity of silver-white hair had been attached like a fringe, so that, now he was denuded of his garb, Mazzaroth—as he called himself—looked very much younger than he did before.

"I had made up my mind to two things. One was, to make every effort to elucidate the mystery attached to all that I had seen. The other was, to obtain my hundred francs. And, as he had not scrupled to defraud or rob me of those, neither did I scruple to determine to take all the other cash I could lay my hands on.

"The adventure promised to be a profitable one to me. But you shall see how it turned out.

"I first of all examined the wand, and found that one end was tipped with loadstone. I held it towards the glass globe, and was able to make the figure within revolve with perfect ease.

"The other end of the wand was hollow, and smelt strongly of sulphur, so I concluded that this had contained some liquid that, when allowed to fall on the floor, caught light.

"The mystery of the magic circle was now cleared up. I could not understand, however, how it was Ras Algethi appeared in the globe, nor how it was my hundred francs had disappeared the moment I placed them on the table.

"Of this last-named piece of furniture I commenced a close examination. At one end I saw a knob which seemed to have been pulled out of its proper position, for part of the shank was visible. I tried to pull it out completely, but, failing in doing this, I pushed it in. It fitted into its place perfectly, and when I looked up I saw that Ras Algethi had vanished.

"I repeated the experiment several times, though it was perfectly plain that there was some kind of machinery connected with the knob which caused the figure to appear or disappear.

"Perceiving a knob of similar construction close to it, but presenting an ordinary appearance, I pulled that, when lo! a small place in the table opened like a trap-door. I hastened towards it, and, putting in my hand, drew out my hundred francs, and perhaps a few more.

"I was fast becoming initiated into the mysteries of an astrologer's business. In seven minutes I had learned as much as some people do when they have been apprenticed to a trade seven years.

"The device of the bullets I thought nothing of. The first was a detonating bullet, and the second some chemical substance which emitted a green flame. The same might be said of the last, though what these substances were I don't know, nor did I care.

"Just when I had reached so far in my investigations, I was startled by a sharp knocking on the door. Some one was without, and I began to wonder what in the world I should do.

"My course of action was decided upon in a second. I had no time to deliberate upon its results.

"Seizing hold of Mazzaroth, I rolled him up into a corner where he was completely out of sight. Then, with all the speed I could, I put on the large robe, which covered all my dress completely. Then I donned the skull-cap, and, as the light in the apartment was very dim, I believed I should be able to pass muster with anyone who did not happen to be intimately acquainted with the astrologer.

"By the time I had done this, there came another knock at the door, showing that the person outside was becoming impatient.

"Then all at once I thought of the black curtains that had hung before the door on my entrance, and glancing towards that end of the chamber, I perceived them.

"I stepped forward quickly, and saw a cord so combined with pulleys and rings as to cause the curtains to fly back immediately it was pulled. This cord passed under the flooring, leaving no trace of the direction it took; but remembering that when I entered Mazzaroth was standing near the table, I went there to look for it, and near one of the table legs, there, sure enough, I saw one end of the cord.

"It was furnished with a loop, and this loop was secured to a hook screwed into the under part of the table. I released this loop. Instantly the cord rushed through the hole in the flooring, and, looking up, I saw that the curtains had fallen, as they were constructed to do, by their mere weight alone.

"Just then the knocking was repeated for the third time. Remembering how Mazzaroth had addressed me, I cried out:

"'Enter!' imitating his voice as well as I could.

"While I pronounced the word, the door opened, and some one came in.

"'What seek you?' I inquired.

"'Private business of Mazzaroth,' was the reply.

"'Enter!' I cried again; and while I spoke I pulled the cord suddenly, and with great dexterity, considering it was the first time I had performed the feat. I placed the loop over the hook.

"I then saw standing near the threshold of the apartment a little, wrinkled old man, who, by his dress, was evidently well off in the world, if not possessing some rank and title. His age was perceptible at a glance, as well as the fact that he tried all he could to conceal the ravages of time.

"'Advance!' I cried, as sepulchrally as I could—'advance!'

"He obeyed.

"'Now,' I exclaimed, 'state what you wish.'

"'Two things.'

"'What are they?'

"'The first, a proof of your art; the second, your aid and assistance in a secret matter, for which I will pay you largely and liberally.'

"At this moment there came from the corner of the room where Mazzaroth was lying a dismal sound, half a howl, half a groan.

"The new-comer started back several paces, and at length ejaculated, with chattering teeth:

"'Wh—what's that?'

"For a moment I lost my presence of mind, but, remembering how the sound was produced, I replied, calmly:

"'One of my familiar spirits.'

"The groaning noise was repeated.

"'Silence, Ras Algethi!' I cried, turning towards the corner. 'Be silent, I command you!'

"'I—is there a spirit here?' asked the old man, somewhat alarmed.

"'There are many spirits,' said I, boldly, 'but the one you heard is the most subtle and rebellious of them all. With great difficulty I succeeded in summoning him to this apartment, and I was in the act of giving him his release when you knocked and interrupted me. He is now chafing under the restraint.'

"This speech was followed by another groan.

"'Pray let him go—let him go!' said the new-comer.

"'I cannot while any of the uninitiated are present. Moreover, if you require a proof of my art, I cannot give it you without his assistance.'

"'Let me have it, then, and then suffer him to depart.'

"'You must pay for the incantation,' I exclaimed, waving my wand grotesquely. 'Two hundred francs is the smallest sum.'

"Without a murmur, the stranger pulled out the amount I mentioned in gold pieces.

"'Place them on the table,' I said.

"While I spoke, I took good care to stand in such a position that I had hold of the little knob.

"He did so, and as soon as the last coin was dropped I pulled the knob suddenly and the whole disappeared.

"I was startled myself at the rapidity of this movement, and could not help admiring the ingenious and skilful manner in which the machinery had been constructed.

"The new-comer was evidently startled.

"I much regretted that I was not able to draw around him the magic circle of fire, but the charge that had been placed in the wand was exhausted, so this was out of the question.

"I nevertheless made an imaginary circle by drawing the end of the wand along the floor, and as I did so I said:

"'Your life depends upon your paying strict attention to the words I am about to utter. If, until I give you leave, you either move from your position a single step, or speak one word, your death will be immediate!'

"So impressively did I pronounce these words, that the stranger turned pale and his knees knocked together. I had great difficulty in subduing the smile that curled my lips.

"'Now,' I said, 'tell me what proof of my art you desire.'

"'A little—a mere trifle will suffice.'

"'Name it, then.'

"'Tell me, then, in a few words, the state of my mind or feelings.'

"This was a poser, but I did not lose my confident air.

"'Enough,' said I—'you shall be obeyed.'

"While I spoke, I looked attentively at the old man, in order to read his character as well as I could.

"From many little things I beheld, all trifling and unimportant in themselves, yet saying much when taken collectively, I came to the conclusion that salacity was the most prominent trait in his disposition.

"This furnished me with the key to my proceedings.

"I had taken particular notice of all the astrologer's movements, of which my perfect recollection of them now is a sufficient proof, and so I imitated him as closely as I was able.

"I was in a little difficulty with regard to the bullets that he threw into the pan. Passing my hand down the side of his robe, I found there were three little pockets or pouches, each of which contained about a dozen of these little bullets.

"Which was the one that would produce the explosion I did not know, nor did I see that it much mattered so long as the smoke did not come first.

"The pockets were placed all under one another, so it was only natural that I should put my hand into the top one.

"I took out one of the bullets between my finger and thumb, and then waved my wand about for some time, and finally disclosed what I had in my hand, so that it appeared as though I had obtained possession of it by magic.

"I cast it into the pan, and an explosion followed. This startled and confused the old man not a little, and of course I took advantage of his confusion to take up the second bullet; and so I went on to the last, and when the room was well obscured by the smoke I cautiously felt my way towards the table and pulled the knob. Then, when the smoke rolled away, there stood the little figure with the wand in its hand.

"The old man was astonished at this, for he had satisfied himself previously that the globe was quite empty when I began my incantations.

"'Now,' I said, 'watch the figure closely; the wand will pause a second before these letters. You will find they will make a complete sentence. Now observe.'

"I waved my wand so skilfully that he did not suspect anything. His own attention indeed, as was very natural, was concentrated upon the little figure.

"The words I produced were these:

"'You are ardently devoted to the fair sex, because, although old, you are younger than many men.'

"This answer pleased him very well, and I asked:

"'Do you wish to know more?'

"To my great relief, he answered:

"'No, that is sufficient.'

"This was lucky, as I might not have been so fortunate a second time. But I saw that he was full of impatience to communicate something to me.

CHAPTER DCLXXXII.

DESCRIBES THE SUCCESS CLAUDE DUVAL MET WITH IN PERSONATING MAZZAROTH, AND HOW MAZZAROTH GOT HIM INTO A VERY SERIOUS FIX.

"'MAZZAROTH,' he said, 'you are a man of great power.'

"I bowed profoundly, but started suddenly upright, for my ears were assailed by a lumbering sound, and then a sharp snap, as though something had been suddenly secured.

"However, I took no notice of this, passing it off as the doings of one of my familiar spirits.

"'For what sum, Mazzaroth,' asked the old man, 'will you consent to aid me in my designs?'

"'That entirely depends upon the nature of them,' was my reply.

"'Then I wish you to assist me by gaining the affections of a young and beautiful girl, who at present treats me with the utmost indifference.'

"I bowed again, and wondered whether this sort of thing was at all in Mazzaroth's line of business. If it was, it would seem strange for me to refuse, and also I should be quite at a loss how to proceed. The only thing I could do was to wait patiently for the old man to continue.

"'Mazzaroth,' he said, 'if, for two thousand francs, you will consent to aid me, I will tell you a scheme by which it may be done.'

"This large sum tickled my fancy immensely, and I thought it would be a pity to allow the chance of earning it to slip by. I therefore replied:

"'I am willing to listen to all you have to say. Let me know the nature of your scheme, and then I will deliberate upon it.'

"'Well, then, this young girl, who, as I have told you, is very beautiful, is also poor and credulous. The fame of your great skill has reached her, and anything you said would have great weight.'

"I bowed again.

"'Now, Mazzaroth, you understand what you have to do?'

"'Perfectly,' I answered, boldly, though I had but a dim idea. To save myself from getting into a dilemma, I added: 'Perhaps it would be better for you to put your proposal in an exact form, and then there would be no danger of a mistake being made.'

"'If you wish it, I will do so,' was the reply. 'I will induce this girl to come to you to have her fortune told, to know what will happen to her in the future.'

"'Yes,' said I, 'that's what I understood.'

"'Well, when she comes, I wish you for once to set aside all your magic art, to use no real incantations, and to call in no familiar spirits, but simply to answer her according to my directions, and that answer must be this: Describe me, and tell her how she is loved by such a one; tell her, too, that the stars and planetary bodies have ordained that she shall be mine; that it will be useless for her to attempt to contend against the decrees of Fate, and that the remainder of her life will be passed in the utmost wretchedness and woe if she continues to turn a deaf ear to my proposal.'

"'And you think that if I tell her this it will succeed—that your purpose will be answered?'

"'I do,' replied the old man, rubbing his hands gleefully and mumbling his jaws together. 'I am sure of it, so great is the veneration in which you are held by her. She knows so many of your prophecies that have come true, that she will not doubt you speak correctly in her case.'

"I reflected a moment before I answered, and I will give you the result of my reflections presently.

"Then I turned to the old man, and said:

"'And this is the service you wish me to perform for two thousand francs? Then I must decline.'

"'Decline?'

"'Yes.'

"'Why?'

"'The sum is too little.'

"'Two thousand francs too little?'

"'Yes—much too little! I must have at least five thousand francs to recompense me for thus violating the noble science of astrology.'

"The old man considered for a few moments, and then his passion for the young girl triumphed over every other consideration.

"'Enough,' he said—'I consent. The five thousand francs shall be yours.'

"'That is quite sufficient,' I answered. 'Place them upon the table, and I will undertake to do all that you require, though you must not blame me if my predictions do not have upon the young girl the effect that you anticipate.'

"'I am not afraid of that,' was the answer. 'I will take the risk of it.'

"'Very good, then. Put down the money.'

"'Not the whole of it,' he answered. 'I will pay you half now, and half when the girl has paid her visit.'

"I tried hard to obtain the whole amount, but could not succeed, so I was obliged to content myself with two thousand five hundred francs, which, you will confess, was not at all bad, considering this was my first attempt at the science.

"Soon after this the old man took his leave, assuring me as he departed that he was quite certain the young girl would shortly pay me a visit. She was more than half inclined to do so already, and the trifling influence which he could bring to bear would cause her to quite make up her mind.

"I shook my fist after him as soon as the door closed.

"'You hoary-headed old monster!' I thought. 'But I will be even with you yet! Some good will come of my turning astrologer, I fancy! And now for my reflections.'

"You must not imagine for a moment that I intended to further the old villain's plans in any way—on the contrary, I had resolved to thwart them.

"The easiest manner of doing this was to pretend to fall in with his views, as I had done. When the girl came, I intended to inform her of all that had passed, and so put her on her guard against his insidious advances.

"This was a very praiseworthy resolve, and I waited impatiently for the girl to make her appearance.

"But all was perfectly still outside. I heard no indications of the approach of anyone.

"My next proceeding was to commence a search all over the apartment, in order to load myself with all the wealth I could find.

"The impression was strong upon my mind that I should be well rewarded for my trouble.

"In this I was not mistaken.

"In many out-of-the-way places, where no one would have thought scarcely of looking for money, I found small bags of gold and silver, and little packets of bank-notes.

"Mazzaroth, as he called himself, had evidently been doing a roaring trade.

"He had taken care of his money, too. Perhaps he was aware that he was playing a dangerous game, and that it might end all at once some day, in the event of which he would be tolerably well prepared to abide by the result.

"This task quite absorbed all my thoughts and attention.

"No interruption came, however; and, all at once, on reaching that corner of the room where I had left the astrologer, I started and paused.

"I remembered that some time had elapsed since he had uttered one of his groans, and I wondered what could be the cause of it.

"Had the gag produced suffocation? or had he in his struggles to get free broken a blood-vessel, or in some other way brought about his death?

"Then I remembered the sharp, snapping sound which had startled not only me but my dupe, and, with a sensation I cannot describe, I drew aside the piece of arras or tapestry that concealed the corner of the room where I had rolled the body of the astrologer.

"To my intense astonishment, he had gone—vanished—disappeared as completely and entirely as though he had been transformed into air.

"For a minute or two I stood in a state of perfect bewilderment, looking at the spot where I was quite certain I had left him.

"He had gone—there was no doubt of that; and I began to wonder whether, after all, there was not something mysterious and supernatural connected with him and with his doings.

"'Perhaps,' I thought, 'he has managed to crawl or roll along the floor to some distance.'

"Directly the thought occurred to me, I commenced a re-examination of the apartment.

"It was large, and I was occupied several minutes.

"At the end of that time I sank down upon a rude seat quite bewildered.

"Mazzaroth was gone—where, I could not for the life of me imagine.

"This sudden and complete disappearance was well calculated to strike awe into my mind, notwithstanding I had penetrated so many of his secrets, and found them to be of a very material and mechanical character.

"But this—how was I to account for it?

"While plunged into deep thought upon this subject, and indulging in many speculations, I suddenly heard upon the staircase the heavy trampling of many feet, and the murmuring of voices.

"I began to wonder whether it could concern me.

"Nearer and nearer came the sounds, and it was quite evident that a large throng of people were, for some purpose or the other, ascending the stairs.

"Would they pause before the door of the apartment I was in? was the question; and I started to my feet anxiously as I asked it.

"I was not long kept in a state of suspense.

"The footsteps ceased at the threshold of the door, but the murmuring of voices still continued.

"Then some one, in a loud, hoarse voice, bawled out in French the word, 'Silence!'

"After this there was comparative stillness, and then the same voice, still speaking in French, said:

"'In the name of the King, open!'

"I made no reply. I concluded in a moment that I was in some sort of danger, and my feelings were anything but pleasant, I can assure you.

"'Confound it all!' I thought. 'That rascally Mazzaroth has been up to something or other, and has got found out. Where in the world can he be? They're officers of police outside, I'll lay any amount. They will break in, take me to be Mazzaroth, and I shall be carried off to the Bastile, or somewhere, to answer for his doings!'

"This, you may depend, was anything but an agreeable reflection for me to make.

"That it was correct there could be little doubt.

"Some very heavy blows now resounded upon the door.

"Finding their demands for admittance disregarded, the officers of police—for such they proved to be—had resolved to batter down the door.

"'Stop!' I thought. 'Is there no way out of this difficulty? Yes—to be sure there is! I will pull off these things I took from Mazzaroth, and hide them somewhere—they surely will not take me for the astrologer then. Hurrah!—that's a good thought!'

"I now made quite sure of getting off clear; and with more speed even than I had assumed them, I threw off the apparel belonging to Mazzaroth, and appeared in my own proper person.

"I made the clothing up into a bundle and threw it into a corner.

"Scarcely had I done so, than the door fell in with a crash, and a number of police officers appeared.

"But I staggered back in consternation and confusion, for there, standing at the head of them, making many gesticulations and pointing to me, was no other than Mazzaroth, the astrologer, himself.

[CLAUDE DUVAL ESCAPING FROM THE FRENCH PRISON.]

CHAPTER DCLXXXIII.

CLAUDE DUVAL IS CAPTURED BY THE POLICE OFFICERS, AND FINDS HIMSELF IN A FAIR WAY OF BECOMING A GALLEY SLAVE.

'This event gave me a sudden shock, I can assure you.

"I was deprived of all motion, and stood like one petrified. Certainly, it seemed as though Mazzaroth did possess supernatural powers; if he had not, how could he —bound hand and foot as he was—have left the room, summoned the police, and then led them to the apartment?

"While I was thinking about this, and feeling rather uncomfortable in consequence, several of the police officers closed round me and seized me tightly.

"'That's the villain!' shrieked Mazzaroth—'that's the villain! Hold him!—keep him tight! Don't let him escape on any account! He has come here, ill-treated me plundered me of my wealth, and ruined my reputation for ever!'

"'All right,' said the officer in command over the remainder, 'we've got him secure enough, never fear!'

"'Then search him!' cried Mazzaroth—'search him at once! You will find, then, my words are confirmed! He has about him a large sum of money belonging to me!

"The officers accordingly began their search; the result of it, of course, you must know.

"They found upon me all the money I had been at such pains to obtain, and all of which Mazzaroth positively swore belonged to him.

"'Why, you impudent scoundrel!' said the principal officer. 'Bring him along, comrades—bring him along! We'll soon settle his business for him!'

"It was no good for me to attempt to resist so many men, and therefore I did not make the attempt. Some over, I was stunned and bewildered by the events which had taken place.

"I suffered myself, then, to be led into the presence of the prefect, as the individual is called who performs the functions of a police magistrate.

"I was very anxious to hear what Mazzaroth had to say against me.

"He made a thousand apologies to the prefect of police, and bowed so very often and so profoundly that he must have had the backache for a week afterwards.

"The substance of his declaration was, however, that I had gained admittance to his room, had brutally ill-used him, bound him hand and foot, and flung him into a corner, and then deliberately set to work to rifle the apartment of its contents.

"The prefect, who was a little man with a little face and huge spectacles, frowned at me severely.

"'It so happened,' said Mazzaroth, 'that he flung me into one particular corner of my apartment where there happened to be a secret door.'

"This made all clear to me. However, I may as well let you have Mazzaroth's account of the proceedings.

"'I knew the secret door was there,' he said—'that is to say, it was three or four feet from the spot where I lay. Although I had been so severely handled, and although I was bound hand and foot, I managed to writhe along the floor till I reached it. I knew the exact position of the spring, and pressed against it with the back of my head; the door flew open; I crawled through and closed it after me. In doing this, I unluckily lost my balance and fell to the bottom of a steep flight of stairs, and with such violence as to burst open the door at the bottom of them. I was then seen by an officer of police, who released me from my bonds, and to whom I gave an account of all that had taken place.'

"I had no particular defence to offer to what Mazzaroth brought against me—in fact, I was quite overcome by the novelty of my situation.

"'This is coming to Paris with a vengeance,' I thought, 'and it's all through my father's silly whim.'

"There was no use in regretting what was past.

"The prefect of police dwelt at great length on the enormity of my offence, committed me to prison, and said that when brought up for my trial I should surely be sentenced for fourteen years to work as a galley slave.

"This was to me anything but a pleasant prospect.

"I was led away, however, from the presence of the prefect, taken to a prison, and there confined in a room that was situated in a kind of turret, and which was a considerable distance from the ground.

"Here I was left to my own reflections, and I must say that it was not until I found myself here that I fully realized my position.

"I began to see that the consequences would be very serious to myself.

"A galley slave: there was something horrible in the very idea and the bare pronunciation of the words.

"'I will escape,' I said. 'Yes—yes, I will escape! I will not submit to my fate without a struggle. I do not believe that I was destined for a galley slave!'

"No sooner did I make up my mind to attempt to escape than I began to look carefully all round me; there was only one window to my cell, and that was so high up in the wall that I could only just reach its lower edge with the tips of my fingers.

"Outside it was furnished with a sloping shutter, so constructed as to make it impossible for anyone to obtain a view of surrounding objects—nothing could be seen but a small patch of blue sky above.

"I should not have known that I was at a distance from the ground but for the fact that I was conducted up several flights of stairs before the cell was reached.

"I was not fettered, which was a great advantage to me.

"The flooring of the cell was composed of red tiles.

"There was a small iron bed in one corner, and in the other a grate, though there was no fire burning in it.

"That was everything the place contained.

"'I will wait awhile,' I thought, 'before I make an attempt to get free.'

"I was hungry, for since my arrival in Paris I had scarcely tasted anything. I knew that weakness would ensue from want of food, and that in my undertaking I should require all my strength. So one of the reasons why I waited was in order to partake of some food, which I felt sure would be brought me.

"In this expectation I was not deceived.

"A jailer presently appeared, bringing with him a pitcher and a loaf, which he set down on the floor in a surly way, without venturing to say one word.

"As soon as the door closed behind him, and was fastened, I sprang forward and took hold of the pitcher first, for my throat was parched.

"But the water was so foul and brackish, that when I had swallowed a mouthful I was glad to put the pitcher down again.

"Then I looked at the bread, and found it black and mouldy.

"Starvation was preferable to eating such food, so I allowed what they brought me to remain untouched.

"Anxiously I waited for night to come, and I watched the gradual darkening of the little bit of sky I could perceive with the utmost impatience.

"I soon found, however, that every three hours visits were paid to the cell, in order to ascertain that all was right, and the prisoners secure.

"That is indeed an excellent plan, and is safer by far than bolts, and bars, and locks.

"Only three hours! And so, if I made my escape, I should have to commence operations immediately after the departure of the guard, and get clear of the prison within three hours.

"I fancied this was to be done, and as night came on I grew more and more hopeful and daring.

"I waited until the hour of midnight was sounded from some church or cathedral in the vicinity.

"In a few minutes after, the door was thrown open, and the guard, carrying torches, entered.

"They found me sitting down upon the edge of my bed in quite a disconsolate attitude.

"They looked at me, looked all round, and, finding everything as usual, departed.

"I listened to their retreating footsteps for a moment, and then sprang to my feet.

"'Now,' I muttered—'now is the time to make my attempt!

"I had only been able to think of one means by which I might perchance effect my escape.

"This was by means of the chimney. Narrow as it looked, I thought I might be able to climb up it and emerge upon the roofs.

"To descend, something like a rope would be necessary, and where was I to look for that?

"There was nothing of the kind in my dungeon. The bed was simply a bag of straw, and I was furnished with a couple of rugs or blankets to draw over me.

"I did not fancy trusting my weight to a rope formed of those articles. But there was no hope for it—there was nothing else.

"With great dexterity, then, I tore up my blankets into long strips, and tied them securely together.

"Then I tore open the canvas covering of my bed, and tore that up also.

"I was now in possession of a rope several yards in length.

"One end I tied tightly round one of my feet, and, going to the fireplace, began to ascend.

"I had taken all this trouble before I found out whether the chimney was wide enough to allow me passage up it.

"It was scarcely likely, as I might have known had I given the subject a proper amount of thought.

"The opening at the bottom, however, was so large as to inspire me with the liveliest hopes.

"Disregarding the soot, which fell down in clouds, I began to ascend, and was just felicitating myself upon the certainty of making my escape, when my head suddenly came into violent contact with some hard object.

"Putting up my hand, I found this was an iron bar, cemented into the wall, and crossing the chimney in a transverse direction.

"This obstacle it was impossible to pass.

"With furious rage I seized hold of the bar and shook it, while I gnashed my teeth together in vexation.

"Suddenly my feelings underwent a change.

"The bar was loose! I shook it again and again, and every time I found it moved more freely in its setting.

"Hope again revived in my breast, and I tugged away manfully, in the hope of releasing it altogether.

"After incredible exertions, I succeeded, and I found myself armed with a truly formidable weapon.

"I was now quite elate.

"The chimney was narrow, and yet wide enough to allow me to ascend easily.

"I accelerated my speed, when again I was stopped by a similar obstacle.

"At this my spirits quite sank.

"I tugged at the bar, but in vain, it was as firm as a rock—there was no hope of releasing it.

"I turned my face upwards, but I could not catch a glimpse of the sky above.

"To what height I might have to ascend I had not the least idea.

"Perchance, if I succeeded in removing this bar, and should a few yards farther on find another and another, and then, last of all, there might be something fixed on the top of the chimney, making it impossible for me to emerge.

CHAPTER DCLXXXIV.

CLAUDE DUVAL RELATES THE ATTEMPTS HE MADE TO AVOID HIS FATE.

"This reflection, probable as it was, quite abated my courage.

"'I will try some other means,' I said—'the chimney is impracticable.'

"Accordingly I lowered myself down, and in one hundredth part of the time it took me to ascend I found myself on the floor of the cell, presenting a truly deplorable appearance.

"My clothing was torn against the rough stonework, I was covered with soot from head to foot and I was bleeding in various places from several abrasions of the skin.

"All that I had gained was the iron bar. This was about three feet in length and an inch and a half in thickness.

"I glanced up at the window.

"It was strongly barred on the inner side, and on the outer was the wooden affair I have spoken of.

"This, no doubt, was firmly fixed, and yet the removal of it and the iron bars did not present nearly so many difficulties as ascending the chimney.

"I deeply regretted having spent so much of my strength so fruitlessly—moreover, what was more precious still, I had lost much time.

"Raising the iron bar in my hands, I used it like a lever.

"I inserted one end underneath one of the perpendicular bars, and, exerting my strength as well as my awkward position would allow me, endeavoured to wrench it from its place.

"Evidently, when those bars were put there, it was never imagined that a prisoner would have in his possession such a powerful weapon as I had.

"Then, to be sure, nothing of the kind could by any possibility be smuggled into the prison.

"But the circumstances under which I had obtained it were exceptional.

"I was really quite surprised at the ease with which the iron bar broke away from its setting. I bent it upwards as well as I could, and then, with the blood literally dancing in my veins, attacked the second one.

"This did not yield so easily as the first, but eventually I conquered it, for I had now more room to use the lever, and could work better.

"An opening was now made almost large enough for me to creep through. The removal of one bar more would suffice.

"After a few minutes' exertion I succeeded in my design; but the obstacles I had yet to encounter and overcome were very numerous, and yet I thought nothing of them—I felt so inspirited by the success I had gained.

"I felt quite an affection for the iron bar, which had done me such good service, and I resolved that we would not part company.

"I have already told you that the sill of the window was almost out of my reach, so I had yet to overcome the difficulty of reaching it.

"The torn blankets were still attached to my ankle.

"About two yards, or rather more, below my foot, I tied the iron bar securely to my rope, which I wrapped round and round many times and finally tied tightly.

"Then, giving myself a spring upwards, I caught hold of the sill of the window, and easily raised my body until my breast was on a level with it.

"I then seized hold of the grating and pulled myself up completely. In another moment I was seated on the window-sill.

"I then, by means of the rope, drew up my iron bar.

"I had all along been under the impression that the opening left at the top of the shutter was wide enough to allow me to squeeze my body through it. It is difficult, however, to estimate distances correctly, and, to my great chagrin, I found that this was impossible.

"Yet I had my iron bar, and though awkwardly situated for using it, yet I might be able, with several smart blows, to demolish the wood-work; but then I reflected if I did this it would fall, an alarm would then be created, and my escape cut off.

"I was not to be stopped by such an obstruction, however; the opening only required a little enlargement, and presently, by using care and caution, I broke off a portion of the wood-work large enough to allow me to creep forth.

"Rising up, I peeped over the edge of the sloping board. It was lucky that I could not fall, for just then I was seized with a sudden vertigo, caused by finding myself at such a height from the ground as I was. This feeling soon passed away.

"From my elevated position I commanded a splendid view of the city of Paris, the roofs of the highest buildings in which seemed far below me.

"Looking down perpendicularly, I saw, about twenty feet below me, a kind of rampart or gallery, surrounding the turret in which my cell was situated.

"The gallery was furnished with a low stone parapet, and along it an officer was pacing with monotonous steps.

"The sentinel did not look up, or he might have seen me.

"Taking the precaution to expose as little of my head as possible, I watched his movements.

"I saw him disappear, and after a length of time come in sight at the opposite portion of the gallery.

"It was by this means that I became aware that the gallery encircled the turret, and the sentinel's duty was to keep walking round and round it.

"Unluckily for my enterprise, the night was what I might call a light and a dark one. At times the clouds would be so dense as to cause a deep darkness; at other times they would open, and through the rift the moon would pour down her silvery radiance.

"My first step must be to descend to the gallery beneath me.

"This, I doubted not, the rope would easily enable me to do; but I must watch for two circumstances; I must choose a time when the sky was covered with clouds, and begin my descent as soon as the sentinel was out of sight—I must also reach the ground and conceal myself before he came in sight again.

"In the first place I secured my rope—if I may so call it—to one of the iron bars belonging to my cell window which I had not yet disturbed.

"I untied the end from my ankle, and secured to it instead the iron bar. I held this in my hand.

"At length the clouds again covered the sky, and all was dark.

"I had discovered by observation that I was able to count a hundred rapidly between the time when the officer disappeared from my gaze and came in sight again.

"To be safe, I must do all that I had to do in the shape of making my descent in something less than that brief period of time.

"I watched him disappear, and almost before he was lost to view I began to lower the iron bar.

"The rope was nearly long enough to reach the floor of the gallery, and in paying it out I counted twenty.

"This was good work, and it could not have been done in less.

"Without pausing, I climbed over the edge of the shutter and slipped down the rope, continuing to count all the while.

"When my hands encountered the iron bar I had reached up to sixty-five.

"I glanced down, and saw that my feet were within an inch or two of the stone gallery.

"I let go without hesitation; then I untied the iron bar and clutched it tightly.

"I looked about me for a hiding-place, but could only find one, and that of a very inefficient character.

"This was a slight indentation in the wall or the turret, like the embrasure of a loophole.

"This was in deep shadow, and I squeezed myself back into it as far as ever I could, hoping by this means to escape the attention of the sentinel when he passed by.

"Scarcely had I taken up this position than I heard him coming, for, while standing in my hiding-place I could not see him.

"Tramp—tramp—tramp he came, and I counted every one of his regular steps.

"I clutched the bar of iron convulsively. I had escaped so far, and did not intend to be thwarted or turned back for a trifle.

"All that I had done would, I knew, add to my offence, and cause a sentence of greater severity to be passed upon me in the event of my being brought up for trial.

"I had just one chance, and only one. The sentinel, in walking round the gallery—as he must have done some hundreds of times that night—his eyes might on this occasion be turned from the wall of the turret towards the parapet. In that case he would pass me unseen, and I should have another hundred seconds to renew my efforts to escape.

"There was my rope still fluttering backwards and forwards a little way above his head, but I trusted he would not raise his eyes and perceive it.

"I fancied, too, that in the deep darkness it would be almost invisible.

"But circumstances combined in my disfavour.

"Almost with the suddenness of lightning, the moon broke out from behind the clouds. As if by magic, everything was revealed with a distinctness that was positively startling, owing to the contrast it afforded to the deep darkness that had previously reigned.

"Just then the sentinel arrived opposite to my hiding-place. His face was turned upwards, and a slight ejaculation escaped his lips.

"I guessed he had seen the rope.

"He stopped in his walk, and then suddenly his eyes rested upon me.

"The moon shone with full force into my hiding-place, so that I was revealed to him with greater plainness than even he was revealed to me.

"The man looked as astounded as he would have done had he found himself face to face with some dreadful apparition.

"But I saw him raise his musket in the air. I knew he was going to fire. I was aware that the shot would arouse the whole fortress, and that I should be recaptured.

"Without pausing to think of the consequences, and animated only by the instinct of self-preservation, I raised the heavy iron bar, and brought it down with full force upon the sentinel's head.

"There was an alarming crack, and then, with a jingling sound caused by his accoutrements, he lay prostrate on the stone pavement.

"He was disposed of. I had one enemy the less to contend with. I sincerely trusted, however, that he was not dead. I hoped my blow was only severe enough to stun him. This was quite possible, for he was furnished with a strong cap purposely constructed to break the force of a blow.

"Crouching down, for fear of being seen, I crept towards the parapet I have mentioned.

"I peeped over the edge. There was a sheer descent of a hundred feet at least. At the bottom was a broad kind of moat or ditch, which, however, was called by the inhabitants of the prison a fosse.

CHAPTER DCLXXXV.

CLAUDE DUVAL FINDS DANGER THICKENING AROUND HIM.

"This fosse completely surrounded the prison, and was filled to the brim with water, upon which the moon's rays shone with great brilliancy.

"But how was the descent to be made? Even if I could have made use of my rope—which was impossible—it would not have been half long enough.

"I was deliberating as to my next proceeding, when I was suddenly startled by an alarming sound.

"I believed that so little noise had been made by my attack upon the sentinel, that no alarm had been given.

"Judge of my surprise, then, when I heard a gun discharged at no great distance.

"I crouched down lower still, believing that I had been seen.

"The report of the gun was followed by the roll of a drum, and this was followed by another and another, until all the prison resounded with the noise.

"'They have gone into my cell and discovered my absence,' I thought, 'that's the secret; and yet three hours have not elapsed.'

"I was now in such a state of confusion that I scarcely knew what to do.

"I was roused into action by hearing a door open. Then followed the sound of heavy footsteps.

"The door was the one opening upon the gallery on which I stood—a door communicating with the interior of the prison.

"A party of soldiers were approaching.

"Only one thing remained for me to do. It offered but a slight chance of escape, but yet I was forced to adopt it, though at the same time I perilled my life.

"With extreme agility I climbed over the edge of the parapet, and hung to it at the full length of my arms, held only by the grasp of my fingers upon the edge of the stonework.

"But my feet encountered something—at first I could not tell what. Directly afterwards I discovered it was ivy. This parasitic plant flourished here in great luxuriance. It twined itself all round the fortress, and had been in existence probably for upwards of a century.

"Its branches were of uncommon thickness, and clung tightly to the wall.

"I ventured to bear a little weight with my feet, and found that the ivy supported them perfectly.

"The party of soldiers passed round the gallery until they reached the spot where their companion was lying.

"I heard them distinctly—not only their footsteps, but their voices.

"'Hullo!' cried one. 'I thought something was amiss when I found the sentinel did not walk round and round the gallery as usual.'

"'Behold!' said another, 'a prisoner has escaped! Look! 'here's the rope by which he has descended!'

"'Very good!' said another. 'Make your mind easy upon that point. He has not gone—he cannot escape!'

"'How do you know he has not gone far?'

"'Because the sentinel is quite warm. Beat the drums again.'

"This command was obeyed.

"'Now search narrowly everywhere around. It's my belief he's hiding close to us.'

"That the soldiers would look over the edge of the parapet was perfectly certain, and if they did so they could not fail to see me.

"I was in a desperate position, and therefore inclined to do desperate things in order to better myself.

"The wild resolve entered into my mind to commit the whole of my weight to the ivy, and to descend by it.

"No sooner did I make this determination than I proceeded to carry it into effect.

"But I closed my eyes and held my breath the while, for I did not know but what I might be precipitated instantly into the fosse beneath.

"I released my hold upon the edge of the stonework, and seized the ivy.

"It did not give way, and then I ventured to open my eyes and draw a long breath of relief.

"It furnished many a hand-hold, and I descended with a speed and recklessness which certainly was warranted by the circumstances.

"I was careful, however, to make no noise, and when I believed I was low enough to be out of sight of the soldiers above, I paused in my descent.

"Then the weather favoured me.

"Clouds again closed over the moon, and all became profoundly dark.

"I breathed a sigh of thankfulness.

"So far, all was well. I clung as close to the wall as I possibly could, so that the large dark leaves of the ivy should cover and conceal my form.

"Then, turning my face upwards, I was able to see though very dimly, the edge of the parapet above.

"Continuing to gaze, I then saw several of the soldiers bending over.

"'He is not on the gallery,' said one, 'and so he must have descended.'

"'But it is impossible,' said another voice. 'Where has he gone?'

"'I tell you again he has descended.'

"'But how can he have done so?'

"'That I don't know. If you fancy still that he is lurking about here, leave some of the men on guard, let the remainder descend, and cause a close watch to be kept round the walls; he may be hidden in the ivy, and if so we shall discover him, even if we have to wait till morning.'

"These words literally chilled my blood, and I wished most fervently that I had given that meddlesome fellow a tap on the head instead of the sentinel, who I looked upon now as quite a decent kind of fellow.

"'There can be no harm in that,' said another voice. 'Divide the men; I will remain here with half and keep the closest watch. You descend with the remainder, and get some more to your assistance with torches. We shall discover him, never fear.'

"I began to be of this way of thinking myself, but kept my courage up as well as I could.

"The soldiers above separated, and the other half continued to search narrowly round and round the gallery; but I thought to myself:

"'If I am to escape, now is the time. At all hazards, I must descend the ivy and cross the fosse before those fellows get down; if I do not, my chance is over!'

"Accordingly, using every care not to make the least disturbance, I recommenced my descent, but, in spite of all my efforts, the ivy rustled, and I feared the sound would reach the ears of those above, who, now that their suspicions were excited, would be listening eagerly to every trifling sound.

"My fears caused me to exaggerate this danger—the rustling was so slight as to be inaudible to them.

"The lower I got the less chance there was that they would hear me.

"The sky still continued covered with clouds.

"I ventured to look down. About fifteen feet below me, or perhaps rather more, was the fosse.

"My heart beat fast.

"'I shall be in time,' I thought. 'I shall cross it before they can arrive.'

"But just then a sound smote upon my ears which caused me to stop, and made me once more cling tightly to the wall.

"It was the regular tramp, tramp of a troop of men.

"'Too late,' I gasped—'too late!'

"My arms now ached terribly, owing to their having supported the weight of my body so long, and I feared their strength would presently depart.

"An invincible curiosity made me look in the direction from which the sounds came.

"I expected to see the gleam of many torches, but in this I was deceived.

"I saw, instead, only a number of small flashing lights, which I made out directly afterwards to be lanterns carried by the soldiers.

"'Curses on this mischance!' I murmured. 'An accident has cut off my escape. This is the regular guard making a round of the prison. Before they have gone, the others will be upon me. But for them I should have been free!'

"This was a vexatious circumstance; but all I could do was to continue to press myself closely against the wall, and hope that the ivy leaves would cover me over and prevent me from being seen.

"On came the patrol, about a dozen in number I saw them with their helmets, and long cloaks wrapped around them, each man carrying on his shoulder a musket furnished with a bayonet, and holding in his other hand a lantern.

"Tramp—tramp—tramp! On they came, and hope once more revived, for I fancied they would pass by, and I should yet have time.

"It was just as I was permitting my spirits to be buoyed up with this idea that I heard a voice from above bellow out in French:

"'Hallo, there!—guard—guard!'

"'Halt!' said a voice, and then, with a clatter, the patrol stopped on the outer edge of the fosse, and just beneath me. The man above then added:

"'Have you seen anything of the prisoner who has just escaped?'

"'No.'

"Then keep a sharp look-out all round the walls, for we believe he is hidden somewhere in the ivy.'

"'All right,' was the reply, and then the same voice immediately added, addressing the patrol: 'Raise your lanterns—flash them well about, and see if you can discover anything.'

"This order was obeyed, but the light emitted by the lanterns was so insufficient that it only cast a faint gleam upon the waters of the fosse.

"As for the lanterns revealing anybody fifteen feet in the air, that was quite out of the question.

"The troop, using unusual vigilance, passed on.

"As soon as I believed they had gone a safe distance, I once more began my descent.

"Down—down I went, my heart beating high with expectation, for I believed that after all I should yet be able to swim across the fosse and escape.

"At length my feet touched the water, and just then there came round an angle of the building a ruddy gleam of light.

"I heard, too, the tramp of feet, the murmur of voices, and the jingling of weapons.

"This was the patrol expressly sent out to discover me, and who had furnished themselves with torches.

"They were almost upon me before I was aware of their presence.

"What to do now I scarcely knew. To swim across the fosse in time was now impossible—it was at least thirty feet wide, and the opposite bank rugged and precipitous.

"On they came, and, glancing to the left, I saw their torches waving in the air.

"Rendered desperate, and resolving not to give in without a struggle, I lowered myself gradually into the water.

"Presently the whole of my body up to my chin was immersed. I kept my head above water by clinging with one hand to one of the ivy roots.

"The patrol was now almost opposite to me.

"The light given forth by the torches was a very different kind of illumination to that afforded by the lanterns; there were twenty of them at least, and everyone was burning brightly, so that, despite the smoke, they revealed not only the surface of the water, but also the ivy against the wall.

"As they approached I sank down lower and lower.

"Then I heard a voice from above—the same voice which had so startled me a little while before:

"'Hallo, there!—guard—guard!'

"'Halt!' cried the one in command, and I recognised the voice as belonging to the man who had first suggested to the others the idea that I might be hiding in the ivy. 'What is it above, there?'

"'Search narrowly round about the spot where you now stand,' cried the voice above; 'we can see marks upon the parapet where I now am, showing that he climbed over it at this point. He must be in the ivy, so search closely!'

"'All right!' was the reply.

CHAPTER DCLXXXVI.

CLAUDE DUVAL ESCAPES FROM THE PRISON AND HAS A SINGULAR ADVENTURE IN THE FOREST.

"Those were the last words I heard.

"I released my hold upon the ivy-root, and body to sink completely into the water.

"I conceived that was the only chance maining undetected. I should be able, I knew, to remain under water for several seconds, and then, by simply raising my head and taking a breath, for several seconds more.

"In my desperate condition I then thought that it was just possible I might manage to remain in the water until the examination was over, yet the least splash would betray me.

"The soldiers formed themselves into a line along the bank of the fosse, and raised their torches high into the air.

"The ruddy gleam fell upon the water and the ivy, but although they strained their eyes they were unable to see anything alarming.

"I should have told you (interrupted Claude) that my chief boyish sport and the one in which I most delighted was swimming; I had practised many odd feats, and one of them—though common enough—stood me in good stead then; it was that of swimming under water for a considerable distance, then rising for breath and swimming farther.

"As soon as I was fairly below the surface I thought of this, and placing my body in a peculiar position, I struck out slowly and gently with both hands. I kept as close to the bottom of the fosse as I could while executing this feat, because there was less danger then of being seen.

"When I imagined I had gone a sufficient distance, I suffered myself to rise slowly to the surface.

"I found instantly that I was just beyond the circle of light that was thrown by the torches, consequently I was invisible to the soldiers, though I could see them plainly enough, and even hear them, for I had not gone very many feet.

"I drew in several long, deep breaths, and while I was doing so I heard the officer say:

"'He must be in the ivy still, and if he is I will fetch him down, I'll warrant!'

"He then commanded a dozen of his men to step forward with their muskets.

"'Now,' he said, 'fire a volley at that part of the wall which is just opposite to you. Do not scatter your shots much, and if he is there we must find him.'

"This order was obeyed; but of course, as I was under the water, it produced no result further than cutting off a great number of leaves.

"'Now again,' said the officer; 'a little higher up this time, and so on, till you get towards the top.'

"Had I been in the ivy when this was tried I must have perished, or else, to save my life, have surrendered myself.

"It was an excellent scheme, and I could not help admiring the officer's invention for thinking of it.

"Of course, being, as I was, in comparative safety, I could look upon his proceedings and those of his men with a very different eye.

"'Now,' I thought to myself—'now is the time to escape while they are firing away in that fashion—a slight noise might not be heard—now is the time.'

"Using great caution, I began to swim again, and this time in the ordinary fashion, because I was able to proceed with so much more rapidity.

"While getting to a greater distance from the soldiers who were firing, I also directed my course in a slanting direction to the opposite bank.

"This at length I reached in safety, and climbed up.

"The plunge into the cold water seemed to refresh me wonderfully. All my energies were completely braced up by it, and I felt as though I could go through as much exertion again as I had already undergone.

"I was aware that other troops were patrolling round the prison—that, if I was not speedy, I might fall foul of one of them.

"Had they formed a complete line round the fosse as they did soon afterwards, my escape would have been out of the question.

"Luckily, I was just in time.

"Crouching down upon the ground, I crept forward on my hands and knees, and, considering the mode of progression, the rate of speed I made was surprising.

"I soon got over a large piece of ground, and then, leaving myself at a safe distance, I sprang to my feet, and ran for my life.

"Away I went, at a furious rate, in a perfectly straight line, and without meeting with any obstacle.

"The last I saw of the soldiers and of the prison was that the whole of them, as I have hinted, had formed a circle round the outer bank of the moat, and were firing at the ivy. The impression upon their minds was that I was still hiding there; but I had escaped—I was free, and, after running much farther, my limbs at length failed me, and I sank down, utterly exhausted, to the earth.

"It so happened that chance had guided my footsteps to a large wood or forest that was situated at no great distance from the prison.

"I had penetrated into its recesses for a considerable distance before my strength failed me, and therefore there appeared to be every probability of my being in safety.

"I remained for a long time in this prostrate condition.

"At length, however, my strength returned to me, and I arose.

"During the remainder of that night, I continued to make my way through the forest as well as I could in a straight line, though whether I did this or not I know not.

"Of my enemies I heard nothing.

"As morning approached, I grew very cold and very hungry, yet where to obtain food or shelter I knew not.

"As for money, I had not a farthing; for when I was taken prisoner, the officers deprived me not only of the wealth belonging to the astrologer, but of my own as well.

"I was, too, in a most miserable condition as regards apparel, though I was somewhat cleansed by my bath in the fosse.

"Towards daybreak I sank down at the foot of a tree, feeling quite spent.

"Before I had remained very long in this position, however, I heard a slight—a very slight—sound. It was no more than the snapping of a twig, and might have been done by the wind, yet it terrified me exceedingly. It might have been done by some one treading upon it—my foes might be at hand.

"This was a thought that served to rouse up what little energy I had left.

"I must conceal myself. I could think of only one mode of doing this, namely, by climbing up into a tree.

"The one beneath which I had seated myself was large, and had many outspreading branches, among which I might certainly remain undetected.

"I had great difficulty, though, in climbing up, for I was very weak, and the trunk of the tree too large for me to grasp, but at length I got hold of a small branch, and drew myself up by its aid.

"After that, farther progress was easy.

"I now heard a footstep approaching distinctly enough, and, fearful of being heard, I resolved to stop where I then was, although I would fain have climbed higher into the tree, where I should have stood a better chance of remaining unseen.

"I paused, and lucky it was that I did so, for the rustling of the branches might have betrayed me.

"It was now gradually growing light, and my eyes were so accustomed to the darkness that I was able to see with tolerable ease into the obscurity around.

"Looking down, I saw a man emerge from a kind of thicket.

"He was all alone, and, as soon as I saw him, my apprehensions vanished.

"He was not one of my enemies. He was dressed as a simple citizen, but there was something so odd in all his motions that, though his presence did not concern me in the least degree, I could not help watching everything he did with the keenest interest and curiosity.

"He seemed to shrink every now and then close to the earth, as though he feared something, and tried to cower down and hide himself.

"With trembling, apprehensive steps he would advance a little way, then pause and listen.

"I was convinced by his manner that he would do me no harm, so I felt quite easy and content.

"Directly afterwards, I perceived that he carried under his coat some bulky and heavy object, which I fancied seemed to pull him down towards the earth.

"'I am all alone,' I heard him mutter to himself, as though the sound of his own voice in that dreary solitude would have a cheering effect and inspire him with courage—'yes, I am surely all alone! I have reached this spot unseen! No eye is upon me—no one will guess my secret!'

"He stopped, and I saw him wipe the perspiration from his face.

"'It is very heavy,' he added, 'and my strength is sorely tried with carrying it so far. Shall I go farther, or stay here? Would it be safe about this spot? Perhaps so—perhaps safer than in many other places. It's getting daylight, too, and I must be careful to depart unseen.'

"You may imagine that these words strongly roused my curiosity.

"What was he speaking about?—what did he intend to do?

"I felt quite excited and anxious, for I feared that he might take it into his head to go somewhere else in the wood, and then I should never know what the secret was.

"But, continuing to observe him, I saw that he was coming gradually to a determination.

"'Yes,' he said again, 'this spot will do well—none could be better. I shall know it again—I shall not confound it with any other place in the forest. That is a large and singular old tree. I could tell that tree from any other—I could not mistake it. Yes, that tree will answer my purpose admirably.'

"Hearing these words, I grew rather uneasy again, and the more so as I found that the tree to which he alluded was certainly the one in which I was concealed, for, with the same shrinking, trembling steps, he crept towards it.

"Was he going to ascend?—was he, for some purpose or other, about to climb into the tree as I had done?

"If so, he could not fail to discover me. Not that I cared particularly for the man himself, for I was more than a match for him, but he could have spread the alarm.

"It was, then, with something that deserves a stronger name than curiosity that I riveted my gaze upon him, and watched his actions, wondering what in the world it was he was about to do, and what effect it would have upon my fortunes.

CHAPTER DCLXXXVII.

CLAUDE DUVAL RELATES HOW HE MADE A MOST FORTUNATE DISCOVERY WHILE CONCEALED AMONG THE BRANCHES OF THE HUGE TREE.

"It kept getting lighter and lighter every moment, and as the faint grey daylight found its way down through the tree-tops on the ground, I was able to see the singular being with much greater distinctness.

"As he came closer, the conviction crept over me that I had seen him somewhere before—that his form was familiar to me.

"As yet, I had not been able to catch a glimpse of his face.

"When he reached the foot of the tree in which I was hidden, he placed the heavy object he was carrying in his arms upon the ground.

"Then again he glanced timidly and apprehensively around him and listened.

"As he did this, he happened to turn his countenance upwards. The view I obtained of it was transient and fleeting, yet nevertheless I started with astonishment, for I recognised him. He was my old friend, Mazzaroth, the astrologer.

"Two things puzzled me much—one was how he came to be there? and the other, how on earth it was I had not recognised him earlier?

"I was not so soon satisfied upon the former point, but, as to the latter, a little reflection soon served to set me right.

"The astrologer had evidently been to great pains to disguise himself, for he was dressed in a very different manner to what I had seen him before.

"Then his voice was rendered so tremulous and shrill by excitement and the dread of being seen by some one, that the tones bore no resemblance to those which he employed when I first entered his mystical apartment.

"Then he addressed himself to me in a heavy, monotonous, sepulchral voice which I knew full well could be easily assumed, and which I felt tolerably certain was not his genuine one.

"The start I gave on making this extraordinary discovery caused the branches of the tree to clash together, and the sound, trifling as it was, caught the attentive ears of Mazzaroth.

"He looked up scrutinizingly into the tree at once, and I began to fear I should be found.

"Luckily, the foliage was very dense, and concealed me completely.

"My good fortune favoured me so far that at this moment a rather large-sized bird flew with a screaming cry out of the tree, and alighted on another.

"'It was only a bird,' I heard the astrologer mutter to himself—'only a bird! And yet how it terrified me! I am getting foolish. Let me make haste with what I have to do.'

"While speaking, he took out of his pocket a clasp-knife with a huge blade.

"With this he carefully marked out and cut a piece of turf rather more than a foot square.

"He used the utmost caution in this operation, and in a minute or two raised up the turf whole and entire, so that when he replaced it no one could tell that the ground had been meddled with.

"He then began, by the aid of the knife and his hands, to make a deep hole.

"While he was thus engaged he kept continually muttering to himself, sometimes so indistinctly that I could not catch a syllable, and at other times loud enough for me to overhear him.

"I strained my eyes and moved about as much as I dared, in the hope of being able to catch sight of the object he carried.

"He had placed it on the ground in such a position that a thick branch of the tree intercepted my view of it.

"Had I changed my position ever so little I could have seen it; but this I was afraid to do, so I remained still.

"'Ten thousand curses!' I heard him say—'ten thousand curses on the meddlesome rascal who has driven me to adopt this course, and who, in all probability, has ruined my business in the future! Thank goodness, he is a prisoner, and if my utmost efforts will go for anything, he will only exchange his present cell for a place in the galleys!'

"I felt very much obliged to old Mazzaroth, of course, and waited, in the hope of hearing a little more of his delightful conversation.

"It was some time before I heard anything again, but at last he said:

"'Yes—yes, depend upon it, this is the wisest and best course I could pursue! Now, if any disturbance is made about me I shall be able to fly easily, for I shall have nothing to encumber myself with. Here, in this leather valise, I have stowed away the greater part of my property. No one will find it here, and when I am driven to it, what so easy as for me to come here and dig it up again?'

"He now rose up, having, as I supposed, made the hole deep enough to answer his purpose.

"He took hold of the object I was so anxious to behold, and then I saw that it was indeed a strong leather portmanteau, such as people frequently carry with them.

"The hole was just large enough, and so he dropped it in, pressing it down close to the bottom.

"Then he filled in the earth over it, taking care to flatten it down as tightly as he could with his hands.

"Then, finally, he replaced the turf he had so carefully cut, and with such skill did he perform this part of his task that it would indeed have required a keen eye to have detected any difference between that one spot and the rest of the grass surrounding it.

"When he had done this there still remained a quantity of earth upon the ground, in consequence of the valise having taken up the greater part of the cavity, and I watched to see how he would dispose of this.

"It seemed to be a point requiring deliberation, for he paused a moment, and then finally struck his breast, as though at last he had hit upon the very thing.

"He took up two handfuls and walked away to a little distance, then flung them in the air, scattering the particles as much as possible.

"In this way he proceeded until he had picked up every grain of earth.

"Then he rubbed his hands slowly one over the other with satisfaction, and no doubt he firmly believed that his treasure was quite safe, and there was not the slightest fear that anyone would discover it; and, probably, it would have been perfectly secure but for the singular accident which placed me in my present position.

"Little did the astrologer think that there was one keeping such a keen watch upon all his movements as I was, and certainly it did not speak well as a proof of his skill in reading the stars.

"Of that, what I had seen had been enough to convince me before that he was an arrant impostor and humbug.

"It was out of fear of being some day discovered in his mummeries that he had removed all his wealth and buried it in the earth.

"Although his task was over, he lingered for a long while around the spot, as though loath to depart.

"No doubt it would have been pleasant for him to have remained there on guard, but the increasing light that was shed around warned him that it was time to take his departure.

"'I must be careful,' he said, 'and speedy, or I shall be observed leaving the wood! One more glance around—one more glance to fix indelibly upon my mind the features of this place, and I will be gone!'

"For at least a moment he stood perfectly still, gazing attentively upon the tree, and noting every little peculiarity there was about it, so as to be able to identify it again.

"Then, with slow, shrinking steps, he took his departure.

"He soon disappeared from my view among the dense vegetation; but I heard him forcing his way through the shrubs for some time after he was lost to sight.

"I remained in the tree for a long time after this, so as to give Mazzaroth an ample opportunity of getting away before I showed myself.

"At length, believing I had waited long enough, I began slowly to descend.

"Just as I was about to drop to the ground, however, I heard again that crashing noise among the trees and underwood which betokened the approach of some one.

"It was marvellous to behold with what speed I drew myself up, and ensconced myself in my former situation.

"Then, to my surprise—I might say consternation—two soldiers made their appearance in the little space beneath.

"Here they stopped and glanced around them, holding their firelocks in such a way as to be able to discharge them in an instant if they saw anything.

"They spoke in French; but, as I was as familiar with that language as with English, I could easily tell every word they said.

"'I don't believe a word about this fellow having got into the wood. How could he do so when we were keeping such a watch all along the edge of the fosse?'

"'How indeed?' rejoined the other. 'But I have my own opinion on the subject, comrade.'

"'What is it?'

"'Why, he must have been drowned.'

"'I shouldn't wonder!'

"'You may depend that's it, comrade. He might manage to descend by the ivy into the water, and there he would be drowned.'

"'You are a clever fellow, Pierre. Have you mentioned that idea to our captain?'

"'I have; but he won't listen to it—he declares he must be in this wood.'

"'Well, we have tramped through a good lot of it, and we have seen nothing suspicious, have we?'

"'Nothing at all; and I don't believe any of our companions have, or we should have heard the signal.'

"'Of course we should, and——'

"'But hark!—what's that?'

"The clear musical notes of a bugle rose distinctly upon the morning air.

"'They have caught him—they have caught him! Ha! So you see you were wrong, Pierre, and the captain's right! He was in the wood, and they have caught him!'

"'So much the better, then!' cried the other. 'Forward, comrade! You know that when we heard the bugle sound we were to hasten towards the spot where it was blown!'

"'All right!—come on!'

"With these words, the two soldiers departed.

"I did not think of descending after that.

"'They have caught Mazzaroth!' I thought. 'They will quickly find out their mistake though, and renew their search.'

"It was well that I had the prudence to remain where I was, for, after this, several soldiers crossed the little open space hastily.

"They were evidently making full speed to the spot where the capture had taken place.

"After this a most remarkable silence ensued.

"I sat perfectly still, making myself as comfortable as I could.

"I was very weak and faint for want of food, for a long time had elapsed since I had partaken of any.

"It was no good thinking about it, however, for there was nothing to be had wherewith I could satisfy my hunger.

"Not long afterwards, however, I discovered that the tree which had found me such an excellent hiding-place was chesnut.

"I noticed it first by the peculiar shape of the leaves, then, afterwards, I saw several nuts hanging to the different boughs.

"I possessed myself of a great many, and ate them heartily.

"They were sweet and agreeable to taste, and although not a very nutritious meal, still it served to deaden the pangs of hunger, and infused fresh strength into my exhausted frame.

"And so the day passed on; but I met with no fresh interruption from the soldiers.

CHAPTER DCLXXXVIII.

CLAUDE DUVAL HITS UPON AN INGENIOUS PLAN FOR GETTING OUT OF FRANCE.

"I WAITED with great impatience and anxiety for night to come, and as soon as darkness began to spread itself over the earth I again commenced to descend from my place of refuge.

"I did so with tolerable confidence, for many hours had elapsed since I had seen anything of my foes.

"Whether they had made such an egregious mistake as to imagine Mazzaroth was the prisoner who had escaped I cannot tell; but from the long silence that had prevailed, I began to think that they must have marched him off to Paris.

"If so, then, I ought to have quitted the wood earlier.

"It was no good speculating upon anything of that kind, however; I believed I should be much safer, and that I stood a much better chance while under the cover of night.

"I dropped to the ground easily, and, with as much ease, fixed upon the exact spot where Mazzaroth had buried his treasure.

"I had no knife or instrument of that kind in my possession, for the officials of the prison had taken care to empty my pockets of every article they contained; but by the aid of my hands alone I managed to raise the turf and to remove the soil that was underneath it.

"Then I seized hold of the portmanteau by the handle and drew it up.

"It was small and very weighty, and this made me conclude that Mazzaroth must have exchanged the greater part of his wealth from bank-notes into gold, as the latter would be less likely to suffer injury by remaining in the ground.

"The valise was an ordinary-looking one, so that no suspicion would be raised in the breast of anyone who saw it, without, indeed, they observed its weight.

"Not without some trouble, I picked up a large number of stones and other objects, with which I filled up the space that had been occupied with the portmanteau.

"Then I covered the whole with the soil, patted it down, and finally placed on the square piece of turf.

"'There,' I said. 'And now, when Mazzaroth comes to find his gold, what a surprise will be in store for him. He may not believe in the transmutation of stones to gold

[THE ATTEMPTED MURDER.]

—but he will be forced to believe that his gold has changed into stones!'

"With this reflection, I carefully removed all the dirt from the outside of the portmanteau, and, taking it up by the handle, cautiously stepped forward.

"I was very much in doubt whether I should be able to emerge from the wood unseen.

"From what I had overheard the soldiers say, it was quite evident their leader suspected my presence somewhere in the vicinity, in which case he might have adopted the expedient of placing his men at short distances all round the borders.

"For greater safety's sake, I resolved to assume that such was the case—no harm could come of a little extra precaution, but most likely a great deal of good.

"At every few steps I stopped and listened; and although I did not on any occasion hear one alarming sound, I did not abate my caution.

"In a very little while I perceived the trees grow thinner and smaller, which told me that I was approaching the edge of the wood.

"Upon the events of the next few moments everything depended.

"I crept forward for some distance, and then halted underneath the shadow of a tree.

"From this point I took a good view all around me, as well as the darkness would permit.

"I saw nothing of my foes, however, nor did I hear a sound to indicate that they were keeping guard.

"I advanced to another tree and remained beneath that, and so on in succession, until the open country was gained.

"It seemed pretty clear that my fears were groundless.

"After going for some distance farther, and still in safety, I came to the high-road.

"I did not venture to travel along this, but followed its course, concealing myself as well as I could by the trees and fences.

"All that night I continued to walk.

"I had, as I imagined, many narrow escapes of detection—but I was lucky enough to avoid them all; and every mile I went increased my courage in a very great degree.

"One fixed purpose had settled itself in my mind—that was to get out of France as quickly as possible.

"How this was to be achieved I had really then no idea, but trusted to the current of events, hoping that in a while something would turn up to my advantage.

"I knew how rigidly all the regulations with respect to passports were enforced, and how difficult it was to pass from one place to another, or leave the country either by land or water without this necessary document, and where was I to obtain one?

"After a lengthened attempt to come to some conclusion upon this point, I was forced to give up the attempt in sheer despair.

"I came at length upon a small inn, or auberge, as they are called.

"'Surely,' thought I, 'after the lapse of such a little time the people in this out-of-the-way place cannot have heard anything about me, nor is there the least fear that I shall be recognised. At any rate, I'll run the risk.'

"I was moved to do this in consequence of my fatigue and exhaustion for want of proper food.

"In this place I could beyond a doubt procure both rest and refreshment.

"Whether I should be safe or not was another matter.

"I was surprised, upon a nearer approach, to see the inn open so early; but I walked boldly up to the front door, and entering, asked whether I could have a private room and a meal.

"I was answered in the affirmative; and not to dwell too much upon these details, I will merely tell you that my appearance excited no suspicion, but I ate heartily, and defrayed all expenses from the portmanteau.

"I paid so liberally that the landlord was obsequiousness itself.

"I told him I desired to rest, and was forthwith shown into a bed-room.

"Here I slept for several hours—in fact, until just about sunset.

"I was then awoke by hearing an unusual kind of commotion in front of the inn.

"Everything that occurred of this kind I considered important to myself, therefore I hastened to the window and peeped out, taking care to conceal myself as much as possible.

"I then saw that a very handsome travelling carriage had stopped in front of the inn.

"The inmates were treated in the most distinguished manner by the landlord, and ushered into the best room he had with a thousand bows and servile gesticulations.

"Looking farther, I perceived the cause of the stoppage.

"It was in order that the horses attached to the carriage might be changed.

"The travellers availed themselves of this opportunity to partake of some refreshment.

"While I was gazing upon this scene, and wondering how I could turn it to my advantage, I heard the clattering of a horse's hoofs upon the road.

"I watched to see who this new-comer could be, and presently saw a man—booted and spurred, and carrying a kind of large wallet by a belt strapped over his shoulder—come in sight.

"He stopped in front of the inn, and in a loud voice called for something to drink.

"He then took from the wallet I have mentioned a brush and some bills, which with great industry and expedition he proceeded to paste up about various parts of the premises where they would be most conspicuous.

"I watched every one of his movements with eager interest; and though I was too far off too make out a single letter, yet I felt certain that those bills referred to my escape.

"'I must make haste and get over to England,' I thought, 'or I shall be too late. What stratagem can I adopt, and how can it be done?'

"I was diverted from these questions by a reflection that crossed my mind.

"'How very odd!' I said, 'that Mazzaroth's prophecies should come so near the truth. Why, here am I, in possession of a large sum of money, as he said I should be; I have had a narrow enough escape of my life, goodness knows! I am now puzzling my brains and endeavouring to find a means by which I can reach England. I suppose when I get there, the only thing to remain to be accomplished will be my taking to the highway!'

"It was not wonderful that I should think of this, for I never forgot my uncle and namesake, and the many achievements I had heard related of him.

"At last, all in a moment, a lucky thought occurred to me.

"I believe that is how the best things are thought of—certainly it was so in my case.

"I brushed my clothes, and made myself look as decent as I could, then left my chamber and made my way to the front of the inn.

"I felt impelled by a resistless curiosity to read one of the bills. I felt I could not set about any plan until I had done so.

"There were several about, so it did not give me much trouble to select one.

"I walked to the entrance of the stables, on the gate-post of which one of the bills had been stuck.

"As I expected, it offered a reward of two thousand five hundred francs to anyone who would capture me and hand me over to the authorities.

"This was followed by a very good description of my personal appearance.

"At the foot, a further reward of one thousand francs was offered to anyone who would give such information to the officers of police as would lead to my apprehension.

"While I was engaged in reading this very interesting document, some one walked towards me.

"I turned my head to see who it was, and to my very great satisfaction perceived it was one of the servants attached to the carriage.

"He was the footman. He spoke to me in French.

"'Can you read that?' he asked.

"'I can,' was the reply.

"'Well, I wish I could,' he answered; 'but I never learned reading, more's the pity. That man told me it was something about a fellow that had escaped from prison.'

"'Yes,' I said, 'so it is, and the Government offers two thousand five hundred francs for his capture.'

"The footman drew a long breath.

"'What a heap of money!' he said.

"'Very true,' I answered; 'it would be worth having if it only had to be divided among two.'

"'What do you mean?'

"'Should you like to have half a share in it?'

"'Me?'

"'Yes, you.'

"'Half a share in two thousand five hundred francs?'

"'Exactly so.'

"'Don't ask me! The pity is it can't be done.'

"'But I believe it can,' I answered.

"'Do you?'

"'Yes; for, as I was coming along towards the inn, I saw a man whose appearance exactly corresponded with the description that is given here.'

"'Did you though?'

"'Yes I did, I can assure you. I thought he looked rather strange and frightened, and he seemed very anxious to get out of my way. I watched where he went to. He walked into that little wood yonder.'

"'Why didn't you follow him?'

"'I had no reason to do so then,' I replied; 'but as it is only a short time ago, no doubt he is there still. I should not like to grapple with him single-handed, for he seemed a powerful fellow; but if you like to assist, we will go into the wood together, make him prisoner, and share the reward between us.'

"'I have half a mind to try.'

"'Have a whole mind,' said I, 'for I am most anxious for your assistance, you look so strong and so well able to cope with him. How long is the carriage going to stay here?'

"'Probably an hour longer.

"'That will be plenty of time for us, then,' I said; we could tramp through every bit of that little coppice in the time, and if he is there we cannot fail to find him. Will you come?'

"'I will,' answered the footman; 'but I'll just speak to Jaques, the coachman, first.'

CHAPTER DCLXXXIX.

SOME CONSTERNATION IS EXCITED BY THE DISAPPEARANCE OF JOSEPH, THE DUC'S FOOTMAN.

"'Stop a moment,' said I. 'Don't you breathe a single word to him about the expedition we are going upon.'

"'Oh, trust me for that!' was the reply. 'I don't want to have the reward divided into three portions.'

"'Nor I either.'

"'I'll just tell him I shall be absent for a little while, and that I shall soon return.'

"'Oh, do that by all means.'

"The footman did so, and, very much to the surprise of the coachman, off we both started towards the wood.

"'What's that you're carrying in your hand?' said the footman, when we had gone a little way.

"'Only a travelling valise,' I answered.

"'Why didn't you leave it at the inn?'

"'Oh, I don't know. I am so much in the habit of carrying it about with me, that I did not give it a thought; it's not very heavy, for I'm not troubled with much wardrobe.'

"Shortly after this we entered the little wood.

"'Now,' said I, 'keep a sharp look-out on all sides, and I will do the same. The moment you catch sight of anything suspicious let me know. We must make a bold rush upon him, and overpower him at once; that will give us the best chance of effecting his capture.'

"'All right; you may depend upon me. I will back you up in everything; but half of two thousand five hundred francs is not to be earned every day.'

"To this I assented.

"I led the way right into the centre of the wood.

"No doubt you can guess what was my object in thus decoying the footman away.

"I was surprised that he should have fallen so easily into the trap, or have been such a numbskull to think that a couple of unarmed men like we were should be able to capture such a desperate character as I was represented to be.

"'I don't see anything of him,' he said, at length, in a somewhat disappointed tone.

"'Oh, don't despair yet,' I replied. 'I'll give you my word you shall see him before you leave the wood.'

"'How can you give me such an assurance as that?'

"'Easily enough, for I am Claude Duval myself, and I have brought you here into this wood in order to compel you to assist me to escape.'

"The look of blank astonishment and terror that came over the footman's countenance upon hearing this announcement was really quite a sight to see, and I was half inclined to laugh aloud, and I only restrained myself because I thought he might jump to the conclusion that I was only jesting.

"'Now,' I said, seizing him by the collar, 'I am a desperate man, and don't care a straw what I do in order to escape, so you had better not resist, but give in quietly. You can't help yourself.'

"'Spare my life!' he gasped out, at length—'spare my life, and do anything else with me that you like!'

"'I will spare your life,' I said, 'never fear for that; I am not the kind of man to murder anyone in cold blood. Just obey me, and you will find that you will come to little harm.'

"'What must I do?'

"'Strip off your clothes. Quick—every one of them—and give me your papers!'

"'Oh, mercy—mercy! What shall I do?'

"'Why, do as I tell you,' I responded, 'or it will be the worse for you!'

"The footman could not make out what my intentions were, but he stripped off his apparel, leaving everything in the pockets undisturbed.

"There,' I said, as I also stripped off my clothes, 'you can put those on if you like. I give you your choice.'

"'No, I would rather not,' he said; 'they will get me into trouble.'

"'Very likely,' I replied, as I hastily assumed his attire. 'And now I must make sure of your silence and non-interference.'

"With these words, I tore up my coat into two pieces, and bound his arms and legs with them.

"'Now,' I said, 'there you are, and you will come to no further harm through me. I am sorry to treat you so, but necessity drove me to it. You will lose a good place, I have no doubt; but, you see, I am not ungenerous, I will make you some return for it. You see that large stone, do you not.'

"He nodded.

"'Well, then, look here.'

"I opened my portmanteau, and, putting in my hand, drew out a great many gold pieces, which I placed upon the ground, and then rolled the stone over them.

"'There,' I said, 'that will be some recompense for the inconvenience you have suffered. It will be your own fault if you say a word about it when you are released from your present position. If you are released, you can take the first opportunity to roll the stone away and take the money. You are heartily welcome to it.'

"With these words, I strode away, leaving him to make the best he could of the adventure.

"I was now completely transformed, and I flattered myself that no one would recognise me.

"My disguise I considered, nevertheless, was not quite complete, and, as I had yet some time before me, I resolved to perfect it as much as possible.

"Presently I came to a little pool in the wood, which I had previously noticed.

"Its surface was as smooth as a sheet of glass, and possessed a great degree of reflecting power.

"Using this as a looking-glass, I proceeded to make still further changes in my dress, endeavouring to put on as every respect the appearance of the footman.

"It was lucky it was dark, for, on my return, the change might have been discovered.

"I walked to the inn when all my preparations were complete, and saw that I was only just in time.

"The people were wondering what had become of the footman. The travellers had taken their places in the carriage, the driver was seated on the box, and they were only waiting for me.

"I ran hastily forward, and with great agility sprang up on to the footboard.

"'You'll get into a row, Joseph,' said the coachman to me, as he whipped his horses and set the carriage in motion. 'The duc has been waiting quite five minutes.'

"'All right, Jaques,' I responded, imitating the voice of the real footman as well as I could—'all right.'

"He said no more, and I began to speculate as to the result of this adventure.

"I had now entered on quite a new line of life.

"I noticed that to the back of the carriage a quantity of luggage had been strapped, so, along with this I placed my portmanteau, imagining it would therefore escape notice.

"I wondered what duc it could be in the carriage, and regretted very much that I had left Joseph so precipitately as not to make such important inquiries of him.

"There was no help for this now, however, and I had nothing left to do but to make the best of my position, and rely on my wits.

"We continued to travel on at great speed during the remainder of the night.

"I felt in the various pockets, and in one of them found a folded paper.

"This I opened, and tried to read, but could not in consequence of the darkness.

"I imagined it was a passport.

"As soon as it was daylight I set myself to work upon this task, and found my conjectures verified.

"It was made out in the name of Joseph Lagardère, servant to the Duc de Ledrolles.

"This was important knowledge indeed.

"We stopped once or twice to change horses, but this was done with great rapidity, and the travellers did not alight.

"Early on the next day we reached Boulogne, from which port they intended to embark for England.

"It is wonderful how the nobility manage to have everything arranged for them, and so spare themselves trouble.

"Had they been less important individuals about to make the journey, there would have been no end of trouble with custom-house officials and the like; but the intelligence of their arrival reached there beforehand, and every pains had been taken to avoid delay.

"I wondered greatly at the rapid rate of speed that had been made use of, but soon discovered that they must have got behind time, for the vessel was waiting only to take them on board.

"A scene of indescribable confusion and bustle then ensued.

"I seized hold of my portmanteau and another huge box of luggage, and by merely shouting out the duc's name I was allowed to hasten on board.

"Great promptitude of action could now alone save me.

"The discovery of the change that had been effected would soon be made by the duc and duchess, or some of the servants, so that it was no longer possible for me to retain my disguise.

"I saw an opening in the deck of the ship, through which many people were hurrying, carrying various kinds of luggage, so I followed their example and descended a steep flight of steps.

"Not without a slight misgiving I placed my valise containing my fortune along with the luggage.

"I then crept to a dark part of the hold of the vessel and secreted myself.

"I was wondering in what way I could change my appearance.

"The livery I wore was a very plain one, and I thought by the exercise of a little ingenuity that I might be able to modify its appearance considerably.

"In one of the pockets I found a knife, and with this I cut off several ornaments from the livery, and also about four inches of the skirt of the coat.

"I then discovered that it looked quite another garment.

"The movement of the vessel now told me that she was fairly underweigh.

"I felt very uneasy, and not a little alarmed at my position. Very reasonably, I dreaded detection, but I experienced a feeling of great security, for I was on board an English ship.

"I walked up on the deck, and seated myself in an out-of-the-way corner.

"I found a great bustle going on, and was not long before I learned the cause of it.

"The greatest consternation was excited by the mysterious disappearance of Joseph, the footman, who was nowhere to be found.

"I saw the coachman surrounded by several others, declaring that he had seen Joseph come on board, and yet he could not be seen anywhere.

"'Rely upon it,' said several, 'he must by some chance or other have been left behind.'

"But the coachman persisted in his statement, and declared he could not have been mistaken.

"And now fortune favoured me in a most unexampled manner.

"It so happened that an Englishman was about to return to his native land by this vessel, and had actually booked and paid for his place. Something or other, however, had occurred to detain him, and he did not come on board; therefore, the steward found the number of passengers quite correct. Coming up to me, he said:

"'Mr. Brice, I presume?'

"'Yes,' I returned, boldly, speaking in English, 'that is my name.'

"'I thought so,' he said, with a bow and a smile, 'because you see your name happens to be the very last on my list. I have been round to all the other passengers, so it followed almost as a matter of course that your name must be Brice.'

"'Just so,' I answered, drawing a very long breath at the occurrence of this most providential accident. 'Take that,' I added, 'and get something to drink my health.'

CHAPTER DCXC.

CLAUDE DUVAL HAS SOME EXPERIENCE IN LONDON LIFE.

"I GAVE him some money as I spoke, and he left me.

"Not to linger over this part of my story, however, I will just say that by the exercise of a little address I managed to pass the inspection of the custom-house officials, and shortly afterwards found myself in London.

"I had heard a great deal of the English metropolis; and as I looked upon the astrologer's treasure as inexhaustible, I set to work to enjoy myself thoroughly.

"I took handsome furnished apartments in a fashionable quarter of the city, and engaged a valet to attend upon me.

"I then commenced to lead the life of a man of fashion, and repaired to the most frequented places, and as I seemed to possess unlimited supplies of money, I quickly found myself surrounded by a circle of butterfly friends.

"I was young, and excessively fond of all kinds of amusement.

"I plunged into every species of dissipation, and soon became quite a noted character about the West End.

"But my expenses were prodigious, and day by day my stock of money diminished, not slowly, but with alarming rapidity.

"The end of it must soon come I felt quite sure, and what to do when it was gone I really had no notion.

"Sometimes the prophecies that old Mazzaroth had made occurred to me.

"Was I really fated to follow in the steps of my uncle?

"There were many things more unlikely, and it seemed as though I should shortly have to make up my mind.

"It was not an unusual thing for young men like myself to replenish their purses in such a fashion.

"At many a convivial meeting I have heard even the sons of peers boasting of their successes on the highway.

"At times, however, we found ourselves at a loss for some new diversion—we seemed to exhaust every source of pleasure, and one who thought of anything fresh was looked upon as a benefactor.

"One night, as my stock of money was all but exhausted—when, indeed, another day's extravagance and riot would quite clear my purse—a party of about twenty of us were seated in a coffee-house that was our great resort.

"'Come!' said one, 'the night is only just beginning—what are we to do with ourselves? Who can devise a fresh pastime?'

"'I have a thought!' said one, somewhat hesitatingly.

"'Then speak out, my Lord Mouldon! It is wonderful for you to have an original idea—let us know what it is.'

"'Nothing very original,' lisped the young nobleman, 'but a very good notion nevertheless.'

"'Well, what is it?'

"'Of course you all recollect the Mohocks who played such pranks in Queen Anne's time, making the whole city ring with their exploits?'

"'Yes, yes—of course we know all about them! What capital fun they had with Dean Swift.'

"'Well, then,' said young Lord Mouldon, 'let us to-night turn Mohocks—let us scour the city round, and by to-morrow there will be such a commotion as was never known before.'

"This proposal was received with vociferous acclamation—it jumped entirely with their inclinations, and there was not one who did not feel anxious to emulate or even exceed the acts of daring and barbarity ascribed to that band of young bloods, who, in the preceding reign, made themselves the terror of all the inhabitants of the metropolis.

"'Come!' they cried—'one more glass of wine, and then we will begin our expedition!'

"I was willing enough to fall in with the scheme for a night's diversion. I was as careless and as reckless as the best of them, so, having drained our glasses, we placed our swords in readiness for immediate use, and, in a dense throng, sallied out into the silent streets.

"By common consent, Lord Mouldon was allowed to be the leader of the expedition, since he had been the first to suggest it.

"'Come on!' he said, waving his rapier in the air—'come on, Mohocks!—shout! Now then, all together!'

"We obeyed, and such a wild, discordant yell as came from our united lips had certainly never startled the streets of London since the time of the veritable Mohocks.

"'Come on!' shouted the leader—'come on. I see a man yonder—we'll begin our sport with him! Aha! we'll treat him in true Mohock fashion!'

"I should explain to you, my comrades," said Claude Duval, "that I had only heard of the Mohocks incidentally, and scarcely knew what deeds they performed. I imagined they were similar to those we had often played before—such as obliterating signboards, changing them, or taking them down and carrying them away to distant parts of the city.

"All these feats we had performed over and over again, and with great relish.

"I imagined though, that I was the only one that did not perfectly understand Lord Mouldon when he spoke about treating the stranger in Mohock fashion.

"With a wild whoop, they all rushed forward, and before the late-wayfarer could understand what was amiss, he found himself surrounded by a dense throng.

"I looked on with curiosity and interest, and, to some extent, imitated the actions of my companions.

"They drew their swords then with marvellous rapidity and stood round the man in a perfect circle, in such a way that the points of the rapiers formed a circle also, and that circle was only a trifle larger than the circumference of the man's body.

"'Now, then,' cried Lord Mouldon, with a boisterous laugh, 'whoever finds his back against the point of his rapier, prick it!'

"The points of some half-dozen rapiers instantly penetrated the man's back.

"With a yell of pain and rage, and by a natural impulse, he turned himself round to escape the points of the swords, but in doing this, he only exposed his back to others, who did not scruple to serve him in the same way.

"Bewildered and terrified, and endeavouring to protect his back from the numerous incisions that were made in it, the man spun round and round like a top, vainly entreating mercy and forbearance of his tormentors.

"It was capital fun, however, and they all enjoyed it mightily, nor did they cease until the man sank, giddy and fainting, upon the ground.

"But not content with what they had done, some called out:

"'Truss him—truss him! We can't leave him in the road like he is!'

"'Hurrah!' was the response, and then, with marvellous dexterity, the stranger's cloak was torn into long strips, with which he was bandaged in a very peculiar manner, or, I should say, trussed, for in a very singular way the steel scabbard of his sword was passed through his elbows and under one knee in such a manner that, while lying tied up in an inconceivably small space, he could be raised and carried by means of the scabbard, just as a fowl might be carried by a skewer passed through it when about to be put down to roast.

"'Now, then, where shall we put him?' asked several voices, and upon this a pause ensued, which was followed by a debate.

"I must confess I did not much relish this adventure, though I did not like to interfere. My dissent would have been nothing against their unanimity, and events would have proceeded just the same.

"I deeply commiserated the stranger, although I was powerless to assist him.

"'Let us hang him up where that signboard now swings,' was the proposal of some one.

"The words were followed by a scream of delight.

"Just opposite to where we stood was a public-house from which an arm of wood was extended in a horizontal position, and from this swung a ponderous sign.

"There was a little difficulty in reaching this object, but the most nimble of the party succeeded in doing so.

"He unhooked the signboard, and, in order not to make too much noise prematurely and so spoil the effect of their plan, it was lowered gently, and taken hold of by those who stood below.

"Then a piece of rope was produced. Where it came from I know not, but suddenly I saw one with it.

"This was passed through one of the staples in the bar of wood that supported the sign, and one end was then tied very securely round the scabbard of the sword.

"With a cry of delight, the young men drew the miserable wretch up until he could go no higher.

"Then the rope was secured, and there he hung, bawling and crying out for mercy and assistance.

"The Mohocks, as they styled themselves, responded to his supplications only by derisive cries, and, when they had amused themselves sufficiently with this, they turned off to seek some other diversion.

"At the corner of the next street, they came upon a watchman's box.

"'Coffin the Charley!' said one of them. 'Don't make a noise! I'll bet a hundred he's fast asleep inside!'

"By coffining a Charley, I found they meant rushing suddenly upon the watchman's box and overturning it, so that it should fall with violence on its face.

"They were usually heavy, cumbersome affairs, so that when the watchman was thus laid prostrate, he had very little chance of recovering himself again without assistance.

"About half a dozen dashed with full force against the back of the watchman's box, and down it went on its face with a terrific crash.

"A dismal, smothered yell came from within, and, as soon as they heard it, the Mohocks burst into a fit of loud laughter, which awakened many an echo in the deserted streets.

"'Now, then,' they cried, 'on again—on!'

"'Yes—yes!' said Lord Mouldon. 'Forward, Mohocks—forward! Yonder goes a girl. She is flying from us in alarm. Be speedy, and we shall overtake her; then we shall have rare fun indeed!'

"With another wild whoop, which was sufficient to strike terror into any breast, the Mohocks sped forward.

"I ran as eagerly and as swiftly as any of them—not that I was anxious to participate in this last exploit, but because I was resolved to prevent it.

"I was growing less and less pleased with their amusement, and, whatever might be the cost, I determined to interpose myself, and show my dislike for them.

"That they meditated some scoundrelly outrage upon the girl I could see flitting along in the darkness I made quite sure, but I resolved that, if I had stood by and seen a man ill-treated, I would not do so when a female was in the case, for I held it to be my duty to defend the fair sex.

"No one seemed to notice that I ran with such increased rapidity, and that I managed to keep on a level with Lord Moulton himself, who had hitherto led the throng, the others following a few paces in the rear.

"Screaming and shrieking for aid, the young girl flew with the speed of a fawn along the street, until suddenly, in her blind haste, her foot struck against some obstruction, and she fell heavily to the ground.

"Once—twice—thrice she essayed to rise, but each time she failed.

"After her last attempt, with a cry of despair, she sank quite down upon the ground, and at that very moment the troop of Mohocks reached her.

CHAPTER DCXCI.

CLAUDE DUVAL FINDS IT EXPEDIENT AND NECESSARY TO RUN THE RISK OF RETURNING TO FRANCE.

"Now was the time for me to interfere.

"I must either make a bold stand at once, or else allow that girl to be the victim of their barbarity.

"With a tremendous bound, I sprang forward, and alighted just in front of the girl, but with my face turned towards Lord Mouldon.

"I had my sword drawn, and held it before me in a threatening manner, in readiness either for attack or defence.

"The young nobleman looked upon my aggressive action with surprise, and so did the others.

"All stopped.

"'What's the meaning of this?' asked the leader of the Mohocks. 'Are you mad?'

"'No, my lord, I am not; and it would be more reasonable for me to ask you that question than for you to do so.'

"'Insolent dog!'

"'Mind what you say, my lord!' I cried, angrily. 'I am no respecter of persons! You have feasted at my table many a time, and I have shaken hands with you in token of friendship, but now I place myself in opposition to you.'

"'But why—for what?'

"'That is the cause,' I answered, pointing to the girl, who was summoning up courage to rise. 'I have witnessed what you have done to-night in imitation of the Mohocks with the greatest disapprobation. Hitherto I have shrunk from interfering; now, however, as you intend to ill-use this girl, I place myself before her to protect her, and those who stand behind who have any spark of manly feeling yet remaining in their breasts, will at once place themselves on my side and defend the right.'

"They listened to my speech so far in silence.

"The fact was, they were astounded at hearing me give utterance to such sentiments.

"But, with a cry of rage, they rushed forward, saying:

"'Down with him—down with him! He is a traitor and a coward!'

"'Hold!' said Lord Mouldon, raising his hand. 'I am your leader by general consent, and you must obey me. Be still!'

"They paused irresolutely.

"'I alone will finish this matter,' he said. 'It concerns me, and me alone. I will teach you how to behave should you ever find yourselves in my position.'

"Then, turning to me, the leader of the Mohocks said:

"'You are a cowardly traitor—a fool—a dog, and not fit to be the associate of gentlemen!'

"'You shall either retract those words,' I answered, 'or pay for them with your life's blood!'

"He laughed.

"'Come on,' he said—'come on! I will soon dispose of you! Form a ring round us, my companions, and watch the fight! We will soon decide this matter!'

"Anything in the shape of a duel or personal conflict of any kind was very grateful and acceptable to the feelings of the band of dissolute young men.

"They were also pleased with any exhibition of bravery, and they considered that Lord Mouldon displaye uncommon courage.

"For my own part, I confess, I stood upon my guard, but not without serious misgiving.

"I was comparatively unused to the sword, having only recently taken lessons from a fencing-master; but I practised assiduously.

"Lord Mouldon had the reputation of being an accomplished swordsman. With him, perhaps, I should stand but a poor chance; nevertheless, I felt bold and confident, for I knew that I was on the side of right.

"The next moment our swords crossed and rang together with a clashing sound.

"Then a furious combat commenced between us.

"I will do Lord Mouldon the justice to say that he conducted the fight in a fair and honourable manner.

"It was pretty evident that we were tolerably well matched as regarded our skill in the use of our weapons, and therefore, with eager and breathless interest, the Mohocks standing round watched the progress of the conflict, and wondered who would be the victor.

"Sometimes I was forced to give ground a little, and then, when they saw their leader obtain this temporary advantage, they would clap their hands and shout in delight.

"Then I would make a stand, and also force him to retreat.

"A dead silence would then ensue, which was only broken by our hard breathing, the clashing of our swords, and the trampling of our footsteps.

"At length, when my arm was perfectly weary, I saw an opportunity for giving a thrust.

"For a brief space of time, Lord Mouldon left his breast unguarded.

"I lunged at it instantly, and with great force.

"I did not pause to reflect, I only thought that I was putting an end to the contest, and so I was, though I did not anticipate that its result would be so fatal.

"Such was the violence of my thrust that the sword passed completely through his body, and the hilt struck with a dull thud against his chest.

"I drew back my sword, and then, after swaying to and fro upon his feet, Lord Mouldon fell down in a huddled up mass upon the roadway.

"He was dead. The sword had passed completely through his heart, so that death must have been instantaneous.

"This event sobered the roysterers not a little.

"Their demeanour changed at once, and several sprang forward with anxious countenances to the assistance of his lordship.

"When they raised him, however, one glance into his countenance was sufficient to show that he was quite dead.

"Bewildered by the suddenness and strangeness of these events, I looked on like one stupified.

"Then, as in a struggle, there will always be two opposing parties. I now found that I had some who were friendly to me, or, at any rate, professed to have an interest in my welfare—perhaps it was because of the manner in which I had behaved myself during the fight.

"'There will be a desperate row about this,' said one. 'It is a most unfortunate affair indeed!'

"'I am sorry for it,' I answered.

"'No doubt you are, but the mischief is done now, and sorrow will not undo it.'

"'That is true.'

"'Take my advice,' said another. 'Sheath your sword and fly—hasten away—if possible get out of England. I give you friendly and good advice. This young nobleman is thought much of. He is an only son of aged parents, and now that he is dead the family becomes extinct. It is a most powerful one, and can accomplish much.'

"'Yes,' chimed in another, 'and depend upon it, if you are in London you will be arrested, and condemned for his murder.'

"'Gentlemen,' I said, 'you are all witnesses that he fell in a fair and honourable fight?'

"'We are—we are, but that fact you will find will go for very little. Fly—depart at once: if you linger you will lose the opportunity. Those who are now so officiously bending over his lordship are his bosom friends, and they may perhaps make an effort to detain you.'

"I shook my sword significantly, for, contrary to their advice, I had not sheathed it.

"'Brave as you are,' said the first speaker, 'what could you do against a large number? you would be overpowered, and then you might choose between being captured or slain.'

"I began to see that I had got myself into a fix, and that the sooner I got out of London and England too, the better it would be for my safety.

"'Many thanks to you, gentlemen all,' I said. 'I will bid you all farewell. I had hoped that we should pass many another jovial night together, and doubtless we should have done but for this unfortunate occurrence; believe me, no one regrets it so much as I do; but I stood here upon the side of right.'

"With these words, I turned round and hastily departed, but not a moment too soon.

"The friends of Lord Mouldon, perceiving my departure, set up a cry of rage, and commenced a pursuit after me.

"But I ran along swiftly, taking every turning I came to.

"Where I was going to, I was not familiar enough with the city to know, but I was satisfied when, after a time, I found that I had outdistanced all my pursuers.

"I paused then for breath, for I was quite exhausted.

"I wondered what had become of the girl who had caused this rupture. I left her still lying upon the stones, and from that day to this I have never seen or heard anything of her, so that I can't even guess what was her ultimate fate.

"I was just about to set forward on my wild flight, when I heard the rumbling of wheels.

"Some ponderous vehicle was approaching, and I drew aside to observe what it was.

"Soon afterwards I perceived it was a stage-coach.

"I called aloud to the coachman to stop, and he drew up with a dash, for there was one place left vacant for a traveller outside.

"'Where are you going to?' I asked of the guard.

"He stared at me in astonishment for a moment, and then replied:

"'Why, to Dover, of course.'

"'All right, then,' I said; 'I was not quite sure I want to go to Dover. Here, take my fare in advance.'

"I pressed some money into his hand, mounted on the top of the vehicle, which was directly afterwards put in motion again, and away we rolled at as rapid a rate as four capital horses could draw us.

"Somehow or other, I felt glad enough to leave London behind, for I could not see how I was to maintain the character I had hitherto borne, but I was so carried away by the tide of events as to have but little time for reflection.

"On reaching Dover I found there was a vessel waiting at the pier to take passengers over to France.

"I found it was the only chance I had of quitting English shores speedily, and so I went on board.

"Then, and not till then, did I recollect the circumstances under which I had quitted Paris.

"In my life of wild excitement and dissipation, it is no wonder that I should have forgotten my escape from the prison.

"The officials at the police office would not, however, be likely to be so forgetful.

"When I landed, I might be at once carried off to prison once more, effectual means taken to prevent my escape, and then, what I dreaded most of all, sent off to the galleys.

"My agitation increased as the vessel reached the shores of France.

"There was no means of retreating from my position. I was obliged to look danger in the face, and abide by the current of events.

"It was no longer in my power to control or direct them in any degree.

"At length I landed.

"Then I found my terrors groundless. I was not recognised by the authorities, and was allowed to go, like the other passengers, unmolested.

"Some kind of fascination drew me to Paris. I could not resist the desire to go there.

"A considerable time had elapsed since I left it, and I began to think that I had changed so much in appearance, and I had been in the custody of the police for so short a time, that I should escape detection.

"What little stock of money I had was, however, very soon expended, and when I parted with the last coin I asked myself seriously, 'What am I to do?'

"It was a question to which I could frame no suitable reply, and so, in rather a melancholy manner, I sat one afternoon in a cabaret.

"Suddenly I was surprised by hearing a voice say:

"'Why, Claude, is that you? How you have altered, to be sure! Diable! why do you look so melancholy?'

"Hearing these words, I glanced up, and saw, seated on the opposite side of the table, a tall, well-built young man, attired in the uniform of a cuirassier.

"I looked scrutinisingly into his countenance, but failed to recognise him.

CHAPTER DCXCII.

CLAUDE DUVAL CONTINUES THE STORY OF HIS LIFE, AND RELATES HOW HE JOINED THE FRENCH ARMY, AND HOW HE WAS LEFT WOUNDED ON THE FIELD OF BATTLE.

"'I CAN see you do not remember me, Claude," said the soldier. 'Well, I don't wonder at it, it's a long time since we saw each other, and this dress alters me greatly, no doubt. But do you remember Herault?'

"I started, for this was the name of the little village where my father had died.

"'I see you remember that,' added the stranger; 'and now, if I mention my own name, perhaps you will remember that also.'

"'What is it?'

"'Leon Malines.'

"'What!' I exclaimed—'is it possible? I remember you now, though I could not call your features to mind at first.'

"I shook hands with him warmly, for Leon was my boyhood's companion and friend. We were always together, and much attached to each other.

"'Now, Claude,' he exclaimed, after our greetings were over, 'tell me what it is that makes you look so confoundedly dull?'

"'I am out of luck,' I answered. 'I have reached the end of my purse, and don't know how to fill it.'

"'Well, then,' said Leon, 'I will act the part of a true friend, for I will tell you.'

"'Indeed!' I exclaimed. 'How?'

"'Why, enter the army, become a cuirassier, like myself. Men of your build are much wanted. You will receive a round sum for bounty, and a splendid uniform will be found you. In times of peace you lead the life of a gentleman, and in war you have the opportunity of fighting for the glory of la belle France and of obtaining the rank of a general.'

"The idea of entering the army had never before occurred to me, but now that it was proposed by my friend Leon I grasped at it eagerly.

"'I have half a mind to say yes to your proposal at once,' I answered; 'but give me a little time. I will reflect.

"'All right.'

"The result of my reflection was that on the following day I joined the regiment to which my friend belonged.

While attired as a soldier, I had little fear of being discovered by the police authorities.

"I found the life was one that suited me very well. I bent all my energies to accomplish my duties, and succeeded in winning the admiration of the commanding officers, and the respect of them.

"This was a feeling, however, that wore off by degrees. I found that there were many unpleasant things connected with the life of a private soldier; but the deed was done, there was no drawing back, so I made the best I could of my situation.

"I led a jolly enough life in Paris for some months, and then, as France was at that time engaged in a war with Spain, my regiment was ordered to the scene of battle.

"I was glad enough to find that we were at last going into action. I resolved to signalise myself by some daring deed, and so obtain promotion.

"Once an officer, I should be content, and the disagreeables connected with my position removed.

"In due time the seat of war was reached.

"A strongly-fortified town had resisted every effort that had been made to capture it.

"The siege had been long and tedious, and every now and then the besiegers were harassed by the besieged making sudden and unexpected sorties.

"This was the state of affairs when I arrived.

"On the next day the signal for an attack was given, for the officer in command was anxious to bring his reinforcements into speedy use.

"I formed one in an advance storming party.

"As we advanced we were attacked by the enemy, who had taken to the field, but had gradually retreated before us until they reached the walls of their town; then, passing through them, the gates were closed, and they were in safety.

"Quite heedless of the many death-dealing missiles that were flying through the air in every direction, I pressed onwards.

"I was the first to scale the walls. I was repulsed, but again and again I renewed the attack, and at last planted my foot on one of the bastions.

"I stood there for a moment, with my sword drawn in my hand, waving it about me.

"I was confronted by many Spaniards, and then suddenly I became unconscious of everything.

"I found out afterwards that a ball had struck me in the chest, inflicting an almost fatal wound.

"I fell backwards off the wall of the bastion to the ground beneath, and there lay like one dead.

"The battle continued to rage until dark without either side gaining the advantage.

"With common consent, hostilities were suspended, and then each army was occupied in picking up the bodies of the wounded from the field of battle.

"At length I recovered my consciousness, and the first thing of which I was sensible was that I was cold—icy cold; and for a long time I lay wondering why this should be the case.

"Then my ears were assailed by surely the most dismal sound that ever yet was heard.

"It was the groaning of thousands of wounded men.

"I found I could not rise, but I was able to move my head from one side to the other.

"Then, all over the extensive plain, I perceived nothing but bodies lying in every conceivable position.

"Most were dead, but many, like myself, were only wounded.

"I was not sensible of any particular pain, nor did I know how I had been wounded, but I was so icy cold that my heart scarcely beat, and in a faint voice I cried for help, but no help came.

"There were many who had stronger lungs than myself, and whose voices quite drowned mine, so that there was little chance that I should be heard.

"If I could only have warmed myself a little I should not have cared so much; but, as it was, the numbness seized upon me to such a degree that I feared I should die.

"After awhile, however, this dread wore off, and I came to the conclusion that my wound was not so serious as I imagined.

"This conviction growing every moment stronger and stronger, warmed the blood in my veins, and in a short time I felt wonderfully better—so much so, that I was able to raise myself on one arm and look about me.

"But I saw nothing whatever to raise any hopes in my breast.

"In the distance I could see several people flitting about the field of battle—some solitary, some in pairs, and sometimes three together.

"In a dreamy kind of way, I wondered who they were, and in what they were engaged.

"I came to a conclusion that was in part correct, but not wholly, as I found afterwards.

"'They are people searching for friends and relatives among the slain and wounded,' I thought, and this conjecture was verified when I saw sometimes a wounded man lifted up and carried away.

"But the horrors of the battle-field, terrible as they were, had not yet reached their climax.

"Suddenly there arose a wild, awful, unearthly cry, such a one as I had never heard before—such a one as I trust I may never hear again.

"Were I to try for a month, I could not by words convey to you any idea of what that sound was like.

"It certainly came from no human throat.

"I started up to a half-sitting posture, and a cold perspiration broke out upon my face.

"Then the sound came again—evidently it was nearer than before.

"One character in the cry could not be mistaken.

"Pain—or, rather, intense agony—must have produced it.

"'What's that?' I asked, little dreaming that I should receive any reply to my question, and, indeed, being unconscious that I had spoken aloud.

"'Don't you know what that is?' growled a voice.

"I turned round suddenly, and saw that I had been addressed by one of the men of my own regiment, who was lying, fearfully wounded, close to me.

"'No,' I said, 'I don't know. What is it? But it fills me with fear.'

"'And well it might—well it might! Say your prayers now—that is, if you know any—and make your peace with the world!'

"'What do you mean?' I asked, and as the question issued from my lips the terrible sound came again.

"'I thought you would have guessed what the sound was.'

"'I cannot; nor do I understand the meaning of what you say.

"'Well, then, that cry comes from a horse!'

"'A horse?' I repeated, incredulously.

"'Yes, one that has been wounded in some sensitive part, the pain of which has driven the creature into a state of raging madness—I tell you it is a mad horse!'

"'A mad horse?' I repeated after him. 'Who ever heard of such a thing?—a mad horse!'

"'You will find it is true, comrade, and it will be all the worse for you too!'

"'How so?'

"'Until that creature is either shot or falls down exhausted, it will continue to gallop wildly and furiously over the battle-field, trampling the dead and the dying alike beneath its hoofs, and caring for neither.'

"'Have you ever known this before?' I asked.

"'Oh yes; I have been a soldier many years, and have seen much service. The first time, when I lay helpless on the ground, I was as much alarmed by the cry as you are—perhaps more so. Like you, I was told of the cause, and could scarce believe it; then, suddenly, there came in sight a huge black horse—I saw it, although the darkness was intense. Its eyes were gleaming like balls of fire, its mane stood erect, and its sides were flecked with foam. On it came with frenzied bounds, every now and then uttering that snorting cry. Hark!—do you hear it?'

"Again the dreadful sound echoed far and wide over the battle-field.

"Chilled with horror at the words the dying soldier had spoken, I turned my eyes, and then beheld the same object that he had seen.

"It presented just the appearance he had described, and had I been superstitious, I might have fancied it was some demon who in this guise tore wildly over the battle-field, and trampled the life out of those who yet existed.

"But it was a horse, and nothing more—a splendid war charger, probably belonging to one of the officers.

"I saw the glaring eyes, the erected mane, and the foam-covered flanks.

"On it came, making towards the spot where I lay in a perfectly straight line.

"To be beaten to death beneath the iron-bound hoofs of this creature was certainly a fate I had never anticipated.

"Now that it stared me in the face, I was paralysed with alarm.

"Any death would be preferable to such a one.

What was I to do? In what manner could I act so as to avert the frightful destiny that was impending over me?

"I knew not, for my wound was too painful to allow me to move much.

"As a last hope, I addressed myself to the soldier who had spoken.

"'Comrade,' I said—'comrade.'

"All was still.

"'He is dead,' I thought, but, urged to desperation, I cried in a louder voice:

"'Comrade, tell me—tell me, what was it you did when that mad horse came galloping to you?'

"There was a gurgling noise, for the dying man was endeavouring to speak.

"'Quick—quick,' I said, 'or it will be too late.'

"'Shot him,' he gasped—'shot him—my hand grasped a pistol, and I shot him!'

"That was all, the voice ceased, but the advice came too late.

"I sank down.

"With a rush like that of some whirlwind, the horse came tearing on.

"I closed my eyes and held my breath, and gave myself up to the fate which I saw was inevitable.

CHAPTER DCXCIII.

CLAUDE DUVAL CONTINUES TO RELATE HIS EXPERIENCE OF THE HORRORS OF A NIGHT ON THE FIELD OF BATTLE.

"My ears were filled with that dreadful cry once more.

"Apparently it was ten times louder than it had been.

"Then I was conscious that something passed over me, and immediately I opened my eyes.

"I was saved. The horse had proceeded by a series of tremendous bounds, and luckily I happened to be lying so as to come between them.

"His feet struck the ground a few paces on my left hand, and again on my right.

"Then I heard a crashing sound.

"The frantic creature, paying no heed to the obstacles in its course, had reached the edge of the dry moat or ditch that surrounded the fortress, and, missing its footing, had rolled headlong to the bottom.

"But this dry ditch was literally choked with the dead and dying belonging to both armies, and therefore great was the havoc wrought by the mad horse.

"I have said that I was lying on the very edge of this

[SIXTEEN-STRING JACK TAKES A LEAP TO AVOID HIS PURSUERS.]

moat, and turning over on one side, I looked down, but, after one glance, was glad enough to turn my eyes away.

"Wild screams and cries for help reached my ears—cries that maddened me, for I could afford no assistance.

"The horse was not killed, but only injured by the fall; the additional pain he thus suffered increased, and he made perpetual but ineffectual efforts to gain his feet, and once more start off upon his headlong course.

"Each time, however, when by dint of hard struggling, he had partly raised himself, his legs would give way, and down he would fall with a crash, upon the bodies of those unfortunate wretches who happened to lie around. A spectacle so terrible as this was one that no one could remain a mute spectator of, and therefore it was with a sense of relief that I turned my eyes away and looked across the plain in another direction, indulging in the vain hope that I might perchance see some one coming to my assistance.

"In this, however, I was disappointed, but soon afterwards I saw at no great distance one of those small parties I have already mentioned.

"It consisted of three persons, two men and one woman.

"They were approaching; I could perceive their motions easily, for they carried a lantern.

"Suddenly they paused, and while the woman held the light, I saw the two men stoop down for a moment.

"I was in doubt as to their purpose, but soon guessed it; they were robbing the slain.

"I had often heard that miscreants, such as I then beheld, prowled over the battle-field, depriving the dead of whatever articles of value they might have about them. Presently afterwards they moved still nearer to me, and again the plundering process was commenced. The man they attacked, however, was not quite dead, and, rising up, he called for help, and seized upon one of the robbers.

"'Settle him!' I heard a voice say—'down with him!'

No. 149 will be Published next Monday.

"A heavy blow followed, and the soldier who had escaped death at the hands of his foes was stricken down by these miscreants in human shape.

"'He ought to know better than interfere!' said the woman, in a croaking voice, and accompanying her words with a horrible laugh.

"I now began to grow seriously uneasy.

"The three wretches were close to me, and I had several articles of value in my pocket with which I would not willingly have parted.

"It was not in my nature to lie tamely down and suffer myself to be robbed without resistance; yet, if I struggled, the consequences would be the same as I had just witnessed.

"My hand began to wander about in search of some weapon with which I could protect myself, and finally I was successful in drawing a brace of pistols from my belt, though whether they were loaded or whether the primings were in proper order was more than I could tell.

"By the time I had done this, the robbers of the slain were close to me.

"'Here,' said one—'here's a prize, I'll warrant!'

"'Yes,' said the old woman, as she flashed the light of the lantern around, 'he looks a strong one, and I don't think he's quite dead. Mind you're ready with the iron bar!'

"'All right,' responded one of the men, and as he spoke he raised his arm.

"I saw then that he carried a kind of crowbar; this was the weapon with which the wounded soldier had been despatched.

"They advanced.

"'Villains!' I cried, as they stooped over me, 'begone, and leave me in peace! Touch me at your peril!'

"The old woman laughed.

"'Down with him!' she cried—'down with him!'

"The man with the iron bar scarcely needed telling.

"I had my eyes fixed upon him, and saw he was about to strike.

"Raising my arm with great suddenness, I took aim as well as I could, and pulled the trigger.

"A loud report followed, and when the smoke had cleared away I saw that only two of my assailants were left standing.

"They seemed half inclined to fly.

"'Begone!' I cried, 'or you shall share the fate of your rascally companion! Begone, I say!'

"I raised my other pistol and pulled the trigger.

"But the lock only snapped—the weapon was useless.

"With an angry cry I hurled it with full force at the old woman.

"What followed I scarcely know

"I have an idea that the one man left rushed upon me, and trampled me violently to the earth with his heavy boots.

"About this I cannot speak with certainty, but these scars on my face seem as though produced by some such means."

Claude pointed to some ugly scars as he spoke.

"After this, I should tell you that a complete blank followed.

"What happened, or what went on I have not the least idea, until, suddenly returning to consciousness, I found myself the inmate of a dark and noisome cell.

"It was a long while before I could recover my scattered thoughts.

"My first impression was that all recent events had been no more than a dream, and that I was still lying a prisoner in my dungeon waiting to be brought up for trial on the charge of robbing Mazzaroth.

"It must have been early morning when I awoke, for by degrees I found the light increasing, until at length I was able to see tolerably well about me.

"Then I discovered that the dungeon I was in by no means resembled that which I had previously occupied.

"That, as I have told you, was at a considerable altitude; this was evidently deep in the earth, and judging by the thickness of the pillars that supported the roof at the foundation of some huge building.

"Not to keep you in uncertainty and suspense, I may as well tell you in this place what happened to me while I was unconscious. I did not know it then, but the facts afterwards came to my knowledge.

"I had been picked up while in an insensible state by some of the troops defending the town. In common with many others, I had been made prisoner for a particular purpose they had in view.

"When I regained possession of my faculties, I was in a very bad way indeed.

"My wound had not been dressed, and my body was in a terribly bruised and injured state.

"Some time afterwards a little wicket in the dungeon door was opened and some food thrust in.

"I appealed for help, and asked them whether they intended to leave me to die from the effects of my wounds.

"To this no response was given, and for a long time I was left in solitude.

"The surgeon and his assistant entered and carefully bound up my wound, and attended to my other hurts.

"In this manner a long and weary time passed—how long, I can scarcely tell you, but I know it must have been for a considerable period, for I quite recovered from all my hurts.

"At length, one night, I was startled by a very singular event.

"I was lying sleeping the sleep of exhaustion upon a miserable stone bench in my cell which did duty for a bed; something, I know not what, aroused me, and I opened my eyes.

"What I then beheld was so strange that I could scarcely believe it was not a vision; therefore I closed my eyes again and opened them quickly.

"This convinced me that it was reality and not a dream.

"Standing close to the bench was the surly jailer who guarded my cell.

"In his hand he held a lantern in such a position that the principal rays fell upon and illuminated my person.

"Standing beside him was a young and beautiful girl.

"When I opened my eyes the first time, I caught a glimpse of her countenance, and this more than anything else made me fancy I was dreaming, for it was one of those sweet countenances that we rarely see except in our dreams; but the second time when I looked she had drawn her veil closely over her features, and I could only distinguish two black eyes sparkling through the gauze covering.

"'Quick!' she said, addressing the jailer, 'he awakes—quick—away!'

"She spoke in Spanish, and this, together with her excitement, told me that she was a Spaniard.

"With this language I was only imperfectly acquainted, yet I could understand quite well any simple sentence such as she had just uttered.

"Then, before I could recover from my astonishment sufficiently to do anything to prevent their departure, the strange pair left the cell, closing and securing the door.

CHAPTER DCXCIV.

CLAUDE DUVAL RELATES THE STRANGE MEANS BY WHICH HE MANAGED TO RECOVER HIS FREEDOM.

"You may easily imagine that such a circumstance as this breaking in upon the monotony of life in a dungeon was well calculated to make a most profound impression on my mind.

"My rest was effectually disturbed, and during the remainder of that night I strove in vain to sleep; I lay torturing and perplexing my brain in a vain attempt to account for so singular an occurrence.

"I waited with extreme impatience for morning to come, when, as I knew full well, the jailer would, in accordance with his usual custom, make his appearance.

"At length he came, but I derived no satisfaction from his visit.

"Mustering up what little Spanish I could recollect, I addressed him in that language, and besought him to give me some explanation of what had occurred, but he only shook his head, as I fancied, in a mysterious way, and resolutely refused to answer one word.

"At length night came again, and I felt feverish and excited.

"As on the occasion of his last visit, I again made application to my jailer.

"As before, he refused to answer, but he asked me a question instead. It was a startling one.

"'Do you want to escape?'

"I glared at him in astonishment.

"'Of course I do!' I said. 'Did you ever know a prisoner who preferred his dungeon to liberty?'

"'I have known some prefer to remain,' said the jailer, 'but that's all,' and, uttering these last words, he backed hastily out of the cell, and closed the door.

"Here was fresh food for reflection. You must not think, however, that the idea of making my escape had not occurred to me—it had done so very many times indeed; but I was so weak and exhausted in consequence of my wound, that I knew it was nothing short of madness to make the attempt.

"What on earth could the jailer mean, however, by asking such a question?

"Fatigued as I was, I resolved to keep awake during the whole of that night, so as to be aware at the earliest moment of the visit of the young and beautiful girl.

"I remained for a long time watching; but at length, completely exhausted, sank off into a slumber, nor did I awake until my jailer paid his accustomed visit in the morning.

"Whether I had had any visitation I could not tell.

"I inquired, but only received a shake of the head for a reply, and so, tormented by a thousand wild and vague surmises, the day passed by.

"About midnight, however, as nearly as I could calculate, I heard a slight noise outside the door of my dungeon. Then the fastenings were cautiously removed, evidently in such a manner as to avoid making any unnecessary noise.

"Then the door was flung open, and the same young girl entered.

"She approached me with a strange air of diffidence and timidity.

"'Stranger,' she said, in low, sweet, gentle tones, 'I have come to ask you whether you will escape?'

"'Escape?' I ejaculated.

"'Yes,' she continued; 'if you wish to do so, the way lies open before you; but you must take me along with you.'

"I stared in great surprise and astonishment.

"She was quite young, and in years a mere child, though in person she seemed a woman.

"'I wish to fly!' she said, observing my look of amazement. 'It is necessary that I should quit this gloomy place at once—it is hateful to me! Will you take me with you?'

"It was not likely that I could refuse, and yet it seemed strange to give my consent.

"You are surprised,' she added, 'no doubt, and at a loss to know why I am anxious that you should escape as well as myself. This, then, is the reason: My father is the governor of this prison, and, in spite of all my tears and entreaties, has insisted that I should become the bride of a hateful old man—one indeed, older than himself, while I am but just fourteen!'

"'And you wish to avoid such a fate?' I said.

"'I do. It is worse than death, and anything would be preferable to it! I cannot go alone—there is no one in the prison who will accompany me! That jailer is my friend, and I owe him much, but yet he cannot make up his mind to accompany me in my flight!'

"'Believe me,' I said, 'I am now and ever at your service, fair lady, and whatever you ask of me I will perform. You cannot demand too much, for what could repay such an obligation as I shall be under to you—namely, my restoration to liberty?'

"'I want a stout defender,' she said, 'for there may be many difficulties to overcome. We must fly, and to-night!'

"'To-night?' I ejaculated.

"'Yes, or it will be too late! I have waited until the last moment, hoping that my parents would relent; but to-morrow is the day fixed for the marriage ceremony, and if I am here, so surely as the sun will rise, I shall be forced into this horrible alliance!'

"'You shall not be if I can save you,' was my answer. 'You need not occupy precious time by giving me any further explanations; only say by what means you hope to effect your escape?'

"'He can tell you more than I can,' she answered, pointing to the jailer.

"'Follow me,' said that individual, 'and I will show you! Be firm, bold, and resolute, and you will be free!'

"'Do not have any fears on that account—I will be bold and brave. But you must furnish me with weapons.'

"'I will see to that,' said the young girl. 'You will have an opportunity of arming yourself before you quit the prison!'

"'Then,' said I, 'fair lady, take my hand. From this moment you are under my protection, and no harm shall come to you except over my dead body.'

"She pressed my hand tightly within her own, and, looking down into her countenance, I saw, by the light of the lantern, that her bosom rose and fell tumultuously, and that her eyes were filled with tears.

"It was hard and painful no doubt to be thus compelled to fly from those who ought to cherish and defend her, and be constrained to rely upon the kindness of a stranger.

"But there was something in her trusting confidence that would be sufficient to disarm treachery, and, so far as I was concerned, I determined that I would take no advantage of her forlorn and unprotected situation.

"'Lead on,' I said, addressing the jailer, 'I will follow!'

"'This way, then, senor,' he said—'this way!'

"The fair Spaniard still clasped my hand, and so, side by side, we followed in his footsteps.

"A long, gloomy subterraneous passage was traversed, a flight of steps ascended, a door passed through, and then we found ourselves on a level with the ground.

"Still pressing onwards, however, we came at length to a gallery, or corridor, that was fitted up as an armoury.

"Here were hundreds of weapons of every description, and I was told to select what I chose.

"I did so, arming myself with a splendid sword and a brace of richly-mounted pistols.

"Then the jailer advanced to a kind of window or loophole in the wall.

"'Outside of that,' he said, 'is a rope-ladder of a sufficient length to reach the ground. Near it, you will find a horse secured to an iron ring in the wall—mount him and ride onward. You will have some palisades to overleap, the moat to swim across, then you will be in safety.'

"Although every means had been taken to make the escape as easy as possible, it nevertheless presented numerous difficulties.

"It was not likely, however, that I should shrink back or hesitate, so I expressed my thanks to the jailer, and assured him I had fully comprehended his instructions.

Then the young girl bade the rough soldier a tender and tearful farewell, and I thought once that, rather than part, the jailer would accompany us; but in this expectation I was deceived.

"The young girl, coming to me, said:

"'Now, stranger, from this moment I place in you the utmost confidence, and I trust that you will not forget that while you are befriending me I have nevertheless rendered you a great service.'

"'I shall ever remember it,' I answered, 'and you shall have no cause to complain.'

"'Alas!' she sighed, again bursting into tears—'alas! that my parents should be so stern and harsh and force me into such a step as this; but I know they will not relent—nothing will move their hearts! But I cannot make such a sacrifice—I cannot—I cannot!'

"And probably, as at that moment she thought of the bridegroom intended for her, a shudder swept over her whole frame, and once more pressing my hand, she said:

"'Come—come, let us depart now, or it may be too late!'

CHAPTER DCXCV.

CLAUDE DUVAL'S HISTORY APPROACHES ITS COMPLETION.

"To this proposal I was glad enough to consent.

"The night was already far advanced, and I was anxious that no more time should be spent in these leave-takings and explanations.

"Had I been strong, the escape would have been accomplished much more easily than it was; however, we managed to descend the rope-ladder in safety, and as soon as our feet touched the ground it was drawn up by the jailer above, so that there should be no trace left behind of the route by which we had gone.

"As he had told me, I found a horse a few paces off, who was chafing impatiently, and tugging at the rein by which he was secured, as though anxious to be off.

"He was full of fire and spirit, and certainly the most magnificent creature I had ever beheld.

"His size was immense, and in his limbs could be traced indications of great strength.

"That he would carry his double burden easily I did not doubt.

"With all convenient speed we mounted, then, turning his head towards the palisades, I pressed my heels against his sides to urge him forward.

"That was quite enough; had he felt a spur he could not have given a more sudden bound forward.

"I kept his head well up, and on coming to the palisades, he cleared them with perfect ease; but in falling into the water of the moat, he made a loud splash, which, to me, sounded alarming in the extreme.

"Whether any notice would be taken of it from the battlements of the prison I could not tell, nor indeed had I any opportunity to speculate upon this point.

"With perfect ease, the horse swam across the moat, and ascended the opposite bank.

"A large, level piece of ground was now before us.

"I paused a second, and inquired whether my fair companion was safe and unhurt.

"She answered in the affirmative; then, giving the horse the rein, he again dashed forward.

"Just at that moment, however, I heard a bugle blown with great clearness and distinctness; then a drum was beat, and a gun fired.

"The shot passed close by us—so close that my fair companion uttered a scream.

"The horse, too, seemed aware of it, for he uttered a snorting cry, and galloped onwards with redoubled speed.

"I should have mentioned to you earlier that not long after my capture, the French abandoned the siege of the fortified town.

"The prison in which I was confined was also used as a fortress, and it was so constructed as to have command over a large piece of open country.

"From the summit of this building we could be seen easily enough, and our course traced for miles for, to my vexation, the moon was shining in the heavens with a brightness of which you could form no idea in England.

"I was well aware that this was the time to make the utmost exertions, and therefore I urged the horse to put forth his swiftest rate of speed.

"The gloomy fortress soon became indistinct in the distance, and I was congratulating myself upon the success which had attended my escape, when I perceived the drawbridge lowered, and a troop of armed men ride forth.

"Very prompt measures had been taken upon the discovery of my escape, and beyond doubt a very hot pursuit would be made after us.

"I wondered very much, and have often wondered since, how the jailer got on, and how he contrived to explain his share in the transaction.

"Whether he escaped scot-free, or whether he paid for what he had done with his life, I have never found out.

"When my fair companion perceived these armed men in the rear she clung to me closely, and showed every symptom of extreme terror.

"I tried my best to re-assure her, and the confident way in which I spoke produced its full effect.

"My great object was to get out of the country as quickly as I could, and cross the frontiers.

"When once on French ground I felt sure the Spaniards would not dare to pursue me.

"The distance, however, was great, and the chances were very much against me.

"During the whole of that night the chase continued.

"My steed behaved himself most gallantly; but, by dint of whip and spur, my pursuers managed to keep about the same distance in the rear.

"They had pressed their horses very much more than I had, and therefore I quite expected to find that their strength would give out soonest.

"In this expectation I was not disappointed, for during the ensuing day, on looking back from time to time, I saw that their numbers greatly decreased.

"One by one the soldiers fell off, as their tired and exhausted horses refused to proceed farther.

"The next night was as moonlight as the one that had preceded it.

"I was growing very anxious as to the result of this long chase, for during the whole of the time I had barely had an opportunity of pulling my horse up to allow him to recover his wind.

"Few animals, I knew, could maintain such a rate of speed for such a length of time.

"About midnight I looked back, and then saw that only one of my pursuers remained.

"For this I felt thankful.

"My horse, worn out by his tremendous exertions, flagged every now and then, and his speed abated, as was proved by the one pursuer in the rear gaining rapidly upon us.

"For one man I did not care, so by degrees I drew rein, resolved to bring matters to a crisis.

"I did not dread an encounter in the least, and I should probably gain much by it

"The rider behind me had by some means or other procured a fresh steed, which was one reason why he had gained upon me so rapidly.

"I determined not only to vanquish him but to seize his horse.

"At length I came to a full stop, and wheeled my horse round, so that I faced my adversary.

"He came on with undiminished speed, and it was clear that he was as eager for the encounter as myself.

"'Rascal!' he cried in Spanish, halting a few paces from me, 'deliver up the girl you have carried off, or your life shall be the forfeit!'

"While he spoke I noticed that my companion clung to me convulsively.

"'What is it?' I asked in a whisper—'what is it?'

"'Save me—save me! do not desert me now!'

"'I will not; but wherefore this fresh alarm?'

"'That man who has pursued us so far is the one to whom my parents promised me in marriage.'

"This announcement increased my animosity, and I determined at all risks to have my full revenge upon him.

"I felt a spirit of rivalry and jealousy within me. Although I had known the fair Spaniard so short a time, yet the romantic manner in which our meeting had been brought about, and the trusting confidence she had placed in me, all won my heart, and I felt that I loved her.

"All this of course took place in a moment, and, without scarcely allowing a pause between his speech and my own reply, I exclaimed:

"'I refuse to accede to your demand. We are man to man, and both are armed. Meet me face to face, and let the question be decided by our swords.'

"These words seemed to put him in a tremendous rage, and he levelled a great many opprobrious epithets at me.

"Nevertheless, he could not refuse such a challenge, so, with the alacrity of passion, he dismounted from his steed and drew his sword.

"I did the same, trying my best to calm my companion, and induce her to believe that all would be well—that victory would be on my side.

"'Should I fall,' I said, in a whisper, 'and should he come towards you for the purpose of seizing you, urge your horse forward, and trust to his fleetness to make your escape.'

"I disengaged myself from her detaining grasp, and, drawing my sword, advanced to meet my adversary.

"Our weapons rang together with a clashing sound.

"I could see that my opponent was in a state of the utmost excitement, and I at first stood calmly on the defensive, so as to ward off any of his fierce and random blows, and give him an opportunity of tiring himself.

"In the agitated state of his mind, he did not divine my purpose.

"Encouraged by the manner in which I met his attack, and by the way in which I retreated step by step before his furious onslaught, he redoubled the vigour of his blows, hoping thereby speedily to put an end to the contest.

CHAPTER DCXCVI.

CLAUDE DUVAL RELATES HOW HE RETURNED TO PARIS, AND HOW HE WAS COMPELLED TO BEAT A PRECIPITATE RETREAT.

"I WAITED until his energy showed signs of being almost expended, and then, putting forth all my strength, I made an attack upon him.

"All this time the young girl remained seated on the horse ready to swoon with terror, and watching all my movements with affright.

"My mode of fighting astonished the old Spaniard, and such was the rapidity with which I dealt my blows that I quite bewildered him and beat down his guard.

"But he was very skilful in the use of his weapon, and recovered before I could inflict a wound upon him.

"The next time, however, I entangled my blade in his, and whirled his sword out of his grasp.

"He was now completely at my mercy, and I lunged forward with all my might.

"But he dropped down suddenly on one knee, and bowed his head, so that the blow intended to be dealt at his heart merely ripped up the clothing on his shoulder.

"At the same time, while gnashing his teeth with rage at his defeat, the Spaniard drew a long-barrelled pistol from his belt, and, raising it with extreme rapidity, aimed hastily and fired.

"There was a loud report; I heard it, and so I knew that I was safe and unhurt.

"But mingled with the sound was a loud shriek.

"It came from the lips of the young girl, and whether she had been wounded or only terrified I could not tell, nor could I then pause to ascertain.

"Exasperated beyond measure at this exhibition of treachery on my antagonist's part, I raised my sword in the air and dealt him one heavy crashing blow as he still knelt on one knee.

"I mentioned about what sort of a sword it was—not a rapier, you understand, but a keen Damascus sabre.

"It clove his skull in two in an instant, and with a gasping cry he fell forwards on the sod dead.

"Sheathing my sword, I hastened towards my fair companion, and was alarmed when I saw how pale she had become.

"'Speak—speak!' I cried, hastily; 'are you injured?'

"She tried to answer me, but in vain.

"I noticed then that she was pressing one hand upon her breast, and that the blood was slowly trickling between her fingers.

"When I saw this I wished my antagonist lived again in order that I might wreak revenge upon him for what he had done.

"How to act now I scarcely knew.

"I was aroused from a kind of stupor by hearing the girl say in a voice little above a whisper:

"'Fly—fly—be quick—oh, be quick! Perhaps you may reach some inn or place where we can stay, and where my wound can be attended to!'

"I seized upon this as the only practical thing to do, and as my only hope.

"According to my intention, however, I exchanged horses.

"Speed now was more than ever necessary, and the animal ridden by the Spaniard was quite fresh. Once more, then, was my headlong flight continued, nor did I pause until at length I halted at the door of a Posada.

"By this time my alarm for my fair companion's safety was much increased.

"For more than two hours she had remained perfectly insensible, not speaking a word nor moving a muscle.

"She was, too, growing cold—icy cold.

"To some extent I succeeded in stanching the blood that flowed from her wound by pressing a handkerchief tightly over the orifice.

"Like all other inns in Spain, this Posada was indeed a wretched place, and destitute of every kind of accommodation.

"I at once engaged the best rooms, ordered a surgeon to be sent for, and, in a word, did all that I could to bring about the recovery of this young girl, whom I found I had learned to love with a deep and intense affection.

"The man who in that remote region styled himself a surgeon was almost destitute of chirurgical skill—he was able to bind the wound up, but nothing more.

"When he had done this he called me aside.

"'Young man,' he said 'do not buoy yourself up with any false hopes; the wound is mortal—she cannot possibly recover.'

"My grief at this announcement was great indeed, and I made extravagant offers to him provided he would only restore her to life; but he again assured me it was impossible, that, in fact, she had not an hour to live.

"Saddened and broken-hearted, I placed myself by the side of the bed on which she had been laid.

"On my approach she opened her eyes and greeted me with a mournful smile.

"She must have gathered something from the mournful expression of my countenance, for she said:

"'My wound is mortal—I am sure of it! I am dying; I can feel that I am dying! Alas! it is hard to quit this world so soon; yet, should you ever see my parents, tell them I would rather perish thus—yes, ten thousand times rather—than be the bride of that old man!'

"I could not deceive her with respect to her condition, and informed her that the surgeon had declared there was no hope for her recovery.

"She was neither alarmed nor shocked by this intelligence, because she had fully anticipated it.

"She earnestly requested that a priest might be sent for, in order to witness her dissolution.

"Then she placed in my hand a small packet, but one of great weight.

"'Take this!' she said. 'I bequeath it to you, and I hope you will find it of service. I am sorry I am not able to reward you better for all that you have done in my behalf, yet take it—take it, and remember me!'

"'I want no reward,' I said; 'I would gladly part with everything I had if I could but insure your recovery.'

"'But that, alas! is impossible,' she said, 'so think of it no more. Accept my parting gift!'

"It was a long, sad interview, and exhausted her much.

"I feared she would expire before the priest arrived.

"At length he came, however, and she only survived long enough to allow the last rites of religion to be administered.

"At her death I was inconsolable, and wished over and over again that I had received the bullet.

"On the following day, however, I opened the packet she handed to me.

"On removing the outer covering I found a richly-inlaid casket. It opened with a spring, the secret of which I easily discovered. The lid flew open, and I found that the little box was literally crammed with gold, and jewels, and valuables of every description.

"The treasure was great, and I should think in actual value quite equal to that which I had obtained from Mazzaroth.

"With a portion of this money I defrayed the expenses incurred by our stay at the Posada, and saw her interred in the nearest graveyard.

"Then, melancholy and alone, I mounted my horse and rode away, neither knowing nor caring where I was going.

"One thing, however, I speedily determined upon, and that was to get out of Spain as quickly as I could—the country was hateful to me.

"After a number of adventures, all of them to a certain degree interesting, and yet not particularly so, I crossed the frontiers and entered France.

"After a little deliberation I resolved to go to Paris.

"It was very strange, but I never once thought of the singular manner in which I had quitted the French army; in fact, I may say that my mind was so occupied with the remembrance of the Spanish girl, whose name even I did not know, that for awhile I quite forgot that I had ever been a soldier.

"From this circumstance alone I incurred no little danger in returning to Paris, where I might be apprehended as a deserter.

"As for the charge against me on account of Mazzaroth, that did not trouble me in the least, for I imagined such a long time had elapsed that the circumstance had been forgotten and I had so greatly altered in appearance there was no danger of being recognised.

"But I was mistaken, for, upon entering Paris, almost the first person I saw was Mazzaroth, the astrologer.

"He appeared to be carrying on his old trade, if I might judge from his appearance.

"I recognised him at the first glance, and so did he recognise me.

"It was not wonderful that I should live in his brains.

"He immediately set up a loud cry for the police, and no sooner did I hear it than, without pausing to reflect, I turned my horse's head round, clapped spurs to his sides and galloped away.

"Where was I to go? was my next question.

"Certainly somewhere out of France, which was much too hot to hold me.

"Belgium I thought would be the easiest to reach, and therefore I proceeded thither.

"I was hotly pursued by the police officers; but, owing to the excellence of my steed, was able to elude them; and without tiring you by dwelling so much upon details, I will just say that I was successful in reaching Belgium, though I can assure you the journey made very great inroads upon my wealth."

CHAPTER DCXCVII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SETS OUT TO PAY A VISIT TO TOM DAVIS.

"For some time I did nothing but travel about from place to place, and though I met with many adventures, yet none of them is sufficiently interesting to deserve being repeated now.

"But I grew tired of this dull life, and longed for the excitement that is to be found only in the cities of London and Paris.

"The latter was quite out of the question, and, indeed, so might the former be said to be, but I resolved to run the risk of paying it a visit.

"I did so, and had the satisfaction of finding that my affair with the dissolute young nobleman had died away.

"Once again, then, I entered upon that extravagant career that I have already described to you.

"As before, I reached the end of my purse, and when I had only about a couple of guineas left I began to wonder what I should do.

"Again the idea of turning highwayman obtruded itself upon me.

"I thought of my uncle, and I thought of the prophecy made by Mazzaroth.

"Although I knew it was such a rank imposture, I suffered myself to be influenced by it, fancying that many a true word might be spoken in jest.

"At anyrate, one dark night I resolved to try my fortunes on the King's highway.

"It should be, I resolved, no common exploit, but something worthy of the name I bore.

"Without having any fixed purpose in my mind, I rode out of London, taking my way along the Oxford Road.

"Several people passed me, but I did not molest them; I meant to fly at higher game.

"Then, presently, the Oxford mail-coach came rolling by.

"I suffered it to pass me, and then I thought to stop that coach singled-handed would be a feat indeed.

"I did not think of the danger there was of making the attempt; but as soon as ever the idea occurred to me I galloped with tremendous speed after the retreating vehicle.

"I soon came up with it, and in a loud voice, commanded the driver to pull up, and then a strange accident happened, but one that turned out in my favour.

"One of the leaders stumbled over some obstruction on the roadway, and after a vain attempt to recover his feet, fell heavily on to the ground.

"The other leader fell also.

"The animals plunged and fought desperately to regain their feet.

"Of course the coach came to a standstill.

"Before the driver knew what I was about, I cut the traces, then, by a vigorous effort, the two leading horses regained their feet, and started off at full speed.

"Although I cut the traces, you must understand I did not cut the reins, to which the coachman continued to hold tightly.

"He was not aware that the traces had been severed, so the moment the horses started, they dragged him head foremost off his seat.

"The coach was now completely at my mercy, if I may except the guard who was, as usual, armed with a blunderbuss; but you know very well, comrades, what sort of a weapon it is.

"He levelled it at me, and pulled the trigger, but it only flashed in the pan.

"I snatched the cumbrous weapon from him, and flung it over the hedge.

"I then levied my contributions upon the passengers in turn, showing favour to none except the ladies.

"When I had finished, I made a deep bow, as I said:

"'Ladies and gentlemen, Claude Duval has the pleasure of wishing you a good-night and a speedy journey!'

"I saw the name produced no slight astonishment, and the passengers looked from one to the other in surprise.

"My uncle had not been forgotten, and by many his very features were remembered, and as there is a strong family likeness between us, they fancied the dead had come to life.

"After that I had many and many an adventure on the highway, until at length I met, for the first time, with my old friend and companion, Sixteen-String Jack.

"As I have now occupied your attention for a long time, and as night is already at hand, I will bring my narrative to a conclusion at this point. I shall leave it for Sixteen-String Jack to relate under what circumstances our meeting took place, and then he will continue our joint adventures up to the time of our meeting with Tom King. You will then have the story quite complete, but it will take much too long to tell now."

With these words, Claude Duval ceased.

There was not one of his auditors, with the single exception of Sixteen-String Jack, who did not long earnestly for the continuation.

But nearly an entire day had been occupied by the relation, and there were many things pressing upon them that required their immediate attention.

First of all, a rude meal was prepared, and, after they had despatched it, a consultation was held as to their future proceedings.

"You all agree with me in thinking," said Tom King, "that our old friend Tom Davis has had plenty of time to mature all his plans."

"Yes, certainly!"

"But when I paid him my last visit," continued Tom, "I quite forgot one very important thing!"

"What was that?"

"I have only just recollected it. I never made any appointment with him as to our next meeting. Of course, if he is at home where he has been living lately, we shall find him easily enough. But if he has removed to the inn, how then?"

"Why, it will be very awkward," said Dick Turpin. "I never thought of it. For my own part, however, I should think that if Tom Davis is not there himself he will have left some one who will give you the information we need."

"It's very certain," said Claude Duval, "that he has had time to complete his arrangements with respect to the inn, and equally certain that one of us ought to go and have an interview with him. Now, then, who is that one to be?"

All agreed with the first part of Claude's speech, but as to the latter, they were in doubt, and all were silent.

Maud placed her hand upon Turpin's arm.

"Grant me this favour," she whispered, imploringly—"do not refuse it!"

"I can guess what you are about to ask."

"No doubt. It is that you will let one of your companions go upon this errand, and not yourself. I wish you to remain here with me—I shall feel safer then."

Then Tom King spoke aloud, saying:

"I can see we are all anxious to undertake this duty. We can't all go, that's quite clear."

"And you ought not to think of it," said Claude Duval, addressing him, "for you went last time."

"I know that; but the best way, and the easiest, of settling the affair is to draw lots; chance alone can decide the point then, and there can be no dispute."

This proposition was at once assented to.

In spite of Maud's request, Turpin determined to join in the lottery with his companions.

Four little pieces of wood were selected—three of one length, and one much shorter.

They were drawn one at a time, and whoever possessed the shortest would set out.

The lot fell upon Sixteen-String Jack, and when he discovered it he uttered a cry of satisfaction.

"This is just what I hoped for," he said. "I am delighted. I have been so long in this old forest, doing nothing but shooting birds, that my blood has grown quite cold and stagnant. I will be off at once."

"There is no time to lose," said Dick Turpin. "If you set out now, you will have the whole of the night before you."

"Very true," replied Jack; "and neither I nor anyone else could say what interruptions and hindrances I may meet with on the way."

"Be careful of your own safety."

"Never fear for that. I will return here as soon as I can."

Sixteen-String Jack hastily prepared his weapons, mounted his horse, and rode out of the forest.

"I wonder, now," he said, when he gained the open country, "whether those dragoons are still patrolling the high-roads. I fancy not. They must have had their patience tired out long before this."

It was a very important point to settle.

If the dragoons were no longer patrolling the road, Jack's course would be easy enough.

On the other hand, if they had not ceased that unpleasant duty, he would have to make use of the greatest circumspection.

The only means by which he could find this out was to ride on until he heard something of them.

The position of the house in which Tom Davis lived was tolerably well known to him, and after a while he paused before a hedge that was of rather unusual height.

On the other side of this hedge was a broad high-road, and this was the one which, if followed, would take him right past Tom Davis's door.

Sixteen-String Jack paused here, and hesitated whether he should run the risk of continuing his course along it.

While deliberating this point in his mind, he was startled from his reflections by the occurrence of a familiar sound.

This was no other than the grating of carriage-wheels on the roadway.

He listened, and soon ascertained that some four-wheeled vehicle was approaching at a rapid rate, and coming from the direction of London.

The temptation to stop this vehicle and levy a contribution upon its occupants came very strongly over Sixteen-String Jack.

But reflection assured him that such a course would be injudicious in the extreme.

Should the road still be patrolled, the intelligence would be quickly communicated to the dragoons.

The troops were all in connection with each other, and then such a pursuit would be commenced after him as he felt certain he could not escape.

While he was thus thinking, and standing secure from observation behind the tall hedgerow, the vehicle came on at the same rapid rate.

CHAPTER DCXCVIII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK IS THE SPECTATOR OF A SINGULAR SCENE, AND PREVENTS THE COMMISSION OF A DIABOLICAL CRIME.

"No," said Sixteen-String Jack at length, shaking his head, "I won't stop the carriage—at least, that is, I think I won't. I will see what it is as it goes by."

So saying, he dismounted from his steed, and standing close to the hedge, drew aside the twigs, and peeped through. He found that he commanded a view of a very lonely and very dark part of the highway.

Not only, as we have stated, was the hedgerow unusually high, but it was planted on the top of an embankment, so that the level of the roadway was several feet below that of the meadow in which Jack stood.

This was enough to give the place a desolate appearance, but in addition, large trees of great height and luxuriant foliage grew on both sides of the way, casting a deep black shadow.

We said that Jack commanded a view of this bit of roadway, but this is scarcely correct.

It was not until he had strained his eyes for several moments that he was able to make out different objects with anything like distinctness.

By the time he was able to do this, the approaching vehicle was very close at hand indeed.

Jack was yet undecided as to what he should do.

His inclination prompted him to run the risk of stopping the carriage, but prudence restrained him from doing so.

Then his curiosity was excited by the fact that as the vehicle approached this dark and desolate bit of roadway, its speed was much diminished.

To his further astonishment, the horses were drawn up with a dash almost in front of the spot where he was standing.

A dim halo of light now illuminated the roadway, and Jack saw it proceeded from two large lamps.

They were fixed on either side of a large old-fashioned travelling carriage, such as in those days was used when families of distinction were travelling from one distant place to another.

On the coachman's seat there was plenty of room for another to ride beside himself, and at the back was a large clumsy seat, called a rumble, in which the other servants sat while the family was travelling.

This rumble, however, on the present occasion was unoccupied.

Two horses were harnessed to the vehicle, and beautiful creatures they were.

They had been driven hard, however, and now that they had stopped, clouds of steam began to rise from their panting sides.

Looking still closer, Jack perceived by the aid of the lamps we have mentioned that the coachman's box was occupied by two persons, one a man and the other a woman.

Both, from their attire, were evidently servants, and the man wore a coachman's wig and a large livery cloak.

All this that has necessarily taken us some time to describe, Sixteen-String Jack saw at a glance, and he was content to bestow only a glance upon them, for the two persons we have described were talking to each other.

As they were so very close at hand, and moreover, the place was so very silent, Sixteen-String Jack was able to hear every syllable that fell from their lips.

The first voice was the female one.

"Why, Robert," she cried—"why have you stopped all at once in this dark and lonely place?"

"Hold your row!" said the coachman, gruffly—"hold your row, I say, and don't be bothering me with questions!"

Something in the gruff tones alarmed his fellow-servant, and she said:

"Drive on—drive on at once! I will shriek and call out if you stay here!"

"Oh, will you?" said the coachman, in even a gruffer voice than before; "we'll see about that. Now squall if you can, and much good may it do you!"

The light was dim and uncertain, and for the life of him, Sixteen-String Jack could not make out what the coachman was about.

He was standing up in the seat, and held something in his hand which Jack fancied was the whip.

There was something very suspicious in his having stopped the carriage in this deserted spot.

Evidently, he was alone with the girl, for had any persons been inside the vehicle he would not have ventured to bring it to so abrupt a standstill.

A half-smothered shriek came from the girl's lips, and then she struggled desperately.

The coachman's hands seemed busy about her neck.

"Help—help!" she gasped. "Murder—murder!"

Then the voice ceased.

While these words were being pronounced, Sixteen-String Jack made out what the coachman was about.

He had taken hold of his long whip and tied the lash into a circular knot.

This he had slipped over the girl's head before she was aware of it, and was tugging with all his might at the two ends, using it after the fashion that a Turk uses the bowstring.

A more effective mode of strangling anyone could not be devised.

"This is fortunate for the girl!" said Jack, as he dashed through the hedge.

He no longer hesitated about what he should do.

It was impossible he could remain there a spectator while a cruel and barbarous murder was perpetrated.

The crashing noise he made by forcing his way through the twigs reached the ears of the coachman, and he paused in his murderous work.

"Hold!" said Sixteen-String Jack—"hold, or you are a dead man!"

He sprang on to the step of the carriage as he spoke, with a pistol in one hand.

The girl was half-lying half-sitting on the seat.

All murderers are cowards, and the coachman was no exception to the rule.

When he found he was discovered, such an abject terror took possession of him that he was unable to move hand or foot.

Trembling and shaking like an aspen-leaf, he sat in his accustomed seat.

With great speed, Jack released the thong of the whip, and found that he had only interfered just in time.

The hard, strong, leather thong was literally embedded in the flesh, and if the pressure had continued only a moment or two longer, death must inevitably have been the result.

But he found, when the knot was slackened, that the girl began to breathe, at first with difficulty, but afterwards with greater ease.

She had never lost her consciousness, and now made vigorous efforts to speak.

"Save me—save me," she cried "from that man! He tried to murder me!"

"I know," said Jack; "but I was just in time! Don't be afraid—he shall not harm you again!"

This assurance did not satisfy the girl.

"Let me get down," she said—"let me feel that I am far away from him! I could not bear to be near him again!"

Sixteen-String Jack made no opposition to her descending from the vehicle.

The coachman crouched down lower and lower in his seat, being exceedingly anxious to escape observation if he could.

"Thanks—thanks, sir," she said, addressing Jack, "you have saved my life; but I must fly now—fly with all possible speed, or he will overtake me, and murder me when you are gone!"

"But his motive for the crime—what is it?"

"I can hardly tell you, sir, except that I know he has been dishonest."

"And does anyone else possess that knowledge?"

"No; when I discovered what he had done he entreated me never to speak, and I have not; but he has always persecuted me with his hateful love, but I have never listened to it."

"And so to-night he tried to murder you?"

"He did. He had repeated his offers over and over again while riding along."

"And where are you going back to?"

"My master and mistress to tell them all that has happened. I must and will get out of his reach."

"Have you far to go?"

"Not many miles, sir; but I shall be on foot, and he will have the horses."

"Never mind about that. I can't go with you to protect you, but I will take care that your would-be murderer does not follow."

The girl pressed Jack's hand in thankfulness, and then, quivering with fright, ran nastily away, disappearing almost immediately in the darkness.

She could not bear the thought of being so near to the man who had attempted her life.

"Now, you rascal," said Jack, turning to the coachman, "I will square accounts with you!"

"Mercy—mercy!"

"Oh yes, plenty of mercy. I would put a bullet through your rascally carcass at once only that would be doing you too great a kindness. No—no, you shall be reserved for the hangman's rope—that's the death you deserve to die!"

CHAPTER DCXCIX.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK FAILS TO FIND TOM DAVIS, AND MAKES UP HIS MIND TO PAY A VISIT TO OLD MATTHEW INSTEAD.

Upon hearing Sixteen-String Jack speak these threatening words, the coachman sank completely down, and tried to get out of sight behind the dash-board of the carriage.

"Remain where you are," cried Jack, in a loud voice—"move at your peril! If you attempt it, you are a dead man—for, rather than you should escape, I would cheat the hangman!"

No sooner had he uttered the words than Jack turned round and dashed through the hedge, in order to obtain possession of his horse.

The gap through which he had made his way, though large enough to admit his body, yet was much too small to allow his horse to pass through it.

The hedge was too high to overleap, so, after springing upon the creature's back, he had no other resource than to ride for some little distance and then take the leap at some more convenient place.

He did this.

But in the meanwhile, the coachman, having witnessed the departure of his assailant, recovered his courage and his seat at the same time.

He grasped the reins and lashed the horses furiously with the whip; turning them round, however, so that their heads were in the direction of London.

He did this in order to avoid Sixteen-String Jack, who, hearing the vehicle rolling away at such a rapid rate, clapped spurs to his horse's sides, and speedily overtook it.

"Pull up," he shouted, keeping himself exactly abreast of the coachman—"pull up, or you are a dead man!"

There was something in the highwayman's tones that made the coachman quite aware that he would be as good as his word if disobeyed, and therefore he tightened the reins and reduced the speed of the horses to a gentle trot.

"Now then," thought Jack to himself, as an idea entered his mind, "I will find out for certain whether the dragoons are still patrolling the road."

"Look you," he said, addressing himself to the coachman, "I will compel you to go to London with me. You shall answer for your crime—I am resolved upon that point. Resist if you dare!"

The coachman made a whining appeal to be let off, but Jack entirely disregarded it.

In this manner the greater part of the journey to Tom Davis's was accomplished without having seen or heard anything of the dragoons, so that Sixteen-String Jack rightly enough concluded that the authorities had withdrawn them in consequence of the non-success attending the movement.

But in a short time the sound of horses' feet upon the road before him reached his ears.

A large body of horsemen were approaching at a rapid rate, and, by the heaviness with which the horses' hoofs came to the ground, the highwayman concluded they must be police officers.

This made him rather undecided as to what he should do.

If he gave the man into their custody, he would run great risk of being recognised; and even if he was fortunate enough to avoid them, the man, on being brought up before the magistrate, would be let off for want of evidence.

Upon one point, however, Jack congratulated himself, for his purpose was achieved so far as getting this man out of the way of the girl was concerned.

She was certainly by this time safe from all pursuit that he might undertake after her.

"Faster—faster!" he said to the coachman—"drive faster! We shall be all night getting to London at this rate!"

[OLD MATTHEW AND THE POLICE OFFICERS IN THE CELLARS OF THE WHITE HORSE INN.]

Much surprised at this order, the coachman whipped his horses, and again the carriage rolled along the road at a furious rate.

Then, watching his opportunity, Sixteen-String Jack stopped his horse somewhat abruptly.

The coachman was scarcely aware of it, or, if so, believed that the stoppage was caused by an accident, in which case his best plan was to drive on with all his might.

Before Sixteen-String Jack had time to turn his horse's head round, the carriage was almost out of sight.

But he was more convinced than ever that the troop of horsemen he heard approaching consisted of police officers.

In order to avoid a meeting, he determined to once more take to the fields, and accordingly jumped his horse over a hedge into a meadow.

Over the smooth, soft turf his horse made wonderful speed, and presently, reaching an elevated spot, Jack again drew rein.

Looking back, and shading his eyes with his hand as he did so, he could just make out in the distance the dusky and indistinct figures of the police officers sweeping along the road.

"I wonder what they are after?" he muttered. "Perhaps on the look-out for some of us. Well, luckily, I have escaped them, and every moment that now elapses will serve to put a greater distance between us."

This was quite true, but Jack little thought how near he was to the truth in part of his conjecture.

The police officers he had seen were indeed in search of the highwaymen.

It did not occur to Jack that they were making their way by the most direct route to Epping Forest.

And yet such was the case.

He watched them however, until he could see them no longer

Then, again setting his steed in motion, made his way towards the house where Tom Davis dwelt.

Without the occurrence of a single accident, he arrived there.

He rode boldly up to the front door, and, dismounting at the gate of the little garden we have mentioned, walked up to the cottage door.

All was darkness, however, and he knocked several times, but without meeting with any response.

Could it be possible that Tom Davis had gone away, forgetting that the highwaymen were not acquainted with the position of the inn?

It seemed hardly likely, and yet the more he looked at the exterior of the house the more Sixteen-String Jack felt assured that it was uninhabited.

'He must be gone," he said. "This is most vexatious and extraordinary. What's to be done?"

Sixteen-String Jack stood for some moments in an attitude of deep reflection.

The only way in which he could account for Tom's departure was by supposing that his residence had by some means or other become known to or suspected by the police.

Still, if any events had arisen to necessitate a hasty departure, it seemed probable that Tom would leave behind him some message or sign by which he could be followed.

In the hope of discovering something of this kind, Sixteen-String Jack searched about for a long time.

But without result.

A closer inspection of the house showed him that it was quite deserted.

To have aroused any of the neighbours, or to have put questions to them, would have been injudicious in the extreme.

The situation of the inn was to be preserved a profound secret, and that was what Sixteen-String Jack wanted to know, and no more.

'This is all Tom King's fault," he muttered. "When he was here last he ought to have arranged about the future meeting. I can't imagine how it was that such a thing was overlooked. It is extraordinary—inexplicable! I must think of it a little while."

And, as he spoke, the highwayman paced up and down in front of the house.

"It won't be wise to wait here," he said, at length. "I must not be connected with this house in any way, or suspicion may be directed to us. What on earth shall I do?"

Sixteen-String Jack was strongly inclined to turn back at once to Epping Forest and acquaint his comrades with the aspect of affairs.

Would that he had done so.

Better by far would it have been for him and all his companions.

Much trouble, and danger, and sorrow would have been spared by such a course.

But it was not to be.

Little dreaming of the urgent necessity there was for his presence at the cave, Sixteen-String Jack at length arrived at a very dangerous conclusion.

"I will ride over to Drury Lane," he said, "and see old Matthew. There is a risk in it, I know, but then it must be run, for he of course will be able to tell me just what I want to know. A long time has elapsed since any of us were there, and surely the officers must by this time have relaxed their vigilance. Yes, my mind is made up—I'll go to old Matthew. I long to look upon his jovial countenance once more. Perhaps, too, I may obtain important information. At any rate, I will go—though I will be cautious."

So saying, Sixteen-String Jack passed out of the garden and remounted his steed.

After casting one look upon the dwelling that had been inhabited by Tom Davis, he turned his horse's head in the direction of London, and set forward at a rapid rate.

There was a certain degree of confidence in his breast, for, as he had seen nothing of the dragoons since he started, he came to the conclusion that they were no longer employed in patrolling the roads.

CHAPTER DCC.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK FINDS A GOOD DEAL OF DIFFICULTY IN DECIDING UPON THE MANNER IN WHICH HE SHOULD GAIN ADMITTANCE TO THE WHITE HORSE INN.

WHETHER Sixteen-String Jack was right or wrong in this conclusion subsequent events alone can prove.

Keeping a careful look-out on both sides of him, so as to be prepared for any danger, he took his way in almost a straight line for his destination.

The closer he got to the metropolis, however, the more careful did he become.

On the way he met and overtook several pedestrians and vehicles, and at length he gained Bloomsbury Fields.

At this lonely spot he reined-in his steed and sat for several moments in deep thought.

He was deliberating the question in his mind whether he should proceed to old Matthew's on horseback or on foot.

The distance was little more than half a mile.

But then, if he walked, what was he to do in the meanwhile with his horse?

There was at no great distance, going towards St. Giles's, a public-house of rather bad repute.

Jack had never paid a visit to it, though he had often heard the place spoken of, and he fancied he should be able to leave his steed there in perfect security

Being unable to think of anything better, he finally determined to run the risk.

The public-house was only about a hundred yards from the spot where he had paused, so he hastened towards it.

He found it was a small, low, straggling building, of quite a forbidding appearance.

At the side were the usual folding gates leading to the stables, for in those days when horses were used for travelling purposes so much more than they are now it was quite a rarity to find an inn that was not provided with stable accommodation for many horses.

As soon as the ostler appeared, Jack took a five-shilling piece out of his pocket and pressed it into his hand.

"There," he said—"there is a crown for you; drink my health with it! I want you to take care of my horse for a couple of hours or so; I am going a short distance off, if you will be at hand when I call."

"Oh yes, sir, never fear for that!" was the ostler's reply, as he consigned the coin to his pocket with an air of great satisfaction—"I will be here, you may depend upon it!"

Upon receipt of this assurance, Sixteen-String Jack surrendered his steed to the ostler's care, and, after giving particular injunctions as to how he should treat it, and promising him an excellent reward for his services, he wrapped his cloak closely round him and walked in the direction of Drury Lane.

He pulled his hat low down over his brow, and turned up the collar of his coat, so that very little of his face was visible.

"Surely," he thought, "I shall be safe among so many people! Why should I be singled out and noticed? If I can once enter old Matthew's house unperceived I shall not care!"

Assuming an air of carlessness, Sixteen-String Jack walked rapidly through the dark, deserted streets.

Nevertheless, his eyes were continually on the watch for every unusual circumstance.

He saw nothing of a more alarming character, however than a few watchmen, who were comfortably ensconced in their boxes, and snoring away as if for a wager.

But as he drew nearer to old Matthew's house he began to reflect as to what would be the best means of entering it.

Some police officers might be lurking about the spot, and if he was once seen he considered his capture would be certain.

There was the little secret door in the passage called White Horse Yard; but then, as he knew full well, the police officers had had their suspicions much excited by that mysterious thoroughfare.

A particularly close watch might be kept at both ends of it.

"No," he said, after much deliberation, "I won't venture into the passage—it is too much like a trap. I should find it awkward if the police officers should fill it up at both ends."

Jack shook his head again.

"I don't like the idea of going in at the front door either," he said. "I might be seen doing that, or, what's more likely, some police officers might be at the bar. What on earth shall I do?"

Sixteen-String Jack paused in perplexity.

He was more than usually careful on that night, not only for his own sake, but for his companions'.

He knew they were depending upon him, and if he failed to bring to them the necessary intelligence, very disastrous consequences might result to all of them.

To stand motionless in the streets, however, was only to court danger in another form.

He looked around him.

But he could see nothing to suggest any particular plan of operations, and his own invention was at fault.

Moreover, his attention was distracted by the movements of a man.

He observed him at no great distance come staggering along Drury Lane, as if much under the influence of liquor.

Although his course was devious and erratic in the extreme, yet he evidently made his way towards the spot where Sixteen-String Jack was standing.

As the man came closer, the highwayman could hear that he was singing, or endeavouring to sing some bacchanalian ditty, which was every now and then interrupted by a loud hiccup.

Jack looked at this man, as well he might, with an air of suspicion.

To assume inebriation was an easy enough task, and this man, who might be a police officer in disguise, might have had the cunning to adopt this means of approaching Sixteen-String Jack unsuspected.

What the words were he was attempting to sing would have puzzled anyone to have found out.

At last it seemed as though the man could no longer trust to his own feet, they carried him about in such an uncertain way, therefore he seized hold of the shutters and doors with his hands, in order to assist his progress.

"I don't like his looks at all!" Jack thought. "I'll watch his motions."

Swiftly, then, the highwayman sped across the narrow street.

On the opposite side was the arched entrance to a court, and in the deep shadow of this he knew he could stand concealed.

The intoxicated man apparently took no notice of Sixteen-String Jack's movements, but continued to struggle on by the means we have mentioned, until at length he paused at the door of a house that adjoined the White Horse Inn.

It was no longer possible for Sixteen-String Jack to see him so plainly as he had done before, but his curiosity as to what he intended to do very much increased.

He fancied by his movements that the man was fumbling in his pocket for a key, and this supposition was soon after verified.

There was a rattling, shaking noise, as the intoxicated man endeavoured to fit the key into the keyhole.

After many fruitless attempts, he succeeded.

The door opened, and he disappeared from Jack's view.

Then the highwayman ventured to quit his place of concealment, and again crossed the road.

"What can be the meaning of it?" he asked himself. "Is there anything suspicious in it? Is there anything that bodes evil to me?"

With the view of settling this point if he possibly could, Sixteen-String Jack went to the door where the man had entered.

To his surprise he saw that the key was still sticking in the lock.

Here was fresh food for thought.

What had been his object for such a proceeding?

"I have been alarming myself needlessly," Sixteen-String Jack at length concluded; "he is evidently so drunk that he hardly knows what he is about. He has found his way home and entered, but has forgotten to shut the door after him. But what is it all to me? I only wish it would suggest some means by which I could get into old Matthew's parlour. Ah! of course!—a good plan! I ought to have thought of it before—a very good plan! Exactly—that will do first-rate!"

Uttering these disjointed expressions, Sixteen-String Jack glided into the house silently, removed the key from the door, and with equal caution locked it on the inner side.

CHAPTER DCCI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK CREATES A COMMOTION IN THE LODGING-HOUSE, BUT GAINS THE ROOF OF THE WHITE HORSE.

He now found himself standing in profound darkness, and merely as a matter of instinct he paused before venturing to take another step.

"I wonder," he thought, "what has become of my intoxicated friend? I must mind I do not run over him."

Jack listened, and then heard the same voice still chanting the same burden of a song.

It was followed by a lumbering, crashing sound.

"That will awake all the inmates of the house at once, I'll wager!" was Jack's thought.

It was pretty clear, however, that the staircase was close at hand, and that the drunken man in ascending had lost his footing and fell.

Jack came to the conclusion that if this was a regular inmate of the house, and that the other inhabitants were accustomed to his coming home so late at night and making so much clatter, what little extra noise he himself would make would count for nothing.

Groping his way forward, then, as well as he could, he, after taking about a dozen steps found himself at the bottom of the staircase.

He began to ascend, making scarcely a sound.

He mounted quickly, but when he gained the first landing, paused.

His guide, for such he could call him, was groping about. Then a door was suddenly opened, and a voice exclaimed:

"What the devil's that?"

"Itsh not the devil at all," said the drunken lodger, for such he was, "it's me."

"Mr. Brown?"

"Yes, I think I've heard that name somewhere before."

"I know it's you, you drunken, idle vagabond!" said the voice that issued from the half open door, "but I give you notice, mind that—I give you notice, you quit my house this day week!"

"Night week," corrected the lodger, with a hiccup.

"Yes, this night week!" was the angry reiteration. "I won't be disturbed, and have my lodgers disturbed by such a one as you! Do you think my respectable first and second floors are to be annoyed by an attic like you?"

Mr. Brown made no response.

"Do you hear?" cried the landlord of the house. "I give you notice—a week's notice—to quit!"

"Well—well, don't put yourself out about it. What does the song say?"

"Oh! d—n the song! Go up to bed!"

With these words, the landlord slammed the door in a great passion, and Mr. Brown contrived to grope and stumble upstairs.

"The attic," thought Jack—"that's the place I want to reach, but it's rather awkward for him to be the occupant of it, and yet no—not so; I can manage to deal with him, whereas I might open a door incautiously, not knowing who was in the chamber beyond, and cause an immediate alarm!"

After this, Jack followed closer than ever in the steps of Mr. Brown, though he was not unmindful of the risk he ran of being hurled to the bottom should the worthy above him slip.

"I will go first," thought Jack. "I will pass him."

Noiselessly as he could, he crept up the stairs at about double the speed he had been going before.

By this time his eyes had grown accustomed to the darkness, and he could see before him the black, shadowy figure of Mr. Brown.

To pass him was not a very difficult matter, for, in order to facilitate his ascent, the lodger clung very tightly to the balustrades.

Jack pressed himself as close against the wall as he could, and without meeting with any accident at length arrived at the top of the tall house.

Now if Jack had only possessed the knowledge which attic was occupied by Mr. Brown, his future proceedings would have been easy enough.

But that knowledge he did not possess, and so, having gained the landing, he was obliged to wait for the lodger to make his appearance.

His patience was put to rather a severe test; but at length Mr. Brown arrived.

"I wonder which is my door?" he muttered. "How dark it is! That must be my door—I'm sure it must!"

So saying, the drunken man staggered across the landing and raised a latch.

The action was accompanied by a scream.

"Who is that?" said a female voice. "Thieves!—murder!"

"Oh! it's nothing, my dear," hiccuped Mr. Brown—"nothing at all! I made a mistake! This is the wrong door! Good night!"

The person addressed appeared to recognise Mr. Brown's voice, for no more was said and the door was closed.

Only one other door opened from the landing, and while this little conversation was going on, Sixteen-String Jack availed himself of the opportunity to open it and slip inside.

He fancied he should have time enough to open the window and scramble out on the roof before Mr. Brown entered.

In this, however, he was disappointed.

Before he could step on to the rude table under the window, the door opened.

Jack crouched down, so that his dark figure should not be seen against the light window.

"It's dark to-night, and no mistake," muttered Mr. Brown. "I must get a candle."

"No, you must not," thought Jack—"that is, if I can prevent you."

Ever fertile in expedients, the highwayman immediately thought of a means by which he could bring about the discomfiture of the lodger.

When he crouched down he found he was close to a bed.

Rising up gently, he took hold of all the clothes and drew them off gently, holding them by the upper edge, in both hands.

Mr. Brown was groping about, doubtless with the intention of finding the means of obtaining a light.

Jack got behind him, and approached him on tiptoe, unperceived.

He held up the bedclothes as high as he could, and then flung them right over the lodger's head.

"Oh, murder!" cried Mr. Brown, in a muffled voice. "What's that?"

He was greatly startled by finding something clinging closely round his head and shoulders, and could not make out what in the world it was.

He struggled and fought most desperately to get free from the bedclothes, and Jack, to complete his discomfiture, held out his foot in such a way that Mr. Brown tumbled over it, and fell to the floor with a crash.

He then rolled over and over, striving in vain to disentangle himself from the objects with which he was covered, and all the while saying something in a muffled voice.

"Good gracious!" said some one outside. "Mr. Brown, what's the matter?"

The voice was that of the girl who had been startled by Mr. Brown opening the wrong door.

Her only reply was some muffled sounds, which were really quite alarming and terrifying.

"There is no time to be lost," said Jack. "I will be off, and I fancy there will be some little difficulty in arriving at a correct explanation of all these occurrences."

So saying, he mounted lightly on to the table, opened the window, and passed out.

Like most attic windows, it opened outwardly like a door, and as soon as he gained the tiles Jack closed it after him.

He could not fasten it; but it happened to fit very tightly into its frame, so that it remained close shut and apparently fast.

In order to avoid being seen, Sixteen-String Jack now, as rapidly as he could, crawled along the roof until he came to a ridge of brickwork, which divided the lodging-house from the White Horse Inn.

Over this he climbed, and when he found that the tiles of old Matthew's house were beneath him, a feeling of great security and satisfaction came over him.

"All is well now," he said—"quite well, and the only thing I have to do is to make my way quietly downstairs. How surprised old Matthew will be, to be sure!"

CHAPTER DCCII.

AFTER MUCH TROUBLE SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SUCCEEDS IN ATTRACTING THE ATTENTION OF OLD MATTHEW.

About this there could be not the shadow of a doubt, for certainly nothing could be further from old Matthew's thoughts than to expect to see Sixteen-String Jack in his house.

For more reasons than one the highwayman was anxious to gain admittance, yet how he was to manage it he scarcely knew.

He crawled along cautiously until he came to a trap-door in the roof.

This he tried to raise.

But tried in vain.

It was firmly secured on the inner side.

Old Matthew was not the individual to leave open such a means of entering his house.

He would have been entirely at the mercy of the police officers, who would have been continually popping in upon him at unawares.

Something like this crossed Jack's mind, and he desisted from any further attempts upon the trap-door.

"No," he said, "it will be quite in vain for me to tug away at the door—it would require thrice my strength even if I had suitable instrument."

Just at this moment Sixteen-String Jack remembered something that had been told him by Dick Turpin.

It was the adventure that was described in an early chapter of this history, and as soon as he remembered it quite a change took place in Jack's manner.

He no longer doubted being able to effect an entrance.

Scrambling to one part of the roof, he came to the square well-like place already described, which was in reality the small yard at the back of the inn.

Down the side of the building, as the reader will remember, a number of iron bars had been fixed in a horizontal position into the brickwork so as to form a rude semblance of a ladder.

Down this it was a very easy matter to descend.

The only difficulty was in slipping over the parapet.

This Sixteen-String Jack contrived to do.

The pieces of iron were firm and well adapted to afford support to both hands and feet.

In a few moments he had reached the little yard.

He drew a breath of relief when he found himself once more standing on firm earth, and then glanced round him to decide upon the means by which he should enter the house, for as yet he was only on the exterior of it.

But he congratulated himself exceedingly upon the address he had displayed in having gained the premises unperceived.

He felt sure that not one of the police officers could have the remotest suspicion of his presence there.

So far then, all was well.

But yet it behoved him to be cautious in his future movements.

It would be a thousand pities to allow any incaution or indiscretion to mar that which had been so well begun.

There was only one window that looked into this little yard—that is, he only saw one on the ground-floor, and towards this Jack crept stealthily.

He endeavoured to peep through and ascertain what was beyond.

But the glass was so thickly begrimed with dirt and dust that he found it impossible.

Then he tried to force the window open.

But in vain.

It was quite secure.

Old Matthew—especially of late—had been most particular about his fastenings.

There was a little secret door communicating with this yard, and also one leading to some stables, but they were so cleverly concealed, that Jack was unable to decide exactly where they were.

As a last resource, he took a coin from his pocket and rapped sharply with it against one of the panes.

Then he waited in silence.

No notice was taken of the summons, and therefore he repeated it, but with no better result.

Jack was growing desperate.

It was then that he recollected Dick had told him about a little bell that could be rung by means of a handle on the doorpost in White Horse Yard.

A wire must communicate with the handle and the bell, and if he could only manage to find this the familiar signal would certainly reach the landlord's ear.

Some pains had been taken to conceal this wire.

But at length, by perseverance, Jack found it.

He pulled it, and though no sound of the tinkling of a bell reached his ears, yet he waited with great confidence for the result.

His patience was not put to a severe trial, for scarcely a moment elapsed before a door opened, and old Matthew appeared.

In his hand he carried a lantern.

The rays from this fell immediately upon the form of Sixteen-String Jack, and old Matthew directed the light so that it fell upon his visitor's countenance.

Then he staggered back several paces in astonishment.

"Don't be alarmed, Matthew!" said Jack.

"Is it really you?"

"I can assure you it's no other."

"I am astonished!"

"No doubt you are."

"But come in—come in; it's dangerous to stay here! Who can tell what ears are listening even now? Come in—come in!"

Jack followed the landlord through the concealed door, which was immediately closed.

Then old Matthew, rubbing his head with an air of great perplexity, inquired:

"But how on earth did you manage to make your way into the yard? I fancied no one could do it without my knowledge."

"Well, you see I have," said Sixteen-String Jack, with a laugh, for now that old Matthew was with him he felt quite secure. "I have heard a great deal about your cleverness in unravelling any mystery or difficulty; now set your brains to work and try if you can find out how I have managed to get here."

"I am afraid——"

"Of what?"

"That you have been seen."

"No—no!"

"You are sure you have not?"

"Quite sure!"

"If you have it's all over with you—I tell you that I can't save you."

"Well, I am content to run the risk," said Jack. "Show me into that little parlour of yours; I want to have a good deal of talk with you; it's a long time since we met."

"It is, indeed," said old Matthew, as he led the way along a dark passage. "And the captain and all the rest of them, are they well?"

"Quite well, and out of all danger. I left them perfectly content."

"I am glad to hear it. But what on earth brought you here?"

"I came to see Tom Davis to know the position of the inn he has taken; but when I got to his house I found no one there, so I thought the best plan would be to come to you at once."

Old Matthew shook his head.

"Ah, Jack, you have no idea what I have gone through since I last saw you!"

"In what way?"

"Oh! it's not that I mind it much, or that it's so very serious, but I allude to the officers."

"The old complaint, I suppose?"

"Yes, just the old style of thing. I have been rather amused than otherwise, for when none of you are here I don't care how much they poke and pry about. I let them search until they are tired, and then laugh at them for their pains."

"And what effect does this defeat after defeat have upon them?"

"No effect at all that I can see, they are as troublesome as ever—nay, scarcely a couple of hours pass but what I am visited by one of those gentry in some shape or other—either a disguised police officer or else a spy."

"It must be very uncomfortable for you, Matthew."

"Very; but yet, as I told you, I don't much mind it, and it furnishes me with a little amusement. I only hope and trust that while you stay here I shall be free from a visit."

"So do I."

This little conversation took place while old Matthew and the highwayman were proceeding along the passage, and just at this moment they emerged into the regular yard belonging to the inn, for the one of which we have been speaking was a kind of supplementary or secret one.

"Now, then," said old Matthew, "to reconnoitre. Just keep quiet, will you, and I will take a peep."

While he spoke, he stepped across the yard, and, leaving the lantern in Jack's hands, he made his way to the little bar window that must be so well known to the reader.

He looked attentively through the panes.

"I fancy it's all right," he said, rejoining the highwayman. "I don't see anyone about, except the girl I leave to mind the bar, and who I know can be fully trusted."

"And how shall we gain that snug parlour of yours, Matthew?"

"Oh, by the old means!"

"But the officers discovered the secret door, did they not?"

"Yes, they did; but I have made a few alterations, and restored the place somewhat to its original appearance. I make no secret about the door now, and use it as an ordinary means of communicating with this yard. You will find," added the landlord, with a peculiar chuckle, "that I have made some other alterations and improvements."

CHAPTER DCCIII.

THE CLOCK SHOWS THE HOUR OF HALF-PAST SIX, AND BREAKS UP THE CONFERENCE BETWEEN SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND OLD MATTHEW.

Old Matthew led Jack into the private parlour, taking the precaution, however, to enter first himself and ascertain that the coast was clear.

Finding that all was right, he beckoned to Jack to come forth.

The highwayman obeyed, and closed the door behind him.

He then observed that where the secret door had been, and which had been demolished by Mr. Wriggles, an ordinary oak door had been fixed, so that there was no sort of secret about it.

Then the door communicating with the bar which formerly had the upper half fitted with glass panes had been removed, and an ordinary door substituted.

He pointed out this change to Sixteen-String Jack, saying:

"You see, I did that after that rascally spy peeped in and interrupted my conversation with the captain. They'd have sharp eyes now to see through that bit of wood."

"Very true," said Jack; "but it strikes me there's one disadvantage connected with it."

"And what is that?"

"Why, formerly, you were able to command a view of the bar, and could tell when danger was approaching."

"So I could," replied the landlord; "but I have not been unmindful of that. The girl who attends to the customers at the bar counter is a distant relation of mine, and, as I said before, can be fully trusted."

Jack nodded.

"Now, do you see that clock up there?"

"I do."

Old Matthew pointed to a small dial fixed against the wall at a considerable height from the floor—in fact, close to the ceiling.

"Now," he said, "I look at that clock, and I can tell by it whether there is danger or not."

"Then it's a capital one," said Jack, "and I should like to have a watch of the same description to carry about with me."

"I daresay you would," said the landlord. "But the clock is only a sham. The works inside are of a peculiar nature, and devised by myself. Now, you see, the hands show the time to be six o'clock."

"Yes," said Jack, "they are straight up and down exactly; but that is not the right time."

"Now, there is a little piece of mechanism that connects the clock with a handle in the bar, which is under the control of my niece, and she perfectly understands how to work the signals."

"You have a rare invention, Matthew, and no mistake."

"Well, I can't help thinking so myself," said old Matthew, in a satisfied tone, and stroking his chin as he spoke. "But as you seem interested, I will, if you like, explain the signals."

"I am deeply interested."

"Very well, then. When the long hand falls to the quarter past six, that shows that there is some one standing at the bar. Not very important, you may think; but, then, the police-officers and men in their employ are very fond of dropping in for a drain, and, whenever they do, I am made aware of it. There—look! there's one just come in. I know it as well as if I was standing there to see him!"

While old Matthew spoke, the minute hand described a quarter of a circle, and showed the time to be a quarter past six.

"Now, if he goes," continued the landlord, "that hand will go back to its original position. If there's anything suspicious about him, it will drop to the half past; if there is immediate danger, it will rise to a quarter to seven."

Sixteen-String Jack, as the reader may suppose, was deeply interested in this arrangement, and complimented old Matthew again upon the ingenuity he had displayed.

"You see!" he exclaimed, "I always have warning, my calculation being that, if any of you were in here, I could conceal you before the officers could enter."

"It's all right now, I perceive," said Jack, whose eyes remained fixed upon the dial.

"Yes, the man has drunk up his glass and departed."

The clock again showed the hour of six.

"Well now," said Jack, "before we proceed to business, just try if you can solve the mystery of my appearance."

"I will try," said Matthew, "and while doing so I won't be idle. Aha! what a deal of trouble and expense Mr. Wriggles has put me to. He thought he had made a wonderful discovery when, with that spiky hammer of his, he found out this cupboard that I had papered over. Now, you see, I have fitted in an ordinary door, and make use of it. I will tell you what I keep here—everything that may be wanted in the shape of eatables and drinkables, so that they can be had without the trouble of going into the bar to fetch them."

"You're a capital schemer, Matthew—I must say it, again and again."

For several minutes the landlord was silent.

He was occupying himself in placing upon the table a very substantial and tempting repast, with other good things to wash it down.

"Now," he said, "I trust we shall have a few minutes' peace."

"I don't know," said Jack; "there goes the finger again."

"Only to the quarter past," said Matthew, coolly. "It's all right—plenty of time. Take no notice until it falls to the half hour, and then I will soon place you in safety."

Whether old Matthew had had his supper or not is more than we can tell, but certain it is he sat down and did full justice to the meal.

Conversation was now somewhat restricted, for Jack had lived long enough in a state of semi-barbarism in Epping Forest to appreciate the comforts of civilisation.

"I can only think of one way," exclaimed old Matthew, suddenly. "You must have got in one of the other houses, climbed over the roofs, and got down by the iron bars into the yard."

"You have hit it," said Jack, slapping the table; "you are cleverer than I took you to be."

He then related in full the whole of his proceedings.

"Ah! I feel more satisfied and content!" said Matthew, leaning back in his chair with the air of one who has had a good meal. I should scarcely think your presence here can be known to anyone, though that there is a grand commotion next door you may safely calculate."

"Yes, I have left no trace behind me," said Jack. "I am sure of it, so perhaps they will put it all down as a drunken freak of Mr. Brown's."

"Very likely. And now, before you go any further, I must insist upon hearing a full account of what the captain and the rest of you have been doing lately."

Sixteen-String Jack knew that the best thing he could do was to comply with this request; moreover, old Matthew had a perfect right to make it.

Therefore, while his narrative was very brief, yet it did not lack completeness.

In fact, it was a summary of all those events of which the reader is already acquainted.

"Well," said old Matthew, when he had concluded, "I am glad to hear things have gone on so well. As for myself, I have little further to tell you than you already know. I have made the improvements I have told you of, and have gone to the expense of putting down a hearth-rug in front of the fire. Perhaps I shall have occasion to tell you the meaning of it."

This was rather mysterious.

Old Matthew evidently meant something by the remark, but before Sixteen-String Jack could ask any questions on the subject, he went on:

"Mr. Wriggles has not given up the hope of getting me into trouble. I must say, that if any of you happened to be captured here it would be almost as bad for me as for you, so I shall take care to prevent it—that's why I am always scheming these little contrivances. Old Wriggles has sworn to have his revenge upon me, and I have sworn to disappoint him if I can."

"And quite right too," said Jack. "I hope you may do it. But now, for fear the opportunity should be lost, describe to me the position of the inn, and tell me why Tom Davis left his house without giving us the information."

"I can promise the first, but not the second."

"Well, then, whereabouts is the inn situated?"

"In a capital place, I assure you. Of course you know——"

Old Matthew stopped suddenly in what he was about to say, and gave utterance to a low whistle.

Sixteen-String Jack glanced up at the clock, and then started to his feet.

"Danger!" he said.

"The dial shows the hour of half-past six."

"Yes," said old Matthew, "I shall be obliged to take the hearth-rug up after all."

CHAPTER DCCIV.

EXPLAINS WHAT OLD MATTHEW MEANT BY SAYING HE SHOULD HAVE TO TAKE UP THE HEARTH-RUG.

WHAT old Matthew could mean by this singular expression Sixteen-String Jack could not think.

But he was all alive to the fact that he was in peril.

It might be, in spite of his precautions, he had been tracked to where he now was.

But while watching the clock, and expecting every second to see the hand rise to a quarter to seven, he nevertheless felt a calm and easy confidence in the power of old Matthew to assist him.

The landlord hastened across the room and quickly slipped a couple of bolts into their sockets.

"Get the lantern," he said to Jack, "and light it. Be quick—everything depends upon speed."

Jack obeyed, and while he was doing so, old Matthew rolled up the hearth-rug.

Then taking a kind of key from his pocket, he inserted it in a crevice in the flooring.

A circular piece was then raised large enough to allow his body to pass easily through.

"Now, Jack," he said—"quick, follow me!"

While speaking, old Matthew rapidly lowered himself through the aperture until he hung the full length of his arms.

Then he let go, for his feet touched the floor of the cellar.

Jack handed down the lantern and followed with all speed.

"Are you going to hide me here?" he asked.

"Yes."

"In the cellar?"

"Yes."

Jack was silent.

"You don't seem to like the idea at present," said old Matthew, "I can tell it by your way. But wait a little. Follow me."

"I don't like being underground," said Jack—"and that's the truth. If you are found out, there is such a poor chance of getting off."

"Don't be afraid," said Matthew—"don't be afraid. You will not be found out."

With this assurance Jack was obliged to rest content.

The cellars underneath the White Horse Inn were of a very extensive description.

They were rather puzzling and confusing, too, to a one unacquainted with them.

There was nothing but a perpetual series of vaults, lined and piled up with barrels of every size and description.

Old Matthew led the way to a kind of sill or raised platform of brickwork, upon which stood a row of very large casks.

In each of these, near the bottom, a tap was fixed, showing that they were in regular use.

In those days, it must be remembered, continual journeys had to be made down in the cellar, for there was no contrivance by which various liquors could be drawn up by a machine into the bar.

"Now, Jack," said old Matthew, "pray make haste. Don't ask me any questions or make any objections. Leave it all to me."

He placed the lantern on the floor as he spoke, and then, with an agility no one would have given him credit for possessing, he stepped upon the sill, for there was space enough between the casks to allow him to place his feet.

Then, raising his arm, he, to Jack's surprise, lifted off the head of a cask.

"Now then," he said, "up with you, and get into the cask. In doing so, mind you do not overturn it."

"But is there no ale in it?"

"No—no, never mind; get in, I tell you. Be quick, or all will be lost! Leave the rest to me."

Thus adjured, Jack obeyed.

It is true he had great confidence in old Matthew, but this was putting his confidence to a very severe test.

Nevertheless he scrambled up, and with some difficulty got into the cask.

He then found that the bottom was dry, and that there was almost room for him to stand upright.

"Now," said Matthew "here's the head of the cask—it fits in in a peculiar manner, and can be removed easily by anyone who is in the secret, but by no one else. There now. I must leave you! Keep your courage up! Let the danger be ever so great, and the search ever so strict, you are safe! Mind that!"

As he spoke, old Matthew fitted the head into the cask, and Jack was left in darkness, and in anything but a comfortable position.

We have no time now, however, to describe his feelings and sensations upon being in such a hiding-place.

We must leave them to the imagination of the reader.

The agility old Matthew displayed was really wonderful considering his age and obesity.

He ran through the cellars to the spot where the opening was above him, and, throwing the lantern up first, climbed up afterwards himself.

Then, with all speed, he replaced the trap-door, and put the hearth-rug straight and tidy.

He extinguished the lamp, placed it in the cupboard, and then, hearing a faint click, he looked up and saw the clock pointed to the quarter to seven.

"Just in time!" he said, with a sigh of relief. "I don't care now not a straw. I must unbolt the door, though, then there will be no suspicion!"

The bolts were well oiled, and they were capable of being drawn back with as much ease as noiselessness.

Then, although rather out of breath by his exertions, old Matthew plumped down in a chair and commenced smoking a pipe most vigorously.

Then the door was suddenly opened, and turning his head he caught sight of his niece.

She was pushed aside, however, by a police officer who strode into the parlour.

He was followed by five of his companions.

They all glanced keenly and suspiciously around them.

Old Matthew noticed with extreme satisfaction the look of vexation and disappointment that afterwards settled upon their features.

"Good evening, gentlemen," he said, with an affectation of good humour. "I hope I see you quite well, and all that sort of thing."

"Oh, d—n your palaver!" was the chief officer's polite rejoinder.

"Well, Mr. Lickfold," said Matthew, pretending to be very respectful, "perhaps you'd have no objections to say what's your errand here to-night?"

It was no other than Mr. Wriggles's deputy, Jim Lickfold, who, at the head of these five other police officers, had entered the parlour.

He had recovered from his wound, but his temper had not improved in consequence.

He swore most horribly to be revenged upon the highwaymen one and all.

Now that he had been injured it was quite a personal feeling that he had against our friends, and he no longer cared for obtaining his share of the reward.

He had been commissioned by Mr. Wriggles to keep a sharp eye on old Matthew and the White Horse Inn.

He had done so, and had been a source of infinite annoyance to old Matthew.

Mr. Wriggles—about whom we shall presently have something to say—was otherwise engaged.

At present, however, in spite of all his cleverness—and it must not be forgotten that this man was very clear-headed and cunning in his way—he had not succeeded in making any discovery.

He had poked and pryed into many a corner, and spent hours in fruitlessly searching about the White Horse, but always with the same result.

Old Matthew was more than a match for him—he was too wide-awake to be caught napping even by Jim Lickfold.

A very cordial antipathy had sprung up between them, which was, however, more malignant in Jim Lickfold's breast than in old Matthew's.

The one was content in defeating his adversary, in fact, by over-matching him.

But as for the other, he longed for the time when he should be able to take the landlord into custody on the charge of having aided, abetted, and concealed a felon, the punishment for doing which was very severe.

CHAPTER DCCV.

JIM LICKFOLD IS CLEVER ENOUGH TO DISCOVER THAT OLD MATTHEW HAD RECENTLY PAID A VISIT TO THE CELLARS.

With these few words of explanation, we will resume.

"You can ask what the devil you like, and be d—d to you!" was Jim Lickfold's reply to old Matthew's question; and then, blowing out his cheeks, he again scrutinised everything there was in the room.

"Been having your supper, have you, Matthew?" he said, at length. "And a d—d good supper too, I should think!"

"Yes," replied Matthew—"I feel rather comfortable."

"So I should think. What a glutton you must be to eat off two plates at once, and with two knives and forks."

"Eh?" said old Matthew, pretending not to understand.

"You know what I mean," said Lickfold. "I was certain there was some one in this room along with you, though where that some one can be is more than I can tell. There's proof of it, for you have not been taking your supper alone."

"I don't remember saying that I had," said old Matthew.

"No, of course not—you left that for me to find out."

"Ah! and some people are so clever!"

"They are," returned Jim, "and it strikes me that some one will find he has been a d—d sight too clever one of these days!"

"I shouldn't wonder," said Old Matthew. "But I confess I have not been taking my supper alone."

"I don't see how you can deny it."

"I never thought of such a thing. But, then, you must know as well as I do, that I am not the only person in this house; I have my niece, who minds the bar."

"Yes—yes," said Jim Lickfold, shaking his head in a very knowing way; "but it won't do, Matthew—it won't do! I have made it my business to get acquainted with your domestic arrangements, and I know you and your niece never sit down to a meal together."

"Not in a general way," said old Matthew; "but with all deference to your knowledge, we make an exception in favour of supper."

"Bah! I don't believe a word of it!"

"I never thought you would. But I don't mind talking, especially after supper—it's agreeable then to have a little chat."

"We know you, old Matthew, and are not to be taken in by your cunning ways—oh! dear no, not at all. I am going to have a thorough search."

"I thought so."

"Oh, did you!"

"Yes, I certainly did. I can always tell by the look of your face when you intend wasting your time by poking your nose into all sorts of holes and corners."

"You be d—d!"

"The same to you Mr. Lickfold; but I have only one favour to ask."

"I sha'n't grant it, then!"

"I didn't think you would, so that's why I am going to tell you what it is. When you search, I wish you'd confine yourself to this room, then I could sit here in my old arm-chair and watch your proceedings. It would be quite a cheerful amusement—it would, I can assure you!"

Jim Lickfold gnashed his teeth with rage as he said:

"Now, my lads, just look round this place! Don't think you will have your labour for nothing—you will be rewarded this time!"

"So you shall!" interrupted old Matthew—"you shall every one of you have a quart of ale apiece when you have done! There now!"

"Mr. Gale!"

"That's my name," said old Matthew, "though I am not often called by it. I have no objection, if it's the same to you."

"Understand, then," continued Jim Lickfold, wrothly, "that you will not presume to interfere with my men!"

"Me interfere?" asked old Matthew, in a tone of amazement.

"Yes!"

"I'd scorn to do such a thing!"

Jim Lickfold made no distinct reply.

The men in the meanwhile, at the command of their leader, rapidly opened and shut the various doors, peeped into all the corners, and otherwise searched the parlour.

"Are you going to join in the search yourself, Mr. Lickfold?" asked Matthew.

"What's that to you?"

"Oh, nothing particular; but if you mean to look on, as I do, you're welcome to accommodate yourself with an arm-chair. Will you take a drop of October, Mr. Lickfold?"

"Look here," said Jim, "you're a clever fellow, Matthew, and I own it."

"I am much obliged to you," said Matthew; "don't think it flattery if I return the compliment."

"Bah! Not so many words! But, clever as you are, I can tell that you are acting a part."

"Can you, though?" said Matthew, as though he had heard something very wonderful indeed.

"Yes," continued Jim Lickfold, raising his voice, "you are acting a part. I am certain of it. I always beware of a dog when he growls, and of a horse when he puts back his ears and looks ugly, and I always beware of you, Matthew, when you're so d—bly polite and hospitable as you are to-night."

"Mr. Lickfold?"

"What?"

"Will you excuse me?"

"For what?"

"Will you believe it when I say it?"

"Believe what?"

"Will you believe that I am in earnest?"

"Oh, d—n it, how many questions do you intend to put?"

"Well, will you believe that I am in earnest when I say it? Come, yes or no?"

"Yes."

"Well then, Mr. Lickfold, you are a clever fellow. I say it, and I believe it, and I give you full credit for it. I will defy anybody to prove the contrary, and all I can say is this—that though whoever got over me would have to rise very early in the morning indeed, yet whoever got over you would have to sit up the whole of the previous night to do it!"

Another string of curses came from Jim Lickfold's lips, for, from the manner in which old Matthew spoke, he had expected something quite different.

At this moment, however, one of the men approached him, and touched his hat respectfully.

"We have searched this room thoroughly," he said, "and can find nothing at all suspicious."

"And so," cried old Matthew, without giving Jim Lickfold time to reply, "you have come to say that you feel entitled to the quart of ale I have promised you?"

"Mind your own business!" said Jim, turning round angrily, and looking old Matthew full in the face.

The landlord did not quail in the least.

But Jim Lickfold suddenly saw something that attracted his attention.

His gaze became fixed, and Matthew wondered much what he was looking at.

That he was gazing at some part of his (Matthew's) person was evident.

"Ahem!" said Jim at length, pretending to cough.

"What now?"

"Excuse me."

"Oh! I suppose I must beware."

"Of what?"

"Of you, for it appears you are putting down your ears and looking ugly."

Matthew laughed boisterously at his own wit, and the other police officers could not forbear from smiling, at which Jim's anger was much increased.

"There," he said, touching Matthew on the sleeve of his coat—"perhaps you'd be kind enough to tell me what that is?"

He pointed to a large stain of reddish-brown colour.

"Don't know," said old Matthew—"never saw it before."

"Strange—very!" exclaimed Jim, rubbing it with his finger. "Now, if I might presume to give a guess——"

"Oh! you may," interrupted Matthew—"just as much as you like—you're very good at that."

"Then I give it as my opinion," said Lickfold, pretending not to notice Matthew's last observation, "that this is rust, and rust of a particular kind—a very particular kind. I should say it was rust off a beer barrel."

"Very likely," said old Matthew, quietly.

Jim Lickfold looked down at old Matthew's feet.

"Ah!" he said—"just as I thought—that confirms it. You have been down in the cellar lately—I know it, because the sawdust is clinging round your boots."

"Now, if you were not such a clever man," said Matthew, "I should think there was nothing wonderful in that, because I make about a hundred journeys into the cellar every day. I am obliged to do it, for I don't like to trust anyone else among the barrels; but of course, Mr. Lickfold, you know best. I humbly give into you entirely in that respect; and therefore, although it did not occur to me myself, I am quite prepared to look upon my having lately gone down into the cellar as quite a wonderful circumstance, provided you say or think it is."

CHAPTER DCCVI.

OLD MATTHEW PROVES HIMSELF A MATCH FOR JIM LICKFOLD, WHOSE SUSPICIONS GROW STRONGER AND STRONGER.

"MATTHEW GALE."

"Sir to you, Mr. Lickfold, being a gentleman."

"None of your nonsence! Understand me, it won't do with me at all! I won't put up with it—that's flat! You have humbugged some others I could name pretty well, but don't attempt to humbug me, for if you do you will find yourself in the wrong box!"

"Me do what?" asked old Matthew, putting on an air of ludicrous astonishment.

"Try to humbug me!"

"The very idea, Mr. Lickfold! Surely you don't think that I should be guilty of anything of the kind?"

"None of your gammon! I tell you it won't do! You had better be particularly careful! I caution you as a friend!"

[TOM KING WARNS HIS COMRADES OF THE APPROACH OF THE POLICE OFFICERS.]

"Thank you," said Matthew, drily.

"If I find anything sufficiently suspicious in my search through these premises to warrant me in taking you a prisoner, rest assured that I shall do it. It would be a most excellent thing if this den of yours was shut up!"

"Well, I don't agree with you there," said old Matthew; "and if you are willing, we will argue the point."

"No, no—nothing of the kind. You would doubtless like to divert my attention; but it won't do, Matthew. Oh, dear no—not at all!"

And Jim Lickfold put his finger by the side of his nose, and shook his head to and fro very slowly, as though to imply how difficult the task would be to impose upon him.

"Oh, just as you please, Mr. Lickfold. I will do whatever you require."

"Then don't be so d—d civil! I always distrust you when you are so damnably polite. I know you mean something by it!"

"It's very hard to be suspected in this way, and to have everything turned against one—very hard indeed. I am a much-injured man!"

"You look like it," said Jim, "I'm blest if you don't! You don't grieve much, or you would not carry so much fat as you do."

"Don't be personal, Mr. Lickfold—don't be personal."

"Fiddle-de-dee! I am going to search your house, and I call upon you, as a good man and true, to give me every facility you can."

"Search away," said Matthew; "you have my consent. You never can say that I once withheld it! Search away, and I hope you will be rewarded for your trouble!"

"Well, we shall see. Come along with me—I want you to lead the way down into the cellars."

No. 151 will be Published next Monday.

"Are you going to search there?" asked Matthew.

"Yes, I am!" said Jim Lickfold, in a triumphant tone of voice. "What do you think of it?"

"Oh! nothing—nothing. I only inquired."

"Now then, lead the way!"

"All right, gentlemen. Pray follow me."

"Here—stop!"

"What's the matter now?"

"Do you go down into the cellar without a light?"

"Oh, no!" replied Matthew. "Dear me, I quite forgot!"

He stepped across the room to the cupboard, into which he had so hastily thrust the lantern.

Jim Lickfold kept close at his heels, determined to watch his every movement.

"Hullo!" he said, as soon as Matthew opened the cupboard door. "D—n me if you ain't a rum 'un! The idea of pitching the lantern into the cupboard in that fashion, and all over those good things too! Why, Matthew, you must have been in a damnable hurry when you did it!"

"Well, it does look like it, I confess," replied old Matthew, quietly, as he took up the lantern. "I can't make it out, the lantern must have fallen off the other shelf!"

"Oh, gammon—gammon, Matthew—that sort of thing won't do with me, I tell you—you won't take me in! I am pretty near certain you have one of those highwaymen in your house, and if you have I don't care a pin what you say or do, I will search till I find him!"

"Very good," said old Matthew. "You will get these crotchets into your head and I can't help it! I say again, search away as much as ever you like!"

Old Matthew opened the door of the lantern, and, as only a few minutes had elapsed since he blew out the light of the piece of candle inside it, the interior was filled with smoke that had come from the smouldering wick.

On the door being opened the smoke poured forth.

Jim Lickfold looked at it critically.

"Aha! Matthew," he said, "you must have been down in the cellar lately—much more recently than I imagined! Why, the candle looks as if it had only just been put out!"

"So it does!" said old Matthew, pretending to be quite surprised. "Would you believe it, the wick is quite warm, as though it had been burning only a minute ago!"

As he spoke, Matthew, in the most off-handed manner in the world, lighted the candle again, and closed the door of the lantern.

"Which is the way to the cellars, Matthew?"

"Follow me and I will show you," replied the landlord, as he went towards the door leading into the bar.

But that is not the way, is it?" asked Jim.

"Of course it is!"

"And is there no other way down into the cellar out of this room?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Aha! I thought so—I was pretty near sure of it! Now, be good enough to show me that way, will you?"

Jim Lickfold's face was at that moment quite a picture. His eyes sparkled, and he rubbed his hands with glee. He thought he had caught old Matthew very nicely.

But that individual did not seem in the least perturbed.

"I was going to show you," he replied. "This is the way!" and again he moved towards the door, and this time he opened it.

"Stop—stop!" cried Jim. "You told me there was a way down into the cellar out of this room."

"So there is," said Matthew—"through this door, across the passage, and down the steps."

"You are very clever, Matthew—very clever! But I tell you I am convinced there is some ready means of getting into the cellar out of this room, and without going through the bar, too! Now, what do you think of it?"

"Well, I can't say I think much of it," returned old Matthew, after a pause, during which he appeared to be considering. "You see, you get such a many odd notions into your head, and there's no accounting for half of them."

"Matthew, you'd better not try me too far! You'll get me into a rage, and then you'll repent it! I shall do something rash—I know I shall; but I want to keep cool."

"I have some magnesia in the cupboard," said Matthew, hastening towards it; "if that will be of any assistance to you, you shall have it with pleasure."

"Once for all—will you cease this foolery? My lads, just look round this place once more, and see if you can find any means of getting down into the cellar."

The men who had enjoyed this scene mightily, hastily dispersed themselves about the room, and began to search.

Old Matthew sat down in his arm-chair to wait the result.

To tell the truth, he had every confidence in the little trap-door under the hearth-rug escaping the officers' attention.

It had been especially constructed by himself, and fitted so closely into its place that, when down, it would defy the keenest eyes to detect it.

But he remembered that he had very hastily shut down this trap-door when he emerged from the cellar, and he was wondering whether it was so closely fitted into its place as it ought to be.

The officers first of all examined the wall, and then, finding nothing suspicious in that quarter, they turned their attention to the flooring.

They did not believe there was much likelihood of finding a trap-door in the flooring.

They believed old Matthew was too cunning a fox to have anything of the kind.

According to the fashion of the times, the boards were covered all over with sand, which served very well as a substitute for carpet in such a place.

They swept this sand aside with their hands in many places.

But the flooring presented quite an ordinary appearance.

They tapped upon it with the butts of their pistols.

But the boards returned in every part a uniformly hollow sound, showing that the cellar was under every part of it.

Then Jim Lickfold went to the fireplace, and, stooping down, pulled up the hearth-rug.

CHAPTER DCCVII.

JIM LICKFOLD DISCOVERS THE TRAP-DOOR IN THE FLOORING, VERY MUCH TO THE CONSTERNATION OF OLD MATTHEW.

JIM LICKFOLD took hold of the hearth-rug at one end and drew it away, rather than lifted it up.

The consequence was that he scraped the sand equally over all parts of the flooring; and old Matthew, as he observed him, gave a sigh of relief.

The round trap-door was fitting closely in its place, and not the least signs of anything unusual could be seen. Jim Lickfold brushed the sand aside as well as he could, but in doing this he only filled up the crack in the floor, making it still more difficult for him to observe the little circle which marked the spot where the trap-door was situated.

But he took out a pistol and began knocking away with it.

As before, he found that everywhere just the same sound was produced, the sound which can always be heard by striking a wooden flooring sharply with a heavy object when there happens to be a cellar underneath.

But old Matthew viewed this proceeding with alarm, and not needlessly.

It so happened that one of the many blows Jim Lickfold dealt happened to fall just on the edge of the trap-door.

So well was the blow delivered, that it caused that portion of the trap-door nearest to him to sink a little way and the opposite side to rise.

He uttered a loud yell of exultation.

Another and another blow followed, and each time the little trap-door rose higher and higher.

At length he was enabled to insert his fingers underneath it.

Then, putting forth all his strength, he attempted to raise it.

But he found his strength unequal to the task.

The circular trap-door fitted into its place and was secured by a spring.

The first blow he had dealt had injured the mechanism, but the spring still held.

"Now we have it," he cried, exultingly—"now we have it! Ah, Matthew, you feel bad now, I should think!"

"Upon my word, I am quite astonished!" said Matthew, who had risen to his feet. "What in the world are you doing there?"

"It's very fine for you to pretend ignorance, old fellow, but it won't do. There—there! What do you think of that?"

As he spoke, Jim Lickfold took up the poker that was standing at the side of the fire.

We have before had occasion to mention this poker.

It was a ponderous instrument indeed, and required no ordinary amount of strength to use it.

But to Jim Lickfold, in his state of excitement, it seemed no heavier than a feather.

While he spoke, he struck the trap-door several heavy blows with the end of the poker, the result of which was that the piece of wood split into two parts and fell into the cellar, leaving a round aperture in the floor.

"There, my fine fellow," said Jim Lickfold, triumphantly, "what do you think of that? You made a mistake if you thought you had a fool to deal with! I ask you again—What do you think of it?"

"Why, I think it a sin and a shame you should come into a man's house and knock it about just as you please. You shall make the damage good. What do you think of that, Mr. Lickfold?"

"Why, I think it makes you look very foolish, Mr. Gale."

"Why so? Here, you get down on the floor and bang away with your pistol till you split one of the boards. Then, not content with that, you must pick up my poker, and bang away again until you have knocked a way clean through the cellar."

"Now, Matthew, do you really think I am such a fool as to be imposed upon in that way? No, you can't think it. I'm sure the idea is absurd. Don't try to bamboozle me any longer. That place in the flooring has been made by you, and carefully fitted with the round trap-door. Luckily, I discovered it. That's the actual state of affairs, is it not?"

"I suppose it's no good for me to say different to you?" replied old Matthew. "It seems, though, that you know a great deal more about my house than I do myself."

"No, Matthew. Just look at the little circumstances. I will put them into a chain if you like."

"I wish you could put them into a rope."

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, nothing— nothing. Go on."

"Well, then, I trace a highwayman—either Tom King or Sixteen-String Jack—to your house. I find you looking flustered. I see signs of your having been down in the cellar. I find a lantern only just extinguished, and here is a convenient little trap-door through which you could descend."

"You're a clever man, Mr. Lickfold—you are, indeed, but you ought to have been a lawyer, or something of the sort. It's a shame you should waste your talents as you do."

"Well, but what do you say to this?" and Jim pointed to the hole in the floor as he spoke.

"Say to it? What's the good of my saying anything to it? It's there."

"Yes, it's there—and what is there down below?"

This question was asked in a very meaning tone.

But old Matthew only replied:

"Why, the cellar, of course."

"Yes, and the highwayman I want. Come, confess I have found him. Save me the trouble of poking about among your barrels, and give him up to me at once. You might just as well do so, I shall be sure to find him."

"That's another crotchet of yours," said old Matthew. "I can't deliver any highwayman up, and that's a fact. I would if I could—but I can't."

"Oh, gammon!"

"I tell you I can't. You have come into my house and disturbed me, and you have broken a hole through the flooring into the cellar. Now, if you're fool enough to go down through it, and poke about all night in my cellar, why do so. I give you my consent—freely give you my consent."

"Oh, thank you for nothing," said Jim. "I should search, whether I had your consent or not."

"Well, you have my consent; but you asked me to save you the trouble of poking about among my barrels. Now, it would grieve me very much to refuse any request you may make; in fact, I could hardly do it, so I will tell you how to save yourself the trouble."

"How?"

"Why, just call your men together."

"Yes—yes."

"And I will give them a quart of ale apiece; then you can all walk out into Drury Lane, and take my word for it, your suspicions are all wrong, and that you wouldn't find the highwayman if you tried."

"Oh, damnation! Do you think I should be such an ass as to act in that fashion. Here, come on, we have stopped jabbering long enough! Now, then, to business. Come on, my lads! One of you stay in here, with a loaded pistol in your hand. You, Smithson, go to the top of the cellar stairs, and if anyone attempts to escape fire on him! I should not have stood so long as I have, only I knew my prey was quite safe. He is down in the cellar, and can't get out. He will have to wait there until I quietly nab him."

"Well don't forget my offer," said old Matthew, "that is all. Remember I undertook to save you all this trouble, but you would not agree."

"Certainly not. Now then—lead the way."

"Which way?"

"Why, down into the cellar, to be sure."

"But you don't expect me to go down through that little round hole, do you?"

"Of course I do. Don't pretend you can't do it; I know you have been down many a time."

"That's a very rash assertion, Mr. Lickfold. Just have the kindness to take the diameter of that little hole, and then—well, you can't take my diameter, but you can measure my circumference, and I have got a sum-book in the cupboard, so that when you have done it you can work it out and find what my diameter is, and then you will see well enough that I could no more go through that little hole than I could walk on the ceiling."

"Oh, you be d—d!" said Jim Lickfold. "You are like some blessed old woman; when your tongue begins to go, there's no knowing when it will stop!"

CHAPTER DCCVIII.

JIM LICKFOLD COMMENCES A VERY RIGID AND SYSTEMATIC SEARCH IN THE CELLARS.

"WELL, I positively declare that I could not squeeze myself through that hole, so let these words put an end to the matter."

And as he spoke old Matthew drew himself up to his full height, and expanded his lungs, so as to make himself look as big as possible.

"Well, you shall try," said Jim Lickfold.

"Well, excuse me—I'd rather not."

"But I say you shall. If you refuse, I will take you into custody at once!"

Matthew knew that this was no idle threat, but he did not alter his demeanour.

"But suppose," he said, "I was to get stuck halfway, how then? What should you do?"

"Oh, never mind, we'd get you down, sure enough."

Old Matthew made many remonstrances, but all to no effect.

Jim Lickfold was inexorable, and determined he should go down into the cellar by that means and no other.

With a heavy sigh, old Matthew prepared to comply.

He seated himself on the floor, and deliberately placed his legs, one after the other, down the hole.

"Make haste!" said Jim Lickfold, and, as he spoke, he put the poker into the fire.

But old Matthew would not hurry.

It had been a long time since he had enjoyed himself so thoroughly, or had so much fun, as on that occasion. He was determined to prolong the scene as much as possible.

Very gently, then, and very carefully, he lowered himself down until only a little more than half of his body remained above.

He then expanded his lungs to the utmost, and held his breath.

It was manifest then that the hole was too small, and that he could not by any possibility pass through it.

He struggled about in a most furious and ridiculous way.

The officers laughed at the joke, and they all believed that the landlord had stuck half-way, and could neither get up nor go down.

"Now then," said Jim Lickfold, turning round to him, "are you going down or not?"

"I can't!" gasped the landlord.

"Well, I shall ask you twice more, and if you don't go then I shall make you. Are you going down?"

Old Matthew puffed himself out more than ever.

Jim Lickfold took the poker out of the fire.

The top of it was just red-hot, and he raised it in a threatening manner.

"Now then," he cried, "for the second and last time—are you going?"

Old Matthew saw the red-hot poker approaching.

He knew nothing would delight Jim Lickfold so much as to inflict some pain upon him, therefore he reduced his size in an instant, and slipped through the hole with a rapidity that would have done credit to a harlequin.

"Gone!" said Jim Lickfold, as he flung the poker under the grate and jumped down after him.

"Murder?" said old Matthew. "What do you mean by acting like that? Oh my toe—my toe! Murder—murder!"

"What's the matter now?"

"Matter?" said Matthew, limping about. "I have got one particular soft corn, and you dropped on it with those d—d heavy riding-boots of yours!"

Jim Lickfold was quite delighted.

"You should not have played the fool, then, in the way that you did, and then you would not have got it. I knew well enough you could slip through that hole if you only liked."

Old Matthew continued to groan out about his toe, but it was all pretence, though it answered his purpose.

Jim Lickfold believed he had done him an injury, and therefore felt content.

"Now then," he cried, "we can't wait while you go hobbling about in that fashion, there has been time enough lost already. Now let us search the cellars."

According to Jim's instructions, one of the police officers remained in the parlour.

He seated himself in old Matthew's easy-chair, and held a pistol in his hand, cocked and loaded, and ready for immediate use.

There was a flagon of ale on the table, which had been placed there for old Matthew and Sixteen-String Jack.

The officer looked at it longingly for awhile, and then, as all remained still, he proceeded to taste its contents.

The other officer, who had been called Smithson, was not in such comfortable quarters.

He was standing at the top of the cellar steps, also with a pistol in his hand, and feeling quite determined to shoot anyone he saw attempting to escape.

Jim Lickfold believed that by adopting these measures he had made sure that no one could leave the cellars unseen.

He waited just underneath the trap-door until he was rejoined by the other police officers, one of whom carried the lantern.

"Give me the light, said Jim.

The lantern was handed to him at once.

He held it above his head, so as to diffuse its light, and then he looked carefully all round him.

The first thing that struck him was that the cellars were of very great extent.

This would make the task of searching all the more difficult.

On the other hand, however, he could only see two places in which the highwayman could be concealed.

It must be remembered that Jim started with the conviction in his mind that either Sixteen-String Jack or Tom King was hidden somewhere in the cellar.

"He is either lurking behind some of those barrels," he muttered, "or else he is in one of them; in either case we shall find him sooner or later."

He took up his position in the middle of this cellar.

"I will begin to search here," he said. "Now, my lads, look all about you. Pry into every corner; look behind all the barrels; and, if you find any that are empty, pull them down and shake them about well to make sure he is not in one of them."

The men responded willingly enough.

They had a great opinion of Jim Lickfold, and shared in his belief that the highwayman was in the cellar, and that he would be found if well looked for.

They commenced their work, then, with great spirit and energy.

Old Matthew appeared to be intent upon one thing only, and that was rubbing his corn, which he pretended was very bad indeed.

The police officers drew their cutlasses, and poked about behind the barrels in a manner that would have been highly dangerous to anyone who might have been concealed there.

But no cry of pain rewarded them for their trouble.

"There's no one behind the casks in this cellar, sir," they said at length, addressing Jim Lickfold.

"Well, then," rejoined that worthy, "try the barrels of the next. Tap against them with your pistols. You will soon find by the sound whether they are empty or full. If the latter, you can let them be; but if they are empty, pull them down, and roll them about well. If he is in one we shall be sure to find him."

The men set about this with greater alacrity than ever.

Of the two they thought it far more likely that the highwayman would be concealed in a cask than behind one.

They were all aware that such would be an excellent hiding-place, and Jim Lickfold was raised in their estimation for having been clever enough to think of it.

They pulled down the casks that were empty in such a rough manner as to bring forth a torrent of remonstrances from old Matthew.

The officers finding barrel after barrel perfectly empty began to grow enraged, and consequently they threw them down with great violence.

"Stop—stop!" cried the landlord. "I protest against this—I protest against it! I won't stand it, and that's flat! You will knock all these casks to pieces. They don't belong to me, but to the brewer, though I shall have to make good the damage, and it will cost me no end of money to have men in to put the barrels in their proper places!"

CHAPTER DCCIX

JIM LICKFOLD AND HIS OFFICERS PAUSE BEFORE THE BARREL IN WHICH SIXTEEN-STRING JACK IS CONCEALED.

It is now quite time that we made some mention of Sixteen-String Jack.

That he was not at all comfortable in the hiding-place old Matthew had found for him the reader need scarcely be told.

Everything had happened with such suddenness, that until he found himself fairly left alone in the cellar with the head of the cask fastened down upon him, he had had no time to deliberate.

If he had, he would certainly have remonstrated with Matthew, and probably refused to get into the cask altogether.

He remained in the darkness and silence for some time waiting [illegible]ly to be released.

Although the head of the cask was fastened down, he found that he was able to breathe with perfect ease and freedom.

In such a condition as this, a little thing will distract the attention, so Jack could not rest until he discovered how this was.

He at length found there was a small hole near the top of the cask, through which he was just able to thrust his little finger.

The mystery was now explained.

There was no fear that he should be suffocated if he remained in that cask ever so long a time.

"I don't half like it," he said to himself for about the hundredth time—"that's a fact! I wish I had said so to old Matthew at first. If the officers come down into the cellar I shall give myself up for lost! The first thing they think of will be to look in the empty casks, and then found I shall be!"

Just as Sixteen-String Jack came to this conclusion he heard the loud knocking on the parlour floor which was caused by the officers while searching for the trap-door.

He wondered greatly what it could be.

Then, afterwards, he heard the trap-door demolished.

Then the murmur of voices, and finally the entrance of the police officers into the cellar.

Then how he chafed in his place of concealment.

He would have given the world to have been in the open air and at liberty to go in what direction he chose.

Without old Matthew's assistance, he knew very well he could not get out of the cask, and to have made any noise would have been to procure his own discovery.

So, very wisely, he kept still.

He heard the barrels as they were rolled about by the police officers, and he thought:

"It will come to my turn soon, and then they will be sure to find me."

We will now describe the proceedings of the officers, leaving the reader to understand that Sixteen-String Jack could hear perfectly every word that was spoken.

That his alarm increased instead of abated may be guessed.

The officers rapidly searched every cask in the first cellar.

They could find nothing, and they announced the fact to their leader.

"All right," he said. "Don't despair because you haven't found him here. I scarcely thought you would, but judged it best that this cellar should be searched before the rest. Now pass on to the next, and we may be more fortunate there."

The officers obeyed.

But it was no longer with the same amount of alacrity that they had formerly displayed.

Still they did their duty well, and made a thorough search.

The result was still more discouraging.

Nothing whatever was found.

In the first cellar all the casks had been empty.

In the next several were full, not having yet been tapped.

Only one more cellar now remained to be examined.

This was the one where Jack was hid.

Jim Lickfold lost part of his confidence, and old Matthew kept up a perpetual string of remonstrances and grumbling.

Sixteen-String Jack resigned himself to his fate.

"Don't be down-hearted, my lads!" cried Jim Lickfold. "The third time is always lucky, you know that. He must be here somewhere; I am convinced of that, and as we have searched two cellars, and without result, and this is the only one that remains, why he must be here, of course."

The officers could not see the force of this reasoning quite so clearly.

They went to work, however, in the same fashion as before.

They poked about behind the barrels with their cutlasses, and Sixteen-String Jack heard the sharp steel weapons scraping against the edge of the cask in which he was concealed, and only separated from him by the woodwork.

"The next," he said, "will be to pull down the barrels."

This was true enough

But it so happened that in this cellar there were only very few empty casks. The others were in use—that is to say, they had a tap fixed in the lower part

We have before mentioned that in those days there was no contrivance by which the various liquors could be drawn up into the bar, and the journey had to be made down to the cask in each case.

"Now you've seen the whole of my stock-in-trade," said old Matthew, "quite as well as if you were excise officers. These casks are in use, but you are welcome to search them all, empty or full; though, mind you, if you don't find him, I shall make you responsible for all the damage."

Sixteen-String Jack thought this a very daring speech.

The officers went first to those casks which were unprovided with taps.

There were four of them.

They knocked against them with their pistols, and the hollow sound returned proclaimed that they were empty.

One after another they were pulled down off the sill on which they stood, and shaken to and fro.

But they were empty—it was perfectly certain no one was concealed in any of them.

Jim looked puzzled.

There were only those casks that had taps in them left, and it was ridiculous to suppose that Sixteen-String Jack could be hidden in one of those.

But, unwilling to confess himself beaten, Jim stepped forward himself, with a pistol, and knocked against the first of the barrels.

It returned a dull, sullen sound.

'Ah!" said Matthew, "you may knock away at that. I only tapped that barrel the day before yesterday. I don't suppose there has been three gallons drawn out of it That's my very best mild."

Jim took no notice, but knocked at the rest.

"That's not quite so full," said Matthew. 'Let me see," he added, knocking against the barrel with his knuckles, "this is about where the ale is, you see. This one is rather more than three-parts full."

Jim Lickfold passed on to the next.

This was the one in which Sixteen-String Jack was hidden.

The highwayman's feelings may perhaps be imagined, but certainly cannot be described.

"Ah, now!" continued old Matthew, heaving a heavy sigh, "knock against that, Mr. Lickfold. It's as hollow as a drum. Ah! there, I told you so! You'd think it was empty, wouldn't you? It is very nearly, I am sorry to say."

Jim Lickfold looked at him suspiciously.

"Now, I could tell a little history about that very cask. You must know that it has been in these cellars ever since I have been landlord of the White Horse, and that's more years than you can remember, I know. That ale was brewed on the day when George the First was crowned. I was a young man then, and there was great rejoicings everywhere, I can assure you. I said to myself, 'I'll keep this cask of ale on purpose for old ale,' and so I did, and I didn't tap it till his present Majesty ascended the throne."

The police officers, who were very tired and glad of a rest, and whose mouths, moreover, were very dry, listened with considerable interest to old Matthew's narrative.

Jim Lickfold regarded the landlord out of the corners of his eyes in a suspicious manner, but said nothing.

Old Matthew tapped the cask again, and gave another sigh.

CHAPTER DCCX.

THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE OFFICERS IN THE CELLARS OF THE WHITE HORSE GROW MORE AND MORE INTERESTING.

"Such ale this was," he continued, "the like has never been brewed. Yet I have not tasted it many times myself, for I have been nursing it up; but, although it's getting down so low, it is as good as ever it was. It draws out as clear as a bell, and the froth on the top is really a sight to look at. It's a little bit hard through being kept so long. I will tell you how hard it is. If I was to give you some in a jug, you would not be able to bite it off, you would have to empty the jug at a draught before you could take it from your lips."

"You're making a great deal of fuss about it, Matthew!"

"Well, excuse me, Mr. Lickfold, I am; this is quite a pet of mine, this barrel is. I've got a weakness for it. It's only a favoured few I have allowed to taste of its contents. Let me see, about how much might I say was left? Certainly, not half of it—the cask isn't half-full, I'm sure."

Old Matthew stopped, and rapped his knuckles very sharply against the cask.

It returned a clear hollow sound until he got about three-parts down from the top.

Then the character of the sound changed

It was dull.

"Ah! you see, Mr. Lickfold, it's only a quarter full—only a quarter of a barrel left of that fine old ale. I knew it must come to an end some day; but when you get it down you, you'll find it search through every vein you've got, and warm you from top to toe!"

"Then I think the best thing you can do, Matthew, is to give us a drop," said Lickfold; "for I'll be d—d if your cellars are not as cold as a church-yard vault!"

All the police-officers shivered immediately, and were surprised to find how exceedingly cold they had grown.

Old Matthew hesitated.

"It's rather a cool request," he said, at length, "I must say that about it! Here have you put me to all manner of inconveniences and trouble—done me a deliberate injury—destroyed my night's rest, and now, because you find your suspicions groundless, you have the conscience to ask me for a drop of my very best ale that I wouldn't sell for a shilling a pint!"

"Well, Matthew, you know how it is," said Jim Lickfold—"jooty is jooty!"

"Yes, to be sure it is," assented Matthew.

It was rather unfortunate for his cleverness, but it was a fact, notwithstanding—like most clever people, Jim Lickfold had a failing, and that failing was an intense love for a drop of strong old ale.

When he heard old Matthew begin to talk, his mouth began to water, and it was with great difficulty that he could resist the impulse of turning the tap on and having a draught there and then.

Moreover, he had talked a great deal, and his throat was dry.

The remainder of the officers were fond of ale of any sort, provided they could get it on the cheap; so they added their request to their leader's, reminding old Matthew that he had promised them a quart apiece.

"But not of this old stingo," he said—"not of this old stingo. I promised you a quart of ale I know, and I will be as good as my word!"

"Well, Matthew," said Jim Lickfold, whose desire to taste the wonderful ale had reached its highest pitch, "I can't help having my suspicions about you, and I would have laid a wager that the man I wanted was concealed in this cellar! But you are a cunning old fox, and it is hard indeed to get the better of you!"

"Now, if you begin to pay compliments," said old Matthew, "I really sha'n't be able to refuse you!"

"Well, I think you had better not!"

"Think I had better not?"

"Yes.

"Why not?"

"Because I should pull the cask down and roll it about, and that'll spoil your old ale!"

"That it would; and it would almost break my heart as well!" said Matthew. "It must have settled considerably all these years; and if it was once stirred up, the ale would be good for nothing!"

"Very well, let us have some."

"Not on compulsion," said Matthew—"not on compulsion; but I can't help being good-natured—it's a failing of mine—been a great loss and hindrance to me on my way through the world; it's quite a bad thing, that good-nature, and I have been quite a victim to it!"

While thus speaking, old Matthew produced a tankard.

Where he got it from not one of the officers knew, nor did they trouble themselves to inquire.

But old Matthew provided himself for this contingency.

Stooping down, he drew out a quantity of the ale; and certainly by the fragrance which it diffused over the cellar, and the manner in which it frothed up, his encominms upon it seemed quite justified.

"There," he said, handing it to Jim Lickfold; "this'll make sad inroads upon it, this will. But you shall taste it—you shall taste it, and I'll warrant you'll say you never tasted such stuff in your life!"

Jim Lickfold eagerly snatched the tankard out of the landlord's hand, and placing it to his lips, took a long pull at the contents—so long that it seemed as though it would never come to an end.

"I told you," said old Matthew, "how it would be. I'll defy anybody to bite that ale off—they can't do it; you must go on drinking to the last drop."

Jim Lickfold returned the empty tankard.

"Now, don't think I begrude it," said old Matthew, as he prepared to fill the tankard again, "for I don't; but I must give you one caution—don't you drink too much of this. It isn't ordinary ale, bear in mind, and the way in which it gets up into your head is quite surprising."

Jim Lickfold smacked his lips.

"Upon my life," he said, "I never did taste anything like it—it's grand!"

By this time another tankard was full, which old Matthew handed to the officer nearest to him.

Jim Lickfold looked at it with longing eyes.

But the man seized it with avidity, nor did he return the vessel to old Matthew until the last drop was drained.

"Isn't it good?" asked the landlord.

"Splendid! It's just like brandy."

"Yes, only ten times better!" said Jim Lickfold.

This made the other officers more impatient that ever.

Old Matthew drew another tankard full.

The ale ran out in a very fine, clear stream.

Whatever suspicions Jim Lickfold might have had concerning the cask when old Matthew first began to talk about it, they were now completely dispelled.

It was out of the question for any one to be hiding in a barrel of such ale.

Old Matthew's caution, however, was not an ungrounded one.

The manner in which the famous ale mounted to Jim Lickfold's brain was really astonishing.

All his cunning and subtlety were completely gone—in fact, he almost forgot the object that had brought him there.

The two other police-officers who had been left on guard were summoned to have their share.

They very gladly responded.

They were all so anxious about drinking the ale themselves that they failed to observe that old Matthew never tasted a drop of it.

Jim Lickfold was so elated that he endeavoured to sing:—

> "It's a very good world that we live in—
> To give, or to spend, or to lend in:
> But to beg, or to borrow, or to get a man's own,
> 'Tis the d—dest old world that ever was known."

Old Matthew put on an expression of affright.

"What's the matter?" asked Jim.

"Don't make that noise—pray don't! You alarm me—it was quite awful!"

"Well, never mind," said Jim Lickfold; "I am not in voice to-night, and that's a fact. But I say, Matthew, old fellow, d—n you, give us another tankard! Don't be stingy with that old stingo of yours! I say another tankard, d—n you, and here's good luck to everybody!"

"Now, you'd better not," said old Matthew, who had a tankard in his hand—"I tell you you had better not!"

"You be d—d!"

The other officers looked on.

"Now, I warn you," said Matthew, "this is very strong ale, and nobody can drink more than a tankard of it without it getting the better of them. I shouldn't like it to get the better of you, Mr. Lickfold—it would grieve me to the heart—it would indeed."

"Oh, d—n you, don't preach me a sermon, but give me the ale! There, that'll do. Now, once more, here's good luck to everybody!"

CHAPTER DCCXI.

JIM LICKFOLD AND THE POLICE OFFICERS FIND THE OLD STINGO RATHER TOO STRONG FOR THEM.

These last words sounded hollow, guttural, and indistinct, for, before he had finished the sentence, Jim Lickfold had dipped his nose into the tankard.

He sucked away at it, to the great admiration of his men, until not a drop remained.

Then he flung the tankard in the air.

"Hurrah!" he said, making an attempt to catch the tankard as it fell, and failing. "Here's three cheers, old Matthew! You're a brick!"

"How do you feel now?" said old Matthew. "Rather queer about the brain-box, and not very steady on your legs?"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, you may be able to carry two tankards of that ale, but I doubt it. I fancy the load will get too heavy for you before you get far."

"Oh, never mind," said Jim, who was now hopelessly intoxicated—"never mind. Come along, my boys—come along."

"Where are you going?" asked old Matthew.

"Well, it's no good stopping here, is it?"

"You are quite welcome to do so, if you like."

"I know that, Matthew—I know that!" said Jim Lickfold, seeming as though he was about to burst into tears, he was so deeply affected by old Matthew's hospitality. "You're a rare good fellow, you are; and we'll drink your health with musical honours—that's what we'll do, and will go afterwards."

"Oh, you are too good," said Matthew—"much too good."

"Not a bit of it! I tell you we'll do it! Won't we, my lads?"

"We will!" replied the officers, who had drank just enough to make them only partially conscious of what they were about.

"Now, Matthew, it's no good for you to refuse. We'll drink your health with musical honours."

"But not down in the cellar?"

"Yes, down in the cellar—here, on this d—d identical spot we'll drink your health with musical honours! It's no good, you can't turn me, we'll do it!"

There was a slight twinkle in old Matthew's eye which none of the officers observed.

"We want some more tankards," said Jim Lickfold—"we must have some more—we'll have a tankard apiece all round, and drink your health with musical honours!"

"Mr. Lickfold."

"What now?"

"Will you let me give you a caution? I tell you this old ale is very, very strong, and if you drink much more of it, it will make you all insensible. Now, I don't want this to happen!"

"Oh, you be d—d, Matthew, you're a clever old fox; but I can see through all your schemes; why, they are as clear as daylight to me. You don't want us to have any more of that jolly old ale; but I am determined! I have made my mind up. Here, Smithson."

"Yes, sir."

"Go up into the bar, and make haste and bring half a dozen tankards with you; we'll have one all round, and drink old Matthew's health with musical honours."

"Hurrah!" cried the men, excessively delighted with this proposition.

Smithson disappeared.

But he was rather surprised to find what an effect that one tankard of ale had had upon him.
